CONDUCTOR, Mr. COSTA.—ON FRIDAY, May 16th, Mendelssohn's ELIJAH. Vocalists—Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss E. Birch, Miss Dolby, Miss M. Williams; Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Novello, and Herr Formes. The orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 performers. Tickets, 3s.; reserved, 5s.; central area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter-hall; or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing-cross.

MRS. ALEXANDER NEWTON

BEGS to inform her Pupils and Friends that she has returned to Town for the Season. Her Terms for lessons or concerts may be known on application at her residence, No. 5, Percy-street, Bedford-square.

THE MISSES SMITH, VOCALISTS,

BEG to announce that they have just arrived from Scotland, for the London season. All letters to be addressed to 6, Albert-terrace, Notting Hill.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Sturley Villas, Sturley Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Furkes, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street; and at all Booksellers,—Saturday, May 3, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; payable in advance; to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Messrs. Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden.

No. 19.—VOL. XXVIII.

SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1851.

PRICE FOURPENCE.

A NATIONAL OPERA.

We have entered the field of discussion, and must maintain our ground. There is plenty of room, without trespassing on our neighbour's estate, or even sitting cross-legged upon his wall. Let us use the space allotted to us, and chalk out a plan for future proceedings.

Since the last fortnight we have been deluged with letters on the subject of English musicians in general, and English Opera in particular. (By English, let it be understood, we mean British; but we dislike the term, which has been applied to all sorts of common places.) From the crowd of suggestions they contain, however, we are unable to select one to the purpose, one that holds out the slightest possibility of accomplishment. We published a communication, in our last number, from the pen of an esteemed contributor, and we must own that we do not entertain any great notion of the scheme he has proposed. Suppose that Mdlle. Jenny Lind, with her usual generosity, consented to appear for a few nights on the English stage, and in English opera, the result would, no doubt, be the accumulation of a considerable sum of money for the treasury of the projected establishment. But quid postea?—what next? Where could an attraction be found, of sufficient importance and interest to replace Mdlle. Lind after her departure? We are decidedly adverse to the hot-bed ("star") system, and protest that, unless a national theatre can thrive upon its own claims to public attention, there had better be none at all. We do not by any means object to foreign singers; on the contrary, we should like them to join us—but as permanent members of the establishment, not otherwise. The more talent we can bring together for the executive department the better. The object in founding a national Opera would be, of course, to have the works of native composers brought before the public in a proper style of completeness and general excellence. But the mere weight of Mdlle. Jenny Lind's name, to say nothing of her talent, for a few representations, would produce a reaction that might prove fatal. Even Her Majesty's Theatre, where there are so many great singers, has hardly recovered from the Lind-triumphs of 47, 48, and 49. To recover from triumphs seems an odd expression, though in the present case it is pertinent enough. These triumphs were a fever, and the fever, once subsided, left the pulse of the public so faint and low, that it is only now beginning, in 1851, to regain its moderate and healthy action.

If, however, our correspondent merely intends that Mdlle. Lind should give a series of concerts for the benefit of our musicians, whereby to form the basis of a fund by aid of which a National Opera might be founded, our objection of course will not hold. But we have another, and an uglier, to make. The funds once raised by the charity of a foreigner, the question would arise as to how they should be appropriated; to whom entrusted, and under whose direction expended. Mdlle. Jenny Lind devotes a thousand or two thousand pounds for the purpose of instituting an English Opera. Granted; but who represents the cause of the whole body of musicians? What number of gentlemen could reasonably step forward and say, "We are English Opera—give the money to us?" Or, on the other hand, presuming that half-a-dozen or a dozen professors associate, under the banner and title of "National English Opera," with what pretext can they ask Mdlle. Lind for £1000—which represents her services for two concerts? She would answer them, and with reason, that no such institution existed—that is, no institution acknowledged by the community at large. It is very easy for a handful of professors to call themselves English Opera, and, forgetting they are but individuals, confound themselves with the body-musical. Their application to Mademoiselle Jenny Lind would be little better than asking her to make them a present, which they have no more right to do than any other handful of professors. Indeed; emboldened by the success of the first handful, a second handful might readily come to Mademoiselle Jenny Lind, and ask her for a second £1000, under the same pretext; since the one handful would have quite as much right to dub themselves English Opera as the other. It is unhappily but too well known that our musicians are split into factions—factions so violently opposed to each other that we utterly despair of any scheme of association ever meeting with the approval of the large majority. In any case, however, the notion of twenty or thirty gentlemen going to Mademoiselle Jenny Lind, to entreat her for £1000, is preposterous and untenable; and, as we have hinted, the subsequent appropriation of the money would lead to squabbles that could only end in a general schism, or at best in a state of inaction similar to that at present indulged in by the committee of another and a very different kind of association, for whose specified object Mademoiselle Jenny Lind did absolutely provide something more than that sum, although two years have elapsed and the Mendelssohn Testimonial is as much in embryo as if Mademoiselle Jenny Lind had provided nothing at all. These and other considerations, which, if requisite, we shall advance on a future occasion, induce us to give our unqualified vote against the suggestion of our correspondent, even supposing, which we do not, that it could possibly be carried into effect.

A letter from another correspondent ("Philo-Musica,") inserted in the present number, contains four objections to the scheme of a commonwealth, all of which are, we think, unanswerable. First, no set of professionals would risk the money; second, none could be found sufficiently disinterested to overlook considerations of individual advancement, and act for the general good alone; third, a great commonwealth has been attempted, and failed; fourth, a small one has been attempted, and failed "most lamentably." Let us hasten, however, to say that we had no more idea of a commonwealth than our correspondent. Our proposition, for some twenty musicians to club together and take Drury Lane Theatre, was simply directed to the present year 1851, which, being the epoch of the Great Exhibition for all Nations, we considered to be an opportunity too good to let pass without something being tried. Out of this a plan more definite and likely might have sprung; but we never intended it to apply to a permanent establishment. The idea of petitioning parliament (which "Philo-Musica" advances) appears to us quite as "Utopian" as the Commonwealth which he derides. It is one thing to petition parliament, another thing to have the petition "laid on the table," and a third to have the petition forgotten as soon as it is read; if, indeed, it be read. Besides, need we remind our correspondent, that the National Drama has no such support from Government, and that, consequently, the National Opera has no evident plea to claim it, and certainly no chance whatever to obtain it. Moreover, the feeling of this great nation is, and has ever been, that all speculations should subsist on their own unassisted merits. True, the French have their great theatres "subventionnés" by the government, and we are not disposed at present to enter into a discussion as to which is the better system, theirs or ours. It is worth observing, however, that, in spite of its subvention, the greatest theatre in Paris, the Theatre de la Nation (Grand Opera) is in a declining state, and but for the operas of a single composer (Meyerbeer—a foreigner), would, in all probability, have ceased to exist ere this.

Our object in the foregoing observations is to call attention to a question of immediate import to our musicians. Now is the time, we think, or never. A reaction is unquestionably going on in the public mind, and if the change cannot benefit, it surely cannot hurt us. In a worse condition the English musicians can hardly be; it is possible they may improve it; but this depends wholly upon their own exertions. They must seize occasion "by the forelock," and though "better late than never" is a maxim not to be despised, it is quite possible to arrive "in time to be too late." Some new phenomenon may come, to occupy the public attention, and then adieu, once more, for years, to poor English Opera!

We have got to the end of our limits, and must "chalk out a plan for future proceedings" another time. Meanwhile our columns are open to those who may be inclined to communicate their notions on subject—bearing always in mind that "brevity is the soul of wit," and that in the height of the Opera season our pages are more than usually crowded.

MORNING POST versus LE TRE NOZZE.

From the following resumé, in the notice of Signor Alary's new opera, published in the Morning Post of yesterday, it would appear that the critic was not, like some of his confrères, enthusiastically moved by the genius of the composer:—

"Having been thus far fortunate, Signor Alary may possibly be indifferent to the opinions of musicians, and if so, he will be able to endure with greater fortitude the severity of the sentence we reluctantly pronounce, which is, that his work is wretchedly bad. We possess not the art of killing by inches. We abominate sneers, and prefer expressing our opinion, to leaving it to be guessed. In all our experience of music we never sat out an opera more utterly destitute of invention, or more densely crowded with plagiarisms upon the worst masters of the worst school. All the slang of the modern Italian repertoire has been pressed into the service, and if the composer occasionally forsakes his pet models, it is to present us with a maimed version of some popular dance tune. The melodies and forms are stale, the harmonies common-place or outrés, the instrumentation confused and noisy, and the concerted voicings clumsy and at variance with the true principles of the art. The only merit the work possesses consists in the feeling for theatrical effect, and attention to the peculiarities of certain singers, which has evidently guided Signor Alary in his labour of compilation; and to this, combined with the inimitable performances of the artists to whom it was last night entrusted, its success is entirely to be attributed.

"It is with extreme regret that we pass this heavy censure, but justice now compels us to do violence to our feelings."

This is speaking out, and no mistake. It is not a sneer, but a blow, and, to superficial observers, the "violence" would seem to be done rather to the feelings of Signor Alary than to those of the writer. We have quoted the passage as a specimen of straight-forward criticism, as an expression of opinion, blunt without bile, cruel without coarseness. We fear, however, that it has no chance of being reprinted in the "Opera Box."

IMPROVEMENTS IN PIANOS.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

33, Great Pulteney-street, 7th May, 1851.

SIR,—An article in a morning paper of this day professes to give an account of improvements effected in pianos within the last 30 years. Describing the metal bracing now in universal use, but variously applied, the writer gives the dates, and attributes the merit of the invention, erroneously. You will perhaps, out of justice to native makers, kindly give room for the following statements, which we are prepared to substantiate, 1st, on evidence of living witnesses, and 2dly, of pay-books of the workmen mentioned:—

1st, Steel tension bars were applied by us to the treble of three grand pianos in 1808. Alexander Finlayson, still in our employ, finished these pianos.

2dly, Algernon Black, now dead (son alive in our employ), finished the first grand piano, with four steel tension bars, in 1818. From that time bars became general, but string plates of metal were not used until 3dly, In 1821, vide our pay-book, Samuel Hervé, now dead, applied a metal string plate to several of our square pianos. From that time string plates in square pianos became general. They were also partially applied to grand pianos, in conjunction with the tension bars long previously in use; but 4thly, In 1827, We finished many grand pianos with solid metal bars attached to the string plate—James McIlwham, still in our employ, being the marker-off.

It is due to Messrs Stoddart to state that they were the first to patent a perfect system of metal bracing for the grand piano. It consisted of hollow metal bars attached to a metal string plate. The inventor, Mr. Allen, is still alive, now a tuner in Mrs. Chappell's employ.

We leave to others to rectify many other inaccuracies in the article.

We remain, Sir, your obedient servants,
JOHN BROADWOOD & SON.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

London, May 8th, 1851.

SIR,—In reply to a letter of Messrs. Broadwood, published in the Morning Post of Thursday, I beg permission to send the following statement which I can substantiate.

There is no doubt but that metal bars may have been applied to pianofortes, in some instances, previous to Messrs. Thorn and Allen's patent for compensation tubes, since, otherwise, their patent would have secured to them the sole right of bracing with metal, and would have prevented Messrs. Erard and Broadwood from practising that method of bracing. But a complete system of metal, of nine solid bars, over the strings of the pianoforte has never been applied to a grand pianoforte previous to Erard's new patent action, in 1824. The model which served Messrs. Erard's men to work upon is still in the possession of Messrs. Erard, and may be seen at their warerooms in Great Marlborough-street. It was not until Erard's patent repetition pianofortes met with great success, that Messrs. Broadwood began, so late as 1827 (from their own admission), to manufacture pianos with the solid metal bars over the strings. Before they adopted this, which is the best plan of bracing, they had been, for some time, placing the bracing bars under the sounding board of the instrument, which mode of bracing was not near so effective.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
PIERRE ERARD.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The Figlia del Reggimento on Saturday brought back the vocal enchantress, Sontag, with her Parisian laurels fresh upon her brow. Maria was the part in which during the winter season, Madame Sontag took captive the hearts of all the habitués of the Salle Ventadour, and achieved her most signal success. But it was at Her Majesty's Theatre, last year, for the first time, that she first assayed the character of the Daughter of the Regiment, and won for herself a new renown. Let not the Parisians, therefore, plume themselves on having discovered the comic element in Madame Sontag's talent. A priori, it could hardly be supposed that the character of Maria would be suited to Madame Sontag's capacities and susceptibilities, considering the parts she assumed when she first came to this country, and those when she returned in 1849—Donna Anna, Zerlina, Countess Almaviva, Susanna, Rosina, Linda, Desdemona, Amina, Semiramide, &c.—which are so entirely different from the enthusiastic Vivandiere. Those, however, who remembered Madame Sontag's comic performances in Rosina, Susanna, Norina, &c., were in some measure prepared for her version of Maria, which altogether surpassed expectation. Having performed Maria several times last season at Her Majesty's Theatre, Madame Sontag, with a perfected conception and matured execution, took the audiences of the Bouffes by surprise. She could not, under the circumstances, have selected a part more favourable than Maria for her rentrée. No part, moreover, is more fitted to exhibit the spirit and vivacity of her acting and the admirable finish of her vocalization to advantage.

Madame Sontag was received on Saturday evening with a hurricane of applause. It was the general opinion that her voice had gained both in power and quality since last year. The duet with Sergeant Sulpizio, "Io vidi la luce," at all events, indicated no falling off. The purity of tone and method, the surprising facility, the delicate fanciful broderies, and the never-to-be-forgotten pianissimos in the upper register—which we might denominate "vocal harmonics"—were as striking as ever. The popular "Ciascun lo dice" was, of course, cheered tumultuously. The pleasing duet, "Da quel istante," was cleverly sung and acted, both by Madame Sontag and Gardoni, and the ensemble "A confession si ardente convient," with the oboe accompaniment, was loudly applauded. The cantabile in the last scene of the first act (in which Maria bids farewell to her friends), was irresistibly pathetic. The cadenzas at the close, tasteful and varied as they were lavishly scattered, were executed with unsurpassable neatness. A general summons at the fall of the curtain, brought on Madame Sontag, with Gardoni and F. Lablache.

The acting of Madame Sontag as the untutored "Vivandiere," throughout the whole of the first act, could hardly be beaten for animation, naïveté, and a certain air of mingled rusticity and grace, in the absence of which, the character of Maria is not realised on the stage, nor the effects intended by the author produced.

The principal feature in the second act was the song at the piano, "Sorgeva il di del bosco," in which Maria breaks off from her lesson to rush into the refrain of her favourite "Rataplan." As an effort of brilliant and enthusiastic vocalization, it can be compared to nothing but Madame Sontag's own "Rode's air"—her own because it is her own.—The cavatina in the last act was sung to admiration; the most brilliant and elaborate fioriture were executed with consummate facility, and the songster was applauded "to the skies," and again recalled at the fall of the curtain to be overwhelmed with demonstrations of satisfaction from all parts of the house. We are pleased to add that Madame Sontag was in excellent health and spirits, and was looking as young and handsome as ever. The military costume of the "Vivandiere," in the first act became her no less than the attire of the "grand dame" in the last, and in both she looked irresistible. The part of Tonio is excellently adapted to Gardoni's graceful and natural style. He acted with more than his usual energy, and sang all the music delightfully. A well-merited and unanimous encore was awarded to him in the aria of the first act. F. Lablache is the most spirited and humorous of sergeants. His bluff vigour and off-handed manner are perfectly characteristic of the honest, rough soldier of the 11th regiment of the grand army of Napoleon. Bref—Frederick Lablache is decidedly a "chip of the old block," and does not sink under the pressure of his weighty name. Madame Solari-Grimaldi played the small part of the Marchioness with effect, and gave the music artistically. The other characters were well filled by Signori Balanchi, Casanova, and Dai Fiori. Between the acts, Carlotta Grisi danced in her own inimitable manner, the pas de pas, the Truandaise, and had the honor—rare, very rare, for a danseuse—of obtaining marks of decided approbation from Her Majesty the Queen, who was present, evidently delighted with the incomparable Esmeralda. This, however, was natural enough. Carlotta is not a mere dancer; she is a poet, and Her Majesty, like her illustrious spouse, Prince Albert, is an excellent judge of poets. A new triumph was achieved for the most popular of pas by Carlotta, who confers a novelty and grace upon every thing she does—even when she does it for the 100th time.

The ballet of L'Ile des Amours followed, in which Mdlle. Amalia Ferraris danced with more spirit than ever and with more applause than ever. The performance attracted the most brilliant and fashionable audience of the season. Her Majesty and suite occupied the Royal Box, and the box next to that of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, who was also present.

In consequence of Lablache's indisposition, the new opera, Le Tre Nozze, was not given on Tuesday, as announced. The Figlia del Reggimento was repeated, and Madame Sontag was in as great force as on the Saturday. A large concourse of fashionables again attended.

After the postponement of a week, Alary's new Opera buffa, Le Tre Nozze, was brought out on Thursday. The success achieved by the Tre Nozze in Paris, the fact that Lablache had a great comic part in it, and a polka, and the performance vocal and histrionic of Madame Sontag, which was pronounced admirable, awakened curiosity and excited interest. Signor Guilo Alary during the past season, produced an oratorio, called The Redemption, at Paris; and some ten years previous composed an opera, entitled Rosimonda, which was performed in Italy with great success. Alary is therefore, not entirely unknown to fame. We know not from what source the poet has borrowed the materials of his story. The plot is slight, but not simple, as might be gathered from the argument, which our readers may remember to have read in the Musical World, some three or four weeks ago, in our Paris Correspondent's letter. (Of which some of our contemporaries have availed themselves with so much spirit and so little acknowledgment). It is enough to state here, that the two first acts are simple enough, and indicate some constructive power in the librettist, Angelo Berrettoni; but the scope and meaning of the last act are not so evident. The reason why Cricca should assume the lawyer's disguise before the Baron, does not appear; nor can we thoroughly appreciate the poet's notion for bringing all the principals into the garden in the dark, unless it were to give the composer an opportunity of imitating Mozart's music in the last scene of the Nozze di Figaro, which Signor Alary has generously declined. The piece, nevertheless, runs pleasantly on, and with Lablache as the infatuated old Baron, who endeavours to speak English, and dance the polka with Madame Sontag, is amusing and lively throughout.

Of Signor Alary's music, our Paris correspondent has already spoken at length, in the letter above alluded to, and for the present, we shall forbear from entering into any critical details.

The performance on Thursday was entirely successful. The singers acquitted themselves admirably, the mise en scene was beautiful and striking, the dresses rich and appropriate. In addition, Lablache had a most amusing part, which he acted with immense humour, provoking continuous roars of laughter, and Sontag was fitted to perfection in the music of the coquettish Luisa.

Signor Ferranti, who personated Cricca, made a favourable debut. He has a high barytone voice, which is excellently in tune, and his humour, if not unctuous, appears to be unrestrained and natural. Signor Ferranti promises to be a decided acquisition to Mr. Lumley's troupe.

There were two encores: the first being awarded to the trio—"D'avanzarsi un cenno aspetta," in the second act, an inspiration after the manner of Verdi—partly indebted for the repeat to Madame Sontag's sustained shake at the end, so deliciously in tune; and the second to the rondo finale, written to exhibit Madame Sontag's wonderful facility, and which created a furor. Indeed, Madame Sontag's performance throughout, both histrionic and vocal, was a pendant to Lablache's—an ear-ring. Madam Giuliani, who made her first appearance this season, deserves a strong word of commendation for her performance of Vespina, which was both acted and sung with much animation. On one point, however, we should like to be informed. Vespina is a servant, and, according to our opinions, should be attired as a servant. Madame Giuliani, however, appeared to think otherwise, as she was dressed exactly like Luisa, so that it was by no means easy to distinguish one from the other. As Rosa Dartle says, "Really, though, we should like to be set right:" do waiting-maids in Naples wear silk dresses made low, with short sleeves, and trimmed with lace; and are silk stockings and white satin shoes their customary foot gear?

Gardoni, as the Chevalier, was more graceful than ever in his acting, and more animated in his singing. We should advise him, however, to omit his aria in the last act, which is by no means effective, although he does his best to render it so.

After each act, the principals were summoned on, and at the end of the opera a general call was made for the composer, who, after some delay, appeared, led on by Madame Sontag and Lablache, and was received with vociferous cheers.

Between the second and third act of the opera Amalia Ferraris and M. Charles danced a favourite pas de deux, which obtained considerable applause.

The performances concluded with a selection from the Melamorphoses, in which Carlotta Grisi created the customary enthusiasm.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday Masaniello was repeated. Tamberlik, who is rising higher and higher in the estimation of the public, surpassed himself, which is impossible.

On Tuesday, Roberto il Diavolo was given. Grisi, Tamberlik, and Formes surpassed themselves. Castellan looked handsomer and sang sweeter than ever, and Stigelli, the new tenor, rose a step higher in public esteem. There was a bad house on Saturday, but we do not envy the subscribers their absence on the occasion; since a more magnificent specimen of acting and singing than Tamberlik's Masaniello was probably never witnessed on the Italian boards. On Tuesday, there was a good house, and on Thursday, a great house, for La Donna del Lago.

In the anticipation of novelty, perhaps, a more attractive opera could not have been put up than La Donna del Lago, which was presented for the first time this season. Although not one of the chef d'œuvres of Rossini, this work offers opportunities for a strong cast, powerful ensembles, and a gorgeous mise en scene, all of which, it is well known, have been taken advantage of at the Royal Italian Opera. As the music is played in England, however, the opera is scarcely amenable to criticism, so many are the omissions and interpolations. From the second act a song for Uberto, and a trio for Rodrigo, Uberto, and Elena, are abandoned, while a duet and a quartet from Bianca e Faliero, one of the least known operas of Rossini, together with a tenor air, composed by Pacini, are substituted. From the first act a duet for Uberto and Elena is omitted, and the cabaletta of an air from Zelmira, for Rodrigo Dhu (originally composed for the famous tenor, Tacchinardi, father of Madame Persiani), interpolated in the finale. Enough, however, remains of genuine melody, brilliant vocal effects, and ingenious concerted music, to render La Donna del Lago a highly spirited and pleasing, if not a great opera.

The cast included Grisi (Elena), Angri (Malcolm), Mario (Uberto), and Tamberlik (Rodrigo Dhu), besides a new barytone, or rather basso giusto, Signor Bianchi, who made his first appearance in the character of Douglas. Many of the pleasantest opera recollections are associated with Grisi's Elena, a part which, while it taxes the histrionic talents of the great dramatic singer in a very slight degree, is much indebted to the charm of her voice and the attractions of her personal appearance, so peculiarly becoming to the costume. Rossini never invented a more fresh and spontaneous melody than "Oh mattutini albori," and the unaffected simplicity with which it is delivered by Grisi gives it a double claim to admiration. This, and the whole of the first scene at the lake, with Mario (whose Uberto, though, as a piece of acting, it presents no salient features, is delightful throughout, in a vocal point of view), went off with the usual spirit; and the duet "Quai tormenti," was immensely applauded. The appearance of the two great tenors, Mario and Tamberlik, on the same evening and in the same opera excited the same degree of interest as last season. Both were happily in good voice—the influenza having probably departed with the east wind—both sang their very best, and both created the utmost enthusiasm. Tamberlik sang with prodigious fire in the air, "Sorgete e in si bel giorno" (with the cabaletta from Zelmira), and took the higher notes with extraordinary force and precision. Mario, in the interpolated cavatina of Pacini, "Come mai calmar le pene," revelled in the falsetto tones with a prodigality only surpassed by the ease and grace with which they were accomplished. The same result awaited both efforts, which were respectively the culminating points of the first and second acts—an unanimous encore and an unanimous recal. Now that Alboni has taken to "grand opera" and soprano parts, Mademoiselle Angri rests without a rival in such characters as Malcolm Grème, the music of which gives full scope to her dashing and energetic style, and to a certain warmth of sentiment which, if occasionally carried to excess, betrays an earnestness that rarely fails to make a lively impression. Of the two airs allotted to Malcolm, which rank among the finest of Rossini's contralto songs, we were most pleased with the first, "Elena, oh tu ch'io chiamo," which Mademoiselle Angri delivered with great breadth of expression. In the "Ah si pera" (Act II.) the largo was beautifully given, but the final bravura, though sung with energy, was wanting in finish. In the grand duet of the second act with Elena (from Bianca e Faliero) both Madame Grisi and Mademoiselle Angri distinguished themselves highly, and the largo, "Ciel qual destin," was redemanded by the audience, although the encore was judiciously declined by the vocalists.

Signor Bianchi, the debutant, did not make a great sensation. His manner of singing was heavy, while his deportment on the stage is uneasy. He has nevertheless a good voice, literally a "basso giusto," and his intonation is generally correct. Douglas is not a grateful part, and his single air, "Taci, lo voglio," is one of the feeblest inspirations of Rossini. We shall be pleased to judge more favourably of Signor Bianchi, but we were not remarkably impressed with his capabilities on Thursday night.

The choral and concerted pieces (except the fine quartet from Bianca, "Cielo il mio labbro," which we have heard so much better) were executed as satisfactorily as ever, under the vigorous direction of Mr. Costa, and the grand finale of bards and warriors, the effect of which was enhanced by the spirited acting of Mademoiselle Angri and Signor Tamberlik, created the accustomed effect. We ought to notice the efficient manner in which the music of the small part of Albina was rendered by Mademoiselle Cotti. The early hour at which the performance terminated (10 minutes to 11 o'clock) caused many persons to suggest that, when short operas like the Donna del Lago are given, something in the shape of a divertissement would be not only acceptable but desirable. With a favourite and talented danseuse in the theatre like Mademoiselle Louise Taglioni, this would be easy enough to accomplish. There was a very full house. Meanwhile the eternal question is, "What has become of Fidelio?" Surely the masterpiece is not laid aside for another season, merely because H. R. H. Prince Albert suggested that Madame Viardot should sustain the part of Leonora, vice Madame Castellan. We shall see.

HERR MOLIQUE'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

(From the Times.)

Herr Molique gave the first of his annual series of chamber concerts on Wednesday night, at the New Beethoven Rooms, and provided his friends, who assembled in large numbers, with an interesting and classical programme. Although this great master has now made London his residence, which cannot but be beneficial to the artists in this country, who have such an example to study and profit by, his public appearances are much too rare. At the Philharmonic Concerts, where, by simple right of pre-eminent talent, Herr Molique should perform every year, he has not yet been heard this season (nor did he appear during the whole of last year); an additional attraction is therefore secured to his own chamber concerts, where the amateurs of the violin and the lovers of sterling music must find equal gratification. Not more a gifted than an industrious musician, Herr Molique never invites his patrons and the public without having something new for their especial entertainment. The prominent feature in Wednesday's programme was a MS. quartet, in B flat, played (for the first time) by the author, assisted by his pupil Herr Schmidt, Mr. Mellon, and Signor Piatti. As well as we could judge from a single hearing, we are inclined to rank this quartet as the most complete and admirable of the chamber compositions of Herr Molique. It does not, like many works of its class, merely shine by the superior excellence of an adagio or a scherzo, but every movement is new and striking. The scherzo, besides its beauty and dramatic colouring, has a novelty of form which cannot fail at once to appeal to the initiated hearer, and which, though an innovation, is vindicated by consistency of plan and unquestionable effect. Instead of making the trio a separate movement, Herr Molique has combined it with the scherzo, in the most ingenious and happy manner. The slow movement is flowing and melodious throughout, occasionally, by its simplicity, recalling the adagios of Haydn. The first allegro is a large and energetic piece of writing, and the finale, a sparkling rondo, full of those contrasts and devices which betray the master and accomplished contrapuntist. The whole composition indeed is such a specimen of musical erudition and felicity of design as, now that Mendelssohn is no more, it is probable no other composer of continental birth could have produced. It was finely executed, and received with enthusiasm. The other compositions of Herr Molique were three new "melodies," for violin and piano, and two songs, "Frülings Lied" and "Liebchens Augen," of which it is enough to say that they are worthy the reputation of their author, whose genius is as agreeably demonstrated in elegant bagatelles as in the higher school of art to which the quartet in B flat belongs.

As an executant Herr Molique maintains the same classical position he enjoys as a composer. His pretensions as a violinist, however, are too well known to need description. He has long been recognized one of the most perfect masters of the instrument, and as a legitimate model, perhaps, no one could be followed with more advantage. Herr Molique took the first part in Spohr's quartet in A minor (Op. 74), and was assisted by the same artists as in his own work. He also played the three new "melodies" with Mdlle. Molique, his daughter, and an "adagio and fugue" of Sebastian Bach, with the same young lady, the pianoforte accompaniment added by Herr Molique himself, who has accomplished this delicate task with equal discretion and talent, emulating, both in skill and in forbearance, the accompaniment which Mendelssohn wrote for the Chaconne in C minor, by the great German contrapuntist. This last performance was an extraordinary manifestation of mechanical proficiency, combined with the utmost vigour and fire. Mademoiselle Molique, whose great promise as a pianist we have already noted, displayed her talents to the best advantage in the equally beautiful and difficult sonata of Beethoven (for pianoforte solus) in C sharp minor, familiarly known as the "Moonlight Sonata." Her execution of this remarkable work was distinguished by the purest feeling, and won the hearty applause of the audience. Besides the performances of Herr and Mademoiselle Molique, Mademoiselle Bertha Johannsen and Herr Stigelli sang a variety of German lieder, accompanied by Herr Schmidt on the pianoforte, which afforded the highest gratification to the audience. The lady is a prima donna from Copenhagen, and possesses a good soprano voice and an animated style of singing. In addition to her German songs, Mademoiselle Johannsen introduced one of the Swedish melodies which Jenny Lind made popular in England, and entered into its national character with genuine spirit and feeling. Herr Stigelli is the new tenor who has lately appeared with such success at the Royal Italian Opera. He is one of the best lied-singers of his country.

Not the least interesting feature of the concert was a duet for two violoncellos, concocted from the first and second "grand duos" of Bernhard Romberg, and executed by Herr Menter and Signor Piatti. This brought the great German and Italian violoncellists into forced rivalry—in such juxtaposition, indeed, that a comparison of their tone, style, and general method of execution was inevitable. The performance created an unwonted sensation, and it is enough to say that, while Herr Menter (who made his debut the day previous at Mr. Ella's Musical Union) rose in our estimation, Signor Piatti preserved his position as unquestionably the first violoncellist of his time. It was suggested that the "tones" of the two violoncellists might be likened to those of Mario and Tamberlik—Signor Piatti being, of course, the Mario—but we scarcely think this was doing full justice to Tamberlik.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE finest performance of Mendelssohn's oratorio of Elijah we ever heard at Exeter-hall, took place on Friday night, the 2nd instant, under the direction of Mr. Costa, in the presence of an audience that crowded the edifice to the walls. The disposition of the principal vocal parts was unusually strong. Misses Catherine Hayes and Eliza Birch were the first and second sopranos; Misses Dolby and Williams, the contraltos; Mr. Sim Reeves, the tenor; and Herr Formes, the bass. Messrs. Novello, Walker, and Smythson assisted in the double quartet, "For He shall give His angels charge." In the first part, the singing of Miss Hayes was beyond reproach. Nothing could be more truthful than her expression in the duet between the widow and Elijah, "Give me my son;" the grief so beautifully painted in the music was reflected in the tremulous tones of Miss Hayes's voice, and the appeals of the widow to the prophet in behalf of her dying son were most touching. In the second part, the fine air, "Hear ye, Israel," and the quartet, "Holy, holy," wanted only a little more energy; the rest was admirably rendered. Mr. Sims Reeves gave the two airs of Obadiah with the utmost feeling; his reading was exceedingly pure, and his execution left nothing to be desired. To some of the recitatives he gave a novel and delicate expression, which was perfectly legitimate, and evidently proceeded from a refined appreciation of the text. Herr Formes, who sang the laborious part of Elijah, seems to be making rapid progress with his English. He understands the character of the music thoroughly, and enters with real heart into the great variety of sentiments it illustrates. In the calm resignation, inspired fury, and deep despair of the Prophet, Herr Formes is equally at home, and the three airs, "Lord God of Israel," "Is not his word like a fire?" and "It is enough, O Lord!" which represent these alternate trains of mind, were sung with great fervour and intensity. The recitatives were impressively declaimed, and the emphatic passages delivered with surprising power of voice. Herr Formes, however, will permit us to demur to the alteration of the last note in the air, "For the mountains," where he makes a skip of an octave, for the purpose of showing, what no one doubted, that he has a full-toned lower F of excellent quality. There is nothing to say about Misses Dolby and Williams, but that they were as perfect, as they rarely fail to be, in the music of Mendelssohn; a word of strong encouragement, however, is due to that rising young singer, Miss Eliza Birch, who sang the soprano part of the unaccompanied trio, "Lift thine eyes," and the quartet, "O come every one that thirsteth," in the most effective manner possible.

The choruses were executed with great fire, precision, and studied attention to nuances, throughout. Indeed, we never remember the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society so entirely "up to the mark." They were, perhaps, anxious to give the foreigners present some idea of what a body of English amateurs, assisted by a few professors, and headed by a competent director, could effect; and it is likely that not many left the hall, after Monday night's performances without a modification of the common prejudice in the mind, of our continental friends, that there is no music to be heard in London except at the Italian Opera. The band was as excellent as the chorus, and, while awarding such warm praise to the general execution, it would be hypercritical to qualify it with the exception that we should have liked "Thanks be to God," and one or two other choruses, a little faster; moreover, we have advanced this suggestion, more than once, already.

It being the first appearance this season of Miss Catherine Hayes, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Formes, a great deal of applause ensued on their appearance in the orchestra, but the admirable regulation of abstaining from such interruptions to the performance was maintained, in the face of some slight attempts to infringe upon it, throughout the oratorio. At the conclusion, the hearty approval of the audience was expressed in a loud burst of applause for Mr. Costa. There will most probably be two more performances of Elijah.

MUSICAL UNION.—The gathering of celebrated musical lions at the extra matinée, on Thursday last, was quite remarkable. The veteran, John Cramer, was present, to applaud his countryman, Menter, from Munich.

Reviews of Music.

No. 1, "INTRODUCTION AND GRAND VARIATIONS ON THE RUSSIAN NATIONAL HYMN." FOR THE FLUTE, WITH PIANOFORTE ACCOMPANIMENT.—Joseph Richardson.

No. 2, FANTASIA FOR THE FLUTE, ON THE SCOTCH AIRS, "COMING THRO' THE RYE," and "JOCK O' HAZELDEAN".—R. Sidney Pratten.

No. 3, "MORCEAU DE CONCERT."—CAPRICCIO FOR THE FLUTE, WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR THE PIANOFORTE.—S. Percival. (A. SICCAMÀ.)

The name of Joseph Richardson, our great little English flautist, is a sufficient guarantee for the merits of No. 1. After an introduction of three pages, the theme, a well known one, is given in unadorned simplicity, on the higher register of the flute, with full harmony for the piano. In bars 1-2 of the bottom line, page 5, the first chord of each bar would be better C—D—F sharp, in the bass, instead of C—E—F sharp, as it is followed by the first inversion of the chord of G. The four variations (all, like the introduction, in the key of G), founded upon the theme, are brilliant and well varied in style; but to play them with effect, demands a mastery of the instrument, if not precisely equal to that possessed by Mr. Richardson himself, at least such as few professors and fewer amateurs can boast of. The piece, in short, must be regarded rather as a study to practise diligently by those who would acquire fluent execution, than as a show piece either for the drawing room or public performance; since, as a study, it can hardly fail to impart agility to the fingers, firmness to the lips, and crispness to the tongue—the three great desiderata of flute mechanism—while if attempted as media of display, before a critical audience, it is ten to one a rash essayist will pay the penalty of his temerity in a "break down," which will be his own fault and not that of Mr. Richardson.

Mr. Pratten comes forward as a legitimate rival to his unrivalled contemporary. His fantasia is, on the whole, a more elaborate and ambitious essay than that just criticised. But then, Mr. Pratten has not been satisfied with one theme as the basis of his variations. In the simple melody, "Coming thro' the Rye," he has constructed four brilliant variations, of which the first, staccato, seems to us at once the most difficult, and, as far as effect is concerned, the best. The fourth variation demands rapid articulation, and a long breath, both of which Mr. Pratten is well known to possess. These four variations, and the introduction to the first air, are all in C. The second air, "Jock o' Hazledean," is introduced in the key of F, but being less amenable to the capricious fantasy which regulates the manufacture of variations, Mr. Pratten has abstained from varying it, content with gracefully changing the harmony of its unconscious and unknown composer, and has concluded his piece with a fifth variation, on "Coming thro' the Rye," which is far more difficult than its four predecessors, and more effective in proportion. All those, indeed, who have heard this elaborate and spirited coda, performed in public by its accomplished composer, at M. Jullien's animated concerts, can testify to its exhilarating character. Bref—few pieces of this kind are better adapted to astonish, and, while astonishing, to please, the eager flautist.

Mr. Percival, coming in juxtaposition with England's two most formidable flautists, is perilously pitched, but having altogether avoided, in his "Capriccio," the variation, has not incurred the risk of a comparison which would have been hazardous with two such competitors. Mr. Percival has sheltered himself in the grove of legitimacy, where classic forms of nymph and dryad have recumbent. Plainly, Mr. Percival's "Morceau de Concert" consists of a single movement, Allegro Maestoso, in E flat, regularly constructed, with themes and episodes developed according to received forms. To the musician, if not to the amateur flautist, Mr. Percival's "Morceau" offers a far greater degree of interest than any piece of the pure variation school can possibly possess; and this interest will be enhanced by the many traits of excellent musicianship with which it abounds, and by certain modes of harmonizing, and certain forms of passages, which betray a leaning on the part of the composer towards the elegant and alluring style of Carl Maria Von Weber, of whom he is clearly and honourably a disciple. At the same time, the amateur flautist must not imagine that the classical form in which Mr. Percival has moulded his Capriccio excludes those brilliant effects which are calculated to display the lighter attributes of this very popular instrument with various advantage. On the contrary the cadenzas and bravura passages interspersed through the piece are equally captivating, from their graceful tourure, and from their perfect adaptability to the character of the flute. On the whole, we have met with very few morceaux for the flute combining more happily an application of the best forms of composition with those ad captandum qualities more generally appreciable by the ear popular.

As the above three pieces have all been written for, and played upon, Mr. Siccama's Patent Diatonic Flute, we presume we have to thank Mr. Siccama for contributions of such value to the répertoire of the instrument, from the pens of Professors of deserved eminence.

"LA GORLITZA "SCHOTTISCHE ORIGINALE."—E. J. WESTROP. Z. T. Purday.

We are unable to say whether this be founded, more or less strictly than other Gorlitzas—ças, which have been recently sent us for review, on the laws which regulate the constitution of that peculiar and important form of harmonious numbers, or whether the addition of the substantive and adjective epithets, "Schottische," and "originale," endow it with extra flavour, (authorised by the qualities they represent being apparent on Mr. Westrop's pages); but, whether that or this, or neither that nor this, or both, the present specimen of the "Gorlitz-ça is the best that has hitherto fallen under our hands. It is in G, with a trio in C, for the Cornet, and we scarcely know which theme is the prettier, or more sparkling. Besides being well-written, which is always the case with Mr. Westrop's bagatelles, it has the chief essentials to popularity—well-marked rhythm, lively tune, and simplicity. Anybody can play it, and many will play it, or we are greatly mistaken.

No. 1, (Op. 72), "PARTING SONG," BY MENDELSSOHN, TRANSCRIBED FOR THE PIANOFORTE.—Stephen Heller.

No. 2, "CHANT D'AMOUR," Ditto ditto.

No. 3, "CHANT DE FETE," Ditto ditto.

No. 1, (Op. 73), "CHANT DU CHASSEUR," Ditto ditto.

No. 2, "L'ADIEU DU SOLDAT," Ditto ditto.

No. 3, "CHANT DE BERCEAU," Ditto ditto.—Cocks & Co.

The music of M. Stephen Heller, one of the most accomplished of the present race of pianoforte writers, is generally so difficult to execute, that the appearance of some pieces dedicated, like the present set, to the capacity of ordinary performers, must be regarded as a boon to those, whose fingers not being injured to the achievement of impossibilities, are still disposed to eschew the merely trivial and commonplace. In whatever M. Heller composes there is invariably the evidence of acquirement, and the stamp of a graceful and original mind. Of the six pieces above enumerated, three are founded on themes from well known lieder of Mendelssohn, and three upon subjects of his own. That we prefer the three in which Mendelssohn has a hand is no compliment to M. Heller, and were the question put to M. Heller himself, we are much mistaken if he would not acknowledge the same preference.

No. 1, (Op. 72) is based upon the popular "Volslied" in D, one of the holdest and most natural tunes the great German master ever composed. M. Heller first gives it simply, then in full harmony, and finally, after a kind of episode in which the subject appears in the bass, with a graceful counterpoint for the right hand, in a variation of triplets distributed between the two hands, remarkable for novelty and brilliant effect. What we particularly admire in this little piece is the scrupulous fidelity with which M. Heller has preserved the original melody, and the skilful manner in which he has adapted his variations and harmonies to the tone and feeling of Mendelssohn.

No. 2, the "Chant d'Amour," (in G) has, if possible, a still more beautiful theme upon which to exercise the fancy. A lovelier, a more tender, or a more gushing effusion never came from the large heart of that musician who, with one single exception (need we name Mozart?), has apostrophised the passions of love with more dignity, variety, and abundance of feeling than any known composer. The first two pages are set to perfection; had Mendelssohn himself first composed his beautiful song as a lied ohne worte, he could hardly have arranged it more becomingly, or with more genuine simplicity. The last four pages, an allegro vivace, in 6-8 time, though exceedingly clever and full of ingenious points of musicianship, are less to our liking, because they depart materially from the character of the original theme, which is not lively, but essentially plaintive and affectionate. Could Mendelssohn be put out of the question, M. Heller's little morceau, minus the two first pages (which are Mendelssohn's), might pass for what it is—a charming bagatelle—without criticism.

No. 3, "Chant de Fete" (in A)—one of those delicious spring-songs, or pastorals, with which Mendelssohn has given a musical expression to the dawn of the budding season, when birds begin to sing and brooks to throw off the embraces of the frost, being really a gay and sparkling effusion, lends itself more happily to the lively costume in which M. Heller has attired it. It "runneth, and babbleth," as Sir John Suckling might have said. Though rather more difficult than the two preceding, it is such a fascinating little gem, that no one, who once begins to practise it, is likely to abandon it for want of patience. The principal requisites, however, to play it with effect, are lightness of finger and elasticity of touch; and these, after all, are not so rare among amateur pianists who love good music.

No. 1 of Op. 73, a kind of movement à la chasse, is the most difficult of the six pieces, and the most entirely characteristic of M. Heller. It is full of brilliant passages and charming points of harmony, and the spirit is maintained with unabated interest until the last note. As a morceau for display this is the one that will probably attract the most favour. Short as it is, it is worthy the attention of any pianist, however advanced, and however refined in his tastes.

No. 2, in C major, is more romantic, as its title, L'Adieu du Soldat, would suggest. It is equally characteristic in its way, and is also more difficult than the majority of its fellows. The military accent and spirit have been happily caught.

No. 3, in G, is one of the simplest and prettiest of cradle songs. This tranquil and flowing melody might well accompany the "rocking" of an infant in its mother's arms; and the harmony is quite in keeping. The interruption of the theme (in the last page), by a sort of ritornella, has a very new and pleasing effect.

To sum up, we recommend these six little pieces of M. Heller, as better than nine-tenths of the publications with which the presses of our music publishers are teeming.

Dramatic Intelligence.

FRENCH PLAYS.—ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—During the present week we have had no new pieces, but there has been sufficient variety in the old repertoire to keep alive public curiosity, and fill the theatre every evening. Nothing could be more refined and gentlemanly than M. Lafont's acting in the delightful and witty comedy Le Mari à la Campagne, which has become one of the especial favourites of all lovers of the French Theatre; and in which M. Regnier keeps the house in a perpetual good humour by the vivacity of his spirits, and the astonishing rapidity of his motions. In the little comedy of Le Roman d'une heure, we have to record the debut of Madlle. Faivre, a young lady of commanding presence, and apparently well suited to the part chosen for her first appearance. The character is that of a young widow in high life, who, having been induced to lay a wager with a gentleman that he will not win her heart within four and twenty hours, is defeated by his own gallantry and generosity. Madlle. Faivre seemed at first rather embarrassed, and hesitated in the delivery of her words; but as she advanced, she acquired self-possession, and finally attained sufficient composure to display no small degree of talent and refinement, both in her acting and general delivery. Alfred de Musset's delightful little proverb, Il faut qu'une porte soit ouverte ou fermée, was revived on Wednesday, and admirably played by M. Lafont and Madlle. Judith. We again admired the politeness, the gentlemanlike embarrassment, and courtly ardour of M. Lafont as the Count, and also had occasion to testify to the easy vivacity and brilliant tact with which Madlle. Judith invested the part of the Marquise, and repelled her pertinacious adversary. No enemy could have been more gaily resisted. The principal attraction is however still Bataille de Dames, which proves more attractive on every repetition, and which we are confident will become an established favourite. J. de C.—

HAYMARKET.—A new dramatic production from the brilliant and accomplished pen of Douglas Jerrold is always an object of curiosity to the public. Its announcement is read with pleasure—the performance anticipated with eagerness. Douglas Jerrold is one of the first of the living dramatists in this country—not, in our opinion, the first, as a contemporary has avouched—and has been acknowledged such ever since Black-eyed Susan and the Rent Day, his two most happy and finished works, whatever may be avowed to the contrary, delighted the play-goer of some quarter of a century ago. In his new comedy, the author has departed from the usual division into five acts, and has reduced the number to three. We see no reason why a comedy, or, indeed, a tragedy, should not be written in three acts as well as five. The French dramatists prefer the division into five acts, as it enables them to provide more set tableaux—a great desideratum in the machinery of the modern stage. This is also the reason why modern operas have deviated from the old two-act form to four, five, and even six acts. No such motive, certainly, conduced to Mr. Douglas Jerrold's deviation. The tenuity of his story, and the poverty of his incidents, no doubt, necessitated the three-act division. With his usual tact and judgment, the author saw that, to avoid diffuseness, he must circumscribe the dimensions of his plot, and he circumscribed them accordingly. In the new drama we have not the slightest doubt but that the alteration from five to three acts is an improvement.

Mr. Douglas Jerrold's "Original English Comedy," is entitled Retired From Business. Were it not that the comic part is mostly broad caricature, the new play might with propriety be called a sentimental comedy. There is a serious underplot, there are real tears, breaking hearts, a farewell for ever, transduction of character, and plenty of misery; but then the lighter business of the piece belongs so evidently to the regions of "Punch," the personages are so suggestive of H. B.'s sketches, and the drollery is so ultra-farical, as to render every attempt at reality abortive, and a violence to belief. The plot is simple enough.

The imaginary village of Pumpkinfield is the scene of the drama.—The period, 1851. Zachary Pennyweight is a retired greengrocer, who, with his wife, has taken up his residence in the imaginary village. Zachary is a good, easy man, but the wife is ambitious of being considered "gentle." She has sent her daughter, Miss Kitty, to France to be educated. The daughter is a girl of romantic turn, and comes back with her heart filled with the image of Paul, a youth, also of a romantic turn, whom she first saw at Boulogne, leaning gracefully on a cannon. The twain fall desperately in love, and are parted without knowing any thing of each other. Paul turns out to be the son of Mr. Puffins, late a Baltic merchant, who has also retired from business, and has come to the said imaginary village. Mr. Creepmouse, late army tailor, is another retired merchant; as is also Jubilee, late pawnbroker. But Creepmouse and Puffins are "Retired Wholesales," and Zachary Pennyweight and Jubilee "Retired Retails." The "Wholesales" naturally look down upon the "Retails," and cut them. Paul and Miss Kitty now meet, and renew their vows of eternal fidelity: but the parents are averse. The Baltic merchant repudiates the pseudo vender of greens, and Kitty's father and mother look upon Paul as a trifle too young and inexperienced for their daughter. The loves of the juvenile pair constitute the most amusing part of the comedy.

Mrs. Fitzwilliam plays the romantic Paul with great humour and allowable extravagance, and Miss Annie Romer makes pretty folly of the love-stricken Miss Kitty. The pretences and squabbles of the "Wholesales" and "Retails" also furnish forth much merriment.

The serious plot involves the fortunes of Amy, the niece of Captain Gunn, late of the Green Bays, a retired officer on half-pay, and Woodburn, the nephew and heir of Creepmouse, the army tailor. Amy meets Woodburn at a boarding-school, where she had accepted the situation of governess, to spare her uncle the expense of her living. She is driven from the school by ill-treatment, and flies to her uncle for protection. The Captain vows never again to part from her. Creepmouse discovers the attachment of his nephew to Amy, and threatens to disinherit him if he marries her. He also menaces the Captain with a bond, which he holds in terrorem over him, unless he interferes to separate Amy from Woodburn. The end is brought about satisfactorily by the services of Lieutenant Tackle, R. N., late of H. M. Brig. Humming Bird, a regular type of the old class of good-natured, good-humoured, sympathising, hearty, and swearing sea officers, to be found in Smollett's novels and the dramas of Morton, O'Keefe, Holcroft, and others. This character, though well drawn, is out of place in a drama designed to represent the manners of 1851. Nothing could be better than Mr. James Wallack's impersonation of the honest and jovial Lieutenant, who swears and blunders, laughs and cries in the same breath, but the used-up allusions to the Union Jack and Britannia were found sadly rococo, and did not tell with the audience. Mr. Douglas Jerrold, however, had his antique love for the sea, and his profound knowledge of the virtues and whimsicalities of the British tar to plead in extenuation. Through the mediation of Lieutenant Tackle, who gives up his prize-money to pay off Creepmouse's bond, and by means of Creepmouse himself, who, to use the characteristic words of the author, "was found iron, but left butter," all terminates satisfactorily. Even to Miss Kitty and Paul a hope is held out that after a few years' delay their youthful hearts may be twined together in the bondlets of hymen.

The writing is replete with point and pungency. The good things are without number; the hits hard and heavy, and their effects hilarious. Of genuine wit there is but little in the comedy, but of fun and humour there is more than abundance. The applause was incessant throughout, and all the actors were called for at the end. The author subsequently made his bow from a private box in answer to a general summons.

We have alluded en passant to some of the actors. We have said nothing of Mr. Buckstone's Creepmouse, which was nothing short of inimitable. His make up was immense. He had not the best things in the comedy to speak, but he provoked the most laughter. Mr. Webster played Captain Gunn with excellent effect. It was a legitimate bit of acting, and was applauded accordingly. Miss Reynolds was unaffected, unusually so, in Amy, and the characters in general were well supported.

The piece was announced for repetition every evening amid universal applause.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—Miss P. Horton, who has succeeded from the Haymarket, has made her appearance at this theatre in Azazel. Some of the songs from the original opera, arranged for the orchestra by German Reed, are introduced, and are admirably sung by Miss P. Horton, who has made a decided hit in her new character of "a Prodigal."

Mr. Ranger, who some years ago made, with much success, his debut at the Haymarket, as a representative of French characters, reappeared here this week as Sir Peter Teazle, and has been well received. He has a gentlemanly appearance, and a thorough knowledge of stage business.

JERSEY.—(From our own Correspondent.)—On Tuesday evening, our Theatre presented a gay and fashionable appearance, being crammed to the ceiling to witness the performance of our troupe of amateurs, two of whom on the occasion were debutantes. The great attraction of the evening was Mr. Douglas Stewart, who undertook the arduous character of Othello. This gentleman already having made a favourable impression in Claude Melnotte last season, much anxiety existed among his friends to see him in one of the great Shakespearean characters, of which last night he proved himself fully capable. Mr. Stewart took the audience by surprise. The house was quite prepared for the striking points in his acting, which gained for him encouraging cheers. The stage bearing of Mr. Douglas is dignified and his action graceful. His features are formed to express the deepest emotion, and his voice is powerful and of good quality. He manages it with admirable skill. A great feature too was the absence of mannerism and of plagiarisms from other actors. The third act was most successful. His bursts of jealous rage were given with energy, unaccompanied by rant. In short, the whole reading of the part was correct. It has rarely been my lot to observe so much promise in so young an actor. Mr. F. Bisson, who made his first appearance on any stage, was the Iago. He read the part correctly and acted with ease and judgment, wholly free from all awkwardness. He gained much applause. Cassio, in the hands of Mr. H. Carter, met with an able and competent representative. This gentleman possesses a decided talent for comedy. The performance ended with the popular farce of John Dobbs, the principal character acted by Mr. Douglas Stewart, who thus displayed a singular versatility of talent. He was ably supported by Mr. Poole, manager of the Theatre.—T. E. B.

THE MUSICAL UNION.

The advent of an unusually large number of foreign artists, attracted by the Great Exhibition, has encouraged Mr. Ella to commence a series of extra matinées, which will enable many to appear who would otherwise be denied the advantage of playing at the Musical Union. The first of these came off on Tuesday, in Willis's Rooms, and a large number of subscribers attended. The programme was interesting, as the means of introducing to an English audience no less than three first-rate performers—Herr Laub (violin), Herr Menter (violoncello) and Herr Pauer (pianoforte). Of Herr Laub we have already spoken, as the substitute for Signor Sivori at the Promenade Concerts of Mr. Allcroft. He introduced the same Fantasia-Caprice of Vieuxtemps which he executed previously, and a second hearing gave us no cause to modify the opinion we then advanced. As a solo performer Herr Laub has distinguished qualities, great energy, pure intonation, good staccato, perfect octave-playing, &c. His left hand is admirable, but his bow-arm wants variety and distinction; his mechanism is excellent, but his style is deficient in the higher attributes of expression. This was more particularly felt in the quartet of Mozart (No. 1, in G), with which the concert began. Here it cannot fail to be observed that at present Herr Laub is rather a promising than a great violinist.

His sentiment is earnest, but so often misplaced that the existence of real feeling is at times felt to be doubtful. In Mendelssohn's trio in D minor (No. 1), where the pianist may be said to lead the way, Herr Laub appeared to more advantage, and his thorough command of the instrument served him to good purpose. Herr Laub was ably supported in the quartet by M. Deloffre, Mr. Hill, and Herr Menter. Herr Menter is one of the most prodigious executants on the violoncello we have ever listened to. His tone is powerful and rich, wanting perhaps in softness, but telling and effective. His mechanism can hardly be surpassed, and we only regretted that his abilities should have been exercised on so very trivial a composition as the "Fantasia on a popular Russian theme," which has positively nothing whatever to recommend it. In the quartet of Mozart, and the trio of Mendelssohn, Herr Menter showed himself perfectly at home in the "classical" school. In short he is really a fine player, and we shall be pleased on a future occasion, to hear him in something more musically interesting than his own fantasia.

Herr Pauer is well known at Vienna, both as a pianist and composer for the pianoforte. His reputation has been well-earned. We have seldom heard a more effective reading or a more brilliant execution of Mendelssohn's difficult trio, which taxes the mechanical resources and the mental qualifications of a pianist in an equal degree. Herr Pauer was evidently quite at home in the music of his great compatriot. The passages were played with fire and admirable neatness, and the cantabiles delivered with pure and unaffected expression. In certain passages Herr Pauer—aided by an instrument which for richness and equality of tone we never heard surpassed—produced an effect peculiarly grateful, every note, in the softest pianissimo, being heard with wonderful distinctness. Herr Pauer made a highly favourable impression, which was by no means weakened, at the end of the concert, when he played solus, a somewhat bagatelle composition of Herr Taubert, of Berlin.

Altogether this matinée was exceedingly interesting, and the performances would have served very well for one of the regular meetings of the Musical Union. The instrumental music was pleasantly varied by some lieder by Schubert, sung by Herr Reichart, from the Imperial Opera at Vienna, in a very chaste and artistic manner. The vocal pieces and the solo of Herr Laub, were accompanied by Herr Eckart in first-rate style.

Foreign.

AMSTERDAM, APRIL.—The ninth concert of Society "Felix Meritis," obtained an additional éclat by the appearance of Made. Bertha Johannsen. This much admired vocalist displayed her charming voice and finished execution in a cavatina from Lucia di Lammermoor, an air from the Nozze di Figaro, and a bravura air by Pacini. The latter was redemanded, and Made. Johannsen gave in lieu thereof a German Lied, accompanied by herself on the pianoforte. This lady possesses a flexible soprano of about two octaves in extent. I have heard her sing her national Swedish songs with a fervour and taste that cannot fail to ensure her, every where, a success which her distinguished talent deserves. Herr Van Bree conducted the concert. Three overtures, by Onslow, Beethoven, and Romberg, as well as Spohr's great work, Die Wiehe der Töne, were well performed by the band. Herr J. W. Kleine performed a clarinet concerto by Crusell, in a masterly style. The concert gave general satisfaction.

TURIN.—The companies for the ensuing summer season at the Royal theatres are now completed, under the direction of the impresario, Giaccone. The National Theatre will open with Verdi's Attila.

FLORENCE.—Romani, the composer, has just finished his new opera, Bacchanali, which will shortly be produced.

NAPLES.—The companies for the summer season at the two theatres, San Carlo and Fondo, are completed. The names are as follows:—Soprani—Luigia Bendazzi, Guiseppa Zecchini, Erminia Taglioni; Contralto—Margherita Poszi; First Tenors—Domenico Labocetta, Gaetano Biondi; First Bass—Francesco Gnone; Buffi—Lusio and Talvetti. This does not look very bright, the only known name being that of Labocetta, who came out at her Majesty's Theatre in London about three years ago; nor does the prospect of new operas by Fioravanti and Aspa help to illuminate the picture. Four new ballets are promised, however, and this is a great point with the Neapolitans.

BERLIN.—A privilege has been granted to M. Paul Taglioni, for a French and Italian Theatre in this city. The Koenigstadt will close on the 1st of July next, never to re-open as a dramatic establishment.

LILLE.—Grisar's new opera buffon, Bon soir, Monsieur Pantalon, has been produced here with considerable success.

MARSEILLES.—The brilliant triumphs of Madame Pleyel will form an epoch in the musical annals of this city. Her concerts were crowded, the public were fou, and the press in ecstasies. Now she has left us, musical affairs are rather dull, and the reprise of Verdi's Jerusalem at the theatre—with Madame Sainton as the prima donna, and M.M. Mathieu and Depassio—has not made matters more lively. The Marseillaises cannot be persuaded to admire the music of Maestro Verdi, although a copy of the France Musicale is supposed to circulate in the town.

LISBON.—The success of Madame Stoltz goes on constantly increasing; she has played in the Favorite and has excited a greater furor than even that caused by her Armée in Semiramide.

MADRID.—The representation at the opera previous to Passion Week, was a very brilliant one. The opera was Linda di Chamouni, in which Frezzolini and Ronconi surpassed themselves. The French tenor, Masset, also pleased very much. He sang at one of the concerts at the Palace with so much satisfaction to the Queen, that Her Majesty the next day sent him a gold chain. All musical Madrid is in mourning for Alboni, whose obligato departure for Paris, to resume her engagement at the Grand Opera, has greatly weakened the resources of the opera here. The absence of Formes is also severely felt, although Ronconi is a host in himself, and Madame Frezzolini greatly admired.

FRANKFORT.—Teresa Milanollo has been playing here with great success. Her last visit was in company with her sister, whose early death was a sad blow to the art. The opening of the theatre after Passion Week was inaugurated with Meyerbeer's Prophete, which is here considered the masterpiece of its illustrious composer. La Juvie has also been performed, which is here considered the best work of Halévy.

PARIS.—The death of Colet, Professor of Harmony at the Conservatoire, at the age of 43, has left a vacancy which M. Auber, the principal, has offered to M. Ambroise Thomas, the most successful of the great composer's imitators. Madame Pleyel has arrived, and there is some hope that the incomparable pianist will give a concert in the Jardin d'Hiver. Pischek is in Paris, en route for London. It is said that the band of the 9th Dragoons will go to London to play during the Great Exhibition season. The idea originated with M. Sax, upon whose admirable instruments they will doubtless exhibit their proficiency. The new opera of M. Gounod, Sappho, whatever may be its merits as a work of art, fails to attract the public. M. Roger's engagement at the opera has been renewed for four years, at a salary of 70,000 francs (an increase of 10,000 on last year) and three months congé. Auber and Scribe's new opera, La Corbeille d'Oranges, is in rehearsal, and will be produced in about a fortnight. Roger will play the principal tenor part.

HAMBURG.—Herr Farkar Wolff, from Vienna, gave his concert on Wednesday, the 23rd, which occasion introduced Madame Macfarren for the first time to our public. This lady, besides accompanying the concert-giver in his several songs, sang an English national song, and upon the enthusiastic applause and call for repetition with which this was received, also let us hear the "Zuleika" of Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Madame Macfarren has with this performance fully confirmed the high expectations that were raised of her; her alto voice is one of the deepest and most powerful, and her style inspired with intelligence and enthusiastic feeling. For the availability of her musical talent on the stage, her tall and well-formed figure, and her classically-formed face, brightened by the most beautiful dark eyes, will be of the greatest advantage. Of the distinguished applause with which the audience received her performance, we have already spoken. Herr Wolff has a rare talent in rendering Hungarian songs, and developed, especially in the last of these, consisting of an adagio and allegro, the astonishing ease and flexibility of his tenor voice. This song has the advantage of possessing a marked national character. Herr Otto Goldschmidt and Herr Joannovitz supported the concert-giver, the former with his performance on the pianoforte, the latter with a concerto on the violin. The attendance was numerous.—Hamburger Nachrichten, Friday, April 25th.

CINCINNATI, APRIL 17.—The second concert of Mademoiselle Lind took place last night. Those who had seats began to arrive early, and by the time the concert commenced the National Theatre was thronged with even a brighter array of beauty and fashion, than had tenanted it on Monday evening. Not a seat in the body but was filled, and with one of the most orderly audiences we have seen. Some disturbance arose among the crowd collected in front of the Theatre, but the police were in greater force than on the evening of the first concert, and kept them in tolerable order. The first part of the programme consisted of the overture to Masaniello, a duet from Il Barbiere of Rossini, by Signors Salvi and Belletti, "Qui la voce," from I. Puritani, by Mademoiselle Jenny Lind, an aria from Gli Arabi nelle Gallie, by Pacini, and the duet on Tyrolean melodies by Mademoiselle Lind and Signor Belletti. The duet from Il Barbiere was excellently sung, and the applause would have been greater but for the expectation of the audience to hear Jenny. At last she came forward; a smile broke from her lips and spread over her brow with a beautiful and tranquil light as she bowed to the audience. Then the orchestra commenced and then her lips unclosed and she burst into song. Nothing could have been more exquisite than her vocalism in "Qui la voce." After this came the Aria of Pacini, sung by Signor Salvi with great feeling. The Duet which followed composed by Benedict, was a racy, spirit-stirring morsel, which gave us the highest opinion of his merits as a composer. It would, however, be unfair simply to judge him by his duet, as he is the author of three of the most popular English Operas of the present day. These are La Zingara, The Brides of Venice, and the Crusaders, the last of which we understand have become standard works in the English repertoire. However, to return to the Duet—it was sung exquisitely by both singers, and received one of the most enthusiastic tokens of approbation which the audience could possibly have given. The overture to the Fra Diavolo of Auber, commenced the second portion of the Concert, succeeded by an Aria from Verdi's I Lombardi, sung by Belletti; the celebrated Trio for the voice and two flutes, composed expressly for Mademoiselle

Lind in Meyerbeer's Camp of Silesia, "Una furtiva lagrima," by Salvi, and finally by Benedict's Ballad, "Take this Lute," and the Herdsman's Song by Jenny Lind. We scarcely know how to express our admiration of the Trio from the Camp of Silesia. The flute parts were admirably played by Messrs. Kyle and Siede. As for Mademoiselle Lind, her share in it was perfectly beautiful. Benedict's ballad, a pleasing and genial melody, full of quiet attraction, made a pleasing contrast with the instrumental peculiarities for which the former piece was most remarkable. It was followed by the Echo song, as the Herdsman's song is generally called. We have heard various romantic stories touching the exhibition of ventriloquial powers in this song, and had indeed attended its first delivery with something nearly approaching to curiosity. We have now the satisfaction of announcing to our friends, in spite of all the rumours circulated affirmatively, that Mademoiselle Lind is no ventriloquist. The Aria given by Signor Belletti we did not greatly relish, although it is one of the most pleasing efforts of Verdi with which we are acquainted. "Una furtiva lagrima" was the best specimen of Salvi's singing, and in every respect more pleasing than the air of Pacini.

From what we have seen, knowing the prices seats have sold at, and the number of seats in the Theatre, we put the number of seats in the Theatre, we put the amount taken at Jenny Lind's first concert at fifteen thousand, and the second, (last night,) at nineteen thousand dollars!!! Our readers may rest assured that this is very near the mark. Mr. Barnum has decided, as may be seen by the advertisement, to give two more concerts in Cincinnati, besides the one announced for this evening. The auction takes place at ten o'clock this morning in the Theatre.

The Concerts of Jenny Lind have left the public pulse at fever heat. The whole town is alive with excitement. Jenny Lind is the only topic. Pork and hams are no where. Such being the state of things, we too gave way to the current, and add such items below, as happen to come in our way.

Jenny Lind is not to sing in Columbus, as was originally intended—the contract for a concert having been abandoned there by mutual consent. The cause of this was probably, the uncertainty of securing an audience sufficiently large to justify the expense. The Jenny Lind company consists of thirty-nine persons, and is made up as follows:—Jenny Lind, her companion (Mdlle Ahmansen;) her secretary, Max Hjorteborg; her accountant, her three servants, (two males and one female;) Mr. Barnum, daughter, and friend; an orchestra of fifteen persons; Benedict and servant, Salvi, Belletti, Le Grand Smith, treasurer, secretary, two ticket sellers, and five persons employed in various capacities.

Provincial.

EDINBURGH.—The concert in the Queen-street Hall, on Saturday, afforded a treat to the lovers of sweet sounds. The vocalists were two young ladies, and a gentleman (Mr. Crowe), Signor Anelli's pupils, whose efforts reflected credit on themselves, and on the system adopted by their teacher. The ballad "O, charming May," which was encored, was tastefully sung by a young lady, who possesses a sweet mezzo-soprano voice, together with self-possession and an unaffected deportment, which promises much for her future success. She was equally successful in "Be Watchful and Beware," and "O luce di quest' anima." "Il soave e bel contento," and the Brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia, were both sung in a creditable manner by another young lady, the first being honoured with an encore, for which she substituted the "Merry Sunshine." Her voice (a contralto) is musical, and her management of it evinces talent. Mr. Crowe, in "Bruce's Address," was warmly encored. Signor Anelli and Mr. Frederic Anelli gave a duet for guitar and pianoforte, which was well performed. Mr. F. Anelli, who conducted the concert, showed much facility of execution in a fantasia from Norma, in which he was encored. The concert concluded with the National Anthem, and the company departed highly gratified.

GLASGOW.—The last Philharmonic Concert for this season took place in the Merchants' Hall, on Tuesday Evening week. The Hall was well filled, and the audience brilliant and fashionable. Unfortunately, several of the most efficient amateurs were absent, and the sudden removal of the 21st Regiment disappointed the Society of the assistance of their band, some of whom had been practising their parts for the concert. Although the orchestra was crippled in consequence, the pieces were well performed. The selection was popular and entertaining. Miss Bassano (contralto), Mr. Lawler (basso), conducted the vocal part of the entertainment with great applause. The latter sung "The Wanderer" "My boyhood's home" and "Largo al factotum." Miss Bassano showed the flexibility of her voice in the "Ah qual giorno," and gratified the audience by the national ballad of "Auld Robin Gray," which was exquisitely sung. Mr. Julian Adams, conductor of the concert, was encored in both his solos on the pianoforte. Of the instrumental pieces, the overture to the Siege of Corinth was best performed, and with the selection from Robert le Diable, made up for the deficiency in the orchestra, though several solos could not be given with proper effect. The following vocalists have appeared at the Society's concerts this winter:—Miss Birch, Miss Bassano, Mrs. E. B. Harper, the Misses Smith, Herr Muller (baritone), Mr. Gustavus L. Gcary (tenor), and Mr. Lawler (bass). The concerts have all gone off with such spirit that there is no abatement in the zeal of amateurs, or patronage of the subscribers. It is confidently hoped, that next winter they will be resumed with more spirit than ever.—(Glasgow Paper.)

HALIFAX.—The concert of the Philharmonics, on Tuesday last, was a gratifying evidence of the value of this society in spreading a love of instrumental music. We have rarely heard overtures better performed than those to King Stephen, Yelva, Gustavus, and Fra Diavolo on this occasion. The band also accompanied Mrs. Sunderland, under Mr. Frobisher's conduct, in the scena from Der Freischutz, "Softly sighs." Mrs. Sunderland was in excellent voice, and also gave a ballad by Alexander Lee, and a song by Rodwell, "Oh, charming May," in which she was unanimously encored. Mr. Inkersall's voice told well in his duets with Mrs. Sunderland (Bishop's "I love thee," and Barnett's "Farewell"). Mr. Frobisher's accompaniments on the piano-forte were judiciously subdued. Mr. T. Haddock's second violoncello solo (a fantasia by Schubert) was an excellent performance; but his first solo (a French air with variations) possessed little attraction. Mr. Haddock has a pure style, with a good, but somewhat thin tone. The concert commenced with the first movement in Mozart's Jupiter symphony, which was well played and evidently enjoyed by the audience. The Halifax Philharmonic Society, which was originated within the last two years, is composed entirely of working men.

NUNEATON. The annual tea party at the National School Room took place on Thursday, the 24th ult. The decoration of the room spoke well for the taste of the ladies, to whom the Rev. R. C. Savage paid flattering compliments. The room was crowded by a respectable audience. The Rev. R. C. Savage presided, and after indicating the proceedings of the evening, introduced the Rev. W. Owen, of Bilston, who delivered a lecture on the "Law of Labor," showing that labor, by the blessing of God, produces its own reward. The lecture was interspersed with anecdotes of the lives of eminent men who have risen from the humblest ranks of society to wealth and honour, by their own industry and perseverance. The lecture was divided into sections, between which, Mr. Paget of Atherstone, gave the following pieces in an effective style, and displayed a powerful and well cultivated bass voice:—"Recit. and Air, "Arm, arm, ye brave," "For behold darkness," "Now Heaven in fullest glory," and Callcott's "Last man," all of which gave the greatest satisfaction. The Rev. Chairman proposed a vote of thanks, which was accorded with great acclamation, to the Rev. Lecturer and Mr. Paget. The evening's proceedings terminate with the National Anthem. Mr. Fletcher, the organist, presided at the pianoforte with great ability.

SHEFFIELD.—The Misses Smith gave a series of concerts at the Music-Hall, on Monday, Tuesday, and Thursday evenings, which were characterised by excellence and variety. The programme on each occasion contained a selection of English, Italian and Scotchairs, duets, &c. The fair artistes were well supported by Mr. Augustus Braham, who bids fair to sustain the world-wide fame of his father. His voice is rich in tone, extensive in compass, and of great power and depth. In its management Mr. Braham evinces exceeding taste and judgment, and the style in which he gave "The Death of Nelson," was enthusiastically applauded. Verdi's serenade, "O, Summer Night," "My Sister dear," "Death of Abercrombie," "Bay of Biscay," "Flowers of the Forest," &c., compositions the most opposite in their character, were rendered by him with admirable skill and grace. The Misses Smith are well known. In Scotch ballads, particularly, they excel, as those who heard them, with Mr. Braham in the trios, "Wha'll be King but Charlie," "Caller Herring," and "Weel may the boatie row," must acknowledge that in this style of composition the vocalists are irreproachable. Numerous other English and Italian songs and duets were given each evening. We must not omit to mention the piano accompaniments of Miss Maria Smith.—Sheffield Times.

WINDSOR.—The last concert for the season of the Eton Amateur Choral Society was performed at the Town Hall, on Monday week, before a highly respectable audience. The performances, which consisted of a portion of the Creation, and a miscellaneous selection for the second part, afforded the utmost gratification. Miss Henderson (a singer new to Windsor), Master Hardy, Mr. Knowles, Mr. S. Smith, Mr. Marriott, and Mr. Whitehouse, were the vocalists. The instrumentalists for the most part were from the Queen's private band. Miss Henderson, the debutante, possesses a powerful voice, and sings with taste. Among the miscellaneous pieces a Protestant Hymn, entitled, "Britain's Banner," the music by Dr. G. J. Elvey, performed at this concert for the first time, was warmly applauded, and kindled enthusiasm among the audience, being adapted to the prevailing spirit of the day. It was well rendered both by vocalists and instrumentalists. Dr. G. J. Elvey, was, as usual, the conductor, and Mr. E. Chipp, leader. Before another series of concerts commences there is reason to hope that the heavy pillars with which the Town Hall is encumbered, which act so fatally against the transmission of sound, will be removed, which will be a real boon to the society.—Bucks Herald.

Original Correspondence.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Your last but one number contained a suggestion relative to the expediency of attempting to establish an English opera upon the basis of a confraternal union; or in other words, upon the joint-stock system. It was my intention last week to have addressed you upon this subject, which I feel to be peculiarly interesting, inasmuch as it has engaged much of my professional time and attention of late, together with some of my best energies, and at the cost of something more than a loss of valuable time. But, Mr. Editor, I did not think fit to rush precipitately into the contest, thinking it probable that your number of this week would contain some response from an abler pen than mine.

Finding, Sir, nothing in any way bearing upon the question at issue in your print of this day, I beg the favour of a little space for the following brief remarks, together with the suggestion to which they will lead me in the concluding portion of this letter.

A combination such as that pointed out in the article before alluded to, may appear to the uninitiated exceedingly feasible and greatly desirable, inasmuch as experience has taught that under the system of private management, English opera has become a bye-word and a scorn to the enlightened foreigner, and something worse than a dead letter to the British public, who are most anxious to avenge themselves for the ridicule which a perverse and selfish system has brought down, by supporting to the uttermost any change of operatic management which will afford fair play to the musical profession, and thereby fair play towards the public themselves.

But, Sir, notwithstanding the foregoing desideratum, circumstances have proved that no amelioration of our present disorganised state is to be hoped from the system before hinted at; the reasons are by far too many to record in this letter, but let the following suffice:—

1. A commonwealth of musicians would not succeed, because no twenty "professionals" could be found hardy enough to incur so heavy a monied responsibility as would be involved in the taking of Drury-Lane Theatre.

2. No body of musicians could be found sufficiently disinterested to throw aside the desire for individual advancement for the general good.

3. Because an operatic commonwealth, upon a grand scale, has been attempted, and failed.

4. Because such a thing has been done on a small scale, and failed most lamentably.

To give further reasons were superfluous. But although an endless variety of causes combine to render impracticable all such Utopian schemes, there does appear, to me at least, one broad, open road, upon which no professional traveller has yet ventured to start, and by which alone the desired goal is to be attained. What think you, Mr. Editor, of a petition to Parliament for the establishment of an English opera, somewhat upon the basis of the "Opera Nationale" of France—to be managed or directed by some one individual, who should be compelled to render an account of his stewardship in such a way as should insure the production of the best music attainable, and the engagement of the best artistes?

The space usually allotted to correspondents will not permit or my trespassing much further on your patience, or that of your readers; but should you think fit to give publicity to this letter, I will in two, or at least three, succeeding epistles, give such reasons for adopting the course now projected as will satisfy the professional world of its high utility; and also the public with its extreme importance as regards themselves. At present I will conclude by stating that I have authentic cause for believing that the course I have ventured to propose would by no means be disagreeable in very high quarters, and that so far as my belief goes, the attempt has only to be made to be successful.

I have the honour to be,

Sir, your obedient servant,
PHILO-MUSICA.

PRIZE ANTHEMS.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

May 8th, 1851.

SIR,—As the annual general meeting of the London Sacred Harmonic Society took place last Monday week, I would suggest to your correspondent "A Church Musician," that he should now repeat his three enquiries respecting the prizes to be given for anthems, which "The Committee resolved to recommend to the subscribers at their next general meeting."

In the present stage of the affair, I will only add that if the letter of F. I. S. was intended for anything more than an invasion of the very proper questions put by a "Church Musician," it is unfortunate the advocate of the society did not delay his reply until two days later, when he might in your same paper, have acquainted your readers with the result of the suggestions offered to the meeting.

HONESTA.

THE GORLITZA-ÇA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

Cheltenham, May 7th, 1851.

SIR.—As "One of the Craft" charges me in the last number of The Musical World with not knowing the meaning of a word in my own language, I am obliged to depart, in this instance, from my general rule of not noticing anonymous correspondents. My letter to you of the 16th April did not refer directly, or indirectly, or had it anything whatever to do with "international copyright." My argument is that a composer can sell his copyright of a tune in England whether he was sitting in Regent Street, or the Boulevard, when he composed it, although as we all know, too well alas, there is no international copyright. M. Varin disposed of the music of his Gorlitza to me, I disposed of it to Messrs. Hale and Son, and I venture to maintain it is as much theirs, by equity, as one of the pianos in their warehouse, but we all know as the law is at present, there is no touching those who daily re-print, under their own names, the compositions of others, with a bar or two altered. I never intended to insinuate there are not other original Gorlitzas of excellence, by English composers.

I am, Sir, your obediently,
JAMES BYRN.

Miscellaneous.

MADAME MACFARREN has arrived in London for the season, her appearance at the Stadt-Theatre in Hamburg being postponed until the autumn, in consequence of the present advanced period of the musical season in that city.

HENRY PHILLIPS delivered a lecture on the Music of Various Nations, at the Southwark Literary Institution, last evening.

LABLACHE AT THE EXHIBITION.—Some amusement was created among the visitors who were first in their seats, by watching the perplexity of new comers. The most interest was, however, felt in the wanderings of Lablache, leading a corps of prime donne and assistants from the regions of the Haymarket, and helpless, applying to the police for access to the transept. It was not till after half an hour's peregrination that the object of his mission was attained.

DOWTON, the celebrated comedian, died on the 19th ult., at Brighton-terrace, Brixton, in his 88th year.

DEATH OF MRS. WAYLETT.—Mrs. Alexander Lee (formerly Mrs. Waylett) died on Saturday fortnight, after a painful illness of seven years' duration, which obliged her to relinquish the profession. She was one of the sweetest and best of English ballad singers.

DRURY LANE THEATRICAL FUND.—The anniversary festival of the above excellent institution, will take place at Freemason's Hall, on the 28th inst. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge will take the chair, and the music will be under the direction of Mr. Walter Macfarren.

HERR HEKKING, the talented violoncellist, who was so successful last year at the Wednesday and other concerts, has arrived in town for the season.

IGNAZ TEDESCO, the pianist and composer, is shortly expected in London.

MESSRS. VERDAVAINNE AND DE BESNIER.—The second concert of the series announced by these gentlemen, took place last night, too late for us to notice this week. Particulars will be given in our next.

VIEUXTEMPS will arrive in London on the 20th inst., and perform at the Musical Union, on the 27th. This great violinist has given three concerts in Paris with increased success.

MR. E. J. TURNER'S concert, which we announced last week, came off on Tuesday evening at the Hanover Square Rooms, and proved a capital entertainment. The vocalists were, besides Mr. Turner himself, the Misses Dolby, Poole, and Watson, and Mr. Leffer. The instrumentalists comprised Herr Oberthur (harp), M. Camus (flute), and M. Alexandre Billet (pianist.) M. Billet opened the ball with a solo composed by himself. The composition was neat and sparkling—the execution brilliant and finished. The eminent pianist concluded amid loud applause from all parts of the room. Miss Watson appeared next, and sang Kreipl's Lied, "When May breezes whisper." This young lady is a pupil of Mr. Tomlinson. She has a tolerably good soprano voice, and sings with neatness and expression. Her timidity, however, stands greatly in her way, and should be got rid of by singing more frequently in public. Miss Watson's talent should not be sacrificed to a nervous apprehension. Mr. Turner was received with warm and encouraging cheers. He was evidently frightened, but did not lose entirely his self-possession. He sang Donizetti's charming romanza, "Una furtiva lagrima," from the Elisir d'Amore, with English words. Mr. Turner has a tenor voice of admirable quality, and of more than average power. It is a true tenore robusto, although the singer sometimes forsakes it for the falsetto. The middle voice is unusually good and strong, the tone being round, full, and highly agreeable. Mr. Turner possesses the very rare advantage of invariably singing in tune. Notwithstanding his evident nervousness in his first song, and the anxiety he displayed in his subsequent efforts, his intonation was always true. His voice was tried in compositions of Donizetti, Gluck, Weber, E. Loder, &c., varied enough to show of what quality it was formed, and was found equally adapted to all styles. Mr. Turner, however, must not be led to fancy he has nothing to learn. His faults are certainly on the right side, being extravagances and not deficiencies. He must amend his tendency to ultra-sentiment, by which "bathos" is obtained in place of "pathos." Energy and abandon will come with time, since of these we espy indications. Mr. Turner is a pupil of Mr. Clement White, who has instructed him for the last two or three years. It is highly creditable to Mr. Clement White that Mr. Turner, who knew nothing of singing when he took him in hand, should have made such decided progress in his art, in so short a period. Mr. Clement White has carefully eschewed the too frequent practice with modern professors of dragging out the voice in the upper register, and hence, no doubt, the fine quality of Mr. Turner's middle voice. The "Una furtiva lagrima," was encored with general applause, and Mr. Turner repeated it with increased effect. His next essay was in Hummel's arduous and somewhat slow song, "When night spreads her shadows around," (Inkle and Yarico). This was too high a flight for a novice, nevertheless, Mr. Turner's capabilities were heard to greater advantage than in Donizetti's aria. His upper tones came out stronger and clearer. Mr. Turner next sang with Miss Poole, the English version of "La ci darem," which still further set off his middle voice. He next sang Loder's "Say wilt thou roam with me," after which he gave Gluck's aria, "Che farò" and finished in the trio from Freyshutz, "Where, O terror," with Misses Walton and Poole. Mr. Turner achieved a decided success. With study, perseverance, and patience, we have no doubt he will become a welcome acquisition to the Concert-room. Miss Dolby and Miss Poole both sang charmingly. Miss Dolby sang the romanza, "Parmi les fleurs," from the Huguenots, Holmes' "Scenes of my childhood," and, with Miss Poole, Macfarren's duet, "The Wood-Nymphs." All were delightfully sung, and all loudly applauded, but Mr. Holmes' most sweet ballad provoked an encore, and we were sorry to find Miss Dolby substituting something about children going to sleep. Miss Poole's solos were Mendelssohn's, "The first violet," and Lee's, "The Spirit of Good," both of which were rendered in admirable and unaffected style, especially the first, which was sung to perfection. Mr. Leffler was more at home in "The lads of the village" than in the "Non piu Andrai." The first was a true specimen of the ballad singing of the Dibdin class. Herr Oberthur played two pieces. He is a performer of the legitimate school. His fantasia, on the "Last rose of summer," was brilliant and effective, while the second moreau, "Souvenir de Bologne," displayed a quiet and unaffected grace we hear seldom in harpists of modern date. Both compositions have a decided merit. M. Camus exhibited a fine tone on the flute, and brilliant execution. He obtained loud applause in the solo. M. Billet's second performance was Thalberg's "Norma Fantasia," a piece of almost insuperable difficulty, but which was mastered by the great pianist with consummate ease. A volley of cheers followed this feat. M. Billet and Mr. Tomlinson conducted. The concert was highly interesting and satisfactory, and afforded unqualified gratification to all present.

MADAME SCHWAB has announced a concert at the Princess's Rooms on Tuesday evening next, when she will be assisted by a strong array of vocal and instrumental talent. The names of Catherine Hayes, Miss Dolby, Miss Birch, Miss Pyne, and others, make the programme look unusually strong. Madame Schwab will play a duet with Mr. Willy, and will assist in a septuor of Hummel's. For particulars see advertisement sheet.

VAUXHALL.—This Royal property has opened under the most favourable auspices. The Bal Masqué, given on the night of the inauguration of the Great Exhibition, was attended by a numerous company, who kept up the fun of the evening for many hours, with indefatigable industry. The regular season began last Friday week. Mr. Wardle, the enterprising lessee, has left nothing undone to attract the public, who already numerous patronize him. Mr. Benjamin Barnett superintends the whole of the arrangements, in his usual gentlemanly and business-like manner.

Advertisements.

MISS HENRIETTE MANN

HAS the honor to announce her arrival in Town for the season.
9, Ovington Terrace, Brompton.

NEW PIANOFORTE PUBLICATIONS.

PRAEGER	Liebes Verlangen.
PRAEGER	Moment Joyeux.
PRAEGER	Nocturne Romantique.
RICHARDS	Moonlight Serenade.
RICHARDS	Pastorale.
OURY	Valse Brillant.
HERZ	La Sylphide.
KUHE	Styriennes.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

CORNOPEANS, OPHEICLEIDES, SAX TUBAS, &C.

J. J. HAITE, Musical Instrument Maker to Her Majesty's J. Army and Navy, sells Sax Tubas—E flat tenor, £3 15s.; B flat Alto, £3 5s.; B flat Bass, £6; Contra Bass, £8. Cornopeans, 30s., £21, £22 10s. Courtois Model, £3 10s. and £4 4s.; Basson Model (3 Sax valves) £4 10s. and £5 5s., New Transposing, £4 4s. Opheicleides, (11 keys and tuning slide), £3 18s. Trombones, Trumpets, Horns, Drums, Cymbals, &c., new and second hand, equally cheap. Eight-keyed Cocos Concert Flutes, with tuning slide, patent head, and German silver cup keys, from £1 1s. Clarionets, six keys 18s.; extra keys in proportion. Good Violin Bows, from 2s. Haite's celebrated Roman and Anglo-Roman Strings. Send postage stamps and try a first at 2d.

Orders accompanied by post-office orders, made payable to JOHN JAMES HAITE, 78, Leadenhall Street, London.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGES

FOR Improving the Voice, and removing all Affections of the Throat. Strongly recommended to Clergymen, Singers, Actors, Public Speakers, persons subject to relaxed Throats, and to all persons desirous of cultivating their Voices, and ensuring a good and clear articulation. They have also been found highly beneficial to those afflicted with Nervous, Hysterical, or Stomachic Coughs. To be had in Boxes, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d. each, of every Medicine Vendor in the kingdom.

Testimonials of their efficacy are published with each Box, from

Mad. Grist	Miss Rober	Mr. Harrison	Mr. J. Barnett
Mad. Persiani	Mad. Albertazzi	Mr. Allen	Mr. George Linley
Mad. Eugénie Garcia	Miss Cooper	Mr. White	Mr. Rodwell
Mrs. Alfred Shaw	Sig. Lablache	Mr. Wase	Mr. Nelson
Miss Rainforth	Sig. Giubilei	Mr. Kroff	&c., &c.

HEALTH WHERE IT IS SOUGHT!

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Cure of a disordered Liver and Stomach, when in a most hopeless state.—Extract of a letter from Mr. Matthew Harvey, of Chapel Hall, Airdrie, Scotland, dated the 15th of January, 1880. To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your valuable Pills have been the means, with God's blessing, of restoring me to perfect health, at a time when I thought I was on the brink of the grave. I had consulted several eminent Doctors, who, after doing what they could for me, considered my case hopeless. I had been suffering from a Liver and Stomach complaint of long standing, which during the last two years got so much worse, that every one considered my condition as hopeless. I, as a last resource, got a Box of your Pills, which gave relief, and by persevering in their use for some weeks, together with rubbing night and morning your Ointment over my chest and stomach, and right side, I have by their means alone got completely cured, and to the astonishment of myself and everybody who knows me.

(Signed) MATTHEW HARVEY.
These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—
Ague, Constipation, Fevers of all kinds, Liver complaints, Tumours, Asthma, the Bowels, Dropsy, Lumbago, Uricers, Bilious Complaints, Consumption, Fits, Piles, Worms of all kinds, Rheumatism, Gout, Sciatica or King's Weakness, from Indigestion, Skin, Dysentery, Hæmorrhoids, Evil, whatever cause, Bowel complaints, Erysipelas, Inflammation, Sore Throats, &c., &c. Jaundice, Tic Douloureux.

Sold at the Establishment of Professor HOLLOWAY, 244, Strand, (near Temple-bar, London, and most all respectable Druggists, and Dealers in Medicines throughout the civilised World at the following prices—1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 38s. each Box. There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients in every Disorder are affixed to each Box.

WESSEL AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

CZAPEK —"La Gorlitzza"	2s. 0d.
MORINE —"Glenalbyn Polkas"	2s. 6d.
DAWES —"Woburn Waltzes"	3s. 0d.
ETTLING —"La Chanteuse Vollee" Valses	3s. 0d.
BARKER (Laura) —"Sprite Polka"	3s. 6d.
TALEXY —"Kosciusko, Etude Mazurka"	2s. 6d.
—"Musidora," Polka Mazurka	2s. 0d.
—"Helena," Premier Nocturne	2s. 0d.
VAN MAANEN —"Atherstone Schottisch," Duet	3s. 0d.
TEDESCO , Three German Melodies
No. 1. "THE COTTAGE."—(Das Hütchen)	2s. 6d.
2. "TRUE LOVE."—(Treue Liebe)	2s. 0d.
3. "LORELEY."—(Loreley)	3s. 0d.

Wessel and Co., 229, Regent-street.

LEE & COXHEAD'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

MUSIC for the VIOLIN.

THE AMATEUR VIOLINIST—A selection of favorite Airs from the Standard Foreign Operas, arranged expressly for the first position of the Violin, in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY FARMER, with an accompaniment ad lib. for the Piano, second Violin, and Violoncello.

THE VIOLINIST'S ALBUM—a collection of favorite Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, &c., arranged expressly for the first position of the Violin, in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY FARMER, with an Accompaniment ad lib. for the Piano, second Violin, and Violoncello.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Farmer's Violin School." 5s.

MUSIC for the FLUTE.

THE AMATEUR FLUTIST—a selection of favorite Airs from the Standard Foreign Operas, arranged in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY NICHOLSON, with an Accompaniment ad lib. for the Violin, Violoncello, and Pianoforte.

THE FLUTIST'S ALBUM—a collection of favorite Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, &c., arranged in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY NICHOLSON, with an Accompaniment ad lib. for the Piano, Violin, and Violoncello.

MUSIC for the ORGAN or HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST—a collection of short interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate Designs by Brandard, arranged by ALBERT KELLER; the six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by EDWIN FLOOD. Price 2s.

A NEW PIANOFORTE SCHOOL, by ALBERT KELLER, price 4s.

"We can confidently recommend this Pianoforte Tutor as the best extant: Mr. Keller has adopted the judicious method of arranging the scales and exercises amongst the lessons, by which plan the pupil is taught these essentials without turning to a formal book of scales, &c.—the fingering is carefully marked without being crowded, and is evidently written by one who has had great experience as a teacher."

Also, "Delices de la Jeunesse," in 12 sets, price 2s. each, written expressly to follow the above Tutor, by C. W. Glover.

London: Lee and Coxhead, 48, Albermarle Street, and all Book and Music Sellers, Catalogues gratis.

THE SCORPION!

NEW PIRATICAL SONG.—Sung by Mr. R. PAGET, for whom it was expressly written and composed. Words by EDWARD FARMER. Music by G. SIMPSON.

"This song, which has attracted considerable attention in the provinces, through the singing of Mr. R. Paget, of Atherstone, is essentially remarkable for the qualities that ensure popularity and command encores. A flowing melody, easily retained, and addressed to the general ear. The accompaniment is easy to play, but effective and appropriate. . . . This song is written with irreproachable correctness, and is happily adapted to the great majority of voices. It has every chance of popularity, and will doubtless be shortly laid hold of by some of our public singers."—Musical World, Feb. 8th.

London: Campbell, Ransford, and Co., 53, New Bond-street, and may be had of Mr. R. Paget, Atherstone, Price 2s. 6d.

Just published, Price 4s.,

Hommage a l'Exposition de toutes les Nations a Londres, INCLUDING Ma Normandie, the German Fatherland, Hungarian National March, National Swiss Air, National Polish Song, Yankee Doodle, and Here's a health to all good lasses. By Wilhelm Kuhe. Published by R. Mills, 140, New Bond-street.

MESSRS. COCKS' NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

EXETER HALL CONCERTS.—Handel's Oratorios, as performed at these Concerts, large folio size, to admit of four or five persons reading from one copy, collated with the author's own manuscripts in her Majesty's library, full Vocal Score, with Pianoforte or Organ accompaniment. These unrivalled editions, by John Bishop, of Cheltenham, are on sale as follows:—"The Messiah," cloth boards, 15s.; "Israel in Egypt," 15s.; "Samson," 15s.; "Judas Maccabeus," 15s.; "Dettingen Te Deum," 12s.; the four "Coronation Anthems," 12s.; "Utrecht Te Deum," 12s.; "Utrecht Jubilate," 10s. 6d. Also "Haydn's Seasons," 21s.; and his "Creation," 15s.; Handel's "Serenata," "Acis and Galatea," 12s. Also Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," 12s.; and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," 12s. Large Folio Editions of the above, for the Pianoforte, without words, by Czerny, of whom may be had tickets for the above concerts.

HAMILTON'S MODERN INSTRUCTIONS for the PIANO-FORTE, fingered by Charles Czerny, twenty-second edition, large music folio, 4s.—"This is the twenty-second edition, and a cheaper or more useful work was never published. Valuable as it has hitherto been to preceptors and students, the present issue is an improvement even upon the former ones. It is complete in every point, and so simple and well-arranged that a child might become proficient by attending to its directions. The exercises commence with standard melodies, and gradually go on increasing in brilliancy until the most sparkling music of modern composers is accomplished without difficulty. We are not at all surprised that the work should have become so popular, considering its merits and cheapness."—Vide North Wales Chronicle, April 15.

DR. BOYCE'S COLLECTION of CATHEDRAL MUSIC, under the immediate patronage of H.R.H. the Prince Albert. In Score, with a companion for the Organ, in three large folio volumes (upwards of 1,300 ps s.), newly edited by JOSEPH WARREN, is now ready for delivery. Price £6 6s. This elaborate work is on view at the Great Exhibition of All Nations, as a specimen of Music Engraving, Printing, and Binding (Class xvii.) It is carefully revised, and corrected from many original MSS. and from Barnard's Selected Church Music, 1641, the most valuable work of its kind. The additions comprise—Services and Anthems by Tallis Thomas Tomkins, Byrd, John Parsons, Rev. R. (Creighton), Orlando Gibbons, and Dr. Blow. There are 10 Services, 78 Full and Verse Anthems and Chants, by the following composers, viz., Tallis, Richard Farrar, Byrd, Bevan, Morley, William Mundy, Thomas Tomkins, John Parsons, Adrian Battell, Drs. Christopher Tye, Orlando Gibbons, Bull, Child, Rogers, Blow, Turner, Croft, Aldrich, and Creighton, William Lawes, Matthew Lock, Henry Purcell, Goldwin, Pelham Humphrey, Goldwin, Weldon, Michael Wise, and Jeremiah Clark, besides copious Memoirs of the Composers and a Life Portrait of Dr. Boyce.—The following is an extract from the Court Journal of April 26, 1851:—"The work has been engraved in the best possible manner, and printed on the best paper, and reflects the highest credit, not only on the editor (whose labours extended over six years on this one collection), but on the publishers, for thus placing before the public a work that must endure for all time."—London—published by Messrs. ROBERT COCKS and CO. 6, New Burlington-street, publishers to her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen.

SACRED HARMONY.

UNDER the especial PATRONAGE of Her Most Excellent MAJESTY.—Just published, price 31s. 6d., H. J. HAYCRAFT'S VOLUME OF SACRED HARMONY. Contributors:—Kate Loder, Sterndale Bennett, Henry Smart, Macfarren, Dr. Walmisley, Lucas, Phillips, Holmes, Richards, Barnett, &c. London: Addison and Co.; and at the Editor's residence, 32, Queen's-road, Gloucester-gate, Regent's-park.

"This is a judicious and interesting publication, containing works of high merit, and altogether possessing an interest not likely to pass hastily away."—Atlas.

CHAULIEU'S PIANOFORTE WORKS.

MESSRS. RUST and STAHL, being the Sole Proprietors of the Posthumous Works of M. Chaulieu, beg to intimate their intention of publishing them as originally intended by the author—viz., in parts at 6s. each, and which will include the Harmonical Dial, twenty-four sonatas in the twenty-four major and minor keys; having before each one exercise, the prelude, and two improvisations in the same key, specially written for the English schools, six parts of which are already published. And also six other parts, comprising two Books of Studies in the modern style, Morceau de Salon, Album de Bal, &c., 5s. each, or the twelve parts in one volume, boards, at £3 2s.

Rust and Stahl, Pianoforte Manufacturers and Music Publishers, 320, Regent-street, opposite the Royal Polytechnic Institution.

MR. CRIVELLI

BEGS to acquaint his friends and the public that a Third Edition of the "ART OF SINGING," enlarged and newly arranged in the form of a Grammatical System of Rules for the Cultivation of the Voice, may be had at his residence, 71, Upper Norton-street, and at all the principal Music-sellers.
* Soon will be ready, the French and German Translation.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published,

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the A FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTE.

Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co. 58, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 210 Regent-street; Keith and Prowse, 48, Chesapeake; and Cocks & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. DON GIOVANNI.

GRAND EXTRA NIGHT.

IT is respectfully announced that a Grand Extra Night will take place ON THURSDAY NEXT, MAY 15, 1851, when will be presented (for the first time this season), Mozart's chef d'œuvre, entitled

DON GIOVANNI.

With the following powerful Cast:—
Don Giovanni	Signor COLETTI.
Don Ottavio	Signor CALZOLARI.
Masetto	Signor F. LABLACHE.
Il Commendatore	Signor SCAPINI.
And
Leporello	Signor LABLACHE.
Donna Anna	Madame FIORENTINI.
Donna Elvira	Madame GIULIANA.
And
Zerlina	Madame SONTAG.

In the Ball Scene Mdlle. CARLOTTA GRISI, and Mdlle. AMALIA FERRARIS will dance Mozart's celebrated

"MINUET" AND "ZARABANDA."

To conclude with the admired Ballet (arranged into one act), entitled

LE DIABLE A QUATRE.

By Mdlle. CARLOTTA GRISI, Mdlles. Rosa, Esper, Julien, Lamoureux, Allegrini, Pascas, Aussandon, Dantonie, Kollenberg; M. CHARLES, MM. Ehrick, Gonrich Di Mattia Venefra, Gossellen, and M. P. Taglioni.

Applications for Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets, to be made at the Box-office of the Theatre. Doors open at Seven, the Opera to commence at Half-past Seven o'clock.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, Mr. COSTA.—FRIDAY, May 16, will be repeated, Mendelssohn's ELIJAH. Vocalists—Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss E. Birch, Miss Dolby, Miss M. Williams; Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Novello, and Herr Formes. The orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 performers. Tickets, 3s.; reserved, 5s.; central area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter-hall; or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing-cross.

PRINCESS'S CONCERT ROOM.

MADAME SCHWAB'S Evening Concert, Tuesday, May 13th. Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Birch, Miss Dolby, Miss E. Birch, Miss M. Williams, Miss Messent, Miss Pyne, Madame F. Lablache; Herr Mengis, Mr. Whitworth, Herr Stockhausen, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Frank Bodda, Herr Reichard. Piano-forte, Madame Schwab; Violin, Mr. Willy; Flute, Signor Bricealdi; Harp, Herr Oberthür; Cornet-a-Piston, Herr Kunig. Conductor, Mr. Lavenu. Tickets, 5s. Reserved Seats, 7s. 6d., Family Tickets for Three, 10s. 6d. Tickets of Madame Schwab, 31, Milton Street, Dorset Square.

M. ERNST'S

GRAND EVENING CONCERT will take place at the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS on MONDAY, JUNE 2nd. Full particulars at Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

MUSICAL UNION.

TUESDAY, MAY 13th, half-past 3:—Quartet, in F, No. 82 Haydn; Quartet, in G, No. 2, Beethoven; Grand Trio, B flat, Beethoven; Artists—Sivori, D. Joffe, Hill, and Piatti. Piano-forte—C. Hallé. None but Honorary Members admitted free to this Meeting; one hundred invitations will be issued for the next EXTRA MATINEE, May 20th, for foreign and native Professors. J. ELLA.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF FEMALE MUSICIANS.

ESTABLISHED 1839, for the Relief of its Distressed Members. Patroness—Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen. ON WEDNESDAY EVENING, JUNE 11th, 1851, at the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS, will be performed, for the benefit of this institution, A GRAND CONCERT OF VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC. Leader—Mr. H. G. Blagrove. Conductors—Mr. W. Sterndale Bennett and Mr. Lindsay Sloper.

An Honorary Subscriber of One Guinea annually, or Ten Guineas at One Payment (which shall be considered a Life Subscription), will be entitled to Two Tickets of admission, or one for a reserved seat, to every Benefit Concert given by the Society. Donations and Subscriptions will be thankfully received, and Tickets delivered, by the Secretary, Mr. J. W. Holland, 13, Macclesfield Street, Soho; and at all the principal Musicians'.

MISS CATHERINE HAYES

BEGS to announce that her GRAND MORNING CONCERT will take place on MONDAY, the 19th MAY, at the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS. The most distinguished vocal talent, also Herr Ernst, Signor Bottesini, and other great Instrumentalists are engaged. The Orchestra, selected from the Italian Operas and Philharmonic Concerts, will perform a new Overture by E. Silas, &c. Tickets and Stalls at Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 201, Regent-street, and all the principal Music Warehouse.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

SECOND NIGHT OF LA DONNA DEL LAGO.

SECOND ACT OF ROBERTO IL DIAVOLO.

GRISI, CASTELLAN, ANGRÌ, FORMES, BIANCHI, STIGELLI, TAMBERLIK, And MARIO.

THE DIRECTORS have the honor to announce that on TUESDAY NEXT, May 13, a Grand Combined Entertainment will be given, commencing with, for the first time this season, Rossini's favorite Opera, LA DONNA DEL LAGO.

Elena, Madame Castellan (her first appearance in that character); Albina, Madlle. Corti; Malcolm Graeme, Madlle. Angrì; Douglas, Signor Bianchi; Serano, Signor Soldi; Rodrigo Dhu, Signor Tamberlik; and Giacomo V., Signor Mario.

To conclude with the SECOND ACT of Meyerbeer's Grand Romantic Opera

ROBERTO IL DIAVOLO.

embracing the duett by Signor Stigelli and Herr Formes, the duett by Herr Formes and Madame Grisi, the duett by Signor Tamberlik and Herr Formes, the grand Trio by Madame Grisi, Herr Formes, and Signor Tamberlik, and the celebrated scene of the Nuns by Madlle. Louise Taglioni, and the Corps de Ballet in the grand cloister scene.

EXTRA NIGHT.

On THURSDAY NEXT, May 15, will be performed, for the fourth time this season, Meyerbeer's Grand Opera.

LES HUGUENOTS.

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor,—MR. COSTA.

COMMENCE AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre, and of the principal Musicians and Librarians.

HERR CHARLES OBERTHÜR,

Harpist to Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Nassau,

HAS the honor to announce that his CONCERT will take place at the NEW BEETHOVEN ROOMS, on TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 20th. Vocalists—Madlle. Bertha Johansen, Mdlle. F. Rummel, and Herr Mengis. Instrumentalists—Herr Menter, Herr Pauer, and Herr Alexandre Ranchorat. Tickets 10s. 6d., to be had at Wessel and Co.'s, 229, Regent-street; Boosey and Co., Holles-street, &c.; and of Herr Oberthür, 87, Milton-street, Dorset Square.

MR. AGUILAR

RESPECTFULLY announces that his Annual Concert will take place at the Hanover Square Rooms on Wednesday evening, May 28th, 1851. Vocalists—Miss Birch, Miss Dolby, Miss Messent, Madlle. Graumann, Herr Stigelli, Signor Marchesi, and Herr Formes. Violin, Herr Ernst; Contrabasso, Signor Bottesini; Piano-forte, Mr. Aguilar. The Orchestra, selected from the Royal Italian Opera, will be complete in every department. Leader, Mr. Willy; Conductors, Messrs. Anschutz and Schimon. Among other pieces, will be performed for the first time in England, Mr. Aguilar's Symphony in E minor.

Tickets seven shillings each, Reserved Seats, half a guinea. To be procured at Messrs. Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent Street; Messrs. Wessel and Co., 229, Regent Street, corner of Hanover Street; and at the residence of Mr. Aguilar, No. 68, Upper Norton Street, Portland Road.

SIGNOR BOTTESINI,

MUSICAL DIRECTOR OF THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA AT HAVANA,

BEGS to apprise the Musical Profession and the Public that he will arrive in London at the beginning of May, and remain during the entire Season.

Letters and applications for engagements to be addressed to Sig. BOTTESINI, Wessel and Co., 229, Regent Street.

TO THE MUSICAL PROFESSION.

MR. FREDERICK WRIGHT begs to inform the Members of the Musical Profession that he continues to manage Concerts, Musical Entertainments, and Lectures, in Brighton. Madlle. Jenny Lind, Madame Mailbray, Miss Adelaide Kemble, M. Thalberg, Herr Ernst, Mr. John Parry, Mr. Albert Smith, and the late Mr. John Wilson visited Brighton under Mr. Frederick Wright's superintendence.

N.B.—An experienced Piano-forte Tuner wanted.

Address—Mr. Frederick Wright, Royal Colonnade Music Mart, Brighton.

DIATONIC FLUTE.

BY Royal Letters Patent.—Amateurs may hear this instrument played by Mr. PRATTEN (first flute), at the Royal Italian Opera; by Mr. RICHARDSON, at Crosby Hall, on the 12th, and at the Princesses Concert Rooms, on the 28th inst.

N.B. Specimens of this flute may be seen at the Great Exhibition, Class X, No. 535. Manufactory, 135, Fleet Street. A. Siccama, Patentee.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Sturley Villas, Sturley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Purkess, Dean Street 8 ho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, May 10, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Messrs. Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden.

No. 20.—VOL. XXVIII.

SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1851.

PRICE FOURPENCE.

SOPHIE CRUVELLI.

As the time approaches for the debut of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli, the interest of the Opera-goer augments, and his expectations are raised. Are we to have another Jenny Lind—or another Grisi—or another Viardot? Sophie has been compared to any and all of these, by critics, Italian, German, and French; we have a right, therefore, to put the question, and as no one is at hand, with the desired information, we shall answer it ourselves. We are to have nothing of the sort—nor Jenny, nor Giulia, nor Pauline—nothing of the sort, but something entirely new, and that is far better than a copy of a great original. We are to have Sophie Cruvelli, and if in having Sophie Cruvelli, the most exorbitant desire for perfections, histrionic and vocal, be not satisfied, we shall cast our pen upon the waters, and prophesy no more.

Three years ago we heard Cruvelli, at Her Majesty's Theatre, in several parts, and how highly we thought of her may be gathered from a reference to our Opera notices of 1848. Sophie was then very young, beautiful, intelligent, energetic, and full of promise. She was driven away by the Lind-fever, as one who quits a city in the time of the plague. All London, all England had the fever, and Sophie herself was in danger of infection. But she fled in time, and escaped untouched. She now comes back, three years older, still very young (not twenty-two), for what is three years at her fresh time of life?—what but the expanding of a bud into a blossom? Three years well spent, however, can make an artist; and Sophie Cruvelli has spent them well—seriously, industriously, and well—and Sophie Cruvelli has returned, not an artist merely, but, or we are much deceived, a great artist. We do not mince words, when we have good news to tell: and we assure our readers, without hesitating, that the debut of Sophie Cruvelli, on Tuesday night, will be the rising of a new and bright star in the operatic heaven.

The choice of an opera, the choice of a part in that opera, already discloses a secret in the nature of a debutante. Sophie Cruvelli has chosen Fidelio. She makes her first appeal in the mighty harmonies of Beethoven. The reader will conclude that Fidelio has been one of her favourite parts, during her absence of three years. No such thing, she has never played it, and has never seen it played. That she should not have seen it played is perhaps an advantage; the conception will be her own. But that she should not have played it is a difficult rock in her path, which she can only level by the potent spell of genius. We have no doubt upon the matter. She will pass the rock, and reach the goal. Sophie Cruvelli has genius, and the world will be charmed, and acknowledge it.

It is now sixteen years since the grand part of Fidelio, the grandest and the most arduous in the lyric drama, has found a competent representative. Malibran was the last. She played it shortly after Schroeder Devrient, and each had her partisans. For our own parts we admired either; but were more nearly moved by Malibran, who delighted, than by Schroeder, who astonished. To succeed triumphantly, Cruvelli must do both. Can she?—will she? We think she can and will; it is a great word to say, but we have said it, and have no thought of retracting. We stand our ground, and leave retreat for the timid. The qualifications demanded by the part of Leonora are manifold. First, voice—voice, high, powerful, and flexible. This is absolute and indispensable. Without voice Leonora is not, cannot be. Cruvelli has voice—a voice of three octaves in compass, from F to F, from Arsace to the Queen of Night—a voice as strong, well tutored, and as much at command, as it is equal, pure, and of fine quality. Second, a person, dignified and feminine, formed at once to inspire respect and win affection. We cannot paint in words; but had we the pencil of Sanzio, we could draw a woman as intellectually beautiful as Rachel, and as soft as his own Fornarina; a veil of German mysticism thrown over the whole—a thin, transparent vapour, which, in return for its envious wish to shroud the splendour of the moon, is robed by its enemy in a brightness not its own; we could draw this, and this would be Cruvelli. Fire, energy, graceful action, passion, abandon, and, above all, the force and stamina that ensure the full realisation of striking dramatic situations, and command the physical resources to the very last—all these are necessary. All these Cruvelli can boast, and a manner of employing them, which, in positions of the highest intensity, still show the woman in all her most winning sincerity, in the genuine simpleness of heart, in the earnest modesty of demeanor. To make Fidelio quite the man was the mistake of Schroeder Devrient; to make her too much woman was the lovelier error of poor Malibran. Cruvelli, if we err not, will steer between the two, and realise the superb ideal of the poet and musician. We suggest no comparisons; we do not say Cruvelli will be less or greater than her celebrated predecessors, but only guess, from what we have been able to see, that she will be most entirely the heroic and devoted wife whom Beethoven imagined and painted. That it was Beethoven who created Leonora, and not the author of the story, or the maker of the libretto, may be tested by an examination of Paer's work of that name. When "the giant of the orchestra" had sat out the opera of Paer, he paid him this compliment:—"Paer, I am enchanted! What a story! what a book! I must write music for it!" And he wrote Fidelio, which was so well appreciated by the manager, the singers, and the public, that nothing could ever induce Beethoven to compose another opera.

The one dramatic work of Beethoven, however, has been very popular in this country, and would have been played as often, and in as many places as Don Juan or Der Freischütz, but for the almost insuperable difficulty of finding a woman who could sing and act Fidelio. That woman has been found. Cruvelli, the young and promising Cruvelli, is made to sing, to act, and look Fidelio. As a messenger dropped from the skies, she will, by the magic of her presence, the charm of her singing, and the ardor of her resolution, clear away the mist of prejudice that has long enveloped this masterpiece, to its bane. Cruvelli shall place Fidelio upon the Italian stage so sure and firmly, that, by the side of the immortal inspirations of Mozart, it shall continue, henceforth and for ever, to delight the masses and sustain the fortunes of the theatre. If she does not this we shall be much disappointed. If she does, her name will be uttered with veneration by every one who loves music, by every one who considers it an art of infinite beauty and majestic influence, and not an empty sound to tickle the ears of "the groundlings."

Sophie Cruvelli has taken Beethoven by the hand, to present him to the crowd that sways to the strains of Donizetti and Bellini. The young German maiden has resolved to interpret the mysterious measures of her sublime compatriot to the other nations. In England she will find ears willing to hear, hearts quick to feel, and hands eager to applaud. It will, indeed, be a night to remember, on which, after a silence of so many years, the faithful Leonora once more sings her sorrows and her rapture, and, to that mournful music, with anxious breast and unquiet eye, faltering steps, but deep resolve, digs the grave of her husband, to save him for herself and happiness. And this we shall owe to Sophie Cruvelli.

THE PIANOFORTE CONTROVERSY.

Here is a bundle of letters on this very important and engrossing theme. We give them in the order of dates, suppressing nothing, nor annexing ought in malice.

I.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—The article on the Great Exhibition, in The Times of Wednesday, erroneously ascribes to the late Sebastian Erard an improvement which you justly characterize as the most important one ever applied to the pianoforte. I allude to that invention by which the immense strain of the strings is taken off the wood framing, and transferred to strong parallel metallic bars.

I have now before me the specification of the patent enrolled in April, 1820, by my late father, William Stodart, of 1, Golden-square, which clearly proves that to him belonged the merit therein expressed, of "removing the strain of the strings from the wood frame, and distending them upon metallic rods, bars, tubes, or plates," &c.

Another invention, viz., that of the inverted or harmonic bridge, by means of which the bearing of the strings is upwards, instead of downwards, was also my father's original idea, and adopted by him in 1822; the subsequent application by Mr. Erard of the studs spoken of in your article, being only intended to produce the same result.

Your invariable readiness to rectify inaccuracies induces me to beg the favour of your inserting this letter.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
MATTHEW STODART,
(for William Stodart and Son.)

1, Golden-square, May 8.

II.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—In reply to the letter of Messrs. Broadwood, published in the Morning Post of the 7th instant, I beg permission to send the following statement which I can substantiate.

There is no doubt but that metal bars may have been applied to pianofortes, in some instances, previous to Messrs. Thorn and Allen's patent for compensation tubes, since, otherwise, their patent would have secured to them the sole right of bracing with metal, and would have prevented Messrs. Erard and Broadwood from practising that method of bracing. But a complete system of metal, of nine solid bars, over the strings of the pianoforte had never been applied to a grand pianoforte previous to Erard's new patent action in 1824. The model which served for Messrs. Erard's men to work upon, is still in the possession of Messrs. Erard, and may be seen at their warerooms in Great Marlborough-street. It was not until Erard's patent repetition pianofortes met with great success that Messrs. Broadwood began, so late as 1827 (from their own admission), to manufacture pianos with the solid metal bars over the strings. Before they adopted this, which is the best plan of bracing, they had been, for some time, placing the bracing bars under the sounding board of the instrument, which mode of bracing was not near so effective.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
PIERRE ERARD.
London, May 8, 1851.

III.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—We thank Monsieur Erard for reminding us that we used solid iron bars under the sounding board. Solid steel tension bars were applied by us above the strings in 1808. Combined with these, the solid iron under-bars introduced at a later period, formed our earliest system of metal bracing.

The metal string plate applied by our workman, Samuel Hervé to the square pianoforte in 1821, was soon adapted in the grand; and together with the upper and under bars, completed our system of metal bracing.

Our plate was fixed. Messrs. Stodart's plate had mortices, and slide-on balls fixed to the bent side.

We have said enough to dispose the priority of application of tension bars above the strings, as claimed by Monsieur Erard, by the writer in the Times.

We had our own bracing; Messrs. Stodart theirs, no doubt; Messrs. Collard, and Monsieur Erard had their own system.

As to the number of bars, 4 or 9, the greatest improvement in our most powerful modern grands has been effected by the reduction of the number of bars to three, and even two. To this fact we invite the attention of all pianoforte makers.

We shall be most happy to explain our present diagonal iron bracing, metal rest plank, and suspension bar, to any curious in such matters.

We remain, Sir,
Your obedient servants,
(Signed) JOHN BROADWOOD & SONS.
33, Gt. Pulteney-street,
9th May, 1851.

IV.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—In the first article of the Times, credit was given to Messrs. Erard alone for the application of metal tension bars above the strings.

We have shown that so early as 1808 we applied steel tension bars above the strings.

In 1820, Messrs. Stodart took out their patent. No one grudges Messrs. Erard their share of merit for the application in a different form of the metal bars, already in use.

We have now in our house a piano of our own, constructed in 1823, with steel tension bars above the strings.

It is true that we took out a patent in 1827 for a combination of solid metal bars with a fixed metal string plate. This does not disprove the fact that metal tension bars had been many years in use.

It is clear that Messrs. Broadwood, Stodart, and Erard, had made distinct applications of the same principle.

In our first letter we did not mention M. Erard's name. We certainly did claim justice for our own countrymen. We do so once more; in the confident hope that whereas in the Times of Saturday, exclusive mention is made of the names of two foreigners of eminence, Thalberg and Liszt, you will permit me to chronicle those of J. B. Cramer and Sterndale Bennett, who can play on our repetition grand pianos, patented in 1837.

We remain, Sir

33, Gt. Pulteney-street,
May 10th, 1851.

Your obedient servants,
JOHN BROADWOOD & SONS.

V.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—In the contest which has arisen out of the able review in the Times of the pianoforte department of the Great Exhibition, I was earnestly desirous to abstain from interfering; I feel it, however, due to truth and to the memory of my uncle, Sebastian Erard, to whose genius and labour the musical art is so much indebted, to supply some more facts in connexion with the questions which have been raised. Mr. Stodart, in his letter which appeared in your journal of Saturday, claims for his father the merit of improvements attributed by the Times to the late Sebastian Erard. It will suffice to compare Messrs. Erard's pianofortes with those of Messrs. Stodart, to be convinced that the principles of their construction are totally different. In Messrs. Thorn and Allen's patent, upon which Messrs. Stodart's pianos are constructed, one end of the bracing bars or tubes only is fixed to the wood frame, the other end being attached to a moveable string plate, to allow them to expand or contract, according to the changes of temperature and of atmosphere. In Erard's pianoforte both ends of the bars are firmly fixed to the wood-frame of the instrument, with the intention of giving to that frame a sufficient strength to carry better proportioned wires, producing consequently greater strength and better quality of tone. When Erard's pianofortes first appeared, from 1821 to 1824, grand pianofortes were generally made with metal arches from the rest-plank to a rail across the centre of the instrument, called the belly-rail. Erard's improved construction consisted from the first of a general system of improved arches, then called long arches, which were prolonged from the rest-plank to the bent side or extremity of the case. Those long arches or bars, with posts to prevent them from bending, were eight or six in number, according to the size of the instrument. They formed a complete system of bracing over the strings in the bass as well as in the treble. It proved so beneficial, that it was soon imitated by all the other pianoforte makers, both British and foreign; but it does not appear that Messrs. Thorn and Allen's patent of 1819 was adopted by any pianoforte maker, except Messrs. Stodart. A second claim was made by Mr. Stodart in favour of his late father for the inverted or harmonic bridge, by means of which the bearing of the strings is upwards, instead of being downwards, as practised by him in 1822. I am not aware that this improvement was patented at that time, but what I do know is, (and Mr. Stodart may easily ascertain the fact at the Enrolment office) that a patent was taken out by the late Sebastian Erard in 1808, where the upward bearing with the stud-bridge is drawn in full. The stud is a piece of metal wire, bent of the shape of a buckle, under which the string passes, the ends of the wire being driven into the wood. This principle was followed up and improved upon in our patent of 1821. The drilled bridge-stud is there specified with a stem tapped to screw into the rest-plank, always with the upward bearing. This drilled bridge-stud, and the construction of the rest-plank dependent on the application of upward bearing, is now practised by all the pianoforte makers in England and abroad, as may be ascertained by looking into the pianofortes of all nations exhibited in the Crystal Palace.

The above-mentioned facts may be corroborated by our patents, models, and instruments, which are open for inspection at our ware-rooms in Marlborough Street, to any one who may wish to investigate the subject.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

PIERRE ERARD.

18, Great Marlborough Street, May 12.

We are much mistaken if Messrs. Kirkman and Son, of Soho Square, could not throw some light on the matter. Why does not that ancient and respectable firm say its say, and vindicate its rights, for the honour of English manufacture? Our columns are open,—they could scarcely close upon a subject of more interest. Step up, Messrs. Kirkman and Son, we shall be glad to see you, and discuss the point.

CONCERT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

On Monday evening Her Majesty gave a concert, to which a party of between three and four hundred, comprising the Royal Family and illustrious foreign visitors, the diplomatic corps, and a numerous circle of the principal nobility were invited. The grand saloon was fitted up for the occasion. The following was the programme:—

PARTE PRIMA.

Quartetto, "Il cor e la mia Fè,"—Madame Castellan, Mlle. Duprez, Signor Gardoni, e Herr Formes (Fidelio)	Beethoven.
Romanza, "Quoi Naphali,"—Madame Grisi	Meyerbeer.
Trio, "C'en est fait,"—Madame Castellan, Mlle. Duprez, e Signor Mario (Le Pré aux Clercs)	Herold.
Air, "O Isis und Osiris,"—Herr Formes (Zauberflöte)	Mozart.
Air, "Se i miei sospiri,"—Signor Mario	Stradella.
Finale 1st, "Esci omai Garzon malnato,"—Mesdames Grisi, Castellan, e Mlle. Duprez, Signori Gardoni, e Coletti, Herr Formes, e Signor Lablache (Nozze di Figaro)	Mozart.

PARTE SECUNDA.

Quartetto, "Notte che attristi e piacei,"—Mlle. Duprez e Madame Castellan, Signor Gardoni e Herr Formes	Costa.
Duo, "A dillo a me,"—Madame Grisi e Signor Mario (Adelia)	Donizetti.
Air, "Come per me sereno,"—Mlle. Duprez (Sonambula)	Bellini.
Trio, "Pensa e guarda," Signor Coletti, Herr Formes, e Signor Lablache (Margherita d'Anjou)	Meyerbeer.
Air, "Arpa gentil," Madame Castellan (Il Ritorno a Pans)	Rossini.
Duo, "Marinara in guardia sta,"—Signori Gardoni e Coletti	Rossini.
Cori e Soli, "Armoni in questo sponda," Mesdames Grisi, Castellan, e Mlle. Duprez, Signor Mario, Gardoni, e Coletti, Herr Formes e Signor Lablache, (Invocazione all Armonia)	His Royal Highness Prince Albert.

Mr. Costa presided at the pianoforte.

Original Correspondence.

JENNY LIND AND ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Your objections to my proposal to invite Mlle. Lind to help English Opera out of the mire are most pertinent, and I will not attempt to argue against them; nevertheless, I would venture to suggest that the disposal of the funds accumulated, as proposed, seems rather a question of detail, and I have been anxious to avoid the discussion of details, as trespassing on your space.

"L'embarras des richesses," is proverbial—but would it not be refreshing to see English Opera in so novel a position? Possibly, however, a satisfactory solution of the problem might be found. I am not prepared to unravel the Gordian knot at present, but I would unequivocally advocate the principle that English Opera is to be considered as an abstract question, and unassociated with individuals;—this being, I think, the best way to extinguish or soften down faction and jealousy. I know full well that the same objections to the Lind proposition will, in a measure, hold good against the possibility of carrying out this principle; but these are all questions of detail, and in considering them, I would urge that the interests of the few must be sacrificed to the many; and the object should be to obtain the largest benefit for the greater number, with as little injury as possible to the minority.

"Philo-Musica's" suggestion about petitioning Parliament for (as I understand it), a subvention, is utterly useless. Any one who is not entirely ignorant of the temper of the House of Commons respecting public expenditure, must know that such a proposition would be simply laughed at. I am at present inclined to think, with "Philo-Musica," that any attempt to carry on English Opera as a pure republic would fail; although I think with certain restrictions, and the co-operation of the capitalists, an equitable scheme might be framed, on the principle that the capitalists should guarantee certain expenses, and undertake to keep the theatre open for a certain time, and have first claim in full on the treasury—the artistes agreeing to a pro-rata division of the remainder, according to certain classifications. Your limits would not permit me to develop this rough plan, even if it were necessary to do so. I believe I may state there is every disposition amongst the most influential people connected with music, to adopt any feasible scheme, and to them, if they are inclined to act, must be left all minor arrangements.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Yours, most obediently,

F. G. B.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—In my last communication I ventured to suggest a course of proceeding, which, if not absolutely indispensable for the reuscitation of the British Lyric Drama, offers at least the probability of investing the attempt with some sort of dignity.

Were this attempt to be made, the principle involved in it would, of course, embrace all branches of the histrionic art, and the reasons which apply to one, would in like manner attach to all simultaneously—a reformation of the present system being IMPERATIVE, in order to prevent the utter decadence of the stage itself.

Previously to going into the plan suggested, it is necessary that the public should be put into possession of a few facts, which though apparent to many of the theatrical and musical profession, and to some few of those before the curtain, are yet but imperfectly understood by many behind the scenes, as well as by the mass of general spectators. In attempting thus to do, I shall confine myself to OPERATIC affairs only, as germane to the object more particularly in view, but the generality of my remarks will be found to apply elsewhere as well, with only slight modifications.

The British public, and, with it, all the world beside, have long been in the habit of supposing that English musicians CANNOT write operatic music—little credence being given to the fact that season after season operatic scores have been tendered for acceptance, in every quarter where the innocent credulity of their authors supposed that a distant chance existed for success. Such is nevertheless A FACT, and the author of these remarks could point out at this moment one dozen, at least, of instances wherein the works so tendered have been better than any ever produced by Englishmen; and, one in particular, written under circumstances of extraordinary physical difficulties, which has no parallel except amidst the chef d'œuvres of the great Meyerbeer himself. What does the British public suppose may have been the result of such application?—something like the following:—If made to a publisher, the applicant was regarded with a smile of compassionate wonder, and recommended to return home to the care of his friends. If made to the operatic manager, the answer was, "How much will you give me to produce your opera?—£700—Eh?" This may appear an exaggeration, but it is substantially true. And now for the reasons.

Neither managers nor publishers have any higher object in view, under the present aspect of affairs, than the mere accumulation of money. The publication or the production of an opera is a matter which involves from £300 to £1,000; and, in many instances, very much more than this sum. Under such circumstances there can be no surprise in both publishers and managers evincing caution. It by no means follows that, because music is good, that the public will buy it. Good music frequently requires more puffing than bad, and as a general rule it will be found that THE ballad, or duet, or polka, which returns its publisher the greatest gain, will have dated its popularity to some circumstance quite apart from its own particular merits. The inference to be gathered is, therefore, that neither publishers nor managers will buy or produce operatic music SIMPLY because it is good. It must be backed by a popular name, or, in default of this, the whole expenses of its production guaranteed. Where, let me ask, is the unknown musician who could obtain a chance of becoming known under these circumstances?

Another reason, or rather a continuation of other reasons, operates very strongly against the success of the lyric drama—reasons which can scarcely be enumerated within small bounds—but, as briefly as possible, they are these:—Laws and bye-laws exist in theatrical communities, which fetter and destroy the vital principle of success. These laws have arisen, in time long past, from the petty jealousies and selfishness of artistes—who, in their struggle for individual fame, lost sight of general approbation; the result has been the tacit acknowledgment of an arbitrary code, whereby the stage is now as fenced round with "privileges" as the House of Commons itself. Let us take an instance, wherefrom it will be seen that the highest interests of the drama are entirely subverted to the detriment of even those who seek to benefit themselves. Instance: Messrs. A., B., and C., are all three principal tenors; Mesdames D., E., and F., are leading sopranis; Messrs. G., H., and I., are all three bassi profondi, &c.; each receiving a like amount of salary, and each receiving a like share of popularity; with these, of course, are engaged the usual number of subordinate artistes, &c. Suppose now, an opera to be submitted to the management, wherein two or more parts are required to be filled with nearly, if not quite, equal talent,—what is the result? Mr. A. refuses to play second to Mr. B., and so on throughout the entire cast. The second parts are obliged to be entrusted to incompetent individuals; and an imperfect representation is the result. To REMEDY THIS DEFECT IN FUTURE, the manager determines to accept no such works as would entail upon him a like unpleasantness. The authors of operatic libretti seldom enter into such an apparently absurd engagement as that involved above—the consequence is, that either the said manager is obliged to write his own libretti, or to dictate to another person—choosing his own COMPOSERS from feelings of private friendship, or particular in trust. This he can only do from amongst known men. And thus new composers, however good they may be, have not the slightest chance afforded them—NOR WILL HAVE—till the system shall be entirely changed.

Other reasons than these, some of them highly important, exist, through which the public is defrauded of its rights, and the profession of its reputation, but they all conduce to one result. Good operas are not produced, and those which have been produced have been inadequately represented, at the same time that good operas and good artistes are plentiful. Absurd to excess.

The public, accustomed, as it is to good operas on the Italian stage, and good representations (although it must be acknowledged that somewhat of the bye-law nuisance exists even amongst the Italians), WILL NOT support respectable mediocrity; and who shall say it is in the wrong!

Having thus, Mr. Editor, enumerated a few of the leading reasons why English Opera is so degraded, I will in my next propose a remedy.

And am, Sir, yours, obediently,
PHILO-MUSICA.

COPYRIGHT.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—It would appear from your remark in your leader on the subject of copyright, viz., "if there be no international law, &c.," that you were not cognizant of such a law being in existence; I therefore beg to call your attention to an Act of Parliament passed on the 31st of July, 1838, called "An Act to secure to AUTHORS, in certain cases, the benefit of International Copyright, 1st and 2nd Victoria, cap. 59," which commences thus:—"Whereas it is desirable to afford protection within Her Majesty's dominions to the authors of books first published in foreign countries, and their assigns, in cases where protection shall be afforded in such foreign countries to the authors of books first published in Her Majesty's dominions," &c. Now, Sir, there needs no other explication of this law than the preamble sets out; for it tells us plainly enough the terms upon which a foreign author can have or assign his copyright in England, viz., an act of reciprocity. And it goes very far to prove that former Acts of Parliament on copyright apply only to English authors; and this fact is farther verified if we look to the reason for which the legislature interfered in the matter at all, the history of which interference is, that a petition was presented to parliament in the reign of Queen Anne, by AUTHORS, and others interested in their rights, for protection against piracy by unprincipled persons printing and publishing their works without their consent. This gave rise to the Act of the 8th of Anne, passed in 1702; after which there was no other act until 1801, passed in the reign of George the 3rd, which was an act to include Ireland in the provisions of the Copyright Law. Now, in the Act of Anne there is an express provision for the importation and sale of books in foreign languages, "printed beyond the seas;" but there is no provision made for a foreign copyright.

The next act was that of the 54th of King George the 3rd, passed in 1814, a period when England was at war with the continental powers; and therefore not likely to make laws for the protection of her enemies. This Act expressly limits the law to the "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland;" and consequently the right of protection to British authors alone, extending the period of such protection from fourteen to twenty-eight years, or the "natural life of the author." There having been many applications by music publishers to obtain a monopoly in the works of foreign authors, and various opinions on the subject broached by Equity Judges, from which it was impossible to obtain a clear decision until the case of Boosey v. Purday; the legislature took up the matter, and passed the "International" Law above alluded to, which, from the refusal of foreign nations to reciprocate, became a dead letter. If a foreigner could have had a copyright under the Acts of Anne and George the 3rd, why did the legislature pass an "International" Law? Finding foreign nations unwilling to reciprocate (because their interest lay decidedly in an opposite direction), our diplomatists tried the matter in the shape of a treaty for a certain number of years. A "Convention" was then entered into "between Her Majesty and the King of Prussia, for the establishment of an International Copyright," to commence on the 1st of September, 1846, for five years, renewable if both powers are agreed. This convention was followed by Hanover, Saxony, and the Thuringian States; but up to the present hour, no other State has come into it. It is, therefore, preposterous to assume a copyright in the subjects of other countries. These conventions are based upon reciprocity, and upon no other principle can a foreigner invest a British subject with a monopoly in his productions, whether literary or musical, for both are classed in the same category. And it is upon this principle alone that Mr. Z. T. Purday has been so often a defendant before the Courts of Law and Equity. Upon this principle the four Barons of the Exchequer gave their judgment in the case of Boosey v. Purday, in these words:—"The object of the legislature clearly is not to encourage the importation of foreign books, and their first publication in England, as a benefit to this country, but to promote the cultivation of the intellect of its own subjects. We therefore hold that a foreigner, by sending to, and first publishing his works in Great Britain, acquires no copyright. A British subject who purchases from him cannot be in a better condition here than the foreigner." This is both good law and good sense; for if an Act of Parliament confers a particular right upon its own subjects, who pay scot and lot in the support of its community, it would be a hard case upon them to confer upon all the world equal rights and privileges, without a share of the burdens. Then, Sir, is it right to give to foreigners that which they will not reciprocate? Does not America fatten upon the publication of the produce of English brains? What an immense boon it would be to have an International Copyright! I perfectly agree with you that such ought to be the case. But I cannot see the justice of giving rights which are not reciprocated; not that I hold with robbing any man, even legally.

I am as much a cosmopolitan as any man; but, let us ask, how much does a foreign author or composer benefit by the sale of his works in England, even if he got the amount actually paid by the monopolist publishers for the assumption of a copyright? In the case of Auber's operas, the composer never got a farthing. Troupenas, the publisher, got £50. each for Fra Diavolo and Les Bayaderes; for Masaniello and Gustavus nothing; for other operas about £80. Bellini never received a penny for any of his operas. Chaulieu, for his pianoforte works, told the writer of this, that what Troupenas should have paid him £20. for, he got £5. of the English publisher and £15. of the Parisian. The like tricks were played with Czerny, Strauss, Labitzky, and others, until the affair was exploded; and in nineteen cases out of twenty, "This work is copyright," has been the only emolument the composer or arranger received! Being a producer myself, nobody would more rejoice to see producers remunerated. There is another argument against the monopoly in foreign copyright assumption, viz., all the while foreign musical productions are to be had at little more than the price of the importation of the copy. What house will employ English talent, especially when such ideas as that broached in a Court of Equity, in a late application for an injunction, by an Equity Judge, is palmed upon the community for law! "Such ought to be the law." Ergo, Such is the law! This ipse dixit of one man, utterly at variance with the deliberate judgment of the four Barons of the Exchequer, is only fomenting the spirit of monopoly in opposition to common-sense and sound principle; and inducing the largest capitalists to oppose the smaller, on the ground of being best able to stand the expense. I have made the subject of copyright in all its bearings, a ten years' study, and have been both amused and vexed with the legal blunderings of those who should be better informed in the matter. In conclusion, I would just combat an erroneous idea suggested by your observation on the "robbery on the property of M. Brandus or Herr Breitkoff," by asking you if you think M. Brandus, or Herr Breitkoff, ever purchased a MS. with a view to a disposal of part of their right to an English publisher, whether they pay the composer a larger price in consequence of such a view, and if you know of any instance of such a case? The fact is, Sir, that you are not sufficiently up to the tricks of trade to know how these things are managed.

Your insertion of this, will oblige yours, &c.

ANOTHER OF THE CRAFT.

MENDELSSOHN'S DUETS.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Chesterfield, May 14th, 1851.

DEAR SIR,—I should feel obliged if you could give me any information, or put me in the way of procuring a copy of Mendelssohn's Duet "O come unto these yellow sands."

I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

THOS. TALBIS TRIMNELL.

[Will any of our readers oblige us by giving the desired information.—ED. M. W.]

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Alary's Opera, Le Tre Nozze, was repeated on Saturday, and had sufficient attractions to allure Her Majesty, Prince Albert and suite, together with a long line of rank and fashion. A second hearing has not altered our opinion of the merits of the work. On the whole we were more pleased with the second performance, since the singers and band went better together, and the colds of Lablache and Signor Ferranti had somewhat slackened in their heat, while Madame Sontag was as irresistible and as perfect as before. Madame Giuliani, however, persisted in dressing the waiting maid like a countess, a grave error of judgment, we take it, on the part of the superintendent of the wardrobe department. The applause was still more general and decided than on the Thursday night, and Sontag excited the same furor in the rondo finale. A selection from Les Metamorphoses, followed, in which the spirituel dancing of Carlotta Grisi created a universal regret that the whole ballet was not given. Gustave III. was played on Tuesday. The influenza, the demon of the season, had laid his hand upon the soft and snowy throat of the fair Fiorentini, and deprived us of many of the beauties of Auber's music. The appeal song of Madame Ankarstrom, in the third act, one of the most exquisite things in the opera, was omitted. Calzolari sang better than we have heard him in Gustave, but why omit the fine aria in the last act? Auber should not be curtailed unless from real necessity. Madlle. Caroline Duprez sang very charmingly, and was encoired in the air from Le Serment. Signor Lorenzo's acting in the third and fourth acts is entitled to special mention. This gentleman is an artist of real intelligence and feeling. His voice is not of the finest quality, but it has a rough energy well suited to certain parts, and certain phases of passion.

L'Île des Amours concluded the performances, Amalia Ferraris achieving her customary success.

On Thursday Don Giovanni was given with a cast, in some respects, different from that of last year. Coletti, Sontag, Lablache, and Madame Giuliani retained their former parts—Don Giovanni, Zerlina, Leporello, and Elvira respectively. Madame Fiorentini supplied Parodi's place in Donna Anna; Calzolari was the Ottavio, vice Gardoni, and Scapini, a new basso belonging to Mr. Lumley's Parisian troupe, appeared as the Commendatore.

Mozart's incomparable work has never failed for the last quarter of a century, and upwards, to prove one of the principal attractions of the season. Despite the love of novelty and the thirst for strange excitement, in defiance of new stars, new operas, new prejudices, and changes ad infinitum, Don Giovanni still upholds its power over the musical public, and still asserts its influence, is still the beacon of glory that, fixed upon the rock of endurance, stands unscathed amid the waters of all time, to point, to dazzle, and allure. The impetuous crowds who besieged the doors of Her Majesty's Theatre on Thursday evening is a sign of the public taste, that is well worth the consideration of the director. Some of the attraction must doubtless be attributed to the union of names brought together in the opera. Nevertheless, we insist that Mozart's name is a tower of strength, even in these days when Meyerbeer and French Opera seem to be all the rage.

The performance on Thursday night was, in general, admirable. Sontag, Fiorentini, and Lablache are entitled to unequalled praise. The music of Zerlina suits Sontag wonderfully well. The "Batti batti" and "Vedrai Carino" were never rendered with more exquisite finish and purity. The delicious coquetry and winning simplicity of the former were inimitable, while the tenderness and devotion infused into the "Vedrai Carino" was sufficient to have touched any heart, factured of any stuff save the stuff impenetrable. No freedom was taken with Mozart. The music stood forth in unadorned simplicity, and, from the effect produced, proved satisfactorily, that it is dangerous to meddle with it. Nor did Madame Sontag have recourse to the usual and, perhaps, pardonable custom of dwelling on the last note, or the penultimate, or anti-penultimate, in the two songs. She finished as simply as she begun, without effort, or desire to add to Mozart. More general and universal encores were never awarded to any songs. Madame Sontag's graceful and exquisite singing was conspicuous in the duet with Don Giovanni, which was also encoired, although not so enthusiastically as her unassisted efforts. In her acting the great artist betokened a thorough conception of the character of Zerlina, and supported the peasant girl with irresistible verve and animation.

Madame Fiorentini has added largely to her fame by her admirable personation of Donna Anna, a part which rightly belongs to the highest range of tragic performances. The splendid voice and fine singing of Madame Fiorentini we never doubted, but, we must confess, we were hardly prepared for the sudden bursts of passion and the dramatic fire we witnessed on Thursday night. Madame Fiorentini might be said to have taken the house by storm in the grand aria, "Or che sei l'honore," which, both as regards the recitative and air, was magnificently sung. The clear, ringing tones of the upper voice, and their power too, we have only heard equalled in one singer. If Madame Fiorentini would always sing with such abandon and energy, she would have few rivals on the stage. A more beautiful soprano voice, one more round, more fresh, more sympathetic, and more touching we never heard, and the method of using the voice is excellent. But why did Madame Fiorentini omit the "Non mi dir," a song which would have suited her so well? These are things we cannot make out.

Madame Giuliani is a musician, a disideratum in singing Mozart's music. Madame Giuliani is, besides, a good artist, and possesses a good voice. Hence Madame Giuliani's Elvira was decidedly a creditable performance. The difficult aria, "Mi tradi," was given with considerable facility and expression. In all the concerted music, being a musician, Madame Giuliani was perfectly at home—all the better for the performance.

Coletti is not exactly fitted by nature and art for Don Giovanni. What Signor Coletti could do, with nature and art strongly opposed to him, he did. He sang the music forcibly and with an able and sonorous voice. His acting in the ball scene was manly and energetic, his fine voice telling with much effect in the chorus.

Lablache's Leporello, as every body knows, is a masterpiece of comic acting and singing. To praise Lablache in Leporello would be to devote our pens to truisms, a practice from which we are decidedly averse. Wherefore, we shall leave Lablache "alone in his glory,"—a glory which years have not tarnished, and which rivalry has not touched. Lablache and Leporello are synonymous—at least they are alliterative—and may we continue to call them so for a thousand years.

We were much pleased with Signor Calzolari in Ottavio, and would have been more pleased had he adhered closely to Mozart's text. The "Il mio tesoro," was on the whole capitally sung, but the alterations did not delight us, and we are certain did not add anything to the effect. Had Signor Calzolari sang "Il mio tesoro" as it is written, we fancy he would not have escaped the encore usually awarded to it. Verbum Sap.

We must pronounce a strong word of praise to F. Lablache, who played Masetto and sang the music of the part excellently. He looked the character to the life.

Bravo, Balfe! you have restored the last scene in all its purity and integrity, which, by the way, you should never have suffered to be meddled with. But we give you praise, nevertheless, for acknowledging your fault in time. For having given the music well, we also thank thee. The band was in force, the conductor was determined, the new Commendatore was efficient, and Coletti and Lablache were stronger than ever. In short, Mozart triumphed, and the last scene of Don Giovanni was heard for the first time at Her Majesty's Theatre as it ought to have been heard. Bravo, Balfe! Go on and prosper.

In the ball scene, Carlotta Grisi and Amalia Ferraris danced the minuet and saraband to perfection. Carlotta in her new dress, crimson and gold jacket and flowing skirt of white satin and gold flowers, looked more charming than ever. The fair Amalia looked, likewise, exceedingly interesting in her becoming costume of white satin and blue. The dancing of the twain excited the loudest applause.

The performances concluded with the new divertissement Les Cosmopolites.

Fidelio is announced for Tuesday. Sophie Cruvelli makes her first appearance in Leonora, and Sims Reeves comes out in Florestan. The debut of the Cruvelli is awaited with the utmost curiosity, and has already excited the greatest interest.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday, Lucrezia Borgia was given, for the first time this season, with Grisi and Mario as Lucrezia and Gennaro; Signor Salvatori appearing as Alfonso. The performance attracted an overflowing audience. Seldom have we heard Grisi in such fine voice, or in such great force. Her Lucrezia throughout was really prodigious, and raised more than the customary enthusiasm. She sang both movements of the opening aria better than we have heard her for years, the upper passages being taken with unusual clearness and certainty. In the exciting duet in the second act (we continue to style the so called "prologue," Act the first, despite the critical prohibitions), when Lucrezia informs Gennaro that he has taken poison, Grisi electrified the house with a single note—a feat of vocalisation but rarely accomplished save by this gifted singer, whose voice, in moments of passion, has a force that is irresistible in its power. Mario, although occasionally affording indications that he had not entirely shaken off his recent influenza, sang superbly, and acted with more power and intensity than ever. The last scene above all was a transcendent display, and raised the audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. The manner in which the death was effected, was worthy the best efforts of a Kean or a Macready.

Signor Salvatori more than confirmed the impression he made on his debut, as an actor of high pretensions. His conception of the character of Alfonso, and his judgment in delineating it, were both admirable. Signor Salvatori has a fine face and a manly person, and is altogether an actor of rare intelligence. As a singer we cannot now criticise Signor Salvatori. The quality and power of the voice have almost entirely disappeared. There may be a chance, however, that the influenza continues to affect his singing; if so, we shall be delighted to hear Signor Salvatori again, and withdraw what we have said above. The fact, however, of no apology having been offered on Saturday night by the management is significant.

On Tuesday, the Donna del Lago was repeated, with Castellani, vice Grisi, in Elena. That Castellani is equal to Grisi in the part we are not going to insist, but we shall do battle for the charming Castellani in this, or any other character, and uphold by word or pen that she possesses the most fascinating qualities, both as actress and singer; and that she always exhibits the skill of a musician added to her fascinating qualities. Madame Castellani sang the music of Elena delightfully, and was applauded with corresponding warmth. The brilliant final rondo was executed with great agility and ease, and created an unmistakeable impression. Madame Castellani looked most charming in the becoming Scotch dress.

Of Mario's Uberto and Tamberlik's Rhoderick Dhu, it is needless to say more, than that they were both supported with as much energy and power as on the first night of the opera being performed, and that the grand air in the first finale by Tamberlik, and the interpolated cavatina in the second act by Mario, both excited the utmost enthusiasm, as before. Signor Bianchi improves on acquaintance. His singing on Tuesday night impressed us more favourably than at first. He gave the air, "Taci lo voglio," with a good deal of spirit. Her Majesty and a large suite occupied the two Royal boxes.

On Thursday the Huguenots was presented, and attracted an overflowing house. Things are decidedly looking up.

MENDELSSOHN AT LIMERICK.

(Abridged from a Limerick Paper.)

The second private concert, for the season, of this society, was given on Friday evening, at the Philosophical Rooms, with a success which surpassed expectation. The society was established in 1846, its objects the cultivation of vocal music. Limerick was at a low ebb in regard to knowledge of classic music. Whether to attribute this want to a fear of grappling with difficulties, or unwillingness to commence what might end in failure, is beside our purpose to enquire; but we cannot too warmly congratulate our fellow citizens on the change which has taken place. We can no longer be taunted with the reproach "you have no talent for music in Limerick." The world knows that Limerick is remarkable for the beauty of its women, and the platform of the Philosophical Rooms proved that on Friday evening, musical talent was there also. No less than sixty of our fellow citizens, amateurs of both sexes, contributed their vocal powers to the promotion of a harmony which, of all others, is most calculated to soften and subdue the discords which in other respects beset our path in this unhappy country. But we do not limit the talent to sixty performers. That is not a tenth of the talent yet to be brought out in this city; but we feel assured that perseverance will draw it forth in time. The selections for this concert were from the immortal Mendelssohn, and, following the solemn season of Lent, how appropriately—how beautifully were they chosen? The programme, commencing with "Praise Jehovah" and ending with "Heaven and the earth display," was calculated to produce in the mind a solemn reverence for the Almighty.

The programme consisted of selections from Elijah, Athalie, Hymn of Praise, and "Lauda Sion," a class of music hitherto unknown amongst us; and in justice to the members we must say, the ideas of the great composer were carried out in each work. The soprano solo "Lord at all times" beautifully sung, caused a general thrill of delight; but the prevalent feeling that "encores" in sacred music were inadmissible, prevented us enjoying this treat a second time. The duet "O Pastor Israel" was charmingly rendered, and the lovely and melodious, "I waited for the Lord" was sung with an amount of feeling which touched the heart of every one present. "Hear my prayer," a gem of the first water, was sung with the utmost delicacy, and the choruses in general reflected credit on the members. "He watching over Israel," in Elijah, was a fine specimen of what chorus singing ought to be—the voices at one moment dying away to the softest echo, and again swelling forth like the deep rich tones of an organ. "Rejoice greatly" was one of the great features of the concert, and much as the singing of Miss Vickers was admired on former occasions, she astonished us in this fine song from the Messiah. We have great reason to be proud of having so talented a vocalist among us. Spohr's solo, with chorus, "Thou earth, waft sweet incense o'er thy plains," was received with a burst of applause and a call for an encore, which on this occasion was acceded to. The music of Athalie is electric, and certain to arrest the attention of any audience. The duet "Ever blessed child," and the trio "Hearts feel that love thee," were beautifully executed, and the chorus in both evinced a cultivation and care to be surpassed by few amateur societies. The final chorus was an appropriate finish to one of the most pleasing and heart-stirring concerts we ever attended.

Exclusive of those on the platform, 400 persons were present, and amongst the members Earl and Countess Dunraven, Sir Vere de Vere, Bart. and Lady de Vere, the Very Rev. the Dean of Limerick, &c. The Mayor and the High Sheriff of the County were also in attendance. The Lord Bishop of Limerick, one of the patrons, was necessarily absent in Dublin.

We should be wanting in respect to ourselves, if we omitted to express our thanks to the conductor, Mr. Vickers and the committee, for the treat they afforded in the means of enjoying the former; for his untiring perseverance in establishing a society which promises to be second to none in Ireland, and which the citizens ought all to feel a personal interest in upholding; and to the latter, for the arrangements entered into for the accommodation of so large a number. The decorations of the platform, &c., tastefully arranged by the female members of the society, were much admired, and the business of the evening was conducted with a zeal which must ensure the future success of the society. The following undertook the duties of stewards, and were unceasing in their attentions to the company:—The High Sheriff, Sir Vere de Vere, Bart., Lt. Col. Doyle, Henry Watson, James Spaight, Edward Browning, James Sexton, Capt. William Maunsell, and Lieut. Johns, 63d Regt.

THE MUSICAL UNION.

The third regular meeting took place on Tuesday afternoon at Willis's-rooms, and was attended by a full and fashionable audience. The executants in the quartets were, Signor Sivori, M. Deloffre, Mr. Hill, and Signor Piatti. Haydn's No. 82 in F, and Beethoven's No. 2 in G, were performed with a delicacy and finish that brought out all their varied beauties with effect. The graceful and finished style of Signor Sivori, combining expression and force without the slightest tinge of exaggeration, were as happily demonstrated in the masterly effort of Haydn as in the less ambitious work of Beethoven, the first and simplest of his quartets, although marked No. 2 in the printed edition. Both went to perfection. We think, however, it was an oversight to have given two long works so similar in character on the same day. The early quartets of Beethoven bear a very close resemblance to those of Mozart and Haydn, although they are certainly inferior in design and elaborate treatment to the best examples of those masters. It is wiser, therefore, when a quartet of Mozart or Haydn is given, to accompany it with one of the later compositions of Beethoven, and to separate the two by a work of Mendelssohn, Spohr, or one of the more recent composers.

The grand feature of the concert was the trio in B flat of Beethoven (Op. 97) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, which was superbly played by M. Charles Hallé, Signor Sivori, and Signor Piatti. M. Hallé may be said to have won his reputation as a pianist by his execution of the compositions of Beethoven, and never was reputation more honourably obtained. This gentleman is a great pianist in the fullest signification of the term; his mechanism for correctness and finish borders on the marvellous; a wrong note is never heard by an accident, nor a carelessly executed passage; while the charm of a large and energetic style, combined with an attention to details which realizes every point intended by the composer to the utmost, gives a double value to his purely mechanical accomplishments. The trio was applauded with great enthusiasm, and the sparkling and original Presto Scherzando, in F sharp minor, of Mendelssohn (solus), which M. Hallé repeated by desire, was not less favourably received. The precept which Mr. Ella places among the mottoes of his synopsis, however—"Il più grand omaggio alla musica sta nel silenzio"—was more than once infringed, by certain "members" or visitors leaving the room during the performance of the trio, to the evident discomfort of the large majority of attentive listeners.

BEETHOVEN QUARTET SOCIETY.

(From the Times.)

Signor Camillo Sivori made his second appearance on Friday night, at the second miscellaneous concert, which took place in the Hanover-square Rooms. The quartets were No. 3, in D, Op. 18 (Beethoven), No. 4, in E minor, Op. 44 (Mendelssohn), and No. 10, in E flat, Op. 74 (Beethoven). The two quartets of Beethoven (both led by M. Sainton) were composed at an interval of twenty-one years (1792 and 1813), and the opposition of manner they present offers an interesting theme for contemplation to the studious amateur. That of Mendelssohn, written in 1845 (led by Signor Sivori), is one of the most matured and masterly works of the composer. The difference of styles in the two great musicians was not more striking than the contrast of feeling and execution in the French and Italian violinists. The broad expression and firm staccato of M. Sainton, and the vigour of his bow-arm (powerfully demonstrated in the "arpeggio" of the No. 10 of Beethoven), were greatly admired, while the elegance, warmth, and finish of Signor Sivori called forth repeated tokens of satisfaction. The quartet of Mendelssohn derived additional importance from the fact of its being played for the first time by Signor Sivori, who by this performance has raised his reputation still higher as a classical violinist. His execution of the andante in G was graceful and flowing as the movement itself—which is a stream of melody that never ceases until the last note is uttered. In the sparkling and fantastic scherzo his bowing was delightfully crisp, and the piano passages were exquisitely subdued. The allegro and finale were full of fire. The tenor and violoncello parts could not have been more efficiently rendered than by Mr. Hill and M. Rousselot. The applause was unanimous at the end of every movement, and the scherzo, re-demanded by the whole room, was repeated with increased effect.

As a novelty it is now to be had for the asking, and our streets are crowded with singers and players, of name and fame, who sigh for nothing better than an opportunity to be heard, M. Rousselot has availed himself of the influx of talent to vary his concerts by vocal performances. A great and charming novelty was a duet in G, from Mendelssohn's comic opera, Die Heimkehr ("Son and Stranger,") which having recently escaped from the hands of the slow and apathetic quorum at Leipsic, is at length published in London. It is a graceful trifle, distinguished alike by genuine melody and strong dramatic sentiment, and was very cleverly sung by Demoiselles Rummel and Graumann. A vocal quartet by the same composer, in the same key, was also given by these ladies, in conjunction with Herren Hoelzel and Carl Wolf. The latter gentleman, a Hungarian, one of the many strangers attracted to London by the Great Exhibition, is a curiosity in his way. His voice is a high tenor, almost a counter-tenor in some of its tones, somewhat guttural, but exceedingly sweet in quality. His execution is remarkable. He sings florid passages with extraordinary rapidity, and shakes with the readiness and volubility of a "prima donna asso- lata." His talents were agreeably exemplified in a pleasing lied, the composition of Herr Hoelzel, called "Das Glockenlied," and in a national air of his own country, full of quaint vivacity, and bearing a strong resemblance in character to some of the popular Spanish melodies. Herr Wolf made a very favourable impression, and was much applauded. He was ably accompanied on the Piano by Herr Hoelzel. But the prominent feature of the vocal selection was a comic trio, by Mozart, called "Das Bandel," ("The Riband"), little known, and the origin of which is connected with a lively anecdote in the artistic life of the gifted musician of Salzburg. Mozart, anxious to engage a prima donna for the principal part in one of his operas, was obstinately opposed by his sister-in-law, who, a popular singer herself, was as jealous as the most jealous of her irritable race. An Italian lady, young, handsome, and talented, was introduced to Mozart as a suitable person. He was delighted with her voice and manners, and after paying her many compliments, snatched a riband from her. The jealous sister-in-law, happening to come in just as her Italian rival departed, insisted upon Mozart's giving her the riband, which he as resolutely declined. High words ensued, and when the quarrel was at its worst in came Schikaneder, the manager, who soon set matters to rights, and persuaded Mozart to compose a trio on the subject of the dispute. The trio, which is alternately in spoken dialogue and music, is a masterpiece of comic humour, and was imitatively performed by Mademoiselle Rummel (the jealous prima donna), Herr Wolf (the composer), and Herr Hoelzel, (the manager). The audience were enchanted, and loudly insisted upon a repetition. Altogether the concert yesterday was one of the most attractive M. Rousselot has provided for his patrons.

At the fourth evening performance in the New Beethoven Rooms, on Wednesday, the quartets were No. 2, in G (Op. 18), No. 9, in C (Op. 59), and No. 15, in C sharp minor (Op. 131). The executants were Ernst, Cooper, Hill, and Rousselot. We must confess, attractive as the miscellaneous performances have proved, we greatly prefer the regular meetings, which are confined to three quartets selected from the early, middle, and latter period of the great composer's artistic career, and consequently more entirely in consonance with the design of the founder of the Beethoven Quartet Society, who had the instruction of the audience, no less than their amusement, in view. Moreover, three long quartets are quite enough at a sitting for the most insatiable musical appetite. After hearing Ernst play three quartets in such different styles as those introduced at the present meeting, we cannot avoid the conviction of his pre-eminence as a performer of the highest order of chamber-music. He seems made by nature to appreciate and explain this particular branch of composition. While Ernst plays, though impressed with his admirable powers of execution, we rarely think of the artist, but are absorbed in the ideas of the composer. The longest and most elaborate quartet is never tedious in his hands, so marvellous is his command of what may strictly be termed the chiaroscuro of expression. Of all the posthumous quartets, that in C sharp minor is the most fragmentary, the most opposed to accepted forms, the most eccentric, and yet, perhaps, the most beautiful. Ernst, by the constant variety of his sentiment and tone, takes the audience with him through this labyrinth of harmonies and movements, and so abiding is the charm that attaches to his playing, it is not until the climax is attained that the conviction we have been listening to a work in which all conventional plan is disregarded presents itself. The slow and measured fugue with which the quartet begins, never before went so steadily, or developed itself with such clearness and consistency, since we remember to have heard it performed in public. In the C major, the finest of the "Rasamowsky" set, Ernst was equally to be admired for his passion in the andante, and his fire in the grand fugued finale; and in the graceful and melodious G major, the simplicity of his expression was perfect—exquisitely in keeping with the unpretending character of the music. Cooper, Hill, and Rousselot, worthy associates of Ernst, were all that could possibly be wished in their respective departments. Perhaps no violoncellist has more completely caught the character of the andante in A minor, with its quaint pizzicato passages, than M. Rousselot; and certainly no tenor player ever led off the fugue finale with the precision, neatness, and vigour of Mr. Hill. It is scarcely a compliment to Mr. Cooper, one of the best of first-violinists, to say that, as second, he is faultless.

The rooms were filled with connoisseurs, and the performance gave the utmost gratification to all present. At the next morning meeting in Hanover-square (on the 22nd) the subscribers are promised a great treat in a copious selection from the MS. comic opera of Mendelssohn, Die Heimkehr ("Son and Stranger"), with other real attractions.

Dramatic Intelligence.

FRENCH PLAYS.—ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—Since our last, Scribe's comedy of La Camaraderie has been repeated, not played so well as last year, when Mdle. Denain and Mdle. Nathalie, MM. Regnier and Samson, took the leading parts, yet still well worth seeing, if only for the sake of M. Regnier's acting. Nothing can be more perfect than his impersonation of Bernardet, the life and soul of the clique whose machinations form the subject of the comedy. His every gesture shows a mind continually on the stretch, an activity not to be subdued, a resolution undaunted in facing every variety of difficulty, an invention never at a loss under any circumstances. His "make-up" of the character, with the bald head, white cravat, and plain frock coat, is in excellent keeping, and tends to complete his finished picture of the man of intrigue. Her Majesty and Prince Albert were present at the performance of La Camaraderie on Friday week last.

On the Monday following was produced, for the first time in this country, another of Scribe's comedies, entitled Une Chaine. This was first produced in Paris about nine years ago, and almost immediately after brought out at the Adelphi, we do not exactly remember under what title. It was but moderately successful on the English stage; nor were we astonished, since the subject is one which commands no sympathy in English society. However, at the St. James's theatre we are in a totally different atmosphere, and can allow things to pass which would shock our prejudices if they were done in a blunt or crude manner, and we pardon equivocal morality under favour of the language. Une Chaine, however, is not absolutely an immoral piece. The author's object, and it required some courage to strike thus boldly at a state of things not at all uncommon in French society, is to show the fatal consequences which inevitably, sooner or later, result from liaisons which society cannot countenance, and which morality condemns in every country, however exceptional may be the circumstances. The story is simple, and can be told in a few words. Emmeric d'Albret, a young composer, has arrived in Paris; he is poor, but having met with Louise (Mdle. Judith), who is the wife of St. Geran (M. Lafont), she has assisted him in his difficulties, and by degrees a passion has sprung up between them. Meanwhile M. St. Geran, an admiral, is reported to have died, and, relying on this rumour, Louise and Emmeric abandon themselves to their guilty passion. Now, Emmeric has a cousin alive (Mdle. St. Marc), daughter of Clérambeau, a merchant, with whom he falls in love. The Admiral, not being dead, makes his appearance, and, having been a friend of the father, warmly espouses the son's interest, and induces Clérambeau to give his daughter to Emmeric. This he consents to do, on condition that Emmeric will pledge his word he has no serious passion to interfere with his daughter's future happiness, the young people being mutually attached to each other. Emmeric makes the pledge, having resolved to abandon his mistress. Here the real action of the piece commences. The young man wavers, and begins to feel the difficulties of his position. He is too generous to throw off his mistress without giving her some explanation, and too cowardly to accept the consequences of his previous folly, by devoting his life to her, Emmeric thus balancing between love and honour. As usual, the poor woman ends in being the willing, generous victim. She discovers how things stand, and herself unites the lovers, by setting at liberty a wretch who was unworthy her affection. The play is neatly written, the dialogue smart and witty, the characters well contrasted and sustained, and the intrigue skilfully prepared and carefully developed, with excellent situations and good dramatic effects. The author has undertaken a most difficult task, considering the state of society in France, but has contrived to enforce his moral pretty well. We may, however, be allowed to regret that St. Geran, "the soul of honour," although he has himself failed in his youth, and his wife's frailty (which may be attributed to his abandoning her in the hey-day of their marriage) cuts such a sorry figure in the last act, where he becomes the catpaw, to bring about the dénouement. The wife, on the contrary, has all our sympathies, in spite of her frailty. We cannot take into account the nonsense about the reported death of her husband, since, if the rumour were true, she might have married her lover, and if not, she would have been the gainer by delay. The idea is a poor makeshift. The part of Aline is naïve and pretty; womanly and confiding, she is attached to Emmeric, and never doubts him for a moment. The two women are admirably contrasted. The father, Clerambeau, is also well opposed to the Admiral. His only concern is in his daughter and his fortune, and the manner in which he is made to sacrifice the latter to the former shows a profound knowledge of human nature on the part of M. Scribe. The hero of the piece is no hero at all; his position is bad from the commencement; he has neither our pity nor our sympathy; on the contrary we have a contempt for him throughout, and in witnessing his struggles to elude responsibilities, the consequences of his own conduct, feel that we should prefer to him a franker villain, a more downright rogue. M. Scribe has taken much pains with his part, and, by inflicting on his hero the scourge of an ill conscience, and the contempt of the woman whom he has abandoned, has consulted the best interests of morality. There is another character, not really essential to the play, but so mixed up in it from beginning to end, that the piece would scarcely exist without him. We mean Ballandard (M. Regnier), who is the life and soul of the intrigue; the everybody's scapegoat, and bears the penalty of whatever is said and done. Ballandard is accused of writing letters, receiving amatory epistles from high-born ladies, fighting duels, seduction, &c.; in short all the world make a convenience of him. The acting was in every particular good. Mdle. St. Marc played the part of the artless young girl with charming simplicity, and Mdle. Judith impersonated the jealous mistress with great dignity. The latter is a semi-tragic part, and a little more fire and energy would not have been out of place: on the whole, however, it was carefully assumed by Mdle. Judith. M. Lafont's part is one of his best assumptions. We know of no piece in which he appears to greater advantage. He is dignified, earnest, gentlemanly, and entirely free from exaggeration. M. Regnier almost surpassed himself. His character is thoroughly adapted to display his peculiar qualifications. His perplexity in the midst of his numerous difficulties kept the house in convulsions of laughter. M. Francisque was not at all up to the mark as the lover. The house was crowded in every part.

On Wednesday, previous to Une Chaine, a new work by M. Barbier, Les premieres Coquetteries, originally played at the Variétés, was produced for the first time. The plot turns on a projected marriage between a dissipated nephew, used to the excitements of Parisian life, and a young lady, his cousin, who has just finished her education in a convent. The young lady fails to captivate the youth at first, but through the interference and advice of her waiting maid, who advises the use of a little coquetry, the young gentleman is eventually secured. Mdle. St. Marc was very pleasing as the young lady, and Mdle. Bilhant made a smart and lively soubrette.—J. de C.

PRINCESS'S.—Mr. Brough, the junior of the "Brothers," has produced during the week a very laughable extravaganza at this theatre, with the time-serving title of "Apartments; Visitors to the Exhibition may be Accommodated." The idea is happy as well as time-serving, and has furnished the author with many curiosities of supposition, and has been carried out with abundance of point and effect. The received notion that lodging-house keepers were about to make large fortunes during the season of the Exhibition, and that every house would make the most of its conveniences, no doubt suggested the thought to Junior Brother Brough. During the absence of her husband from town, the landlady of a lodging-house has let her "Apartments" to all sorts of applicants. A Highlander, a Yankee, a Red Indian, and a Frenchman, are all located in rooms for one. The manner in which the landlady provides space for the overplus occupiers is sufficiently funny, and something of the kind may be seen in Punch's Almanack for 1851. When the whole house is turned topsy-turvy by the quartet of lodgers, the husband returns and becomes frantic at beholding his peaceful domicile converted into a model bedlam. Eventually he clears the house by a false alarm of fire, and bolts out the quartet. The smartness of the dialogue, no less than the whimsicality of the situations, conduced to the decided success of the merry and off-hand piece of Mr. Brough, the Younger. The acting was admirable. Keeley was the husband, Mrs. Wigan the wife, and Mrs. Keeley the maid of all work, the Atlas of the establishment, who carried a world of pains, endurances, and responsibilities on her shoulders.

OLYMPIC.—The version of Une Bataille de Dames which has been brought out at this house is very well done, the plot of the original being closely followed, and the dialogue written with more smartness than is usual with mere translations, and seasoned with a few of those verbal jokes which are deemed acceptable to English audiences. Mrs. Stirling, who plays the Countess, shows all that tact and neatness which approximate her, perhaps, more than any other actress, to the French school. The deeper emotions are not overwrought; the gaiety is easy and spontaneous. Flavigneul's assumed character of a footman is acted with some humour by Mr. W. Farren, junior, but he does not think enough of the officer, who wears the livery, and the part lacks the romantic elevation which is given to it by M. Lafont. Mr. H. Farren, in depicting the prefect of police, takes a ground different to that adopted on the French stage, making bluntness, not ironical courtesy, the characteristic of the official, but he works out his own notion effectively. The sustained comicality of M. Regnier's De Grignon is not to be found in Mr. Leigh Murray's personation from his tendency to be too much in earnest with the heroic side, but the ludicrous indications of terror are pleasantly brought out and elicit laughter. On the second night a damp was thrown over the performance by the absence of Miss L. Howard, who was prevented from acting by illness, and whose part (Léonie) was read by Miss Adams. The piece was, we understand, produced in a great hurry, so as to be played during the "run" of the original at the St. James's Theatre. On the whole it is forcibly executed, though the time of its production subjects it to a comparison more than usually severe.

ADELPHI.—The drama of Flowers of the Forest—one of the best pieces of the kind that has issued from the prolific pen of Mr. Buckstone—has been revived here. Made, Celeste, Miss Woolgar, and Miss Ellen Chaplin have parts well suited to them. Made, Celeste as the Italian Gipsy gives with tact and discrimination the impulsive warmth of the affections peculiar to the children of the south. Miss Woolgar in the Gipsy boy—the main link in the action—had abundant room for the delineation of the passions in humble and rustic life, in which she excels, and she seized the occasion with even more than her usual felicity, her sketch being one of the most spirited and graphic that we have yet seen from her. She was exceedingly well supported by Miss Ellen Chaplin, who looked the very epitome of a Gipsy belle, and played with simplicity and feeling.

Miscellaneous.

REUNION DES ARTS.—The first meeting of the patrons and subscribers of this Society took place on Monday evening, at the Music Rooms in Queen Anne-street, and was patronised by a numerous assemblage of fashionables and litterati. The features of this society are somewhat similar to that which brought upon Mr. Silk Buckingham the bitter irony of our cotemporary, Mr. Punch; but its management is far better, and it contains elements which, if properly brought out and adapted to the spirit of the times, may become the source of a prosperous career. In the drawing-room, music and singing held pre-eminent sway, and Mdle. Lavinia and Miss Rummell, birdlike, filled the "carpet atmosphere" with melodious strains, while Miss Day performed most excellently on the pianoforte. Mr. De Muncie astonished his hearers by a violoncello fantasia; and Messrs. Schmidt and F. Chatterton, on the flute and harp, were of material assistance to the entertainment, which might have been expected. Herr Goffrie—to whose indefatigable exertions, we believe, the society owes its existence, played upon the violin in first-rate style. In the rooms upon the ground-floor, were exhibited some fine specimens of painting and drawing by Sir F. Landseer, Bartholemew, Hayter, Kempf, Haag, Zweecher, A. Taylor, and others. We can safely say that these meetings are entertaining, instructive, and interesting, and the amount of subscription just enough to place them within the reach of all respectable persons desirous of information, of mixing in good and learned society, and of wiling away a few hours with pleasure and profit.—H. L.

LONDON SACRED HARMONISTS.—The performances of this society on Wednesday, the 7th inst., must be regarded as an experiment. The selection differed materially in character from any yet given by either society, a large portion of the concert consisting of psalmody, chanting, and "services." With due thanks to the directors for the attempt, we do not think they have availed themselves so judiciously as they might have done of the resources at their command. The selection should have been made with a view to meet the party coloured tastes of the visitors of the hall—popular as well as classical—religious as well as musical—foreign as well as native. The concert had been better if this discriminating process had been more carefully attended to. The chorale and fugue of Bach, with which it opened, was perhaps the best thing in it. If chanting is to be introduced into the concert room (a process by which it may be doubted whether anything will be gained), why not have given the Gregorian chants, which are not only by far the finest things of the kind that have come down to us, but, by being taken in unison, are capable of having great variety given them in the accompaniment. The Psalms were better selected: St. Anne's Tune (Dr. Croft) and the Old 100th were judiciously chosen, and highly effective in the performance. The 120th by W. L. Phillips, is smooth and melodious. It would be better in future either to support the *sol*i voices by the organ or to give those verses to a semi-chorus; the effect of the four single voices being weak and inefficient against the full power of the organ and choir in the choral verses. Dr. Elvey's "Te Deum," being written in all the so-called severe simplicity and rigour enjoined by the Church, had better be confined to the places for which it was written. His verse anthem, "I beheld," contains many salient points, the concluding chorus, in particular, showing vigour of treatment. The song from Handel's Theodora,—"Lord to thee each Night and Day," was given by Miss Dolby, in her very best style; she was followed by Miss Birch, in a no less charming delivery of the song, "Holy, holy Lord!" Mr. Washbourne Morgan contributed a "Christmas Anthem." The choice of the words which were those of Handel's famous recitative "There were Shepherds" was unlucky, and provoked awkward comparisons—then the theme of the final chorus is so close an imitation of the subject of the quartett of the Messiah "Lift up your Heads," as to be received with a buzz of recognition in the room. Mr. Hopkins's Evening Service, is unquestionably a clever work, evincing both vigour and variety. The graceful little song of Méhul, nicely sung by Mr. Young, was encored. The concert was so long that nearly one part of the second act was cut out. Among the omissions were a quintett of Dr. Crotch—a song of Handel's, "If guiltless blood," and Purcell's anthem, "Oh! give thanks." The hall was quite full.

THEODORE HAUMAN.—This celebrated violinist has arrived in town for the season.

GRAND EXHIBITION.—A testimonial, presented some time ago to Mr. Lumley, is among the recent contributions. This beautiful work of art represents figures of Melpomene, Thalia, Terpsichore, and Euterpe, artistically disposed, and has been modelled and designed by Mr. Brown.

MODEL OF HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Among the many interesting contributions lately presented to the Exhibition, may be mentioned a miniature model of the interior of Her Majesty's Theatre, sent last week, and placed in the nave. This beautiful work is a fac-simile of the original, both as to conformation and embellishments. The proportions are reduced to a scale of three-quarters of an inch to the foot. The decorations and general arrangements which were devised at Her Majesty's Theatre, by J. Johnson, Esq., F.S.A., have been closely copied; while the panels, medallions, figures, &c., have been painted by Mr. J. R. Powell, Pimlico, a student of the Royal Academy, the painter and designer of the originals. Mr. Deighton, of Great College Street, Westminster, is the maker of the model. The material is strong mill-board. The decorations are painted in encaustic, a medium, for brilliancy and effect, superior to all others. This little work is one of rare merit, and will no doubt attract universal attention. To such as have not seen the original, the model will prove an object highly interesting, and will convey a very accurate notion of the structure and magnificence of the opera. For the patrons of Mr. Lumley's establishment, it will possess the novel charm of exhibiting the theatre as seen from the stage, under which aspect Her Majesty's Theatre certainly presents its most dazzling appearance.

MESSRS. C. DE BESNIER AND VERDAVAINNE's second concert of "classic, sacred and modern, vocal and instrumental music," was given in the new Beethoven Rooms, on Friday evening, the 9th inst. The first part commenced with Beethoven's Andante Religioso, from the 12th quartett, which was played with great expression by Messrs. H. Blagrove (first violin), Clementi (second violin), R. Blagrove (viola), and Hausman (violoncello).—A quartett, from a "Stabat Mater" by C. De Besnier, was pleasingly sung by Mesdames Zimmerman, and Lemaire, Messrs. De Besnier and Bottura; as were also the "Cujus animam," "Quis est homo," "Pro peccatis," and "Quando corpus," from the "Stabat Mater" of Rossini. Madame Verdavainne performed Weber's Concert Stuck, for the piano, with accompaniments for two violins, viola, and violoncello (instead of full orchestra), with brilliancy and taste. Haydn's quartett, No 82, (the allegro and adagio), was played in a very effective manner by Messrs. Blagrove, Clementi, R. Blagrove, and Hausman, and greatly applauded. Beethoven's favourite Andante in F., for piano, was also given by Madame Verdavainne in such a style as to gain her much applause, and a Motet of C. De Besnier, sung by Madame Lemaire with true sentiment; the violoncello obligato accompaniment by M. Hausman, was greatly admired. The concert concluded with "God save the Queen," by all the artistes.

THE LATE MR. DOWTON, THE COMEDIAN.—This inimitable actor has at length "shuffled off this mortal coil." The following brief memoir of his theatrical career may not be uninteresting to our readers:—Mr. Dowton, who undoubtedly in some characters was without a rival, was born at Exeter in 1763; consequently he was in his 88th year. At the age of 16 he was articled to an architect, but having performed Carlos in the Revenge at a private theatre with good success, he was induced to relinquish building substantial castles to erect certain ones in the air, and joined a strolling company at Ashburton. He was subsequently engaged by Mr. Hughes, manager of the Plymouth Theatre. "D. G.," the critic of Cumberland's edition of plays, states that Dowton, after having made the ubiquitous grand tour, returned to Exeter and performed Macbeth, Romeo, and the usual round of first rate tragic characters, for, like some of our capital comedians, his original addresses were paid to Melpomene. It is but just to state that in these representations he evinced much good sense and feeling, and if he rose not to pre-eminence he descended not to mediocrity. Sheva, in Cumberland's comedy of the Jew, had long been a favourite part of Bannister's—Elliston had also marked it for his own—Mr. Dowton stepped into the field, and without taking the laurel from either, honourably shared it with both. His first appearance at Drury-lane was on the 10th of October, 1796, in this difficult character. He was hailed as a genuine actor, and crowned with applause. In 1805, he was engaged at the Haymarket Theatre, and on the 15th of August in that year he revived for his benefit the warm weather tragedy of the Tailors, which produced that memorable fracas between the "dunga" and the "flints," and ended in the committal of three dozen and odd, and one rebellious carver and gilder, to the watch-house. The principal rôles in the burlesque were sustained by Dowton, Mathews, Liston, and Mrs. Gibbs, as Francisco, Abrahamides, Zachariades, and Tittilinda. The great success of Tom Thumb, in which Mr. Dowton played King Arthur very humourously, stimulated him to this attempt. His two principal Shakespearian characters were Sir John Falstaff and Dogberry. As Dr. Cantwell in the Hypocrite he was inimitable. His other best parts were Sir Anthony Absolute and Major Sturgeon. With the proceeds of his farewell benefit at Her Majesty's Theatre a few years since an annuity was purchased, on which he lived to a "fine green old age," happy in the bosom of his family and a large circle of professional and private friends.

BALLAD MUSIC OF IRELAND.—Mr. Frank Martin, R.A.M. has been giving his "Irish Evenings," composed of anecdote and song, at Northampton, with success.

MISS EMILY NEWCOMBE.—This talented young artist will pass the summer months at Guernsey, where she proposes giving lessons during the sojourn of Mr. Newcombe, who has taken the theatre, and opens with a capital company. The want of a competent musician has long been wanting here.

MR. J. T. COOPER, organist of St. Paul's Church, Islington, performed the following pieces at the Crystal Palace, on the opening day, Thursday, May 1st.—Coronation Anthem, Handel—Fugue, G minor, J. S. Bach—March, in David, C. E. Horsley—"Comfort ye," "Every Valley," "For unto us," "I know that my Redeemer liveth," "Hallelujah" Chorus, Handel—Overture, William Tell, Rossini—"Il mio tesoro," "Non mi dir," Mozart—Song, "To my Brother," Prince Albert—"Quadrille of All Nations," Labitzky.

MR. ALEXANDRE BILLET'S CONCERTS.—Our columns have been so occupied with matters of immediate importance, that we have been unable to find space for a notice of the last concert, at St. Martin's Hall, of this popular and classical pianist, which took place about a fortnight ago. We are pleased to be able to say, however, that the series of six concerts has been eminently successful, so much so indeed that it is M. Billet's intention to continue them. Among the features of the last concert, were Sterndale Bennett's sonata in F minor, and a caprice in C major of Haydn, neither of which was ever before introduced in public. The last, which is very little known, was unanimously encored, and the same compliment was paid to M. Billet in a study of Mendelssohn in F minor. The same composer's movement, con moto in A, from the Temperaments (of which M. Billet introduced the entire first book), and Stephen Heller's beautiful caprice in F minor, "Le Deserteur," were also encored with enthusiasm, and well merited the encore. M. Billet also played Handel's "Suite de Pieces" in F minor, and a selection of studies by Mudie, Macfarren, Chopin, and Moscheles, in D minor, A flat, C minor, and D flat. That of Mudie, from a very little known work, Notes from the Diary of a Musician, is an original and masterly composition, and exceedingly difficult. The concert was crowded to suffocation. We are glad to find sterling merit and a sincere love of the best music rewarded. M. Billet might appropriately style himself "The People's Pianist," or "Alexander of St. Martin's," although his next concert, as we are told, will, in all likelihood, take place in Hanover-square-rooms.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.—The annual concert for this charity took place last week at the Hanover-square Rooms. The Messiah was performed. Formes and Miss Pyne were the chief singers.

THE ANNUAL FESTIVAL OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY came off at St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday. Full service was performed, and about 1000 persons attended.

FIORENTINO.—The celebrated feuilletonist and esprit fort of the Constitutionnel, has arrived in London for the season, and will doubtless give us some brilliant descriptions of the Exhibition.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.—Her Majesty honoured this theatre with her presence on Thursday evening, to witness the new piece of Mr. Brough.

VAUXHALL.—The enterprising lessee has determined on giving a Bal Masqué on Wednesday next, the Derby Day. The experiment was tried last year by Mr. Wardell, and proved very successful.

LECTURE HALL, GREENWICH.—A concert of a superior character was given here on Wednesday morning. It was the last of the new series of the Classical Subscription Concerts, and was by far the best of the set. The committee is entitled to much commendation for their endeavours to introduce among their subscribers a taste for the best kind of music; and we must do the good folk of Greenwich the justice to acknowledge that they have been impressed with a feeling thereof, and are already on the high road to pure appreciation. The concert on Wednesday was really a model concert—not utterly classic, but preponderating thereto—not loading the table with all the viands of huge size and equal tension—good cooking, of a verity, which would not send up a dinner of beefs and muttons, and nothing else. Season your classics with light matter, so shall your classics be enjoyed and appreciated. Such is the motto of the Committee of the Classical Subscription Concerts. The very opening was significant. Mozart's trio in E flat—violin, viola, and violoncello—was played marvellous well by Sainton, Webb, and Hancock, and was thoroughly appreciated. The second part commenced with an equal significance—Beethoven's grand Septuor, for violin, viola, violoncello, clarinet, horn, bassoon, and contra-basso, by Sainton, Webb, Hancock, Grist, Jarrett, Hobbs, and Russell. We have not room to specify all the items of the entertainment, vocal and instrumental. Principal among the singers shone the charming Anna Thillon, who created a powerful, but not an unexpected, sensation among the visitors. Her first essay was a happy one—it was Edward Loder's charming song, "Come buy my summer flowers," and never was charming song more charmingly rendered, and never did charming song elicit a more decided and general encore, alike due to charming song and charming singer. Madame Thillon's next accomplishment was the aria d'introito of Lucia, from Lucia di Lammermoor, the brilliant fortitude of which she mastered with incomparable ease. Being encored, she supplied a French canzonette of Auber, which she delivered with the concentrated grace of the whole Opera Comique. Mr. Augustus Braham next comes under our cognizance. He has a magnificent voice, and with good tuition and time would become a great singer. If he disdain these adventitious aids, he will assuredly founder on the road to success. M. Alexandre Billet is a grand pianist, with a touch of thunder, and a pace like Prime Minister, who, we prophesy, will win the Derby next Wednesday. The Norma fantasia was a vigorous and dashing feat, eclipsing all we had heard on the piano since Leopold de Meyer shook the chimneys of the Hospital with his Lucrezia Borgia wonders. M. Billet and Edward Loder performed a pianoforte duo of Herz with immense effect. The other pieces were variously effective. Miss Bassano sang, as did eke Mrs. Weiss, excellently and encoresdly, and Mr. Hancock played a duet for piano and violoncello with M. Billet—an admirable specimen, and doubly, nay quadruply relished, that the composition was by Mendelssohn. Edward Loder accompanied the songs at the piano with great ability.—(From a Correspondent.)

MDLLE. ANICHINI.—The annual vocal and instrumental concert with which this charming and accomplished singer is wont to delight her patrons, will take place this year at the magnificent mansion of Lady Vassall Webster, Granard Lodge, Roehampton, on Friday morning next. Mdle. Anichini, besides her own talent, will be aided by the entire force of Mr. Lumley's brilliant company. The concert, under distinguished patronage, will be, as usual, a feast of flowers and music, beauty and sunshine.

HECTOR BERLIOZ has arrived in London.

MRS. MOWATT is in America.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Elijah was performed, for the second time this season, last night. The hall was crammed to suffocation. Every ticket was disposed of yesterday before two o'clock. This looks as if a third performance was imperatively called for.

MDLLE. JETTY TREFFZ.—This universal favourite, and most charming and popular of lied singers, the delight of the multitude and the apple of Jullien's eye, has left London for Vienna, but, in all probability, will return before the expiration of the season.

PRINCESS'S CONCERT ROOM.—Madame Schwab's Annual Evening Concert took place in the above locality on Tuesday, and was well attended by the pupils and friends of the talented beneficiaire. Madame Schwab was assisted by the following artists: vocalists, Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Dolby, Miss M. Williams, Miss Pyne, Mdle. Bertha Johansen, Herr Reichard, Herr Mengis, Herr Stockhausen, Mr. Whitworth, Mr. Herbert, and Mr. Frank Bodda; instrumentalists, Mr. Willby (violin), Signor Briccialdi (flute), Herr Oberthur (harp), and Herr Koenig (cornet). The concert in general was highly agreeable. In one respect, it possessed a feature of more than usual interest. Miss Catherine Hayes, who only appeared once previously in public this season, since her coming to London, added a peculiar clat to the entertainment. The "Irish Swan" was the great attraction of the evening, and created a profound sensation in her one song, which was Donizetti's aria, "Benigno il cielo." More expressive singing it would be next to impossible to hear, and more finished vocalization it is not our fortune to listen to often. Indeed the aria was exquisitely sung, and did not produce a furor, simply because the majority of the audience was composed of the gentle sex, and the room is not very large. Among the many things noticeable in the concert, was a German lied, with the euphonious title of "Du mit den schwarzen Augen," a composition of much merit, sung with expression and force by Herr Mengis, the music by F. Praeger. Madame Schwab exhibited her neat and finished execution in a Grand Rondeau Brillante, by Hammel, and in a fantasia for pianoforte and violin, with Mr. Willby; in both of which she was loudly applauded. The fair pianist had every reason to be satisfied with the results of her concert.

THE PRESERVATION OF THE VOICE.—From the first moment that a child attempts to emit sounds with the voice, he should be forewarned against the errors of a bad method, and everything should concur to make the best possible use of the original capacities of the organ. The care which the preservation of the voice requires ought to commence from the moment of its first emission. Now, it is to be remarked that, besides the art of singing, there is a preliminary part of music, called solmization, which is designed to form skilful readers, by the execution of certain progressive exercises upon all the difficulties of time and intonation. The studies of these exercises is made ordinarily in childhood, under the direction of masters who, for the most part, are strangers to the art of singing. No care is taken, either in the composition or the selection of these exercises, in reference to the extent of voices; so that it almost always happens that children are made to sing out of the limits which nature has assigned to them.

The efforts which they are obliged to make to reach the high sounds which they are made to sing, very soon destroy the foundation of the voice, and strain the fibres of the throat. When this is once done, there is no remedy. All the art in the world cannot give such children smoothness of voice, for they have lost it for ever. Add to this, that the precautions necessary to take in the beginning, to deliver the sound with the respiration, not to respire too frequently, and not to weary the chest by retaining the breath too long,—all this, I say, is completely unknown to the majority of the masters of solfeggio. After two or three years' practice, they succeed in forming good readers of music; but they have, in the mean time, destroyed or injured the voices of their pupils; and in this state they deliver them to the professors of the vocal art, all whose skill, can never restore to these poor young people that which they have irretrievably lost.—Extracted from —, by Aurelian.

THE ANCIENT TRUMPET.—The Buccina, or Trumpet, is ascribed to the Egyptian Osiris, who made use of it in grand sacrifices. The Hebrews derived it from the Egyptians, most probably during their long captivity, as the first mention of it in the Holy Scriptures is at the descent of the Lord upon Mount Sinai, and the second where he says to Moses, "Make thee two trumpets of silver, of a whole piece shalt thou make them, that thou mayest use them for the calling of the assembly, and for the journeying of the camp." Previous to this period, the trumpets of the Israelites appear to have been made of the horn of the ram, or some other animal, and were called buccina; their form resembled the modern hunting-horn; but after that time they were made of metal, and assumed a shape somewhat similar to the modern instrument. Mr. Bruce says: "The Abyssinian soldiers make use of an ancient trumpet which is called Meleket; it is made of a cane that has less than half-an-inch aperture, and about five feet four inches in length. To this long stalk is fixed at the end a round piece of the neck of a gourd, which has just the form of the round end of our own trumpet, and is on the outside ornamented with small white shells; it is all covered over with parchment, and is a very neat instrument. This trumpet sounds only one note, E, in a loud, hoarse, and terrible tone. It is played slow when on a march, or before an enemy appears in sight; but afterwards it is repeated very quick, and with great violence, and has the effect upon the Abyssinian soldiers of transporting them absolutely to fury and madness, and of making them so regardless of life as to throw themselves in the middle of the enemy, which they do with great gallantry."—Tomlinson's Lectures on Ancient Music.

Mr. W. Morse, son of the late organist of St. Peter's, Marlborough, has been elected to the situation vacant by his father's death.

ADOLPH SAX is in London.

Provincial.

HALIFAX.—The Halifax Philharmonic Society gave the first of a series of three subscription concerts on Tuesday, the 29th ult., to a fashionable audience. The band played the first part of Mozart's Jupiter symphony, and the overtures to Gustave and Fra Diavolo (Auber), King Stephen (Beethoven), and Yelva (Reissiger), in a spirited manner. Mr. Haddock, from Liverpool, displayed considerable execution in two solos on the violoncello. The ease with which he overcame several very difficult cadenzas, won him the applause of all the amateurs present. Mrs. Sutherland sustained her well known reputation in the scena, "Softly sighs," from Der Freyschutz, and was encoresd in Rodwell's ballad "Oh charming May!" Mr. Inkersall, a tenor from Sheffield, sang in a very tasteful manner "In this old chair," and the "White Squall." Mr. Frobisher, founder of the society, and to whom much of its present efficiency is due, conducted and accompanied with his usual ability and judgment.

CORK.—The concert given by Mr. Distin and Sons, on Wednesday evening, the 7th inst., in the theatre, was numerously and fashionably attended. The performance fully supported the character and impression produced by their former appearance. The concert was agreeably diversified with ballads, madrigals, and glees, sung with great taste by Miss Moriatt O'Connor, and the Brothers Distin. Mr. Distin, sen. took his farewell benefit on the following evening, under the immediate patronage of the officers of the 40th, who allowed their band, together with the band of the 90th regiment, to perform; there were in all 70 performers.

MANCHESTER.—On Saturday the members of the Mechanics, Institution Choral Society gave a miscellaneous concert to the members of the institution. The attendance was numerous, and the pieces, upon the whole, were given with effect. Webb's glee, "Thy voice O harmony," was a little unsteady, but was compensated by Morley's madrigal, "Now is the month of Maying," and "The dear old chimney corner," both of which were loudly applauded. "Sigh no more, ladies," was encored; "Here in cool grot" received the same compliment—the pianos and fortes being well observed. "Spring's delights," and other pieces were given with taste. We may especially express our satisfaction with the "Hunstan's chorus," from Der Freischutz, which was also en-chored. The motet, arranged by Shore, commencing, "Holiest, breathe an evening blessing," and ending with "Clad in light and deathless bloom," was, perhaps, the most effective of all, the occasion which had called it forth—the death of the late Mr. Day, president of the institution—adding to the solemnity of the subject.—Mr. Rumney, one of the directors, proposed a vote of thanks to the Choral Society for their gratuitous services. He said that an addition of members was required by the society, and he hoped the proceedings of that evening would be the means of increasing a department of the institution which afforded such pleasure and instruction weekly to its members—enabling them, as upon this occasion, to entertain them and their families free of cost.—Mr. Harry Rawson seconded Mr. Rumney's motion, and expressed his hope that, though it would be necessary for those wishing to join the society to possess considerable proficiency in music, to meet on equal terms with the members whose performances this evening had been so creditable and so well received, there would be many ready to join them. The thanks of the meeting (he observed) were especially due to the ladies of the society, who, out of regard to their fellow-members, had come forward to spend an hour with them, having overcome the false scruples which too often confine their sex to private circles.—(Manchester Examiner 14th May.)

DUBLIN.—The Distin family appeared on Monday and Tuesday evenings, in a spacious salon of the Music-hall, which has been newly decorated under the direction of Mr. Mackintosh. The interest taken by the public in the Distin concerts was evidenced in the overflowing houses and the appreciation of the performances in enthusiastic plaudits. The vocal performances were worthy the applause conceded them. We may mention as prominently successful the harmonized quartet of the Irish melody, "The Last Rose of Summer," by Miss M. O'Connor, and Messrs. H. W. and T. Distin, and a new quartet "The Red Rose," by the same performers. The concert on Tuesday was for the benefit of Mr. Distin Sen. and the closing performance.

TOTTENHAM.—A concert was given at the Lecture Hall on Wednesday evening. The programme was in every respect admirable, and is worth printing as a manifestation of the feeling for classic music exhibited in places removed from the influences of the Metropolis. Thus it runs:—Part I. Symphony in D. (No. 4) Mozart. Recitative and Aria.—"Quando miro" Miss Dolby, Mozart. Trio in B Flat, Op. 2, for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello, Messrs. Walter Macfarren, Dando, and Lawford, Beethoven. Song.—"Nobil Donna." (Les Huguenots.) Miss Dolby, Meyerbeer. Andante Movement, from Symphony No. 3 (by Desire) Haydn. Part II.—Symphony in C Major (No. 1.) Beethoven. A Fireside Song—Miss Dolby, W. V. Wallace. Duet for Violin and Pianoforte, Messrs. Dando and W. Macfarren, De Beriot and Osborne. Scotch Song—"Bonnie Dundee," Miss Dolby. Overture—Masaniello, Auber. Mr. Dando lead and Mr. Walter C. Macfarren presided at the piano.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. M. B.—The copies required can be procured of Messrs. Wessel & Co., 229, Regent-street. The price now is 4d. unstamped.

C. D. (Belfast).—Decidedly Formes.

J. H. D. E. (Worcester).—Thanks. We can make no use, however, of the communication.

A. P. (Glasgow).—We are much obliged for the sonnets, but are unable to find space for them.

AN ORGANIST.—We are in treaty with a celebrated authority in these matters, but, meanwhile, shall be glad of the information kindly offered by our correspondent. The subject is assuredly one of general interest.

S. P. (Liverpool).—We are much gratified that our correspondent is satisfied with our appreciation of his work.

A CONSTANT READER &c.—The notice of the London Sacred Harmonic Society, was unavoidably postponed till the present number.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The report of the last Concert is in type, with our Reviews and Foreign News, and will appear next Number.

Advertisements.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGES

FOR Improving the Voice, and removing all Affections of the Throat. Strongly recommended to Clergymen, Singers, Actors, Public Speakers, persons subject to relaxed Throats, and to all persons desirous of cultivating their Voices, and ensuring a good and clear articulation. They have also been found highly beneficial to those afflicted with Nervous, Hysterical, or Stomachic Coughs. To be had in Boxes, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d. each, of every Medicine Vendor in the kingdom.

Testimonials of their efficacy are published with each Box, from

Mad. Grisi	Miss Bonner	Mr. Harrison	Mr. J. Barnett
Mad. Eusiani	Mad. Albertazzi	Mr. Allen	Mr. George Linley
Mad. Eugenie Garcia	Miss Cooper	Mr. White	Mr. Bodwell
Mrs. Alfred Shaw	Sig. Lablache	Mr. Wass	Mr. Nelson
Miss Rainforth	Sig. Giubilei	Mr. Kroff	&c., &c.

CURES FOR THE UNCURED!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—Cure of a Red Leg of more than sixty years' standing.—Mr. Barker, of No. 5, Graham's Place, Drypool, near Hull, had ulcers on his leg from the age of 18 until upwards of 80, and although for many years he had sought the first advice in the country, nothing was found to cure them. He often suffered excruciating pain for long periods together, which incapacitated him from attending to his business. He had given up all hopes of getting a cure, when at last he was persuaded to try Holloway's Pills and Ointment, which he did, and however wonderful it may appear, the leg was thoroughly healed by their means, and by continuing to use the Pills alone after his leg was well, he has become in health so hale and hearty as now to be more active than most men of fifty. N.B.—The truth of this extraordinary statement can be vouched for by Mr. J. C. Reinhardt, 23, Market Place, Hull. Feb. 30th, 1850.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in the following cases:—

Bad Legs	Coco Bay	Contracted and	Lumbago	Scurvy
Bad Breasts	Chiego-foot	Stiff Joints	Filices	Scalp-heads
Burns	Chilblains	E'phanitais	Rheumatism	Tumours
Bunions	Chapped hands	Fistulas	Scalds	Ulcers
Bite of Mosche-	Corns (Soft)	Gout	Sore Nipples	Wounds
toes and Sand-	Cancers	Glandular Swell-	Sore-throats	Yaws
Flies		ings	Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar), London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World, in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

MR. CRIVELLI

BEGS to acquaint his friends and the public that a Third

Edition of the "ART OF SINGING," enlarged and newly arranged in the form of a Grammatical System of Rules for the Cultivation of the Voice, may be had at his residence, 71, Upper Norton-street, and at all the principal Music-sellers.

* Soon will be ready, the French and German Translation.

SACRED HARMONY.

UNDER the especial PATRONAGE of Her Most Excellent MAJESTY.—Just published, price 31s. 6d.,

H. J. HAYCRAFT'S VOLUME OF SACRED HARMONY. Contributors:—Kate Loder, Sterndale Bennett, Henry Smart, G. A. Macfarren, Dr. Walmesley, W. H. Holmes, Lovell Phillips, Brinley Richards, C. Lucas, Robert Barnett, &c.

"This is a judicious and interesting publication, containing works of high merit, and altogether possessing an interest not likely to pass hastily away."—Atlas. London: Addison and Co.; and at the Editor's residence, 32, Queen's-road, Gloucester-gate, Regent's-park.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

PIANO SOLOS.
Beyer, Ferd.	Op. 101bis, One hundred Melodies for Beginners, in 4 books.
"	" 109, No. 1 to 12, Soirées Musicales, 12 Morceaux gracieux, in 12 books.
"	" 111, No. 1 to 6, Six Morceaux élégants, in 6 books.
Cramer, H.	" 58, Schwäbische Volksmelodie.	Fantasia.
Eser, H.	" 36,	Sonate.
T....., F.	Makó Csárdás.	Hungarian Dance.
Maier, T.	Four Hungarian Marches to Battle.
Leopoldini, A.	Les trois Soeurs.	Trois Valses.
Prudent, E.	Op. 30, No. 4, 2d Impromptu.
"	" 80, No. 5, Chanson Sicilienne.
Slazy, L.	Rhein und Main, No. 8 and 9.	Two Polkas
PIANO DUET, TWO PERFORMERS.
Beyer, Ferd.	Morceau élégantes sur des airs Allemands favoris.
	No. 2, Das Alpenhorn, by Proch.
	To be continued.
VIOLIN WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR THE PIANO OR ORCHESTRA.
De Beriot, Ch.	Op. 76, 7me Concerto.
Leonard, H.	" 14, 2d do.
FLUTE SOLOS.
Kuffner, Jos.	One hundred favorite Melodies, in 7 books.
	Schott and Co., 89, St. James's Street.

Schott and Co., 69, St. James's Street.

HYMN OF PRAISE FOR ALL NATIONS.

NOW READY, under the Patronage of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, HYMN OF PRAISE for all NATIONS: a Sacred Cantata for Four Voices, with Chorus, and Organ or Pianoforte. The Words selected from the Holy Scriptures; the Music by T. LLOYD FOWLE. The work is handsomely and elegantly printed, price 7s. 6d.

Printed for the Author at the London Sacred Music Warehouse, 69, Dean-street, Soho, and 24, Poultry.

DEUX POLKAS BRILLANTES,

DEDICES à W. H. HOLMES. No. 1, LA POLKA GLISSANTE. No. 2, LA POLKA TREMOLA. Price 2s. each. Also, the BUSY BEE POLKA. Price 2s. Wessel and Co., 229, Regent-street.

"Mrs. John Macfarren's Polkas, though trifles, are original and excellent of their kind. They are alike attractive, as lively and rhythmical dances, and as sparkling and brilliant pianoforte pieces."

DIATONIC FLUTE.

BY ROYAL LETTERS PATENT.—This instrument is exclusively used by Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. PRATTEN (first Flute at the Royal Italian Opera), and many other Professors in town and country; testimonials of whom, with description, prices, &c., will be forwarded on application. This flute may be heard at the Manufactory, 135, Fleet street. A. SICCAMA, Patentee.

Published at the above address, 5s. each:—
Grand variations on the Russian Hymn ... Richardson.
Do. on Coming thro' the Rye, and Jock o' Hazeldean ... Pratten.
New Grand Capriccio ... Percival.
N.B.—For opinion of these pieces see "Musical World," of May 10.

Just Published.

CHARLES OLLIVIER'S

ROYAL MUSICAL REPOSITORY AND CIRCULATING
MUSICAL LIBRARY,
41 & 42, NEW BOND STREET.

VOCAL MUSIC.

The Fairest joys are fleeting,	E. J. Loder.	2s.
The Naiad's Call,	C. Pugn.	2s.
I dreamt of a Land,	C. Pugn.	2s.
The Fairies' meeting,	C. Pugn.	2s.
The Father's death,	Tomaschek.	2s.
Henry the Fourth of France,	To Gabrielle.	2s.
The Dying Wife's farewell,	Rungenhagen.	2s.
Fidelity,	Brinley Richards.	2s.

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.

Grande Valse,	J. Rummel.	Solo, 3s.; Duet,	...	4s.
Duo Dramatique—Donna del Lago, Renaud de Vilbac	6s.
Fantaisie—Nuit de Noël,	D. Magnus.	2s.
German Illustrations—Six Lieder,	J. Rummel.	In 3 books, each	...	3s.
Zephyr—Nocturne,	W. H. Palmer.	2s.
Six Pensées Musicales,	Kuhe.	4s.

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATION.

MOZART'S COMIC TRIO (the Ribbon) for Soprano, Tenor, and Bass, as sung at the Beethoven Quartet Society, with the greatest success (see Times notice of these Concerts on the 10th inst.). Rousselet's Midshipman's Star and J. Hertz's Redowa Brillante, at Messrs. Rousselet & Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

WESSEL AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

CZAPEK—"La Gorlitz"	2s. 0d.
MORINE—"Glenalbyn Polkas"	2s. 6d.
DAWES—"Woburn Waltzes"	3s. 0d.
ETTLING—"La Chanteuse Volée," Valses	3s. 0d.
BARKER (Laura)—"Sprite Polka"	3s. 0d.
TALEXY—"Kosciusko, Etude Mazurka"	2s. 0d.
"—"Musidora," Polka Mazurka	2s. 0d.
"—"Helena," Premier Nocturne	2s. 0d.
VAN MAANEN—"Atherstone Schottisch," Duet	3s. 0d.
TEDESCO. Three German Melodies.
No. 1. "THE COTTAGE."—(Das Hütchen)	2s. 6d.
" 2. "TRUE LOVE."—(Treue Liebe)	2s. 0d.
" 3. "LORELEY."—(Loreley.)	3s. 0d.

Wessel and Co., 229, Regent-street.

LEE & COXHEAD'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

MUSIC for the VIOLIN.

THE AMATEUR VIOLINIST—A selection of favorite Airs from the Standard Foreign Operas, arranged expressly for the first position of the Violin, in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY FARMER, with an accompaniment ad lib. for the Piano, second Violin, and Violoncello.

THE VIOLINIST'S ALBUM—a collection of favorite Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, &c., arranged expressly for the first position of the Violin, in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY FARMER, with an Accompaniment ad lib. for the Piano, second Violin, and Violoncello.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Farmer's Violin School." 5s.

MUSIC for the FLUTE.

THE AMATEUR FLUTIST—a selection of favorite Airs from the Standard Foreign Operas, arranged in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY NICHOLSON, with an Accompaniment ad lib. for the Violin, Violoncello, and Pianoforte.

THE FLUTIST'S ALBUM—a collection of favorite Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, &c., arranged in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY NICHOLSON, with an Accompaniment ad lib. for the Piano, Violin, and Violoncello.

MUSIC for the ORGAN or HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDEST—a collection of short interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDEST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate Designs by Brandard, arranged by ALBERT KELLER; the six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by EDWIN FLOOD. Price 2s.

A NEW PIANOFORTE SCHOOL, by ALBERT KELLER, price 4s.

"We can confidently recommend this Pianoforte Tutor as the best extant: Mr. Keller has adopted the judicious method of arranging the scales and exercises amongst the lessons, by which plan the pupil is taught those essentials without turning to a formal book of scales, &c.,—the fingering is carefully marked without being crowded, and is evidently written by one who has had great experience as a teacher."

Also, "Delices de la Jeunesse," in 12 sets, price 2s. each, written expressly to follow the above Tutor, by C. W. Glover.

London: Lee and Coxhead, 48, Albermarle Street, and all Book and Music Sellers. Catalogues gratis.

CHAULIEU'S PIANOFORTE WORKS.

MESSRS. RÜST and STAHL, being the Sole Proprietors of the Posthumous Works of M. Chaulieu, beg to intimate their intention of publishing them as originally intended by the author—viz., in parts at 6s. each, and which will include the Harmonical Dial, twenty-four sonatas in the twenty-four major and minor keys; having before each one exercise, one prelude, and two Improvisations in the same key, specially written for the English schools, six parts of which are already published. And also six other parts, comprising two Books of Studies in the modern style, Morceau de Salon, Album de Bal, &c., 6s. each, or the twelve parts in one volume, boards, at £2 2s.

Rüst and Stahl, Pianoforte Manufacturers and Music Publishers, 390, Regent-street, opposite the Royal Polytechnic Institution.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published,

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTE. Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 210 Regent-street; Keith and Prowse, 48, Chesapeake; and Cocks & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. GRAND EXTRA NIGHT.

IT is respectfully announced that a Grand Extra Night will take place ON THURSDAY NEXT, MAY 22, 1851, when will be presented for the first time this season, Rossini's celebrated Opera,—

IL BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA.

Rosina	Madame SONTAG.
Il Conte d'Almaviva	Signor CALZOLARI.
Figaro	Signor FERRANTI.
		And
Bartolo	Signor LABLACHE.

In the Lesson Scene Mad. SONTAG will introduce Rode's celebrated Variations. After which a Selection from a favourite Opera, in which Mdlle. Caroline Duprez, Madame Fiorentini, Signori Gardoni and Coletti, will appear, with various Entertainments in the Ballet Department, in which Mdlle. Carlotta Grisi Mdles. Rosa, Esper, Julien, Lamoureux, Allegrini, Pascales, Kohlenberg, Dantonie, and Mdlle. Amalia Ferraris; M. Charles, MM. Ehrick, Di Mattia, Gounet, Venafra, and M. Paul Taglioni, will appear. The Opera to commence at Half-past Seven o'clock.

Applications for Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets, to be made at the Box-office of the Theatre.

MR. W. H. HOLMES'S NEW OPERA.

HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS, WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAY 23, at 2. Performers—Mrs. Sims Reeves, Misses Dolby, Messrs. Ransford, Eyles, Land, A. Dolby; Messrs. Land and Frank Bodda. Full Orchestra and Chorus. Conductor, Mr. Lucas. Solo, Mr. J. Balair Chatterton (Harpist to the Queen). Overture, Macfarren. Tickets, 7s.; Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d. To be had of W. H. Holmes, 36, Beaumont-street, Marylebone, and at all Music Warehouses.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY,

EXETER HALL.

EXTRA NIGHT ON MONDAY NEXT, the 19th of MAY. Handel's MESSIAH, to afford the visitors to the Exhibition an opportunity of hearing the composer's great masterpiece. Principal English Artists—Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Henderson, Miss Dolty, M. as Felton; Mr. Cooper and Mr. H. Phillips. The Band and Chorus, the most extensive in Exeter Hall, will consist of above 800 performers. Tickets, 3s.; reserved, 5s.; central area, numbered, 10s. 6d. each, at the Society's office, No. 9, in Exeter Hall, and at the Principal Music-sellers.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, Mr. COSTA.—FRIDAY, May 23, will be performed Handel's Oratorio, MESSIAH. Vocalists—Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss E. Birch, Miss Dolby, Miss M. Williams; Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Formes. The orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 performers. Tickets, 3s.; reserved, 5s.; central area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter-hall; or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing-cross.

MR. FRANK BODDA

RESPECTFULLY announces that his MATINEE MUSICALE will take place at 27, QUEEN ANNE STREET, Cavendish Square, on FRIDAY, MAY 23rd. Vocalists—Miss Birch, Miss Williams, Miss Poole, Miss Messent, Miss Ransford, Mdelle. Graumann, and Madame Macfarren; Sig. Riccardi, Sig. Sal. Tamburini, Mr. Laud, Mr. Frank Bodda. Pianoforte—Miss Kate Loder. Violoncello—Herr Hausmann. Conductors—Sig. Piloti and Sig. Blietta. Tickets, Half-a-Guinea, to be had of Mr. Frank Bodda, 42, Hart-street, Bloomsbury-square.

MISS CATHERINE HAYES

WILL give a GRAND MORNING CONCERT at the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS, on MONDAY, 19th MAY. Madlle. Anna Zerr (prima donna of the Opera, Berlin), will make her first appearance, Miss Sassano, and Miss Hayes; Herr Reichard, de Vienne (premier tenor de l'Opera Imperial), Mr. Augustus Bralem (his first appearance), Herr Mengis, and M. Jules Stockhausen. Violin—Herr Ernst. Harp—Madame Parish Alvars. Contra Bass—Sig. Bottesini. The Orchestra, selected from the Italian Operas and Philharmonic Concerts, will perform Weber's Overture to Oberon and an Overture, MS., by E. Silas. Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; Single Tickets, 7s.; at Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 201, Regent-street, and all principal Music-sellers.

BEETHOVEN QUARTETT SOCIETY.

HERR ERNST will play conjointly with Messrs. Copper, Hill, and Rousselot, at the Third Morning Performance given in honour to Mendelssohn, on Thursday, May 32nd, quarter past Three. When a selection from his Operetta will be produced and sung by Madles. Rummel, Graumann; Herren Carl Wolf and Hüsel. Quartetts in D and in E flat, Mendelssohn; Sonata in C minor, violin and pianoforte, Beethoven. Pianist—Madlle. Elise Kunitz. Tickets at Messrs. Rousselot and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

M. ERNST'S

GRAND EVENING CONCERT will take place at the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS on MONDAY, JUNE 2nd. Full particulars at Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN. LUCREZIA BORGIA—MASANIELLO.

GRISI, ANGRI, FORMES, SALVATORI, TAGLIAFICO, TAMBERLIK, And MARIO.

ON TUESDAY next, May 20th, a Grand Combined Entertainment will be given, commencing with, for the second time this season, Donizetti's Opera,

LUCREZIA BORGIA.

The principal characters by Madame Grisi, Madlle. Angri; Signor Salvatori, Signor Tagliafico, Signor Polonini, Signor Soldi, Signor Mei, Signor Romni, Signor Ferrari, and Signor Mario.

To conclude with the SECOND and THIRD ACTS of Auber's Favourite Opera, including the Barcarole by Signor Tamberlik, the duet by Signor Tamberlik and Herr Formes, and the celebrated prayer and the Tarentella in the Market scene. The principal dances by M. Alexandre and Madlle. Louise Taglioni.

MASANIELLO.

GRAND EXTRA NIGHT.

FIRST NIGHT OF LA FAVORITA.

On THURSDAY NEXT, May 22nd, will be performed, for the first time these three years, Donizetti's Grand Opera,

LA FAVORITA.

Leonora, Madame Grisi; Ines, Madlle. Cotti; Baldassara, Herr Formes (his first appearance in that character); Don Gasparo, Signor Soldi; Alfonso XI., Signor Tamberlik (his first appearance in that character); Ferdinando, Signor Mario. Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor,—M. R. COSTA.

Commence at Eight o'clock.

Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre.

HERR CHARLES OBERTHÜR,

Harpist to Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Nassau,

HAS the honor to announce that his CONCERT will take place at the NEW BEETHOVEN ROOMS, on TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 20th. Vocalists—Madlle. Bertha Johansen, Mdlle. F. Rummel, and Herr Mengis. Instrumentalists—Herr Menter, Herr Pauer, and Herr Alexandre Rancharave. Tickets 10s. 6d., to be had at Wessel and Co.'s, 229, Regent-street; Boosey and Co., Holles-street, &c.; and of Herr Oberthur, 87, Milton-street, Dorset-square.

MR. AGUILAR

RESPECTFULLY announces that his Annual Concert will take place at the Hanover Square Rooms on Wednesday evening, May 28th, 1851. Vocalists—Miss Birch, Miss Dolby, Miss Messent, Madlle. Graumann, Herr Stigelli, Signor Marchesi, and Herr Formes. Violin, Herr Ernst; Contrabasso, Signor Bottesini; Pianoforte, Mr. Aguilar. The Orchestra, selected from the Royal Italian Opera, will be complete in every department. Leader, Mr. Wilby; Conductors, Messrs. Anschuetz and Schimon. Among other pieces, will be performed for the first time in England, Mr. Aguilar's Symphony in E minor.

Tickets seven shillings each, Reserved Seats, half a guinea. To be procured at Messrs. Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent Street; Messrs. Wessel and Co., 229, Regent Street, corner of Hanover Street; and at the residence of Mr. Aguilar, No. 68, Upper Norton Street, Portland Road.

MUSICAL UNION.

SIVORI, Bottesini, Piatti, Gollinelli, Deloffre, and Hill, will execute, at the Extra Musical Union, on Tuesday, May 20th, at half-past Three, Quartet, E minor, Mendelssohn; Trio No. 3, C minor, Beethoven; Sextet Brillante, Op. 50, Mayseider; Solo Contra, Bass and Solo Pianoforte. Tickets 10s. 6d. each, to be had at Cramer and Co.'s, Treasurers. Members admitted 7s. each at the rooms on giving the number of their tickets. Foreign and native artists, on application to the Director, admitted without payment.

J. ELLA.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

THALBERG	Irish Airs.
SCHULZ	Mélodie.
FRÄGER	Liebes Verlangen.
FRÄGER	Moment Joyeux.
RICHARDS	Moonlight Serenade.
RICHARDS	Pastorale.
RICHARDS	Danish Air.
BOEHEL	Clotilde.
BRESSEN	L'Arabesque.
KUHE	Styriennes.
OURY	Les Fleurs du Printemps.
OURY	Un Souvenir.
MORI	Romance sans Paroles.
MORI	Pensées Pendant l'Absence.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Stridley Villas, Studley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid, To be had of G. Purkes, Dean Street, 8. ho.; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, May 17, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Messrs. Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden.

No. 21.—VOL. XXVIII.

SATURDAY, MAY 24, 1851.

PRICE FOURPENCE.

CRUVELLI.

THE papers are unanimous in praise of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli. We cannot find room for all their criticisms on Fidelio and the new representative of its heroine (who has, in one performance, placed herself side by side with Malibran); but we extract what relates exclusively to the latter, from the elaborate notices of the four principal journals, as a strong corroboration of our prophecy of last week, and of the opinion of our reporter in the present number. We could not decently take into our own hands the fulfilment of our own prediction, and have, therefore, left the task to a collaborateur, in whose judgment we have entire faith, and whose initials will at once be recognised. D. R. has written enthusiastically, but not too much so. Had he written coldly, after the performance of Tuesday night—had he not been deeply impressed with the genius of Mdlle. Cruvelli—we should have been disappointed; but his report would, nevertheless, have appeared in our columns. If Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli is not destined to become one of the greatest dramatic singers whom the art has known we are altogether out in our reckoning, and shall cease to have any further confidence in our own powers of appreciation. But we have no fear of the result. True genius cannot be mistaken; it cannot be confounded with mediocrity; it finds the heart at once, and satisfies the intellect afterwards. That Mdlle. Cruvelli is a genius we had not the smallest doubt after the first scene of Fidelio. She is an actress of the highest order, and, besides being an admirable and accomplished singer, is gifted with one of the most beautiful voices we have ever listened to. Though, if all our contemporaries had declared a contrary opinion, we should not have been shaken in our own, we are pleased to find them coinciding with us, and reprint their articles with the fuller satisfaction.

(From the Daily News.)

"Mademoiselle Cruvelli excited an enthusiasm exceeding anything we have witnessed since the debut of Jenny Lind.

"The heroine of last night was at this theatre (as our musical readers will remember) three years ago. Young as she then was—only 19—she showed powers of a high order, and made a very great impression on the public. But the Lind mania was at its height that season, and, after she appeared, no one had ears or eyes for any body else. Since that time she has been unremitting in the pursuit of her art, and has appeared with constantly increasing reputation at the principal theatres in Italy and Germany. She has now returned to us, at the age of two-and twenty, in the full maturity of her gifts and attainments; and her appearance last night has set the seal upon her name, and stamped her an artist of the very highest class.

Mdlle. Cruvelli never played or saw the part of Leonora performed, we believe, and therefore was neither guided nor fettered by traditions. But she reminded us much of Madame Schroeder Devrient, the greatest representative of the character, doubtless because she entered deeply into its spirit, and took truth, nature, and simplicity for her guide. She looked the handsome youth who captivates the jailor's daughter, better than any of her predecessors in the part, and her quiet air of melancholy resignation was very touching. In the most impassioned scenes her acting was powerful without exaggeration, and it was impossible to contemplate her transports of rapturous joy at the close without a strong sympathetic emotion. Of her singing it is impossible to speak too highly. Every quality of a great artist—voice, taste, execution, style, expression—are combined to charm and move her hearers. Her performance of the great scena, containing the beautiful invocation to Hope, threw the audience into a tumult of enthusiasm."

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

"We have a lively recollection of the crowds which used to besiege Drury-lane Theatre when Malibran appeared as Fidelio. The impression left by her performance was one of the few which are marked by the stamp of unmistakeable genius. We are greatly deceived, if, without the disadvantage of interference with the music, Mdlle. Cruvelli will not be found to have left a similar impression, last night, upon the minds of those who witnessed her impassioned performance, and who, twenty years hence, may have to advert to it.

* * * * *

The "event" of the night was the appearance of Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli, who sustained the arduous character of Leonora. This young lady, who has for some years been pursuing her musical studies with an earnestness which it is impossible to praise too highly, has been accredited to us by the Parisian audiences with an unusual fervour of recommendation. She has created a furor in the French capital, and we believe that no ordinary attempts were made to detach her from Mr. Lumley's establishment, and to retain her where she had suddenly achieved so brilliant a success. But it is really matter of congratulation to the habitués of Her Majesty's Theatre that all such endeavours failed, and that last night she made her appearance in the sombre garb of the prison servant. Tall, finely formed, and with most expressive features, Mdlle. Cruvelli is admirably adapted for the lyrical stage. Her voice is of extensive compass, wonderfully fine, clear, and resonant, and perfectly under her control. It is a voice which can be relied upon to execute the conceptions of its owner, and, consequently, there is no hurry on that owner's part to exhibit its riches. She can afford to reserve her powers from full display until the proper moment for putting them forth, only indicating from time to time what a treasury is under her charge. And when the moment arrives for giving full scope to her powers, and when the tide of song bursts forth in all its richness of melody, what a display it is! We have rarely witnessed such a marvel of power as was manifested by Mdlle. Cruvelli last night. The exigencies of the part require that the earlier scene shall be exceedingly quiet—undertoned so to speak—the action being that of watchfulness and secrecy. Mdlle. Cruvelli kept herself under the most perfect restraint, and it was not until the lovely canon quartett, "Il cor, e la mia fe," that she allowed the expression of feeling to prevail. But as her passionate notes then gushed upon the ear, the audience almost involuntarily burst into a shout of approbation. In the terzetto, "Corragio, orsu," the sensation Mdlle. Cruvelli made was extraordinary; but her triumph was in the recitative and air (in the first act) "A qual furor." Her terrible emphasis upon the words "di vendetta," at which she seemed to rush as if grappling with a hateful idea—her exquisite delivery of the concluding portion of the recitative, "Ah, già rinasce," will not be forgotten by those who had, or may have, the good fortune to hear them. The air itself she sang with a delicacy, an elevation, and a brilliancy which enchanted her hearers. The redemand, malgré the arduous task, was vociferous, and Mdlle. Cruvelli repeated the last passage with unabated power.

In the second act, where she is conducted into the dungeon, and is set to dig a grave for the husband, who, squalid and weak from want and misery, lies near her, Mdlle. Cruvelli's acting was of the finest description. She hovered about and around the unrecognising Florestan, intensely anxious, but as intensely self-restraining. But when the moment arrived for her dashing between him and the intended murderer, her performance was literally superb. Confronting Pizarro with a dauntless brow, and pouring forth with lightning-like vividness her reproach and defiance, the ruffianly noble appeared to succumb to her womanly energy, and the weapon seemed but a secondary terror for him. Nothing could be finer; and her subsequent ardent outpouring of affection for Florestan, her clinging to him in his dungeon, and his long gaze of love were all admirably conceived. Her superb execution of the finale was a vocal triumph which will be long remembered in Her Majesty's Theatre. We can felicitate the management upon having achieved at once the most legitimate and the most extraordinary success with the débütante of last night, and we regard the honours she has won in a very difficult and by no means a "showy" part, as an augury of a series of successes with which a fresh tone will be given to this unmanageable season.

(From The Morning Herald.)

"Mdlle. Cruvelli, who comes to London under more auspicious circumstances than before, seeing that there is no Jenny Lind prejudice to compete with, was handsomely and warmly received. Her performance of the unhappy heroine evinced singular ability, which was the more apparent, seeing that there are few artists who are competent to undertake it, owing to physical deficiency on the one hand, and limited histrionic powers on the other. The extensive range of voice possessed by Mdlle. Cruvelli is a great point in her favour; and she sang the music from first to last without let or hindrance, and at the same time with a feeling and abandon that disclosed the right sort of impulse—the right sort of interest in a work as remote from the common place which constitutes the staple of the modern Italian opera, as any two things can possibly be. But Cruvelli, when last here, was remarkable for her intelligence and strong dramatic passion, and it was again gratifying to find these qualities so well developed as they were last night. Her acting, throughout, was highly effective, and in the second act, where there is so much opportunity for the display of ability, and in which she had the remembrance of several illustrious predecessors to contend with, she created no little sensation. Her delivery of the words 'Io son sua sposa' was a signal for a round of applause, drawn forth by the impassioned earnestness of her manner, and the vivid colouring she imparted in this trying melo-dramatic collision. Her singing was at all times excellent, for it was vitalised by the best musicianship, a quality indispensable in music of this lofty and difficult class; and we therefore cannot but welcome an artist of such unquestionable accomplishment as an event of importance to the musical interests of the metropolis. She gave the aria, 'O tu la cui dolce possanza' (Komm Hoffnung) admirably; in fact, we never heard the delicious recitative given better or with more refined taste; while her sonorous contralto notes fell on the ear with round and voluptuous beauty. She was loudly encored, called for at the end of each act, and her success in one of the most arduous parts which either actress or singer dare grapple with, was affirmed by the universal verdict of the house."

(From the Morning Post.)

"After this came the magnificent scene of Fidelio, in which Mdlle. Cruvelli fairly took the sympathies of the audience. It was, on the whole, one of the grandest displays of executive genius we ever witnessed. Tremendous energy, soul-stirring pathos, masterly discrimination, extraordinary physical power, and finished mechanism, all were united to make up this vast sum of excellence. The air itself is a perfect miracle of genius and learning, and, executed by Cruvelli, produced an effect we shall never forget. During the fine introductory bars which so truthfully illustrate the situation, she rushed wildly from her hiding-place, where she has overheard the duet betwixt Pizarro and Rocco, and raising her arms with the inspired furor, breathed execration upon the future assassin of her husband; horror and defiance quivering on her lips, and gleaming in her eyes, as she stood with her gaze transfixed to the door at which Pizarro had just entered. She presented a truly sublime and terrible picture of desperate courage, animated by lofty purpose, struggling to subdue the natural impulses of womanly fear.

An effect was realised which could not but have satisfied Beethoven himself. Mdlle. Cruvelli's performance of this heavenly inspiration will be a "joy for ever" to all who were fortunate enough to hear it. Every note she sang was instinct with the spirit of the whole. In the responsive or imitative passages which frequently occur in this movement, she managed to catch the tone of the last instrument, blending her voice admirably with the various concerting parts, though never for an instant sacrificing the expression of the words. In her delivery of the beautiful figure divided between the voice, horns, and bassoons, on the words "Amor mi guidava," she was especially successful.

The last movement, in which Fidelio expresses faith in Providence, and her determination to save her husband's life, afforded Mdlle. Cruvelli a grand opportunity for the display of her lofty genius. It was a magnificent performance from first to last, and drew down thunders of applause, and an unmerciful encore. By this time the audience felt that one of the brightest ornaments of the modern stage was before them, and the débütante's triumphant success was already a fait accompli. Mdlle. Cruvelli was called for twice, and the subsequent buzz of voices throughout the vast salle proved that an unusual sensation had been created amongst the subscribers. Mdlle. Cruvelli's singing and acting in the great prison scene reached the loftiest degree of excellence.

(From the Times.)

Last night Beethoven's opera of Fidelio was produced, for the first time, at a London Italian Opera, and Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli made her first appearance since 1848, when she will be recollected as a singer of much promise. The double event proved a great attraction. Her Majesty and suite attended, and the house was filled by a brilliant and overflowing audience. Both the opera of Beethoven and Mademoiselle Cruvelli, the representative of the heroine, now a singer and actress of the highest attainments, were triumphantly successful.

Fidelio was a failure at Vienna in 1805, but it was never a failure in England—to the credit of our "unmusical" public be it recorded—and less than ever a failure last night. The chief part in the success must be awarded to Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli. Three years ago Mademoiselle Cruvelli, in certain operas of Donizetti and Verdi, made a highly favourable impression, and was considered a dramatic vocalist of unusual promise for her years (she was then scarcely twenty). But the "Lind fever," as it has been called, left no chance for any one else than the popular Jenny to be appreciated, and Mademoiselle Cruvelli suffered with the rest. The interval between then and the present time has been spent by the young artist in various parts of Germany and Italy, where she followed her professional career with a success always increasing, until, last month, Mr. Lumley had the good fortune to secure her for the Italian Theatre in Paris, where she brought his season to a close with some performances of almost unexampled brilliancy. The French journals praised her to the skies; but, as the French journals are not invariably the safest authorities to rely upon in such matters, we confess we distrusted them, and believed no more than half of what they said about the genius and accomplishments of "La jeune et belle Cruvelli." For once, however, we did our contemporaries d'outré manche injustice; and we are too glad to pay them honourable amends, by giving in our adhesion to their verdict. Mademoiselle Cruvelli has made such good use of her time that we doubt much if a "Lind fever" or any other fever, could now shut the eyes of the public to her merits as an actress and a singer. The mere fact of making her débüt in such a work as Fidelio—a work so opposed to all that bears the name of Italian opera—and in the part of Leonora, without comparison the most laborious, trying, and difficult in the entire range of the lyric drama, already entitles Mademoiselle Cruvelli to admiration for her courage, and praise for her good taste; but the fact that she did full justice to the character, in every respect, vocal and histrionic, and that since Malibran there has been no representative of Beethoven's "heroic wife" who can support the slightest comparison with her, is still more important, since it places her at once in the first rank of dramatic singers. It is said that Mademoiselle Cruvelli never played Fidelio before, and never saw the opera performed, an assertion which the exhibition of last night makes very difficult to believe. From her first entry on the scene she showed an entire appreciation of the dramatic exigencies of the part, and her earnest manner continually courted attention. We need not describe the personal appearance of Mademoiselle Cruvelli, which is known to be vastly in her favour, but it is not out of place to say that her voice, which already, in 1848, was powerful and of extensive compass, has now acquired the flexibility and equal tone which it then in a great degree wanted. Her higher notes are remarkably clear and brilliant; what may be the highest in her register we cannot pretend to say, but in the duet of the second act with Florestan we heard her take the D in alt. with the greatest ease, force, and truth of intonation. The latter quality, indeed, seems inherent in Mademoiselle Cruvelli, as was proved by her singing in the difficult aria in E, with the three horns and bassoon (exceedingly well played by the gentlemen in the orchestra), her intonation of which was as correct as her expression was beautiful, and her softe voce singing perfect. The quick movement of this air was unanimously encored, and at once placed Mademoiselle Cruvelli on the pedestal from which she never once descended throughout the evening. The charm of her voice is not lost even in the most impetuous declamation, as was amply shown in the quartet and duet of the second act; her middle tones are rich and mellow, and several fine points served to bring out, with striking effect, the strength and quality of her lower register. A voice so good throughout is rare indeed. We have only space to mention one or two great points in the acting of Mademoiselle Cruvelli, which we have already declared to be excellent throughout. The famous gravedigging scene was rendered much in the same way as by Malibran, 16 years ago—with the same exhibition of restless anxiety, faltering tones, and intense solicitude, the same earnestness and grace of gesture, and the same overpowering passion when the great moment of declaring herself and saving her husband arrives. When she exclaimed the famous passage, "Todte erst sein Weib!" (spoiled in the Italian version, "Io son sua sposa," which, while it fails to translate the meaning, necessitates the addition of another note for the superfluous syllable in the word "spo-sa," and robs the high B flat of half its effect), her stature seemed heightened, and the strength and dignity of a man to clothe her slender form. Her suddenly drawing out the pistol, and presenting it at the breast of Pizarro, was equally striking, and as she followed, with tottering steps, the cowardly assassin, her right arm stretched out to fire, if necessary, her left reposing on the shoulder of the husband she was protecting, the applause of the audience was enthusiastic, and the curtain fell upon one of the most deserved and genuine successes we remember for many years. Mademoiselle Cruvelli was recalled at the end of every act, and twice after the second. The Italian stage has thus gained another great dramatic singer in the person of a foreigner (Mademoiselle Cruvelli is a German, and her real name is Cruwell)—and, if we be not mistaken, a genius. Time will show."

Our purpose is sufficiently served by the above, without further extracts. It was natural that we should wish to show our readers the general impression produced on the critics, and through their medium on the public, by an artist whose advent we announced in our last with such unmeasured confidence, and whose triumph we predicted. That the result has not disappointed our own expectations, while it has far exceeded the anticipations of others, is a matter upon which, without arrogance, we may take leave to congratulate ourselves.

THE PIANOFORTE CONTROVERSY.

The question is not yet settled. The great houses of Stodart and Collard have put in their claims to some consideration. We shall wait till the letter writing is exhausted, and then compare notes and offer a few observations of our own.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—After your kind insertion of my letter proving my father's right to priority in the metal bracing of pianofortes, it may seem ungracious to seek to trespass on your columns again; but the general tenor of Mr. Erard's reply so neutralizes the effect of his abandonment of the question of priority, that I cannot help begging permission to say that my father's patent provides for all, and more than all, the improvements contemplated by Mr. Erard's metal bracing; and that there is also no conceivable tension of string that it would not counteract. My father's bracing entirely removes the strain from the wood frame by being detached from it at one end. Mr. Erard's does so but partially, owing to its being attached to it at both ends.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
1, Golden Square,
May 14th.

MATT. STODDART,
For W. Stoddart and Son.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—As we find in your columns of to-day that the subject of the pianofortes at the Exhibition is again brought under notice, we, in common with others, feel it a duty to remonstrate against the manner in which the merits of English pianoforte-makers have been overlooked. We therefore beg the favour you have already accorded to two other firms, namely, the permission to say a few words as to our own share in the improvement of this instrument.

Had the reviewer in a morning paper given a more comprehensive view of the present state of the art in England, and noticed less exclusively the various improvements made in it from time to time, we should have had no right to complain of any preference he might have expressed in favour of any particular firm; but what we do complain of is, the almost entire omission of the improvements of the English makers; and, as regards ourselves in particular, we think it an extremely hard return for upwards of 50 years' indefatigable exertions in the cause, that we should only be mentioned in connexion with one of the most insignificant parts of the manufacture, that of external decoration.

We beg to enumerate the following as a few of the improvements which have originated with our house:—

1. The present method of stringing, by which the old defective system of the loop or eye was entirely superseded. This was patented by us in 1827, and is now (the patent having expired) almost universally adopted, and its importance acknowledged, wherever the manufacture of pianofortes is carried on.
2. We are the originators of the grand square pianoforte, a form of instrument which has done as much to advance the reputation of the English manufacture as any of the improvements of modern times. Antecedent to this change the square pianoforte was almost useless, except for the purposes of the school room; but it has ever since become a valuable and important instrument, where space is an object, it has been invariably accepted as the best substitute for the grand.

3. The first application of the repeating action to the vertical or upright form of pianoforte (erroneously claimed by your reviewer for Messrs. Erard) is due to us; and we have good reason to believe that the attention we have devoted to this class of instrument, particularly in its smaller varieties, has contributed essentially to procure for the vertical pianoforte the high place it at present holds in public estimation.

4. We originated and patented an action for the grand pianoforte, the peculiarities of which it is unnecessary here to detail, beyond remarking that, for extreme simplicity of mechanism, for unerring certainty of touch, for quality of tone, and for general durability, these instruments are placed by the public favour, as well as by professional opinion—the usual tests of excellence,—in so high a rank as to render it unseemly in us further to allude to the subject.

These are some of our contributions to English pianoforte making, which are surely of sufficient importance to deserve special notice; not to mention many other modifications in form, framing, mechanism, touch, &c., for which our house is well known. We claim, however, with peculiar emphasis, the credit of such a constant and unremitting attention to, and gradual improvement in, the details of the manufacture, as has enabled us to insure the production of instruments second in quality, and, we believe, in reputation, to none that can be brought forward either in this country or elsewhere.

Permit us to observe, in allusion to your remark, that certain pianists of great reputation prefer Messrs. Erard's instruments, that others of equally high renown use and approve those of other makers, ours not excepted; but we are free to confess that it is, and ever has been, our aim to produce an instrument fitted rather for the requirements of chamber music, and for the refinements of the drawing-room, than for public purposes.

We remain, Sir, your obedient servants,

Cheapside, May 14.

COLLARD & COLLARD.

Meanwhile, Messrs. Kirkman and Son obstinately guard silence.

Since writing the above another letter has reached us, which, as the question is one of such general interest, we insert, without pretending to fathom its meaning. The line of our intelligence, indeed, is not long enough to reach the bottom of it.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

DEAR SIR,—The question whether the late Sebastian Erard did, or did not, originate all improvements in the Grand Pianoforte, has been so completely set at rest by the assertions and reassertions of the Times, that I will not again enter upon it; but permit me to call your attention to the fact, that of one invention at all events, Mr. Pierre Erard is unquestionably the author. I allude, sir, to the "METALLIC CONCERT NAME PLATE." The maker's name, hitherto known to the performer only (concealed as it was under the cylinder), or at most, suspected by a discriminating public, is by this contrivance made manifest to every individual present, at any concert where Erard's instruments are played, so much so, that he who runs may read.

Now, sir, I do think that the credit of an invention so admirably calculated to further the progress of music should be awarded unhesitatingly where it is so justly due. In fairness to the eminent firm above named, I trust Mr. Editor, that you will give publicity to this communication, the accuracy of which is vouched for by your constant reader, himself

London, May 17th, 1851.

A PIANOFORTE MAKER.

In addition to the above we have this moment received a letter on the subject of the pianoforte controversy from a well-known English composer, which we shall insert next week.

CARLOTTA GRISI AND LODER.

It is not the marriage of the greatest of dancers and one of the most charming of composers that we are going to record. We merely intend to ask a question. A marriage was expected—a marriage between Loder's music and Carlotta's feet; M. St. Georges was to be the priest, and the libretto of a new ballet from his pen the service. We know something of Carlotta's feet, since we see them twinkle every night at Her Majesty's Theatre, like dancing stars that get in your eyes in dreams, and will not quit for any straining. But we know nothing of M. St. Georges' ballet, nor of Loder's music, of which not long ago all the habitués of the Opera, and all the lovers of music and beautiful dancing, were eternally talking, full of expectations. What has become of either we cannot say. But we can say, and we must say,—if Mr. Lumley has abandoned the idea of a new ballet by St. Georges, and Loder, and Carlotta, he has thrown away a chance of raising the ballet, which he has already elevated so high, higher than it was ever raised before. A ballet, with music by Loder! The very sound makes the mouth water. Carlotta moving and dancing, and looking all that is most divine, to Loder's melody, and Loder's harmony, and Loder's orchestration! The very thought of it has haunted us, and haunts, and will haunt us. The vision shall be realised.

BEETHOVEN AND FIDELIO.

As the single opera of Beethoven, the greatest composer for the orchestra whom the art has known, and as the dramatic work which approaches next to the Don Juan of Mozart, surpassing it in unity of purpose, if inferior in prodigality of invention, Fidelio must ever be regarded with interest. The history of this opera, and the vexations it caused the composer are well known. An anecdote exists in reference to its origin which is thoroughly characteristic of Beethoven. The libretto was originally in French, and Paer, a composer of much popularity in his time, set it to music. Beethoven heard it performed in Germany, and was delighted beyond measure with the story. Meeting Paer after the performance, he is stated to have said,—“My dear Paer, I am enchanted with your opera, it is most interesting; I must write music for it!” Whether this anecdote be true or not, the libretto of Paer's Leonore is the libretto of Beethoven's Fidelio; and, while the music of the one is already forgotten, that of the other is accepted by the world as an imperishable masterpiece. Fidelio was composed between the years 1804 and 1805, and first brought out under the name of Leonore, at the Theatre An der Wien, at Vienna, in the autumn of 1805. The libretto, in three acts, was translated into German by Joseph Sonnleithner. The French had just entered Vienna, and the audience was chiefly composed of the military. Such music as that of Fidelio was not likely to be over warmly appreciated even by an audience of French civilians; it was therefore not surprising that the soldiers found it dull, understood nothing about it, and that it was, in consequence, a failure. The part of Leonora was composed for, and first played by a famous singer named Madame Milder, and Herr Roeckl, a tenor and a friend of Beethoven's, was Florestan. Of the other actors no record is at hand, except of Marconi, a contralto; but what she had to do with the cast is not known. The apathy with which Fidelio was received was not entirely attributable to the French military. Beethoven had many enemies, and had offended the singers because he refused to alter any of the vocal parts, with which they found fault on account of their difficulty; and on the other hand, dissatisfied with the libretto, he withdrew the opera in a pet, after the third representation. His shallow biographer, Herr Schindler, complains that he gave "full scope to his genius," and did not pay sufficient attention to the advice he had received from Salieri in constructing his vocal parts. The idea of Beethoven deriving advantage from the counsels of Salieri—composer of Tarare, and the jealous enemy of (Mozart two distinctions equally honourable)—is rather amusing; nevertheless, posterity, we think, has reason to rejoice that Beethoven gave "full scope to his genius," and paid no more regard to Salieri than some years later, if report err not, to Herr Schindler himself. Nevertheless, when peace was restored, Breuning a real friend of Beethoven, compressed and materially altered the libretto, and Leonora was reproduced under the altered title of Fidelio (Beethoven's own suggestion—perhaps with a view to avoid being confounded with Paer), and again played for three nights, with much greater success than before. But the enemies of the great musician were still busy and malevolent, and by their intrigues persuaded the manager to restore the original title of Leonora, in place of Beethoven's own name of Fidelio, and ultimately to withdraw the opera altogether. This ill treatment, combined with the straitened circumstances, which he had counted upon Fidelio for ameliorating, so offended and afflicted the composer, that no possible temptation could ever induce him to write a second opera, or to behave with common civility to singers and managers afterwards,—which was forcibly illustrated many years later when the mass in D minor, and his ninth symphony, with chorus, in the same key, were produced at a concert, in which the celebrated Madame Sontag assisted. Times have now changed, however; the illustrious musician has departed this life nearly a quarter of a century (he died on the 26th of March, 1827, in his 57th year), and his works have long since been the delight of his countrymen, no less than of other nations. His only opera, under his chosen and darling title of Fidelio, which no one would now be so sacrilegious as to impugn, is one of the stock pieces of the stage; it has been performed everywhere and everywhere received with enthusiasm, and will continue to be performed as long as the art of music exists.

Fidelio has frequently been played in England, in the form and under the title of which Beethoven approved. He has revised it considerably, and compressed it into two acts. He wrote no less than four overtures, finding it difficult to satisfy himself and those with whom he had to deal. Three of these were performed by the Philharmonic Society of London, in 1815, but with such small success, that the music of Beethoven was regarded as a dead weight in the market—since which, it is scarcely necessary to add, that society has mainly existed through the attraction of his nine symphonies. The correspondence between the great genius and his professed friends and agents in England says very little for the enthusiasm of the latter, and still less for their discrimination. To have been to Vienna and visited Beethoven, in his house, as one goes to see some strange animal, was a fine thing to talk about; but to spend some time and pains, and perhaps some money, for the purpose of making Beethoven's works known at home, was quite another matter. Such pretended worshippers of genius are too numerous in England, as elsewhere; touch their pockets, entrench upon their time, when the object of their fondly imagined idolatry is absent, and enthusiasm vanishes into smoke. It was not merely from great men, like Goethe and Cherubini, that Beethoven encountered indifference and coldness, but from others, whose only claim to consideration was their personal acquaintance with himself, and who will now be handed down to posterity, in company with Schindler and Ries, as men who knew, but did not understand him. The care with which Beethoven revised his works showed the difficulty with which his taste and judgment were satisfied. The first and last editions of Romeo and Juliet, and other plays of Shakspeare, if collated, would scarcely present so many changes, interpolations, and omissions, as the first and last versions of Fidelio. In England the two act opera alone has been performed. It was originally produced at Her Majesty's Theatre 1832, by the German company, Schroder Devrient as prima donna, with brilliant success (a lucky augury, one might say, for last night); three years afterwards, at Covent Garden Theatre, with Malibran as the heroine (1835—the year before the death of that distinguished artist); again, with a second German company, at the St. James's, Fidelio by Madame Fischer Schwarzbeck; and in 1841, 1842, and 1849, with other German troupes, the miserable fiasco of the last attempt being only compensated by the introduction of Herr Formes to the English public. The story of the libretto is so well known that it is scarcely requisite to allude to it; but a brief sketch may help us in our endeavour to explain the intentions of the composer.

The scene of the entire opera is a fortress near Seville—one of those old castles where a state prisoner might be immured in a dungeon for life, without even the chance of escaping, as Monte Christo escaped from the Chateau d'If. Don Florestan, a Spanish nobleman, is in this unhappy predicament, and the governor of the prison, Don Pizarro, being, for reasons unexplained, his implacable enemy, has spread the report of his death, and meanwhile ordered him to be confined in the lowest cell of the fortress, where, by gradual starvation, Don Pizarro hopes to extinguish the life of his prisoner without resorting to violent means. Don Florestan, however, is happy in the possession of a devoted, attached, and high-spirited wife—Leonora—who, incredulous about the report of his death, disguises herself as a servant, and assuming the name of Fidelio, contrives to get engaged by Rocco, the principal gaoler of the fortress. The docile manners of Fidelio soon render her a favourite, and Marcellina, daughter of Rocco, though pledged to Jacquino, a porter, becomes enamoured of the supposed youth. This, of course, favours the designs of Leonora, and the latter soon persuades Rocco to allow her to accompany him to the dungeons of the prisoners, on the occasions of his periodical visits. Meanwhile news arrives to Don Pizarro, that Don Ferdinand de Zelva, Minister of the Interior, is on his way to inspect the prison, suspicions having been raised that Don Florestan is still living, which determines the minister to inquire into the truth. Surprised in his villany, and fearful of the consequences, Don Pizarro resolves to murder Don Florestan, and discloses his plans to Rocco. Rocco, refusing to undertake the deed himself, agrees nevertheless to prepare the grave within an hour, while Don Pizarro himself is to strike the blow. The conversation is overheard by Leonora, who, suspecting the intended victim may be her husband, prevails upon Rocco to allow her to assist him in the task of preparing the grave. Rocco consents, and Leonora soon knows her husband by his voice, although his emaciated form would almost have defied recognition. The grave is dug, all is ready, and Don Pizarro arrives; but, at the moment when he is about to accomplish the fatal act, Leonora, forgetting her disguise, rushes precipitately between the assassin and his prey, proclaims herself at once the shield of Florestan and his wife. This situation is, perhaps, without exception, the finest in the lyric drama, and the manner in which Beethoven has treated it would alone have made his work immortal. Astonished at discovering so formidable an opponent, in the person of a supposed servant-boy, Don Pizarro is, for an instant, abashed; but, collecting his energies, he is about to sacrifice both man and wife to his fury, when a flourish of distant trumpets (behind the scenes) announces the arrival of the Minister. Don Pizarro is of course discomfited and disgraced, while Fidelio (the "faithful Leonora") is made happy by the pardon and re-possession of her husband. As a heroine, we confess, we prefer Fidelio to Penelope, and there can be but one regret that Shakespeare did not know and dramatize the story, which may be presumed to be much older than is generally stated. The consolation, however, is that had Shakespeare treated it he would have left nothing more to express, and Beethoven must have selected another subject, or, perhaps, would never have written an opera at all, his admiration for the story of Fidelio having alone put such a notion into his head. Mozart would then have been the gainer, and his Don Juan have remained without a rival.

Of the music it is more difficult to speak. To say that an opera is not inferior to Don Juan is to say so much that to prove it becomes a question in which assertion must necessarily take a serious part. No one, however, denies that Beethoven equalled Mozart in his symphonies and quartets, and excelled him in some respects, while remaining behind him in his sacred music; why then, should not Beethoven have equalled Mozart in his dramatic composition? One thing is certain, that never did subject more thoroughly take possession of poet, painter, or musician, than Fidelio of Beethoven. It was the time of his passion for the celebrated "Julia,"—celebrated only because she was loved by Beethoven. It was the period when his rapidly approaching deafness threw the shadow of that despair before him which darkened his after life. He was completely filled with the story of Fidelio, and was never, even when his malady increased the natural irritability of his temperament, more irritable, more absent, more solitary than while engaged in composing the music. He wrote the whole of it at Hetzen-dorf, a "laughing" hamlet in the neighbourhood of Vienna, in the bosom of a thick umbrageous wood, contiguous to the park of Schonbrunn;—"seated," as the lively Schindler relates (whose wretched "life" of the great musician is only valuable on the strength of a number of anecdotes of the same familiar description), "between the stems of an oak, which shot out from the main trunk at the height of about two feet from the ground." In the very same place Beethoven had already composed the Mount of Olives. For many years it was his favourite summer residence. There is an earnestness about the whole opera of Fidelio, which, from first to last, betrays a spirit deeply absorbed in a particular train of thought. We have often dreamed that in Fidelio Beethoven had pictured to himself a Julia, devoted solely to himself, and painted her in the bright hues of his glowing imagination; that Florestan's sickness and imprisonment were but the ideals of his own physical malady, and his own separation from the busy strife of worldly joys and worldly passions; and that, despairing to meet a being so constant and so self-sacrificing, he created one, forgetting that he was mortal, and that the creature of his fancy belonged to another and a more enduring world!

As a mere artistic work Fidelio is incomparable. Every personage sings his own peculiar music; every incident is described with consummate art; every passion is exhibited with an intensity that only music can accomplish, and a truth that belongs to the highest combination of philosophy and poetry. That Fidelio moves the crowd has been a hundred times proved. That it has the entire admiration of artists needs not our assurance. It therefore possesses both the qualities most desirable in art, and here again comes into rivalry with that inconvenient Don Juan, which will not allow us to entitle anything else unrivalled. But how much more simple, pure, and elevating is the subject of Fidelio! It is human, and contains one character that does honour to humanity—which is more than can be said of Don Juan. Fidelio is the heroine of heroines, the lover of lovers, the wife of wives, the woman of women, and Beethoven has described her, has done her justice, has individualized her, has made her immortal—which would seem to establish the paradox that art is higher than virtue, a paradox nevertheless, and only not a paradox when the sincerity of the musician, the certainty that his heart was in his work, and that while writing the music of Fidelio he identified himself with the character, are taken into consideration.

In speaking of the music of Fidelio we may pass over the four overtures, two of which the Leonora in C, and the Fidelio in E, are familiar to every amateur, while the two others were condemned by the composer himself. We merely express our opinion that the former—preferred by Beethoven, though (or, perhaps, because) condemned by Schindler—should always be accorded the place of honour, as not only the grandest piece of music, but by far the best fitted to be the prelude to such a work. The opening scene of the opera begins with a duet in A, for Marcellina and Jacquino, and an air in C minor for Marcellina. The first represents a lively altercation between the lovers, whose happiness is disturbed by the fascinating influence of Fidelio upon the young lady; the latter a vague inspiration of Marcellina about some unknown and impossible felicity. One is playful, the other romantic; both are admirably true. The unpretending commencement of Fidelio often reminds us of Godwin's romance of Caleb Williams, which from so commonplace an announcement, ends with so absorbing a dénouement; not, however, that we would think of comparing the two works in any other respect, or of placing the rude ease of the first chapters of the English novel to the interesting and highly finished music with which the German opera sets out. The quartet in G, for the same couple, with the addition of Leonora and Rocco, where Marcellina congratulates herself on the love of the false Fidelio, poor Jacquino is disconsolate, Rocco has visions of a happy old age, and Leonora looks upon all of them as implements for her purpose, is again unstudied and simple, although the musician's hand is evident in the canon, and in the varied accompaniments that mark each successive appearance of the theme, while the vocal harmony is beautiful. This quartet is one of the pieces wherever the opera is played. Rocco's air, in B flat, an apostrophe to the united charms of love and money (the last first, in Rocco's esteem), is as reckless and full of candour as the words themselves. The episode, in the subdominant key is sparkling and effective. The terzetto in F, for Marcelina, Leonora, and Rocco, is a piece of more elaborate and ambitious texture. The interest of the plot is beginning to unravel itself, and with true dramatic genius, Beethoven makes his music rise with the fortunes of his heroine. But this terzetto, the march in the B flat which follows, announcing the arrival of Pizarro, and the fine air with chorus, in D minor, in which the wicked governor unfolds his hatred and his malignant intentions towards the unhappy Florestan, are too well known in our concert-rooms to need description. At this point both the drama and the music have seemingly reached the highest point of interest; but, with singular art and prodigious inventions, Beethoven makes it go on increasing. The duet in A, in which Pizarro confides his designs about the murder of Florestan to Rocco, as a piece of musical dialogue is equal to anything ever written, while its dramatic interest is absorbing to the last degree. The point in the words "Und er verstummt"—expressed by the three notes, F natural, D, A—has often been cited as a consummate master-stroke, unfolding, with a single touch, the cowardly spirit and black heart of Pizarro. During the whole duet the fear and horror of the gazer are painted with vivid intensity. Many regard this duet as the triumph of Beethoven's genius.

The scena in E, where Leonora ponders on her situation, protests her abiding love for her husband, and resolves to save him, brings out the character of the heroine in a still stronger and more beautiful light. This is equally a well known morceau, and will be at once recognised by its obligato accompaniment for three horns and bassoon, which renders it so difficult of execution both to singer and orchestra. What is there to say about the chorus in B flat, where through the intervention of Leonora, the prisoners are allowed for a short time to issue from their dungeons, breathe the air, and see the light of heaven? What that has not been said a thousand times? What but that, for pathos and expression, it is matchless? The single burst on the chord of D flat, in the first phrase of the subject, is a stroke of genius that must touch every heart sensible to the divinest effects of harmony. It reaches the crowd without the crowd knowing why, and little does it matter to them or to Beethoven what the chord may be called in the technical dictionary of sound. The two solos, for tenor and bass are both exquisitely touching, and the whole chorus is a masterly dramatic picture,—the expression of a momentary joy too sweet to last, half stifled at intervals by sad recollections of the past and sadder apprehensions for the future. This chorus forms the opening of the finale to the first act. The remainder consists of a duet for Leonora and Rocco, which, going through a variety of keys, ultimately conducts to an andante in E flat, remarkable, among other things, for the fine employment of the wind instruments, especially the clarinets, in the orchestra. The action of this duet comprises the narration of Florestan's history to Leonora, and Rocco's ultimate consent to allow her to share his task in digging the grave for the victim of Pizarro's vengeance. The rest of the finale includes a series of fragments, following each other with the utmost consistency of plan, and concluding with a splendid chorus in B flat, the action described being the return of Pizarro, who surprises the prisoners in the enjoyment of their unwonted freedom, rebukes Rocco for disobeying his orders, and commands them back once more to darkness and despair, which gradually dies away as the prisoners retire to their dungeons, when the curtain falls.

The second act commences with an instrumental prelude in F minor, descriptive of the misery of Florestan, which leads to the fine adagio in A flat, when the hapless victim of state revenge, bound by a chain to the walls of his cell, recounts his sufferings and innocence, until a vision seems to appear to his distracted mind, in the shape of his beloved Leonora. Nothing can be more striking than the expression of enthusiasm in the movement which follows the adagio and terminates the air in F, the major of the key of the prelude, by which the whole becomes one connected piece. If any part of Fidelio can be said to surpass all the rest, it is the scene which follows. The action comprises the preparation of Florestan's intended grave by Leonora and Rocco, the appearance of Pizarro, his approach with intent to murder Florestan, Leonora's intervention and subsequent avowal of her sex and relation to the prisoner, the sudden arrival of the Minister of the Interior, the discomfiture of Pizarro, and the joy of the devoted pair, thus restored to each other and happiness. The whole of this is described in four magnificent pieces: a duet for Leonora and Rocco in A minor; a trio in A major for the same, with Florestan; a quartet in D for the same, with Pizarro; and a duet for Leonora and Florestan, in G;—the first, gloomy and oppressive; the second, a stream of flowing melody; third, agitated, stirring, and dramatic; the fourth, unbounded in its passionate expression. The part played by the orchestra in these pieces is tremendous; nothing can surpass it in depth and variety of colouring. The introduction in the quartet, of the distant trumpets, in B flat, on an interrupted cadence, when the furious progress of the music appears to have attained its utmost possible climax, is a master-stroke of genius, for which the art can shew but few parallels. The same effect is introduced in the overture in C, called Leonora, for which reason alone (without taking into consideration that it was the composer's favourite), that instrumental piece should always precede the performance of the opera. We have now nothing left to describe in this rapid survey but the grand choral and concerted finale in C major, which, happily, is too well known to render detailed analysis requisite. The dénouement of the story is arrived at, and Beethoven makes his characters assemble and give utterance to a veritable hymn of gladness and thanksgiving, in which all but the guilty Pizarro take part. Never was the united effect of full chorus and semi-chorus (represented by six of the principals) more superbly employed. As the finale proceeds the voices and instruments seem gradually to accumulate power, and the end is attained with a burst of harmony, solemn, grand, and overpowering,—a triumphant climax to a noble work of art and inspiration.

FORMES.

(From the Athenæum.)

"We have reserved for a last paragraph the welcome progress made by Herr Formes. Many parts of his Bertram were magnificently sung on Thursday; his voice being riper and rounder and his articulation more refined than they were. Some tendency to attitudinize still remains; but this we begin to think may also disappear,—since marked amendment in one point may naturally be accepted as prophecy of improvement in others. It is especially our duty to say this; having been among the few who criticised Herr Formes strictly in the days when he did not sing well."

[We understand that Herr Formes is cast for the bass part in Sappho.]

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

DEBUT OF SOPHIE CRUVELLI.

Our prophecy has come to pass. Our expectations have been verified, our anticipations more than fulfilled. Sophie Cruvelli has been tried in the balance and found equal. She has been tested in the ordeal of the loftiest and severest music and has come forth, not only unscathed but triumphant. We are not going to be critical—we would fain be poetical, had we the gift of the gods. Nor are we in the mood for arithmetic and calculation. We cannot be cooled down to details. What care we for that criticism which deals in "parcels and metaphors?" We feel ourselves elevated above it. We have stood within the temple, and bowed before a new divinity. The influence of genius is upon us. The fncsi uo Cruvelli's voice still rings in our ears. The beauty and grace of Cruvelli's face and form still live in our eyes. Beethoven's Fidelio, in a new and a lovely image, has found a resting place in our heart. Under such impressions can we write as we are wont to write?—can we criticise with calm indifference? It must not be expected.

Another Malibran has descended to us, as it were, from the clouds, and in Malibran's greatest character, has won for herself a name. Three years ago, Sophie Cruvelli, then scarcely nineteen, made her first appearance on the operatic horizon, and was winning her way with rapid strides to the zenith of public estimation, when she found herself suddenly all but extinguished in the radiance of the fiery comet of 1848—Jenny Lind. But Sophie's light was not to be entirely quenched even by this brightness. The spirit within her told her with prophetic tongue to bide her time. Sophie stole away quietly, almost unperceived, from the glare created by the approximation of the fiery comet, and instead of giving way to despair, or resenting the apathy of the public, lifted her proud head erect, and said to herself, "Mine shall be a great revenge! I will shine yet with a lustre equal to that of this all-absorbing planet. My course may not be so erratic, but my light shall at least be as intense, my direction as straight. Art and determination shall guide me on the way, and hope support me through difficulties. This shall be my revenge." Thus spoke Sophie Cruvelli, or rather her good Genius, which would not let her rest until the prophecy was fulfilled, and the vow accomplished. The prophecy has been fulfilled. Sophie Cruvelli has taken her revenge. We were not entirely unprepared for the result of Tuesday night.

For the last twelve seasons, or, it may be, fourteen, we had at various times heard of Cruvelli, and read of her successes on the continent. In Genoa, especially, the accounts that reached us, public and private, were of a kind not to be disregarded. Had we not known the stuff of which Cruvelli was made, the splendid voice she possessed, the energy she exhibited when she appeared in London, all indicating the latent fire of genius, we might have paused before giving credence to the reports of friends, enthusiasts, and journalists. As it was we put some faith in what we heard. More lately, when she appeared in Paris and turned the heads of all the habitués of the Salle Ventadour, when the critics of the press to a man, including Jules Janin, Hector Berlioz, Fiorentino, Theophile Gautier, Adolphe Adam, and others, wrote glowingly about her, although on many occasions we had found reason to differ toto cælo from the fiat of Parisian criticism, we fancied there must be truth in the general proclamation of Cruvelli's greatness. Not entirely grounding our opinions upon report, but wishing to judge for ourselves, we went to hear Cruvelli at rehearsal, and after hearing her entertained no further doubt.

Our readers will not have forgotten the prophecy of last week, nor will they feel uninterested in reading the history of its entire fulfilment now.

Leonora, the mightiest creation of Beethoven, is considered without exception, the most arduous and difficult part in the whole range of the lyric drama. Was it wise, then, in Cruvelli to risk her reputation by making her debut—her real debut—before the most critical and most exacting audience of Europe, in such a character? Did she consider as nothing the fact that she had never played Leonora, never seen it played? Did she weigh well the policy of being first heard in the profound inspirations of the German composer, in preference to making her initiative essay in the brilliant strains of some favourite Italian? Did she ponder well on which would prove most acceptable to the subscribers and public?

Sophie Cruvelli, no doubt, sifted every side of the question and drew her inference accordingly. Genius is bold, or else she would never have had the courage to undertake a character which had proved a stumbling block to every artist since Malibran. Genius is self-dependent, and without genius Cruvelli would never have attempted so arduous a task, and sustained it to the end without a single moment of doubt. Genius is full of faith and hope, and without genius Cruvelli could not have anticipated success in such a labor.

We repeat, we are not going into particulars; to count the stars, and separate the petals of the rose, belongs to astronomers and botanists. We do not feel the critical affatus. To pick out, one by one, the beauties of Cruvelli's Fidelio belongs to the cumini sectores. We are poets, not analysts; but language fails us and inspiration is speechless. The curious in details may learn from another part of this journal the statistics of Cruvelli's first appearance. What to us are a voice of unparalleled beauty and power, intonation never at fault, method style which might serve as models, flexibility, and compass, phrasing, and other qualifications—when we see genius transcending all, when we feel lifted up by enthusiasm, absorbed by passion, permeated by emotion. Can we applaud when the quick beating of the heart chokes us? Can we clap our hands when our eyes are suffused with tears? It is necessary, however, that our readers should have some idea of what Cruvelli is. It may be expressed in a line—she is the successor of MALIBRAN.

We have not written this upon impulse, although impulse suggested it the instant she appeared on the stage. We have considered it well, weighed it well, and come to a rational conclusion. Cruvelli lacks not one of those qualities which rendered Malibran the greatest dramatic singer of her age. Voice, power, art, energy, impulse, abandon, intensity, feeling, are all in the German maiden; face and personal appearance are equally in her favour; ease and grace are visible in every movement. One thing alone we would particularize in Sophie Cruvelli—and here again the comparison with Malibran forces itself upon us. Every thing she does is redolent of youth. The honey fresh voice, the grace of action, the simplicity of gesture, the natural bursts of enthusiasm, each look, each word, possess an almost infantine beauty beyond the power of words to convey. This peculiarity proceeds from genius being paramount to art, and has been pointed out in two artists only, Mademoiselle Mars and Malibran. We have discovered it in two others—Rachel and Cruvelli.

Of Sophie Cruvelli's performance of Leonora in Fidelio, we shall be enabled to render a more specific account next week. At present, we can only trust ourselves to generalities. That Cruvelli has made one of the most decided hits ever remembered at her Majesty's Theatre is certain, and that her name is already enrolled among the greatest singers of all time is equally true. When Sheridan made his famous speech against Warren Hastings, Pitt moved an adjournment of the debate, giving as a reason, that it was impossible for the house to consider the question calmly after the effect produced by the orator. So, in like spirit, we move the adjournment of our critical discussion, since it would be next to impossible to render a dispassionate account of the first performance of Fidelio, after the effect produced on us by SOPHIE CRUVELLI.

D. R.

Thursday night was "long" and "extra." The performances included the second and third acts of Masaniello, the whole of the Barbiere, a selection from the ballet of Esmeralda, and ditto from Les Cosmopolites. The theatre was crowded in every part, and numbers were sent away from the doors who came to seek for places. The two acts of Masaniello went admirably, and Pardini and Massol, both of whom sang splendidly, created the usual furor, and elicited the usual encore. The choruses all went well; and, indeed, we perceived no indication of a falling off in the general performance—a fault too often to be remarked when selections from operas are given, and singers appear to have lost all zeal.

The charming Monti was as irresistible as ever, and never acted with more exquisite grace and finish.

The Barbiere offered some new points that call for special notice. Signor Ferranti, who made so favourable a first appearance in Alary's opera, Le Tre Nozze, was the Figaro, and achieved a decided success. His qualifications for a buffo singer are not to be denied. He has a well toned, flexible, and powerful barytoné voice, and high, too—an indispensable requisite in the music of Figaro—while his humour is hearty and natural. His appearance is also in his favour. His countenance is expressive and his figure good. Altogether Signor Ferranti is perhaps the best Figaro who has been at Her Majesty's Theatre since the days of Tamburini. The "Largo al factotum," rendered with great spirit and animation, was loudly applauded. The prestissimo at the end was given admirably, not a note nor a word being lost. The two duets also—that with the Count, "All' idea di quel metallo," and that with Rosina, "Dunque io son"—were both well acted and sung. Indeed throughout the opera Signor Ferranti proved himself an artist and an actor, and Mr. Lumley has to congratulate himself on the acquisition of a good buffo singer—Lablache is of course beyond the pale of comparison—the want of his company during the last few years.

Signor Casanova played Basilio for the first time at this theatre, and sang the music better than we anticipated. Still he has not weight of voice sufficient for the music, and especially for the "Calunnia," which would have suited Coletti better. Basilio is an important part (as the great Ronconi proved once upon a time), and might have been assigned to Coletti without derogating from the position of that esteemed artist.

Madame Sontag was as delightful as ever in Rosina, and sang the music with an indiscrible charm and prodigious effect. Being written for a mezzo soprano, the music of Rosina is occasionally too low for Madame Sontag, and the necessitated alterations interfere in some respects with the composer's intention; but these are slight drawbacks, except with the sticklers for Rossini—a difficult race to please—and Rosina is certainly one of the accomplished artist's most finished performances. Rode's "Air and variations" excited more enthusiasm than ever, and was encored in a perfect hurricane of applause.

We prefer Signor Calzolari's Almaviva to any part in which he has yet appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre. The great flexibility of his voice, and the pure quality of the upper register, admirably befit him for the music. The opening cavatina, "Ecco ridente," was rendered with sweetness and expression, and the florid passages in the cabaletta mastered with singular ease. The whole of the duet with Figaro, also, displayed to advantage the capabilities of his voice in florid singing. We were infinitely pleased with Signor Calzolari in the trio, "Ah! qual colpo," in the last scene, and indeed in the whole of the opera he entirely satisfied us. If there was anything on which we might animadvert it was perhaps the drunken scene, into which a little more fun might have been infused without weakening the vocal effects. Nevertheless, Signor Calzolari's acting throughout was genial and animated, and his performance frequently and loudly applauded.

Lablache's Bartolo is prodigious. It is one of the masterpieces of comic acting and buffo singing. But why does the great basso omit his air in the first act, one of the finest things in the opera? We shall quarrel with Lablache if he treats Rossini's score with this indifference. He had no excuse on Thursday night, as he was in glorious voice and immense condition.

Take it altogether, the performance of the Barbiere was one of the best we have seen at Her Majesty's Theatre for many years.

Between the acts of the Barbiere, a selection from Esmeralda introduced Carlotta Gisi, who danced the favourite Truandaise with M. Charles to admiration, and was applauded tumultuously. In the selection from Les Cosmopolites, which closed the performances with great brilliancy, the Quadrille Française, supported by the Mesdemoiselles Esper, Aussandon, Julien, Allegrini, Kohlenberg, Soldansky, Rosa, and Lamoureux; the Sicilienne, by Mlle. Amalia Ferraris; and the Mazurka, by Carlotta Gisi and Paul Taglioni, were all received with great favour. We must chide M. Taglioni, however, for having cut out the Anglaise after the first performance of this divertissement. It was not only one of the prettiest and most characteristic pas in the whole, but one of the most decidedly successful, and was danced with the utmost verve, spirit, and cleverness by our clever countrywoman, Mlle. James, who is not to be put aside in favour of others, her inferiors, simply because she is of English birth. Mlle. James is one of the very best of Mr. Lumley's principal coryphées, and the Anglaise should be restored forthwith. Carlotta's dancing in the Mazurka created an unusual sensation. The incomparable danseuse was never more incomparable.

Owing to the excellent regulations, the performances concluded at an unusually early hour for a long Thursday, the delays between the acts being of little or no account.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday Der Freyschutz was given for the first time this season with Tamberlik as Giulio (Max, or Rudolph), the part played last year by Signor Maralti. It was the first appearance of the great tenor in the character. The substitution was an immense improvement, and, although the music is too low in general for Tamberlik, we never heard it so magnificently and effectively sung. The cantabile in the grand scena, "Thro' the forests, thro' the meadows" transposed a note higher), was encored, a compliment rarely, if ever, paid to a singer. The passionate energy infused into it completely carried away the audience. In the fine trio in the second act, Signor Tamberlik also sang admirably, although a more intimate acquaintance with the music would have tended to heighten the effect. After a few repetitions, when Signor Tamberlik will have become more familiar with the score, we have little doubt that Giulio will be one of his finest performances. It is no small merit in this admirable tenor that he has now proved himself fully equal to the three great schools of dramatic music—the Italian, French, and German.

Formes was again the Caspar, and, though labouring under severe indisposition, his acting was as dramatic and impressive as ever. His death-scene was a masterpiece of melo-dramatic effect.

Madame Castellan was the Agatha, as she was last year, and proved herself more efficient than ever in the music. She displayed an unusual amount of energy and feeling in the great scena of the second act, and avoided the interpolations of last year, which made her singing all the more delightful.

Mdlle Bertrandi made her second appearance in Annette, the music of which seems still better suited to her than that of the Page in the Huguenots. She sang neatly and agreeably, and in the legend of the second act, created a most favourable impression. Mdlle Bertrandi is an excellent musician, and has a charming light mezzo-soprano voice. A little more confidence would have made her singing unexceptionable. She has proved a most valuable acquisition to Mr. Gye.

Signor Tagliafico was an efficient substitute for Massol in Chiliano, and Signor Rommi filled out the small part of Kuno with his usual ability.

The overture was superbly played by the band, and encored with immense applause. The laughing chorus might have been improved, and the chorus of spirits behind the scenes in the incarnation was also open to criticism.

Her Majesty and Suite arrived at the end of the first act, and remained until the termination of the opera.

On Tuesday the Lucrezia Borgia was announced, but, as we suppose, in consequence of Signor Salvatori's influenza, was withdrawn, and the Donna del Lago given instead. This performance calls for no particular remarks.

Fidelio was substituted in the bills for the Favorita, which had been announced for Thursday, but, in consequence of Formes' indisposition, this also was withdrawn for the present, and Manassella given in its place. Tagliafico, that most generally, and generously useful barytone, filled Formes' place in Pietro. This performance calls for no particular remark.

Dramatic Intelligence.

FRENCH PLAYS.—ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—The departure of M. Regnier and Mdlle. Judith has produced an entire change in the style of the performance. We have now bid adieu to comedy, and entered upon the domain of broad farce. One of the principal attractions of the French

Plays is, that however successful a piece may be, we never have it more than three or four times, the limited circle who frequent this theatre being a bar to a long "run;" so that the agreeable consequence is, a rapid succession of new actors and new pieces. This keeps up an excitement which is never allowed to flag, from the beginning to the end of the season. After the repetition of "Le Chevalier du Gue," in which M. Lafont played with his accustomed humour and aplomb, a new piece entitled "Romeo et Marielle" was produced, in which M. Levassor made his reappearance for the first time this year before a London public. He was warmly greeted on his appearance, and, before he had uttered a syllable, the laughter of the public proved that, as an established favourite, he need but point his joke, and all would be sure to relish it (de confiance). It is true that no actor on the stage understands a joke better than Levassor. He treats it as a gourmand some favourite dish; dwells on the very part which is safe to ensure the greatest effect, enables you fully to appreciate his meaning, and by the apropos of his acting and pantomime carries you clean off your legs, and convulses you with laughter whether you will or not, not unfrequently in spite of your better judgment. The fact is, that you had better leave your judgment at home; you will be all the better pleased. After all, we delight in a good hearty laugh, and, thanks to M. Levassor, can now enjoy that luxury to our heart's content. The new piece is of Palais Royal manufacture, or rather Montassier, as it is now called. Three men, Messrs. Dumanoir, Sirandis, and Moreau, have clubbed their wits together to write an extravaganza for two actors, of whom M. Levassor is one, and Mdlle. Scriwaneck the other. These two parts make four; each of the actors appears in a double disguise. Romeo is a young lawyer's clerk in love with Marielle, a grisette, who, to avoid the annoyance of being hunted to death by her admirers, has assumed the disguise of her own aunt. But Romeo is not so easily put off his scent. He resolves to try what he can do with the assumed aunt, and disguises himself as an old man—assumes the name of Grenouillet—palms himself off upon the supposed aunt as an old flame, and is thunderstruck at the success of his machinations, and the extraordinary stories which he invents to ferret out some of the old woman's former adventures, which he employs as a lever to induce her to consent to his marriage with her niece. The sudden transitions from old age to youth on both sides—the occasional oblivion of their disguise, gave place to a succession of humorous scenes, which kept the house in excellent humour from beginning to end. Nothing could be more perfect than Levassor's assumption of the old man's part; his make up was admirable, as usual; while his singing was warmly applauded, and most deservedly so. We were also delighted to see Mdlle. Scriwaneck in her own element. Her assumption of the old woman's part was well managed, and sustained throughout with considerable tact. Her acting, as the niece, was also highly pleasing; her singing was also much superior to what is usually heard on the stage of the Vaudeville. The performances concluded with another new piece, entitled Embrassons vous Folleville, which we shall make no attempt to analyse, being thoroughly convinced that we should be unable to convey any idea of the story. All we can do is to advise every one to go and see it, and enjoy a hearty laugh. M. Amant plays the part of an old marquis of hasty temper, with much humour; M. Derval that of a young viscount, of hasty temper, with considerable spirit; Mdlle. Scriwaneck the part of a young lady, also of hasty temper, with charming vivacity; and M. Lacouriere the part of a chevalier, endowed with a more pacific disposition, and a decided lack of humour. One scene, in which the three hasty people set to breaking all the china within reach, was excellent, and kept the house in convulsions.

On Wednesday, three pieces, entirely new to London, were produced, all from the repertoire of the Montansier. The first is a pretty trifle, entitled Une femme qui a une jambe de bois, in which a young gentleman offers to submit to the amputation of a leg, by way of putting himself on the same footing as his mistress, whom he supposes to be minus a leg. The next novelty is by M. Mélesielle, and is called Si jeunesse savait. The Duc de Richelieu, now old, engages in an adventure to secure the hand of a certain marchioness for a blockhead of a nephew. At an interview in the garden the nephew kneels at the feet of his mistress, while the old beau pronounces a declaration of love, and when a rival appears with a drawn sword, disarms him and retreats, leaving his nephew all the honour of the victory. M. Levassor was wonderfully comic as the silly, simpering nephew, and the old duke was ably impersonated by M. Derval. The third piece is called Madame Bertrand et Mademoiselle Raton. It is a farce of the broadest style, and was recently produced in Paris. As may be gathered from the title of the piece, Madame Bertrand makes a cat paw of Madlle. Raton, to effect a certain object she has in view, which is to keep up a correspondence with a lover who dwells in a house opposite, who writes her flaming epistles, and shaves three times a day to have a pretence for seeing her from his window. Madame Bertrand is a bad hand at orthography, and steals a letter from one of her workwomen, Madlle. Raton, which is despatched to her innamorata, who immediately make his appearance. Unfortunately Tetard is the quondam lover of Madlle. Raton. A quarrel ensues—an explanation takes place, the shocking revelation of the lady's inability to spell is made, and the poor mistress is deserted for her more clever assistant. The part of the poet was played to perfection by M. Levassor. His drinking song was heartily and deservedly applauded. Madlle. Scriwaneck also displayed a burst of female vindictiveness, which partook of genuine comedy.

J. de C.

ADDELPHI.—The drama of Green Bushes has been played here during the week to crowded houses. Criticism would be superfluous on a piece so long established in public favour; but those who can love heroism in russet as well as ermine should go and see Madlle. Celeste and Miss Woolgar in Green Bushes. The former lady has more than usual scope for her abilities in Miami, the fair rover of the Indian mountains and forests; nor does the stage at present possess a truer thing of the kind than Miss Wolgar's rustic pathos and humour as the poor Irish peasant-girl. Miss Ellen Chaplin, the fair coadjutor of these twin-stars, is fast rising in popular esteem.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—"The Messiah" was given on Monday evening, the singers being Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Dolby, and the Mesdms. Felton and Henderson, Messrs. Cooper and Phillips. The event of the evening was Miss Catherine Hayes in "I know that my Redeemer liveth," which, in spite of the regulations of the society, very nearly obtained an encore. Miss Dolby was as effective as ever. Miss Felton's singing appears to possess some incipient excellencies, but we cannot speak with confidence of her until she has obtained more of that commodity herself.

Miss Henderson, who looks as fresh as "the early May," sung "Come unto Him" with taste and expression.

Original Correspondence.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—The two or three reasons, communicated in my last, why English opera has failed of success hitherto, are, of course, by no means the only ones which exert a baneful influence; others are well nigh as prominent, and "their name is legion." Your pages are, however, not the area wherein to exhibit them even were space less valuable than it is. Very many of them will suggest themselves to an observing mind, but some few are of a nature which can only be removed by a special legal enactment, such only as may be obtained through the remedy I would propose, namely, A PETITION TO PARLIAMENT, praying for—in the first place—

A CHARTER—not of INCORPORATION, but of LAWS—such as may hereafter be detailed, provided only the "notion" be entertained by the profession generally. This charter should have for its object the establishment of a national opera, based upon a code of laws, specially enacted, whereby the cultivation of the lyric drama should be made subservient to the advancement of ART, and the culture of ARTISTS, affording to all the musicians of this kingdom an equal chance of being heard, if worthy, both as composers and as vocalists. Also, for establishing a legitimate grade for the profession generally, and affording a guarantee against want to all who shall establish a claim through certain terms of service or association.

And, in the second place, a subsidy of £2,000. per annum, for the purpose of guaranteeing the following salaries to the following officers, who shall conjointly act as a committee of management—

General Director.....	£400 per ann.
Musical Director.....	350 "
Stage Manager	300 "
Leader of the Band	250 "
Chorus Master.....	250 "
Treasurer	250 "
Secretary	200 "
	2,000

The appointment of these officers, as also the means of obtaining a grant of land for the erection of a theatre, are subjects for future consideration. Let it suffice, that this difficulty has been well considered, and can be overcome without asking of Parliament more than is likely to be granted. My object in this letter being simply to suggest to my brothers of "the craft" a means of rescuing themselves from unmerited obscurity, and convincing them that the attainment of this means is not so absolutely ridiculous as your correspondent F. G. B. seems to think.

My reasons for believing that Parliament would listen to a well digested scheme are twofold—those which I privately entertain through having partly agitated the question; and those which I publicly could advance through having given the subject a consideration, based, not merely on my hopes, but on the result of enquiry. The following is one, and a sufficiently intelligible one to satisfy most people of the probability of success—namely, all educated persons, and the AUTHORITIES OF THE LAND in particular, know that music is a science which elevates and refines the human mind, that its encouragement as an art is to be commended, and that its partial development within these few years past has been attended by good political consequences. They know that the OPERA is the least reprehensible form the drama has ever assumed. They have some reason to feel aphaned of the want of sympathy with us hitherto; and would so clearly perceive the advantages which might be reaped from the abolition of existing abuses, and the substitution of feasible improvements, (such as the contemplated petition would embody), that even Mr. Joseph Hume would scarcely venture to oppose the grant of so small a sum as would be found adequately necessary for the purpose prayed.

I will now, Sir, conclude my letter, and the subject, by stating the means which it would be desirable to employ for the attainment of this object. Firstly, a petition to be got up—setting forth, as briefly as possible, the nature of its prayer; and, secondly, the said petition should be signed as numerous as possible.

To attain the first, I would, myself, draw up an abstract of the plan which should be submitted to any six competent individuals, who might feel sufficient interest in the matter, to give it their attention. It could, after being well considered, be submitted to legal revision, and afterwards printed in sufficiently brief form to be sent for ONE PENNY by post.

To attain the second—I would crave your assistance, and ask that a copy of the said petition be given to every subscriber to The Musical World, with a request that each individual might append his or her own name, and obtain as many as possible of those of his or her acquaintance. A copy might also be posted to every important town in the United Kingdom for the same purpose. In order to effect this, an expense of some five or six pounds only need be incurred, and I hereby state, that should any of your subscribers take up the matter I will cheerfully contribute my mite, and give whatever time or labor may be required for the completion of the object in view.

I have now, Sir, trespassed long enough on your time and patience. Should my suggestion be taken up by only half a dozen courageous and not-to-be-daunted individuals, success may be looked upon as most probable. Many there are who may smile at its apparent absurdity, but let them think more deeply on the subject, and its ridiculousness will vanish. At all events many do think, with me, that the trial is worth the risk—even of being laughed at—and now is the place for one concluding observation. It is not by the assistance of those "eminent" gentlemen whose names stand forth most prominently in the musical profession that my object is likely to be obtained; not that all amongst them would be so ungenerous as to withhold their signatures; but because it is from those who hope to attain fame, rather than from those who have attained it, that assistance may most naturally be looked for. The petition must, therefore, be numerously signed to be of any value. Any communication addressed to the Editor of The Musical World in answer to this, will be thankfully responded to. Should none be made, the subject must be considered as "negatived," and will, therefore, be no further pursued by,

Sir, your obedient servant,

PHILO-MUSICA.

Miscellaneous.

MISS CATHERINE HAYES' GRAND MORNING CONCERT.—The Hanover-square Rooms were filled to overflowing on Monday morning by an elegant and fashionable company. Miss Catherine Hayes had prepared a programme of unusual excellence, and the executants reckoned among them Ernst, Bottesini (the great contra-bassist—his first appearance for two years), and others of note. Miss Hayes was in splendid voice, and sang with immense effect; in fact, we were never more surprised than at the improvements we found in Miss Hayes. Her voice has gained greatly in power, and there is more decision in her tones. The peculiar sweetness and plaintiveness, so remarkable before, are as conspicuous, and her intonation as faultless, as ever. The cavatina from the Prophète, "Ah, mon fils!" and the "Casta diva," from Norma, in their different styles, were both rendered to perfection. The low notes of Miss Hayes in Meyerbeer's song were exceedingly fine, and created a deep sensation. In the brilliant school of vocalization Miss Catherine Hayes has few rivals; hence her scena from Norma was a great feat. She also sang with great effect a duet from Linda, with Herr Reichart, the tenor, which barely escaped an encore. Miss Catherine Hayes created an unusual impression: her voice and singing were the themes of universal admiration, and her immense improvement was generally allowed. The prodigious enthusiasm Miss Catherine Hayes created in Ireland can no longer be matter of surprise. Herr Reichart will certainly prove a valuable acquisition to the concert-room. We have already spoken of his talent on the occasion of his début at the last Philharmonic concert, and hope we shall frequently hear him in Schubert's "Lieder." A vocalist from Vienna, Mlle. Anna Zerr, we have likewise to congratulate on a most successful début. This lady has a soprano voice of great compass, and of clear and agreeable quality. Her execution of an air from La Clemenza di Tito, as well as some bravura variations written for her by the Leider composer, Heinrich Proch, stamped her as an artist of pretensions. Herr Jules Stockhausen affords, at all times, pleasure by his unaffected manner of rendering the German Leider. On the present occasion he sang Mendelssohn's Lied, "On song's bright pinions," and Schubert's Lied, "I heard a streamlet gushing." Miss Bassano's charming contralto was heard with considerable effect in Handel's, "Lascia ch'io in pianga;" and again, in a quartett by Biletta. Herr Mengis obtained also his share of applause. His voice has gained in softness. Mr. Augustus Braham, a son of the veteran, who made his début in London, created a highly favourable impression in the cavatina, "Tutto sciolto," from Sonnambula, and a Scotch ballad, both beautifully sung. His voice is a pure tenor of power and undeniable sweetness, which a little practice will bring to perfection. Mr. Augustus Braham was loudly applauded. Ernst was as great as ever, and as perfect as ever, enchanting everybody by the inimitable performance of his Otello fantasia, and his popular and never-tiring Carnaval de Venise. Signor Bottesini, whose return from the Havana has been long anticipated, received a hearty greeting on his appearance. Whoever heard him perform on his huge instrument can never forget the wonders of his achievements. Bottesini is the king of contra-bassists. The bass in his hands seems often to assume the character of the violoncello. Signor Bottesini created a perfect storm of applause, and certainly such an extraordinary performance was never heard before. Madme. Parish Alvars' Harp fantasia afforded general gratification. Miss Catherine Hayes had a very efficient orchestra to accompany the vocal pieces, and to perform the overtures to Oberon and Zampa. Some curiosity was created by the announcement of a M.S. overture by M. Silas. Although no work of genius, having been written some five or six years ago, when M. Silas was a mere boy, it gives indication of much talent, and the orchestration is exceedingly clever. Miss Catherine Hayes's concert proved one of the most interesting and attractive of the season. Mr. Lavenu conducted carefully, and Mr. Willis lead the band with his usual ability.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The performances of Elijah of the 2nd and 17th, and likewise the Messiah last evening, have attracted the most numerous audiences of the season. Many hundreds of applicants for tickets were disappointed on each of these occasions.

With the view to prevent the numerous visitors from the country being unable to witness the performances of the Society, the Committee have issued a notice recommending such parties, to apply previously by letter to the Society's Office, remitting a Post Office Order for the requisite Tickets, which will then be forwarded by Post.

THE "DISTIN FAMILY," have returned to town for the season.

MR. RICARDO LINTER (the Pianist,) performed several new morceaux, at Mrs Pinney's Soirée Musicale, on Wednesday evening, Nearly 200 of the nobility and gentry were present.

HECTOR BERLIOZ.—This eminent composer and critic has arrived in London, probably with the object of writing a series of letters on the Great Exhibition in the Journal des Debats. M. Berlioz's attention will be naturally occupied with the department of musical instruments. M. Hector Berlioz has been appointed one of the jury in the appointment of prizes.

M. ADOLPHE SAX.—The famous inventor of the splendid family of wind instruments which bear his name, and which are familiarly styled "Sax-horns," although they are "Sax-everythings," has quitted London, but will return in a few days, to put his instruments in order in the Crystal Palace, where he will be a most extensive exhibitor.

M. HERMANN, the well known violinist, is in London.

HERR OBERTHUR'S EVENING CONCERT.—On Tuesday, the 20th, a crowded and fashionable audience gave a gratifying evidence of the favour that Herr Oberthur enjoys as a composer and executant on his instrument, the harp. The Duchess of Nassau has lately conferred upon him the title of Harpist to Her Royal Highness, an honor in which the success of an opera of his composition, lately performed at the theatre of Frankfort and Wiesbaden, had their due share of influence. Herr Oberthur played the following solos of his own composition:—"La belle Emeline" (impromptu), "La Cascade" (Etude caracteristique), "Soldier's delight" (Morceau caracteristique), "Souvenir de Boulogne" (Nocturne), and a Fantasia on Flotow's Martha, introducing "The last rose of summer," which is not Flotow's. In these pieces, all composed by himself, Herr Oberthur proved himself a master of his instrument, and was greatly applauded. Herr Pauer, the pianist from Vienna, who appeared with such success at the Musical Union, played Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso in masterly style; graceful in the cantabile, and vigorous in bravura passages, Herr Pauer produces a real and decidedly legitimate effect. His standing in the Austrian capital, as a first-rate pianist, has been fully maintained by his performances in London. The young violinist, Alexandre Rancheraye, has made evident progress since we heard him last. His execution of Prume's "Melancholie" and Ernst's Carnaval de Venise, obtained him much and well merited applause from the audience. He uses the bow with the left hand. The other instrumentalist was Herr Menter, from Munich, whose admirable performances on the violoncello we have already had occasion to notice. In a fantasia on Schubert's Serenade ("Cooling Zephyrs"), and Rossini's Tarantella, he produced the greatest effect. The vocal department was filled by Mdlle. Rummell, Herr Menghis, and Mdlle. Bertha Johansen. The two former sang a duet, by Nicolai, very effectively. In Henrion's romance, "La Manola," Mdlle. Rummell displayed great naivete, and in Oberthur's MS. Canzonette, "L'aspettazione," a neat and facile execution; she was applauded as she deserved. Herr Menghis was heard to the best advantage in Oberthur's "See the mariner returning," a song well calculated for his voice and manner of singing. Last, not least, Mdlle. Johansen in a Gondolier song, by Schmezer, and in Kucklen's Volklied, "Friendly is thine air, Rosalie," took the audience quite by surprise, and received a unanimous "encore." Her energy and manner are quite charming, and we see nothing to prevent Mdlle. Johansen from becoming a general favourite with the public. The concert gave general satisfaction.

THE MUSICAL UNION.—The second extra matinée presented an interesting assemblage of aristocracy of birth and talent. The programme included Mendelssohn's quartet in E minor, played to perfection; the scherzo was encored rapturously and each movement of this chef d'œuvre applauded with enthusiasm. The execution, so faultless and equal scarcely demands individual praise. Sivori, Deloffre, Hill, and Piatti, realizing all that the most fastidious critic could desire. Beethoven's Trio in C minor, by Golinelli, an Italian pianist and professor from Bologna, accompanied by Sivori and Piatti, was an able performance. In a solo fantasia, Signor Golinelli did not raise himself in our estimation. The brilliant execution of the first movement of Mayseder's quintet in E flat, by Sivori and Piatti, &c., elicited a roaring accompaniment of bravos from the auditors. Signor Bottesini in a well written solo, excellently accompanied by Herr Eckert, terminated this matinée with the same success that attended his performance on the day previous, at the concert of Miss Catherine Hayes. In phrasing Cantabile, and complicated passages in alt., delivered with all the delicacy and finish of the most refined violoncellist, Signor Bottesini is the most marvellous performer on his instrument we ever heard. The audience was excited to a pitch of enthusiasm by his performance, that fully justified all the encomiums of foreign journalists. The instrumental part of the entertainment was agreeably varied by songs of Schubert and Taubert (of Berlin), sung by Mdlle. Johansen from Denmark, a lady, who, possessing a pure soprano voice, sings with spirit and good taste.

ON THE DICHORD AND OBELISKS OF EGYPT.—There are no memorials of human art and industry, at present existing of equal antiquity with the obelisks that have been brought from Egypt;

two of them in particular are thought to be of the greatest antiquity; these the Emperor Augustus caused to be brought to Rome from Egypt, and they are supposed to be erected at Heliopolis, by Sesostris, near four hundred years before the Trojan War. On the largest of these is represented a musical instrument, with two strings and a long neck to it, and shaped like a guitar; by means of its long neck, though possessing only two strings, it was capable of producing a great number of notes—for instance, if these two strings were tuned fourths to each other, they would furnish that series of sounds called by the ancients Heptachord, which consisted of a conjunct Tetrachord, as B, C, D, E.—E, F, G, A; and if tuned in fifths, an octave, or two disjunct Tetrachords, would be produced; an advantage which none of the Grecian instruments seem to have been possessed of for ages after this column was erected. This instrument is not only a proof that music was cultivated by the Egyptians in the most remote antiquity, but that they had discovered the means of extending their scale, and multiplying the sounds of a few strings, by the most simple and commodious expedients. Proclus tells us, "that the Egyptians recorded all singular events and new inventions upon columns, or stone pillars." Now, if this be true, as the gulgia or great obelisk, is said to have been first erected at Heliopolis, in the time of Sesostris, it will, in some measure, fix the period when this dichord, or two-stringed instrument, was invented. Sir Isaac Newton supposes the elder Bacchus, Osiris, Sesac, and Sesostris, to be one and the same person; the Bishop of Gloucester, on the contrary, denies their identity, especially that of Osiris and Sesostris, whom he makes totally different persons, and to have flourished at very different periods. To Osiris he gives the character of legislator, inventor of arts, and civilizer of a rude and barbarous people; and to Sesostris that of a conqueror, who carried those arts and that civilization into remote countries; and Osiris, whom Sir Isaac Newton places but 956 years before Christ, the Bishop makes cotemporary with Moses, and 700 years higher than Sesac or Sesostris, the cotemporaries of Solomon and Jeroboam. The first opinion is the most probable. There were two Herms; one Trismegistus (i. e. thrice illustrious), already mentioned; the other, as appears from a passage in Cedrenus, was no other than the patriarch Joseph. Admitting the identity of Noah with Osiris, the tradition that music was invented by Hermes or Mercury, may well be accounted for. As already observed, Noah was doubtless versed in all the antediluvian arts and sciences, and would of course communicate a knowledge of them to his family and dependants.—(Tomlinson's Lectures on Ancient Music.)

M. SELIGMANN, the violoncellist, has arrived from Paris.

JENNY LIND FELTED.—At Jenny Lind's concert at Pittsburgh, on the 20th ult., 9000 dollars were received. Some mischievous boys threw stones in at the windows of Jenny Lind's carriage, and afterwards into her dressing room. Her feelings were so deeply wounded by this indecent insult that she refused to sing the next night, and left for Baltimore.

MR. AGUILAR.—This gentleman's concert, which takes place on Wednesday evening next, merits attention from the fact, not only that he has engaged some of our best English and German singers, but that he will have an orchestra (too great a rarity at benefit concerts) composed of the élite of the Philharmonic and Opera bands. Mr. Aguilar purposes introducing a symphony in E minor, besides some descriptive vocal pieces of his own composition. The symphony, we understand, has been frequently performed in Germany with much success.

Madame Fiorentini and Signor Calzolari were the vocalists at the fourth concert of the Philharmonic Society, which took place at their Hall, on Tuesday evening week. Madame Fiorentini possesses rare natural advantages for succeeding in the profession she has chosen, for she is young, handsome, and of a good figure. Her voice is a soprano, of great sweetness, purity, and extensive compass. She sings with taste and truthful intonation, and overcomes difficulties with ease. She was encored in a Spanish song and two duets with Calzolari, scarcely sufficient to enable her to develop her powers. Signor Calzolari is a very tasteful singer: he cannot fail to please. His style is correct. Herr Lidel displayed much talent in a fantasia on the violoncello, and Mrs. Beale was deservedly applauded for her pianoforte performance in Hummel's Septuor. The choir sung a madrigal of Wilbye's, the "Ratapan" chorus from the Huguenots, and Weber's "Lutzow's Wild Hunt." The two first were coldly received, but the latter, which was sung with spirit and precision, met with a well-merited encore.

On Tuesday evening week the Festival Choral Society gave their fifty-first public performance at the Music Hall, before a numerous audience, when Handel's oratorio, Joshua, was performed. The principal vocalists were Mrs. G. Holden, Miss Whitnall, Mr. Ryalls, and Mr. Armstrong. Miss Whitnall made her debut at this society, and gave general satisfaction. The chorus singers deserve honourable mention for their exertions, and were rewarded with encores to the following choruses, viz., "May all the Host," "Hail, mighty Joshua," and "See, the Conquering Hero comes." Mr. John Richardson presided at the organ, Mr. C. Herrman led, and Mr. G. Holden acted as conductor. The oratorio of Isaiah, by Jackson, of Masham, is to be put into immediate rehearsal for the society's next public performance.—Liverpool Mail.

MDLLE. ANICHINI.—In stating that the concert of this charming vocalist was to take place yesterday, we made an error of a week. It is for next Friday, the 30th, that Mdle. Anichini convoked her friends and admirers to Granard Lodge, Roehampton.

MADAME PUZZI.—The annual concert of this accomplished professor of the vocal art, is announced to take place on Monday afternoon, in the great music-room of Her Majesty's Theatre. The attractions are multiple and various, Sontag, Cruvelli, Fiorentini, Duprez, and all the stars of Mr. Lumley's company, Sig. Puzzi himself upon the horn, Sivori upon the fiddle, Piatti on the fiddlecello, &c., &c., &c.—not to speak of an Inno delle Nazioni, composed by Balfe, to be sung by nine prime donne, each of whom is to represent the country in which she was not born. Balfe has stolen this idea from our triple cast of Don Giovanni.

Advertisements.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The Work's Performances will include the talents of

Mesdames SONTAG, CAROLINE DUPREZ, FIORENTINI, GIULIANI, IDA BERTRAND, and SOPHIE CRUVELLI;

Madlle. MONTI;
Signori GARDONI, CALZOLARI, PARDINI, and SIMS REEVES;
Signori LABLACHE, MASSOL, CAZANOVA, SCAPINI, LORENZO, FERRANTI, and COLETTI;

Miles. CARLOTTA GRISI, AMALIA FERRARI, AUSAISON, PASCALES, Mles. Ross, Erper, Julien, Lamoureux, Allegrini, Kolenberg, Aussandon, Pascals, Dantoine, Soto;

M. Charles, Ehrick, Gosselin, and Paul Tagliani.

Tuesday, May 27—IL BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA, and LES METAMORPHOSES.
Wednesday, May 28—FIDELIO, Two Acts of MASANIELLO, and LES COSMOPOLITES.

Thursday, May 29—IL DON GIOVANNI, and L'ILE DES AMOURS.
Friday, May 30—LA FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO; DIVERTISSEMENT; Scene from I DUE FOSCARI; Selection from L'ELISIR D'AMORE; and a favourite BALLET.

M. THALBERG.

A GRAND MORNING CONCERT will be given at the GREAT CONCERT ROOM, at Her MAJESTY'S THEATRE, on MONDAY MORNING, JULY 16th, at which this eminent Pianist will perform.

MR. W. H. HOLMES'S NEW OPERA.

HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS, WEDNESDAY MORNING, NEXT, MAY, 28, at 2. Performers—Mrs. Sims Reeves, Misses Dolby, Messent, Ransford, Eyles, Land; Messrs. Land and Frank Bodda. Full Orchestra and Chorus. Conductor, Mr. Lucas. Solo, Mr. J. Balser Chatterton (Harpist to the Queen). Overture, Macfarren. Tickets, 7s.; Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d. To be had of W. H. Holmer, 36, Beaumont-street, Marylebone, and at all Music Warehouses.

MISS CATHERINE HAYES

AND

MDLLE. JENNY LIND.

THE ONLY English Ballads sung by the above distinguished vocalists are, "Take this lute," by Benedetto; "Oh, summer morn" by Meyerbeer; and the "Lonely Rose," by Balfe, sung by Mdle. Lind; "Those happy days are gone," by Lavani; "Why do I weep for thee," by Wallace; "O sing to me," by Osborne; and "My last thoughts of thee," by Maynard, sung by Miss Hayes.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

MUSICAL UNION.

FOURTH MATINEE, TUESDAY, MAY 27, Willis's Rooms. Quartet, Onslow; Pianoforte Quartet, No. 2 Mendelssohn; Quartet No. 7, in F, Beethoven; Fantasia, Violoncello, Solo. Executants—Sainton, Delbore, Hill, Herr Menter, violoncellist (from the Court of Munich), and Herr Pauer, pianist, (from Vienna). Strangers' tickets to be had at Cramer and Co.'s, Regent-street, 10s. 6d. No artist admitted without a ticket, owing to the increased number of members. J. ELLA, Director.

BEETHOVEN QUARTETT SOCIETY.

SIGNOR CAMILLO SIVORI and MR. SAINTON, will play conjointly with Messrs. Hill and Rousselot at the fifth evening performance on Wednesday, May 28th, to commence at a quarter past eight o'clock, at No. 27, Queen Anne-street. Quartet—Beethoven, first period, No. 5 in D, No. 4 in C minor, third period, No. 7. Grand Quintet in C, No. 2. Beethoven. Tickets at Messrs. Rousselot & Co., 66, Conduit-st., Regent-st.

DISTIN'S CONCERTS.

MR. DISTIN and his SONS perform on the Sax Horns this Evening, Saturday, May 24th, at Liverpool. Vocalist—Miss Moriatt O'Connor. Pianist—Mr. R. A. Brown. Messrs. Distin return to London on Monday, the 26th. All letters to be addressed to H. Distin, Sax Horn Manufactory, 31, Cranbourne-street, Leicester-square.

MR. L. VERDAVINNE

RESPECTFULLY informs his friends and the public that in consequence of M. de Bernier retiring, the THIRD and LAST CONCERT of Modern Music will take place under his sole management, at the BEETHOVEN ROOMS, 27, Queen Anne-street, JUNE 6th. Tickets, Half-a-Guinea, may be had of Mons. Verdavainne, 57, George-street, Portman-square.

NEW MUSIC.

THE WORLD IS A FAIRY KING, Ballad written by Eliza Cook, comp. and by Joseph Philip Knight; composer of Beautiful Venice, Gather ye Rosebuds, Ocean Dreams, Song of Early Days, Come away, Catinna, The Happy day, The Old and New Year, Her check was Pale. London: Z. T. Purday, 45, High Holborn.

MESSRS. COCKS'S

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

NEW MUSIC BY BRINLEY RICHARDS for the Piano:—The Angel's Song. s.; The Vision. 2s.; The Sturm March; Galop, Poor Mary Anne, The Ash Goose, the Rising of the Lark, each 3s.

THE GREAT GLOBE QUADRILLES, by STEPHEN GLOVER, Piano, 2s.; Duets, 4s. Also, by the same distinguished author, Mamma's Quadrille, Papa's ditto, Solos, each 3s.; Duets, each 4s.; Mamma's Galop, 2s.; Papa's P. lka, 2s.; Osborne Quadrille, 2s.; Duets, 4s.; the Six Palace Band Marches, each 2s.; Royal Hyde Park March, 2s.; Home March, 2s.; Alpine March, 2s. 6d.; Prince Arthur's March, 2s.; and Fantasia on Airs of all Nations, 4s.

HAMILTON'S MODERN INSTRUCTIONS for the PIANO-FORTE, large music folio.—"An educational work, which has now reached its 22nd edition, requires no other praise than the simple record of the fact. This is the case with the above, containing a manual of instructions so simple, that they may be easily understood by the youngest learner; and, besides exercises on the scales, &c., a collection of 61 preludes and favourite airs, 68 exercises, 12 chants, and 4 favourite vocal songs, with pianoforte accompaniments; easy and pleasing airs, arranged with great care, and fingered by so eminent a professor as Mr. Czerny. Its extremely low price—only 4s.—is also an important recommendation.—Vide Weekly Chronicle.

London: R. Cocks & Co., New Burlington-street, Publishers to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

THALBERG	Irish Airs.
SCHULZ	Melodie.
FRAEGER	Liebes Verlangen.
FRAEGER	Moment Joyeux.
RICHARDS	Moonlight Serenade.
RICHARDS	Pastorale.
RICHARDS	Danish Air.
ROEHEL	Clotilde.
BRESSEN	L'Arabesque.
KUHE	Styriennes.
OURY	Les Pleurs du Printemps.
OURY	Un Souvenir.
MORI	Romanes sans Paroles.
MORI	Pensees Pendant l'Absence.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATION.

MOZART'S COMIC TRIO (the Ribbon) for Soprano, Tenor, and Bass, as sung at the Beethoven Quartet Society, with the greatest success (see Times note of these Concerts on the 10th inst.). Rousselet's Miscellaneous Star and J. Hertz's Redowa Brillante, at Messrs. Rousselot & Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

- PIANO SOLOS.
Bayer, Ferd. Op. 101bis, One hundred Melodies for Beginners, in 4 books.
 " 109, No. 1 to 12, Soirées Musicales, 12 Morceaux gracieux, in 12 books.
 " 111, No. 1 to 6, Six Morceaux élégants, in 6 books.
Cramer, H. 38, Schwäbische Volksmelodie. Fantasie.
Eser, H. 36, Makó Csárdás. Hungarian Dance.
F. T. P. Four Hungarian Marches to Battle. Hungarian Dance.
Müller, T. Les trois Soeurs. Trois Valses.
Loewenherz, A. Op. 30, No. 4. 2d Impromptu.
Prudent, E. 30, No. 5. Chanson Sicilienne.
Slomp, L. Rhein und Main, No. 8 and 9. Two Polkas
- PIANO DUET, TWO PERFORMERS.
Bayer, Ferd. Morceau élégant sur des airs Allemands favoris.
 No. 2, Dem Alpenhorn, by Proch.
 To be continued.

VIOLIN WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR THE PIANO OR ORCHESTRA.
De Bériot, Ch. Op. 78, 1me Concerto.
Leonard, H. 14, 2d do.

FLUTE SOLOS.
Kupfer, Joe. One hundred favorite Melodies, in 4 books.
 Schott and Co., 59, St. James's Street.

LEE & COXHEAD'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

A NEW PIANOFORTE SCHOOL, by ALBERT KELLER, price 4s.
 "We can confidently recommend this Pianoforte Tutor as the best extant: Mr. Keller has adopted the judicious method of arranging the scales and exercises amongst the lessons, by which plan the pupil is taught those essentials without turning to a formal book of scales, &c.,—the fingering is carefully marked without being crowded, and is evidently written by one who has had great experience as a teacher."
 Also, "Deuxes de la Jeunesse," in 12 sets, price 2s. each, written expressly to follow the above Tutor, by C. W. Glover.

London: Lee and Coxhead, 48, Albermarle Street, and all Book and Music Sellers. Catalogues gratis.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate Designs by Brandard, arranged by ALBERT KELLER; the six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.
 The PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s.
 N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by EDWIN FLOOD. Price 2s.

MUSIC for the ORGAN or HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS.
THE AMATEUR INTERLUDE—a collection of short interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.
THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS.

MUSIC for the FLUTE.

THE AMATEUR FLUTIST—a selection of favorite Airs from the Standard Foreign Operas, arranged in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY NICHOLSON, with an Accompaniment ad lib. for the Violin, Violoncello, and Pianoforte.
THE FLUTIST'S ALBUM—a collection of favorite Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, &c., arranged in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY NICHOLSON, with an Accompaniment ad lib. for the Piano, Violin, and Violoncello.

MUSIC for the VIOLIN.

THE AMATEUR VIOLINIST—A selection of favorite Airs from the Standard Foreign Operas, arranged expressly for the first position of the Violin, in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY FARMER, with an accompaniment ad lib. for the Piano, second Violin, and Violoncello.
THE VIOLINIST'S ALBUM—a collection of favorite Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, &c., arranged expressly for the first position of the Violin, in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY FARMER, with an Accompaniment ad lib. for the Piano, second Violin, and Violoncello.
 N.B.—A New Edition of "Farmer's Violin School." 5s.

CHAULIEU'S PIANOFORTE WORKS.

MESSRS. RÜST and STAHL, being the Sole Proprietors of the Posthumous Works of M. Chaulieu, beg to intimate their intention of publishing them as originally intended by the author—viz., in parts at 5s. each, and which will include the Harmonical Dial, twenty-four sonatas in the twenty-four major and minor keys; having before each one exercise, one prelude, and two improvisations in the same key, specially written for the English schools, six parts of which are already published. And also six other parts, comprising two Books of Studies in the modern style, Morceaux de Salon, Album de Bal, &c., 5s. each, or the twelve parts in one volume, boards, at 25s.
 Rust and Stahl, Pianoforte Manufacturers and Music Publishers, 320, Regent-street, opposite the Royal Polytechnic Institution.

CARTÉ'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published.

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carté's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTÉ.
 Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 210 Regent-street; Keith and Prowse, 48, Cheapside; and Cocks & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

MR. CRIVELLI

BEGS to acquaint his friends and the public that a Third Edition of the "ART OF SINGING," enlarged and newly arranged in the form of a Grammatical System of Rules for the Cultivation of the Voice, may be had at his residence, 71, Upper Norton-street, and at all the principal Music-sellers.
 * Soon will be ready, the French and German Translation.

NEW QUARTETT, NO. 1,

FOR two Violins, Viola and Violoncello. Performed for the first time at the Chamber Concerts, Crosby Hall. Composed and dedicated to his friend, J. H. B. Dando, by ALFRED MELLON. Published by W. Blagrove, 71, Mortimer-street, Cavendish-square, Price 10s.

FIDELIO.

WESSEL and CO.'S complete Edition (with English words) of this celebrated Opera, now performing at Her Majesty's Theatre and the Royal Italian Opera, may be procured by order at all the Music Libraries.
 The Grand Scena, "O monster,"—Sung by Madlle. Cruvelli, ... 3s. 6d.
 The Prison Air, "Oh! what dreary Gloom!"—Sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, ... 3s. 6d.
 The Grand Duet, "No greater Bliss"—Sung by Madlle. Cruvelli and Mr. Sims Reeves ... 3s. 6d.
 The Grand Trio, "Take heart, my son," ... 4s. 6d.
 The Chorus of Prisoners, "Oh! what delight," ... 4s. 6d.
 The Overture to Fidelio, for piano solo ... 2s. 6d.
 The Overture to Fidelio, piano duet, ... 3s. 6d.
 Wessel and Co., 329, Regent-street.

TO SINGERS.

WANTED, for the Parish Church of Liverpool, an efficient Bass Singer. Salary, £30. Applications, stating age and qualifications, may be addressed to C. Danvers Hackett, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Fairfield, Liverpool.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGES

FOR Improving the Voice, and removing all Affections of the Throat. Strongly recommended to Clergymen, Singers, Actors, Public Speakers, persons subject to relaxed Throats, and to all persons desirous of cultivating their Voices, and ensuring a good and clear articulation. They have also been found highly beneficial to those afflicted with Nervous, Hysterical, or Stomachic Coughs.
 To be had in Boxes, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 6d., and 4s. 6d. each, of every Medicine Vendor in the kingdom.

Testimonials of their efficacy are published with each Box, from Mad. Grisi Miss Romer Mr. Harrison Mr. J. Barnett
 Mad. Persiani Mad. Albertazzi Mr. Allen Mr. George Linley
 Mad. Eugénie Garcia Miss Cooper Mr. White Mr. Rodwell
 Mrs. Alfred Shaw Sig. Lablache Mr. Wass Mr. Nelson
 Miss Rainforth Sig. Giubillei Mr. Kroff &c., &c.

HEALTH WHERE IT IS SOUGHT!

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Cure of a disordered Liver and Stomach, when in a most hopeless state.—Extract of a letter from Mr. Matthew Harvey, of Chapel Hall, Airdrie, Scotland, dated the 16th of January, 1850.—To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your valuable Pills have been the means, with God's blessing, of restoring me to perfect health, at a time when I thought I was on the brink of the grave. I had consulted several eminent Doctors, who, after doing what they could for me, considered my case hopeless. I had been suffering from a Liver and Stomach complaint of long standing, which during the last two years got so much worse, that every one considered my condition as hopeless. As a last resource, got a Box of your Pills, which soon gave relief, and by persevering in their use for some weeks, together with rubbing night and morning your Ointment over my chest and stomach, and right side, I have by their means alone got completely cured, and to the astonishment of myself and everybody who knows me.

(Signed) MATTHEW HARVEY.
 These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—
 Ague Constipation of the Bowels Fevers of all kinds Liver complaints Tumours
 Asthma the Bowels kinds Lumbago Ulcers
 Bilious Com- Consumption Fits Rheumatism Worms of all kinds
 Blotches on the Dropsy Head-ache Scrofula or King's Weakness, from whatever cause Skin Indigestion Evil Sore Throats &c., &c.
 Bowel complaints Erysipelas Inflammation Tye-Douloureux
 Colic Jaundice
 Sold at the Establishment of Professor HOLLOWAY, 244, Strand, (near Temple-bar, London, and most all respectable Druggists, and Dealers in Medicines throughout the civilised World, at the following prices—1s. 1½d., 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 36s. each Box. There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.
 N.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients in every Disorder are affixed to each Box.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Messrs. Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden.

No. 22.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, MAY 31, 1851.

PRICE FOURPENCE.

FIDELIO.

A critical analysis of Fidelio is being written by Mr. G. A. Macdoreen, and will be inserted next week, or the week following.

JULES JANIN.

JULES JANIN has quitted London, after much too brief a sojourn with his friends in England. He has, as we anticipated, been feted and coveted everywhere. He has written feuilletons about the Great Exhibition, which all the world has read, and which all the world has pronounced masterpieces of eloquence. He came welcomed and he has gone regretted.

Jules Janin looked at the Crystal Palace in a philosophical point of view. On the day of his arrival he walked round the building, and then went home and wrote his first feuilleton. It was about his voyage from Paris to London, via Calais and Dover. And what a voyage it was! Through the magnifying glasses of his poetical vision he saw and recounted things that no traveller ever saw and recounted before. The journey from the French to the English capital, via the French and the English ports, became a thing unknown to Murray. Bradshaw might be consulted in vain for the particulars. Jules Janin, the brilliant Frenchman, alone knew them, alone saw them. Reading his feuilleton made us sigh for a Janin's Hand-Book for Travellers, instead of a Murray's. As a great painter, Janin saw objects in nature invisible to Murray. And what he saw he tells his readers, with a bonhomie that is delightful.

The second feuilleton was about the Crystal Palace, which, as we said, Jules Janin looked at in a philosophical point of view. He was present at the Inauguration by her Majesty the Queen Victoria of England, and there he witnessed a great fact, solemnized by a great people, with great decorum. Jules Janin was, above all, delighted with the order in which everything was conducted. Here were no "reds;" here was a loyal nation, a Queen beloved, and a Prince admired. Janin thought of France, and sighed for four years back. The Crystal Palace led him into a train of reflections which had nothing to do with the Crystal Palace. But we thanked the Crystal Palace for having set Janin to think, and thinking he wrote, upon a theme which none can handle like himself—none with the same sincerity, the same devotion, the same sentiment.

The third feuilleton discoursed of sundry matters beside the Exhibition of All Nations, which, nevertheless, came in for its share in a column. The jumbling together of art and mechanics offended the great critic, who rated the classification in unmeasured terms. We cannot blame him. On the contrary, we agree with him. His fine eye perceived defects which had escaped the miopie of English journalism; and he castigated with a sharp stylus what he considered an offence against taste. Jules Janin admired Hampton Court, and knew all about its history, without consulting anybody. He had read his own library in the Luxembourg, and remembered it by date. When he arrived at Hampton Court all the objects were familiar to him—the palace, the pictures, and the park. He recognised them as old familiar friends, and wrote a panegyric on them à propos of the Great Exhibition of All Nations.

A month's stay in London was not much for a first visit. But it was enough for Jules Janin, who will be replete with London for the next fifty-two feuilletons. Out of a few facts he can construct a splendid essay, an essay glowing with the burning coals of enthusiasm, and sparkling with the upward sparks of wit. There never was before such a writer in his way, and there never can be another. He stands alone, sui generis. Thackeray, who is all of one colour—a deep green—is nothing to him. Janin is many-coloured, like the rainbow; his colours appear, and are not like the cameleon's; he tricks the judgment, as shotted silk the eye. His feuilletons resemble the aurora borealis, which begins in a speck of light, grows into a blaze, illuminating the sky, and gradually fades into a cloud. The speck is his theme, the blaze his development, the cloud his moral. He is the most charming of feuilletonists, and a keen hand at dominoes. May he live for ever!

Jules Janin left London on Thursday morning, at seven o'clock. The sooner he leaves Paris to come back again the better.

CRUVELLI.

The second and third appearances of Mr. Lumley's new prima donna have more than confirmed all that was advanced on the occasion of her debut. The "great press" continue to be unanimous in their panegyrics, to which the confidence derived from the experience of further performances has added warmth and enthusiasm. The Morning Chronicle declares its impressions in the following brief and emphatic manner:—

"Mlle. Cruvelli played with all that romantic grace and picturesque tenderness which distinguishes her embodiment of the Character of Fidelio. Her finely intellectual and contemplative features light up under the inspiration of Beethoven's music into an expression which the spectator will not easily forget. The poses and attitudes were models of graceful picturesqueness—none the worse, considering the subject, for being a little Germanesque withal; and her singing was full of fire, energy, and expression—the difficulties of the music melting into air before the attack of her immensely extended register and brilliant and well trained flexibility of execution."

The Morning Herald, always careful and seldom wrong in its conclusions, branches out into a long and elaborate critique, embracing most of the prominent features of Cruvelli's performance, and showing a subtle appreciation of them all, and more than ordinary discrimination in their classification:—

"That Cruvelli is destined to become a favourite of character and importance there can be no doubt. Her Leonora is remarkable for excellence of no ordinary kind; and excellence in such a part betokens an intelligence and ability commanding both respect and admiration. We have little to add to the eulogy which we bestowed on the former occasion of her personation of the heroic woman who perils her life to save that of her husband. The prison scene, in which the great incident takes place, is one of the most exciting, as it is one of the most touching climaxes in the whole range of the lyrical drama, and Cruvelli embodies it with a force and intensity to which words are scarcely sufficient to do justice. The best proof of its merit is in the impression which it makes upon the spectator. The moment in which the heroine, who is listening with racking anxiety to the ominous words of the cruel and revengeful Pizarro, perceives the meditated consummation of his wickedness, and with a voice choked with agony and passion declares her right to brave authority itself, is of the most terrible and absorbing interest; and while the librettist has wrought up a situation, in itself of the extreme pathos, to a point beyond which dramatic intensity could not go, the musician has clothed it with language quite equal to the necessity, not merely mechanically descriptive, but imbued to the uttermost note with the divine and glowing fire of inspiration. Cruvelli communicates to this great scene all the force and elevation of which it is susceptible, and her sudden cry as she throws herself into the arms of her husband, and with dilated frame, as if inspired with superhuman strength, shields him from danger, is thrillingly, painfully effective. This is the rivetting point of the opera, and it is here that Cruvelli makes her chief display; but her acting in the earlier scenes as the humble servitor of Rocco, is fraught with distinct and characteristic touches. Her rapid and searching scrutiny of the prisoners as they steal feebly into the courtyard and offer up poems to Heaven for the momentary blessing of air and light; her look of bitterness and disappointment when she sees not the face she yearns for; her eager solicitude to accompany the gaoler into the vaults; and her fear and trembling when she digs the grave, are delineated throughout with the most natural and affecting expression, to the delicate and feminine truth of which no one can be insensible. The vocalism of Cruvelli on Saturday night was as upon the former occasion, remarkable for its breadth and dignity of style. Her delivery of the impassioned invocation to Hope was a noble instance of execution in its large and poetical sense; and few that we have heard attempt this fine aria have avoided exaggeration and other undue expenditures of effort so well as this young lady, whose judgment evidently is in no wise inferior to her art. Her personation of this most interesting of operatic heroines is altogether as charming as it is effective; and, writing now under the influence of more deliberate convictions, we see no reason to retract a syllable of the panegyric which we ventured to express in our notice of her first performance of Tuesday last."

The Morning Post writes in a still more glowing style, and is fairly carried away into the regions of high metaphor—lifted off its feet by the poetical afflatus, which defies weight, and scorns the ground.

"The aura popularis seems now to have fairly set in for Madlle. Sofie Cruvelli. Her performance of Fidelio, on Saturday evening, was again instinct with lofty tragic genius, and profound musical feeling. Every phase in the character of the devoted wife, her intense emotions, ever fluctuating betwixt hope and fear, until the wished for goal is reached, her every thought, nay, the most delicate shades of thought reflected from passing events, during the terrible struggle to save her husband's life, were faithfully and vividly portrayed. With Madlle. Cruvelli, Fidelio is governed throughout by one purpose, to which everything is rendered subservient. Determination to discover and liberate her husband is the mainspring not only of all her actions, and the theme of all her soliloquies, but even when others likely to influence her design in any way are acting or speaking, we read in the anxious gaze, the breathless anxiety, the head bent to catch the slightest word, a continuation of the same train of thought, and an ever living ardour in the pursuit of the one cherished object. In such positions as these, where our gifted artist follows nature, with so delicate an appreciation of its most subtle truths, it is not easy for a character occupying the back-ground of the stage picture to maintain (although by gesture only) a constant commentary upon the words of others without becoming obtrusive, and attracting an undue share of attention. Yet Cruvelli does this throughout the first scene, especially during the duet betwixt Rocco and Pizarro, in which Fidelio overhears the plan to assassinate her husband, with a perfection akin to that realised by Rachel in the last scene of Ees Horaces, where Camille listens to the recital of her brother's victory over her lover; and the result, like that of the chorus in a Greek drama, is to heighten rather than lessen the effect. These may be considered minor points, but, as necessary parts of a great conception, they are as important, and afford as much evidence of the master mind, as the artiste's delivery of the grandest speeches or scenas. The marvellous canon quartet, "Il core e la mia fe," which follows the first entrance of Fidelio, was again enthusiastically encored; and the same compliment was extended to the divine scena, "O tu la cui dolce possanza," sung by Cruvelli with exquisite sweetness and soul-stirring energy. The great scene in the second act was again a triumph of the highest order. From the shuddering expression given to the words "How cold it is in this subterranean vault," spoken on entering Florestan's dungeon, to the joyous and energetic duet, in which the re-united pair give vent to their rapturous feelings, all was inimitable. Each transition of feeling was faithfully conveyed, and the suspicion, growing by degrees into certainty, that the wretched prisoner is Florestan, was depicted with heart-searching truth. The internal struggle was perfectly expressed. The heroic Fidelio was evidently tortured by the terrible conflicts of hope and fear raging within her bosom, but the dread of committing herself, and sacrificing her beloved was seen to subdue and hold in check her womanly impulses. She continued to dig with apparent calmness; but ever and anon whilst throwing up spadefuls of earth from the future grave of the unhappy victim, her furtive glances towards the spot where he was chained, the sickening horror of her gestures, as each fresh lump of earth fell with a dull, heavy, death-announcing sound upon the prison floor, told sufficiently to the audience the heart-crushing sufferings of Fidelio. The crescendo of feeling up to the grand climax where, the truth suddenly rushing upon her, she gasps the words "Oh God! It is he!" and falls senseless, was graduated with consummate skill. Equally sublime was her utterance of the words, "Tyrant! I will protect him!" when, like a heaven-sent spirit of retribution Fidelio rushes between her husband and his murderous assailant; and the subsequent line, "An avenging God has guided me here—I am his wife!" At this thrilling point the excitement of the audience found full vent, and tumultuous applause greeted the fair artist—applause which was shortly after to be renewed with still greater force at the supreme moment when Pizarro, hastening with desperation to accomplish his bloody purpose, is held in check by a pistol steadily levelled at him by Fidelio, who thus effectually preserves her husband's life. Here, both as actress and singer, Madlle. Cruvelli appeared to the utmost advantage; and her animated execution of the succeeding duet, in which she was ably seconded by Mr. Reeves, brought the second act to a grand conclusion. Madlle. Cruvelli was again immensely applauded throughout the evening, and called on to receive the congratulations of the audience at the end of each act."

The Times, more sedate, but not less anxious to do justice to the rare beauties of Cruvelli's impersonation of Leonora, has so intermingled its criticism of the prima donna with its view of the tendency and merits of the general performance, that we are compelled to make a more lengthy extract from the article than could appropriately find a place in the present resumé. We have therefore transferred it to another page. Meanwhile we affix an extract from the brief notice which appeared in the same journal, on the third performance of Fidelio.

The pièce de résistance, the grand attraction of the evening, in short, was Beethoven's opera of Fidelio, in which Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli made her third appearance. The performance of the new prima donna last night set all doubts at rest about the position she is entitled to occupy. It was an unquestionable exhibition of genius from first to last. In the recitative and air, "A qual furor ti conduma," her singing was inimitable. The adagio (the address to Hope) was delivered with a fervour to which the energetic action and the wonderfully expressive countenance of Mademoiselle Cruvelli gave double intensity. It was the religious exultation of a saint. Rachel's utterance of the sublime "Je crois," in Polyeucte, was not more striking and impressive. The allegro, overwhelming in its force and animation, stirred up the whole audience to enthusiasm, and this fine display of vocal and dramatic power was rewarded by a storm of plaudits which showed how entirely it was felt and appreciated. Without going into further particulars, we may add, that in the rest of the opera Mademoiselle Cruvelli reached the same high standard. After the experience of three several performances, to which we have paid the most unremitting and severe attention, we rise thoroughly assured that Beethoven's Leonora has never been more entirely understood, or more perfectly embodied, than by Mademoiselle Cruvelli: we except neither Schröder Devrient nor Malibran. With this conviction we entertain no apprehension whatever for the result of her next attempt, which we understand is to be Norma. She who can realize the aspirations of Beethoven has nothing to fear from the more graceful and familiar, but far less lofty and ideal sentiment of Bellini. The opera was still better played and still better liked by the public than before. Mademoiselle Cruvelli and her associates had to come before the curtain after every act, and Beethoven's Fidelio may now be regarded as a permanent fixture in the repertoire of the Italian Opera."

We have not room for the articles of the Morning Advertiser and Athenæum, and must therefore leave them to the imagination of the reader.

CRUVELLI AND FIDELIO.

(From the Times.)

The second performance of Fidelio, on Saturday night, confirmed the success of the opera, and of Mlle. Sophie Cruvelli, the new representative of the character of Leonora. A house crammed to the ceiling attested the attraction of Beethoven's chef d'œuvre, and the impression produced on the first night by the new prima donna, while the strict attention paid by the audience from first to last—a compliment alike to composer and performer—was an undeniable proof that such music and such singing can never fail to find appreciators in an age like the present, when the art is so generally cultivated, and in a metropolis such as London, which, by its numerous institutions for the encouragement and execution of the best kind of music, has lately begun to take the lead among the cities of Europe. If, a few years ago, any one had proposed Beethoven's Fidelio for representation at Her Majesty's Theatre, he would have been set down as an enthusiast or a madman; the attempt having been made, however, and the result brilliantly successful, is a guarantee of the vast strides that music has been making in the right direction. Much of this may be traced to Mendelssohn and the Sacred Harmonic Society, to Mr. Costa, and the Philharmonic—to Meyerbeer, Auber, and the Royal Italian Opera—to M. Jullien, who has forced the masses to listen attentively to symphonies as well as polkas—to the Musical Union, the Beethoven Quartet, and other societies—and much to the increasing spread of music as a popular medium of recreation, and to the progressing influence of the highest models, which may be referred to a variety of causes, independent of the above, but unnecessary to specify here. The triumph of a work like Fidelio at an Italian Opera is a matter for congratulation, a sign of the times which may be accepted as a prognostication of further and continuous advance. Henceforth the idea of reducing dramatic music to the insignificant proportions of a cavatina with roudades, a buffo air without roudades, and a quantity of remplissage, which may be listened to or unheard with the same indifference, is put out of the pale of likelihood. Italian composers must learn to write music, and good music, or throw aside their pens.

"To achieve even tolerable success in a part like Leonora demands gifts, physical and mental, of no common kind. It taxes the utmost resources of the singer and actress, without an instant's intermission. Beethoven, as we have hinted, had no sympathy with singers, and paid little attention to the capacities of voices; hence the enormous difficulties presented in his vocal writing—difficulties, moreover, which, when overcome, are not seldom caviare to the multitude, and leave the industrious and deserving artist without a just reward in the immediate acknowledgment and applause of the audience. But Beethoven must be regarded as an exception, not a rule. His genius, essentially dramatic, towered above conventionalities; and the ambitious singer, who aspires to the approbation of judges, would rather be raised up to Beethoven, by entering into the spirit of his works, than win the ad captandum admiration of the crowd, by pulling him down to an ordinary level. It is one thing to sing an Italian aria, another to execute one of the pieces in Fidelio; one thing to give the music of Beethoven in its integrity, another to alter it in such a manner as to bring it within the province of mediocrity. Mademoiselle Cruvelli well understands this, which in some measure accounts for her success in the most arduous part of the lyric drama. The few alterations she makes rather tend to increase than diminish the difficulties of the original. She has entered upon her task with faith and enthusiasm. Had she merely shown a common talent, nothing could have saved her. People would have derided her arrogance, rather than have sympathised with her fall; but, conscious of her own powers, she dared the ordeal, and has come out of it triumphantly. She has had the courage to appear before that public which, three years ago, was slow to perceive her merits, in a part depending solely upon truth for effect, offering scarcely a single opportunity for the display of mere vocal brilliancy, scarcely a point where facile execution, irrespective of dramatic propriety, would be likely to ensure the plaudits so flattering to the ears of an artist. To understand and enjoy Fidelio thoroughly, the attention must never wander; nothing must be unheeded, nothing indifferently heard, or much that is interesting and important loses its weight and significance. To enter fully into the excellence of Mademoiselle Cruvelli's Leonora, it must be closely watched throughout. Leonora is almost always on the stage, and, when not on the stage, always in the confidence of the audience, who listen with her to the wicked machinations of Pizarro, sympathise with her in the wretched condition of Florestan. Not a scene, a dialogue, an air, scarcely a speech or recitative, which does not in some degree advance the progress of the action and approach a step towards the dramatic climax. The labour of sustaining such a part with anything like efficiency may easily be comprehended. How much greater to realise completely, as Mademoiselle Cruvelli has done, the whole meaning and intentions of the author and composer! Her first scene, before she has obtained the confidence of Rocco, before she has overheard the revelations of Pizarro, would alone show her to be an actress. The eagerness with which she listens to the gaoler, in the hopes of obtaining every interesting particular in reference to the prisoner whom she suspects to be her husband, is intense and beautiful. Her exhibition of horror, and subsequent burst of resolution when the treachery of Pizarro has been disclosed, is exceedingly fine, and her acting during the whole of the grave scene consummate. We have remarked few touches of natural instinct more exquisitely embodied than when, hearing the unconscious Florestan speak of "Leonora," she checks her almost irresistible desire to rush into the arms of her husband and reveal herself. We need scarcely call attention to the great points of the declaration to Pizarro and the drawing forth the pistol; these are self-evident; nor is it necessary to point to the ardour, the overwhelming affection with which she regards Florestan throughout the subsequent duet (one of the most absorbing pieces in the opera). But when her task is accomplished and her husband saved, a more delicate exhibition of histrionic truth, one which might possibly escape all but the most attentive observer, is the seeming prostration, mental and bodily, which has seized upon Leonora, rendering her, amid the fulness of her happiness, almost an apathetic spectator of what passes around her. A point like this could only have suggested itself to rare intelligence; and this, with others which we cannot stop to mention, show Mademoiselle Cruvelli to be an actress of the highest sensibility and refinement. About her singing we have little to add to what was said in our first notice. It is always appropriate, correct, and effective. Mademoiselle Cruvelli has the power of expressing joy and despair, hope and anxiety, hatred and love, fear and resolution, with equal felicity. She has voice and execution sufficient to master with ease all the trying difficulties of the most trying and difficult of parts. The very few changes she makes—of which we cannot approve, since we have yet to be convinced that to alter Beethoven is to improve him—may easily be rejected with advantage. Mademoiselle Cruvelli's abilities are such that they are wholly unnecessary. She evinces throughout the opera too complete a forgetfulness of herself in her author to make it possible for us to believe she would wittingly interfere with his ideas for the sake of shining at his expense. Not the least beauty in Mademoiselle Cruvelli's Leonora is, that in the scenes where resolution soars the highest, as in those where fear and uncertainty perplex, the modesty of womanhood is never overstepped, while a sentiment of youth in the tones of the voice, in every look, movement, and gesture, imparts a peculiar and abiding charm to the whole impersonation. It is long, indeed, since we have felt more entirely satisfied with a dramatic and vocal performance from first to last. What may be the present capacity of Mademoiselle Cruvelli in operas of a different class from Fidelio we cannot pretend to determine; but if she succeeds in pleasing the exclusive adherents of the Italian school as fully as she has already done, the more strictly musical worshippers of Beethoven, the high position to which she must be entitled as a dramatic singer will be placed beyond a doubt."

MADAME HERMINE RUDERSDORFF, the vocalist, has arrived from Berlin.

PIANOFORTE CONTROVERSY.

The following letter was promised in our last. We insert it without comment:—

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Sir,—Without presuming to offer any opinion on the purely mechanical points in dispute between the Messrs. Erard and the English manufacturers of pianofortes, or upon those which relate to patents and the dates which prove priority of invention, will you allow me, as a musician of some experience, and one whose attention for the last twenty years has been particularly directed to the pianoforte, to make a few remarks in reference to a point of view which, materially affecting the importance of the question and the interests of the disputants, has been entirely overlooked.

Far be it from me to arraign the Times on a ground where, by the acknowledgment of the whole world, it stands unrivalled—I allude to its means of acquiring information on all subjects—still less would I think of doubting its impartiality, which is equally placed beyond the possibility of dispute.

My only object in addressing you is this:—from the general tone which the discussion has assumed in the Times and the other morning papers, although comparisons have been avoided, it is more than probable that the majority of readers may arrive at a conclusion with reference to the respective merits of the instruments manufactured by the great French and English houses greatly prejudicial to the latter, and especially to Messrs. Broadwood.

Now this, allow me, Sir, respectfully to urge, is a matter not merely for taste, but for knowledge to decide; and not so much mechanical and historical as musical knowledge. I think I am not saying too much when I assert that, for quality of tone and durability,—certainly the two most valuable requisites in the manufacture of pianofortes,—the instruments of Messrs. Broadwood are unequalled by those of any maker in Europe; and in this opinion I may safely assert I am only uttering the sentiments of the majority of musicians. By musicians I do not mean exclusively pianoforte players, but those whose particular walk in the study of the art renders it essential that they should be thoroughly acquainted with the nature and peculiarities of every musical instrument, and whose authority must necessarily be of greater weight than that of the executant, mechanic, manufacturer, or even scientific acoustician. The preference shown by M. M. Thalberg and Liszt for the pianos of Erard, in their public performances, is derived materially from the peculiar character of their music, which, in many particulars, differs altogether from that of the "classical masters," as they are termed. The works of Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., and, among pianoforte writers exclusively,—Dussek, Wolff, Steibelt, Pinto, J. B. Cramer, Clementi, Chopin, Stephen Heller, Sterndale Bennett, &c., depending less on mere brilliancy and dry feats of manual dexterity, which, you will own, Sir, can scarcely be placed among the higher qualities of artistic expression, are better suited to instruments which promote facility by the singing quality of their tone, in giving force to the beautiful cantabile phrases, the rich and impressive harmonies, and the endless variety of colouring that distinguish the compositions of the great masters, from the fantasia and variation school of writers, in whom but too often want of invention and baldness of design are ill concealed by quantities of notes, endless forms of arpeggios, and other figures of bravura passage, by which some inoffensive tune (rarely their own property) is tortured into such odd shapes as to be scarcely recognizable to the ear. It is worthy of remark that Chopin, the chief of the "Romantic School," and the only one who founded his fantasias on themes of his own invention, invariably, when in England, played upon the pianos of Broadwood, and in Paris on those of Pleyel, who has been denominated, not unappropriately, the French Broadwood. It would, however, be a waste of your valuable space, and a needless application of "tu quoque" to prolong this letter by a list of the names of those eminent pianists who have (in many cases exclusively) performed on the pianofortes of our great English manufacturers, without, as their undiminished fame has demonstrated, in any way "risking their reputations." I may, however, state, as directly supporting my position, that the performance of Beethoven's trio in B flat, by M. Charles Hallé, which was so justly eulogized by all the London press in their reports of a performance at the Musical Union, some time since, was upon a pianoforte of Messrs. Broadwood; that, last year M. Stephen Heller, whom all the English press, echoing the opinion of the continental critics, pronounced one of the most finished pianists of the day, during his visit to England last season, invariably played upon the instruments of Broadwood; and that Madame Pleyel, pronounced by Liezt himself to be "the greatest pianist in Europe," after playing throughout the entire season upon the pianos of Erard, made, as may be proved by a reference to your own columns, the greatest sensation she ever produced in London at her last appearance in the Hanover-square Rooms upon one of the pianofortes of Broadwood.

Knowing your impartiality and love of justice, and feeling assured that nothing would give you greater pleasure than according credit where credit is due, and having experienced in your generous encouragement of the efforts of our own composers and performers (in whose ranks I may presume to place myself as an humble member, though not one of the least grateful for the services you have rendered us by your powerful support) that you take no one-sided view of the important question of the progress of art in England as in the other countries of Europe, I have addressed you fearlessly on the subject which cannot fail to be of the utmost interest to all connected, either by taste or avocation, with music and its influence.

Should you consider these observations worthy the honour of a place in your columns I shall feel most flattered, but in any case I am sure you will appreciate the motives which induced me to submit them to your consideration, and, under the circumstances, excuse this intrusion on your time and attention.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant and constant reader,
EDWARD J. LODER.

Manchester Street, May 14.

We have received so many letters on the subject that we are compelled to decline their insertion, unless the names of the writers be appended.

BOOSEY v. JEFFERYS.

(IMPORTANT DECISION.)

Before Lord Campbell and the Judges of the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas, in errors from the Court of Exchequer.—"A Foreigner resident abroad may assign Copyright to a British Subject for first Publication."

Lord Campbell now delivered the judgment of the court. This was an action for pirating and using a musical composition entitled a cavatina from the opera of La Sonnambula, of Bellini. The declaration, which was in the common form, alleged that this composition was first published in England within twenty-eight years; that the plaintiff was the proprietor of the copyright therein, and that the said copyright was subsisting at the time when the grievance set forth in the declaration was committed. To that declaration the defendant pleaded, first, that the plaintiff was not the proprietor of the copyright in the declaration mentioned, and secondly, that at the time of the committing of the said supposed grievance, copyright did not subsist in the said composition. At the trial before Lord Cranworth, then Mr. Baron Rolfe, evidence was adduced to show that the opera La Sonnambula was composed by Bellini, an alien, at Milan, in February, 1831; that Bellini then resided, and had ever since resided at Milan; that he was by the law of Milan entitled to the copyright in the opera, and to assign that right to any one he pleased; that on the 19th of February, 1831, by an instrument in writing, framed in accordance with the law of Milan, he assigned the copyright in the work to Giovanni

Ricordi, also an alien, and resident at Milan; and that Ricordi thereupon became vested with the said copyright; that on the 9th of June, 1831, Ricordi, in England, duly made, signed, and sealed, and attested by two witnesses, an indenture between him and the plaintiff, whereby, for a valuable consideration, he assigned to the plaintiff, a native born subject of Great Britain, the right to publish the opera in Great Britain and Ireland; that the plaintiff published it on the 10th of June, 1831, in London, that there had been no prior publication of the opera either within the British dominions or in any other country; that he made the usual entry at Stationers' Hall, and deposited copies of the publication at the British Museum, and other places as required by law; and that on the 13th of May, 1844, he caused a further entry thereof to be made at Stationers' Hall, under the 5 and 6 Vic., c. 45. The learned judge, in conformity with the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, in the case of "Boosey v. Purday," ruled that the evidence was not sufficient on the issues joined, and his lordship directed the jury to find on both issues for the defendant. To that ruling a bill of exception was tendered, on which the present writ of error was brought. After listening to the very learned argument, and looking into the authorities on the subject the court were all of opinion that the evidence was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict on both issues; that the direction of the learned judge was erroneous, and that there must be a venire de novo. The first question discussed was, whether an author possessed a copyright in his works at common law. That was not essential to the determination of the present case, but, supposing that it were, the court were strongly inclined to concur in the declaration of Lord Mansfield and other judges, in favour of the common law right of authors. But the court rested their judgment on the statutes with respect to literary property, which, in their opinion, and according to the evidence adduced at the trial, entitled the plaintiff to maintain this action. The Court of Exchequer, in the case of "Boosey v. Purday," (4 Exchequer Reports, 145), overruled the prior decision of that court on the equity side, the opinion unanimously expressed by the Court of Common Pleas, and the subsequent opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, all directly expressive of the opinion that the right in such an action must depend on the statute law of this country, that the laws of foreign nations have no extra territorial power, and the proper construction of the statutes of Anne and George III, that a foreign author residing abroad was not an author within their meaning, and could not have a copyright in his works, which acts were intended for the encouragement of British talent, by giving to British authors a monopoly in their literary works, dating from the period of their first publication here. The learned judges of that court therefore held that by first publishing his works in Great Britain, a foreigner acquired no copyright here. If these premises were sound, the inference to be drawn from them was incontrovertible, that a British subject who purchases such a right from a foreigner cannot be in any better condition here than the foreigner would have been himself. But with great deference for an opinion so expressed, the court saw no sufficient reason for thinking that it was the intention of the legislature to exclude foreigners from the benefits of the statutes. The British parliament has no power to legislate for aliens beyond the British territory, but within the limits of that territory, it has the power, and the court conceived that the general words must be presumed to do so. The monopoly which the statutes conferred is to be enjoyed here, and the conditions for the enjoyment of it are to be presumed here. What was there to rebut the presumption that aliens are entitled? The statute 8 Anne, c. 19, is for the encouragement of learning, by vesting the right in printed books in the authors thereof. Assuming that the legislature intended this necessarily for the encouragement of learning in Great Britain, might it not be for the encouragement of learning that foreigners should be induced to send their works here to be first published? If Rapin and De Lolme had written their valuable works on our constitution on the continent, without visiting this country, instead of first publishing them as they had done in England, was it to be contended that they would thereby have been debarred from assigning their property in these works to an Englishman? It would ill become them, sitting on that bench, to express any opinion upon the policy of introducing agricultural produce or manufactures from foreign countries; but looking at the statute book, he might without any impropriety observe that it had been the uniform policy of parliament to facilitate the introduction of learning and literature from other countries. Although printing had been introduced and carried on by Caxton in the reign of Edward IV., in the statute 1 Richard III., c. 9, to restrain Italians and other foreigners from carrying on trade here and to protect our woollen manufactures, a proviso was made by the 12th section, that that act should not extend to prevent any merchant or trader, of whatever nation he might be, from bringing into this country any books, written or printed. The real question was, whether a foreigner, by sending his work to a publisher here, could acquire a copyright in it. Upon that question depended his right to assign to another. It was admitted that if a foreigner composed his work here he might acquire a copyright in it; and the learned counsel for the defendant would not deny that if a foreigner while living here for a temporary purpose wrote a poem, he might publish it and acquire a copyright in it here. If he had composed it in his own country, and brought it over in his memory and produced it here for the first time, or if he had written out a book in manuscript, would it have made any difference as to his rights? Could his personal appearance within our realm be essential to his right as an author, if he did that by an agent which it was not disputed he might do in his own proper person. The right which he had in England was the right of acquiring a monopoly for a certain number of years for the sale of his work. That right was incorporeal, and in the nature of personal property which he carried with him wherever he went, and all that was to be done to negotiate it he might do by another. Where, then, was the necessity of crossing from Paris to Dover before giving instructions for the publication of his work, and entering it at Stationers' Hall? The law of England afforded protection, and would give the foreigner redress for any wrong which might be inflicted on him here. In the sixth year of Henry VIII. the Court of Common Pleas held that an alien residing in France might maintain an action of debt here, but not in the case of real property, for an alien could hold no land. In another case, it was held that an alien, although he had never been in this country, might maintain an action for an injury to his reputation contained in a libel; and that great judge, the late Chief-Justice Tindal, remarked that it would create in foreigners an unfavourable opinion of our laws if we held that aliens could not maintain an action of this description. And Mr. Justice Maule also pointed to the fact of our courts going further, in allowing actions to be brought by foreigners for running down ships on the high seas. If Mr. Gibbon, after writing the concluding volume of his work at Lausanne, had published it there, could it be doubted, that while domiciled there, he could, having caused his work to be published in London, acquire the same right as an English author? For such a purpose, what difference could it make whether the author were an alien or a natural born subject. In the present case he presumed it would be admitted that if Bellini had never come to London, the defence would have been done away with if he had been naturalised by act of parliament. For these reasons the court thought that if an alien residing in his own country were to compose a literary work there, without publishing his work, but should cause it to be published in this country, he would be an author for the encouragement of learning, and might maintain an action against any one who should pirate his work. He wished to be understood always to speak of the rights of foreigners who first published their works in England. If a literary work is once published, an author can only claim a copyright by the law of the country in which it is first published. That was the doctrine of our courts, and the legislature might be considered as having adopted and sanctioned it by the enactment of the two recent international copyright acts. The learned counsel for the defendant contended that though an alien residing abroad might publish here, he could not transfer the right to another, but if by the law of a foreign country in which he resides the right may be assigned to a publisher with a right of again assigning, the assignee of the author, or his assignee, becomes the owner of the property. It consisted in the right of retaining a monopoly for the sale of a work in the country in which it was first published. Whatever right the author of this work had of publishing in England was transferred by him to Ricordi, and by Ricordi to the plaintiff. His lordship having referred in detail to the authorities cited in the course of the argument, observed that he was perhaps justified in saying that these cases were rather in favour of the doctrine now supported by this court. In the Exchequer, a case decided by Vice-Chancellor Shadwell was relied on, in which his Honour had observed that the court would not protect the copyright of a foreigner. But the point in that case had nothing bearing on the present question, it being for an infringement of a design for seals and labels; and in a subsequent case—"Bentley v. Simons" (as we understood)—his Honour adopted the view now taken by the court. One other point only remained. It was contended on behalf of the defendant that there was not in the evidence any valid assignment to Ricordi, there being no allegation that it was attested by two witnesses. Looking at the assignment in the bill of exceptions, it might be presumed that there was such an assignment executed as was sufficient. At all events, the court thought the title sufficient, upon the statement that Bellini assigned to Ricordi according to the law of Milan. This was not like a conveyance of real property in England, or an assignment of personality in England, which might be attested in a particular form. When the assignment was made, it had no reference to England, and it was merely sufficient to clothe Ricordi with all the rights of property in the opera of La Sonnambula. The assignment by Ricordi to the plaintiff was made according to all the forms of English law. Upon the whole, the court thought the learned judge ought to have directed the jury that if they believed the evidence, they should find a verdict on both issues for the plaintiff. There must, therefore, be a venire de novo.

MR. AGUILAR'S CONCERT.

This entertainment, which took place on Wednesday evening at the Hanover Square Rooms, in the presence of a crowded and brilliant audience, merits being placed upon record, not merely on account of its very attractive programme, which included some of the most eminent vocalists and instrumentalists now in London, but because there was a grand orchestra, and because the concert-giver had shown the industry and talent to write a symphony for the occasion. A musician who composes a symphony is primâ facie to be respected, since to compose a symphony demands not only a continuous flow of ideas, but a knowledge of form, an acquaintance with the great models, experience of the orchestra, and in short the highest musical attainments. Mr. Aguilar is not the only Englishman who has shown himself equal to this great labour; but we are always glad to be able to add another name of a compatriot to the small and honourable list. Mr. Aguilar's symphony is a work of decided merit, ambitious in design and worked out with artistic skill. The first movement (in E minor) is an allegro of great length and elaboration. The general style is passionate, and there is much of the richness of Spohr in the orchestral combinations and effects. The principal themes are most happily contrasted, and the entire movement has a largeness of manner which is sustained with great ability. The slow movement (in E major) does not please us so much; it reminds us occasionally of the andante in one of Macfarren's symphonies, and the subjects have scarcely enough interest to bear out the length of the whole; it contains, however, some charming points of instrumentation. The scherzo (in E minor), in spite of several reminiscences of Beethoven's ninth symphony (the "Choral"), is a striking, clever, and spirited movement. The contrast of its theme with that of the trio is felicitous, and the manner in which the short and piquant theme of the first part is spread out and elaborated betrays not only a ready invention but great familiarity with what may be termed the mechanism of composition. The finale (in E minor) is a lengthy and complicated movement, rather too much spun out, excessively modulated, and of a sombre character throughout. Some portions of it are monotonous in consequence of these defects; but there are many parts of the movement so spirited, and the instrumentation for the most part, so learned and well contrived, that it cannot be listened to without a considerable degree of interest; and this, indeed, may be said of the whole symphony, which is certainly a valuable addition to the repertory of English orchestra music. The band which Mr. Aguilar had gathered together, under the able direction of Mr. Anschuetz and the leadership of Mr. Willy, was admirable, and did ample justice to the important work committed to their charge. The audience appreciated, enjoyed, and applauded the symphony throughout with equal heartiness and discrimination.

There were also two vocal compositions by Mr. Aguilar, "Edith," sung by Miss Birch, and "Come let us wander," sung by Miss Dolby, which, as it our intention to submit to the examination of our reviewer, we need only mention here as having been extremely successful. The first is a kind of tragic scene, the other a light and elegant ballad. Both received entire justice at the hands of the fair singers, and may be regarded as favourable specimens of Mr. Aguilar's vocal writing.

Mr. Aguilar also came forward as a pianist, and exhibited pretensions of a high order. His choice of Mendelssohn's first concerto in G minor, indicated judgment and ambition in equal degrees. The mere possession of mechanical ability is not enough for the effective interpretation of a composition so full of fire and genius, but Mr. Aguilar, although he exhibits great readiness and fluency of execution, is not a pianist of the dry, mechanical school. He can play many notes in a short space of time, and dashes off the traits de bravoure with the ease and nonchalance of a regular piano-forte lion. But he does more than this; he lends expression where expression is demanded, and uses it without extravagance or affectation. He plays with spirit as well as with elegance, and his reading of the Concerto was worthy of the music and the loud applause he obtained. Later in the evening Mr. Aguilar played, in conjunction with the gifted Ernst, some of the beautiful Pensées Fugitives, which the great violinist composed in fellowship with his admirable friend and compatriot, Stephen Heller, and which have been appropriately styled by the English publisher, Mr. Wessel, Gages d'Amitié. The three selected were those entitled "Lied," "Adieu" and "Priere pendant l'Orage." The performance of these charming bagatelles was all that could be desired. How finely Ernst plays them we need not say, and it is no small compliment to Mr. Aguilar to add that his fingers and his mind seemed to have caught the spirit of Heller, and that he showed himself worthy of playing such good music in such good company.

We must be brief with the remainder of the concert. One great feature was Ernst's performance of his own fantasia, Airs Hongrois. Another was the marvellous execution on the double-bass by Signor Bottesini in a solo of his composition. Both elicited the enthusiasm of the audience. Herr Formes was put down in the programme to sing twice, but his presence being unexpectedly demanded at Buckingham Palace, he was only enabled to come forward once, much to the disappointment of the audience, who applauded his Schubert's "Wanderer"—which he sung very finely—with vehemence. Amends, however, was made for the disappointment by Signor Bottesini obligingly consenting to play a second time, and his Carnaval de Venise, as prodigious in its way as that of Ernst himself, elicited thunders of applause.

We cannot enter into particulars about the vocal music, nor is it necessary, since, with the exception of Mr. Aguilar's two songs before mentioned, it consisted of well-known popular pieces, by well-known and popular singers, Mdlle. Graumann, Misses Birch, Dolby, and Messent, Herr Stigelli, and Signor Marchesi. We must, however, just mention as worthy of all eulogy, Mdlle. Graumann's execution of Mendelssohn's lovely lied, "On song's bright pinions," and Meyerbeer's fresh and charming "Fishermaden," a well assorted, because a well contrasted, pair of melodies. That very rising singer, Signor Marchesi, must also be commended for his choice of the beautiful air, "Nasce al bosco," from Handel's Actius, and for the highly finished manner in which he sang it; nor can we let off the excellent and promising new tenor of the Royal Italian Opera, Herr Stigelli, without a word of recognition for his really chaste manner of rendering the charming tenor song, "Dies bildness," from Zauberflöte, and a spirited lied of his own, "Ob sie weke kemmen wird;" nor industrious Miss Messent for her "Se Crudele," nor all the singers for the concerted pieces; nor the band, with Mr. Willy and Mr. Anschuetz, for their spirited performance of the overture to Euryanthe, and Mendelssohn's "Wedding March;" nor M. Adolphe Schinon for his musician-like accompanying on the piano; nor the audience for appreciating everything so well, and applauding everything with such good-will; nor, finally, Mr. Aguilar, for having given such an excellent concert to deserve both appreciation and applause.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

If, after her debut, any doubt existed as to the lofty position Cruvelli was entitled to occupy on the lyric stage, it was entirely set at rest by her second performance of Leonora on Saturday, when Fidelio was repeated. Scepticism was silenced for ever, and Sophie Cruvelli, by universal election, was raised to the throne left vacant by the death of Malibran. The performance of the great artist, from first to last, was a masterpiece of singing and acting, and produced a profound effect. The theatre was crowded in every part, and Sophie was received throughout with immense enthusiasm. The mighty Beethoven, interpreted with such power and intensity, afforded a deep and intoxicating delight to all who could understand and appreciate genius and art in holiest communion.

We must now hasten to make the amende to the artists engaged in the performance of Fidelio for having omitted all mention of them last week, especially when there was so much that called for strong praise, individually and collectively. Mr. Sims Reeves has added largely to his great reputation by his fine and energetic performance of Florestan. Indeed, in point of energy and dramatic feeling he could hardly have been surpassed, while his singing betokens skill as a musician, and sympathy with the classic inspirations of Beethoven. Mr. Sims Reeves has returned to Her Majesty's Theatre with an increase of fame won from his successes at the Italiens in Paris. His voice is as powerful and firm as ever, as was fully evidenced on Tuesday week at the first performance of Fidelio. The great English tenor met with a hearty reception, and after his grand scena in the prison, which he culminated and sang with intense vigour and pathos, was tumultuously applauded.

Madame Giuliani sang the music of Marcellina with that ease and gracefulness which are characteristic of her style.

Her acting, too, was careful and artistic. In short, a better Marcellina could hardly have been desired.

The part of Pizarro is an arduous, and by no means a grateful one. Signor Coletti studied hard to render it effective, and he was successful, although occasionally he found the score foreign to his musical sensibilities. His powerful voice and manly style, however, told well in the concerted music.

Signor Balanchi—not Bianchi—has a good bass voice, not powerful, nor particularly telling, but good, nevertheless, and he sings like a musician, no more than was to be expected, seeing that he is a pupil of Duprez. He is very young, and has much to learn yet. A more experienced singer should have been found for Rocco, upon whose shoulders much of the weight of the opera is thrown. We must, however, do Signor Balanchi the justice to say that his singing in the trio in the first act, and throughout the prison scene, indicated much tact and skill. It is no small merit in an artist to obtain any, the smallest praise, in the difficult and elaborate music of Beethoven.

Signor Mercuriali deserves credit both for his singing and acting in Fritz. He pleased very much in the duo with Marcellina, and in the quartet a canone.

The chorus were well up to the mark, and had evidently come to their task with heart and soul. They were strengthened in the grand "chorus of prisoners" by Gardoni, Calzolari, Pardini, Poulter, F. Lablache, Casanova, Massol, and Scapini. The prisoners' chorus produced a great effect, and was encored. We were sorry not to perceive the principals in the finale to the second act, when their services would be found more available than even in the prisoners' chorus. More of this anon.

Balfe done wonders with his band, and never achieved a more decided triumph than by his direction of Fidelio. It proved that he understood the great master, and felt the great master; and knowing and feeling the great master, he was enabled to give vitality and meaning to his inspirations. We object, however, to the introduction of the ophicleide into the music in the grave scene, and rate Balfe, and soundly too, for so unnecessary an innovation. In such music the ophicleide is positively offensive, besides being a sacrilege. With deference, Beethoven knew what he was about; and had he thought it requisite to create an uproar in order to illustrate the agonies of a heart torn by conflicting emotions, he would have found more legitimate noise than could be produced by that bugbear of the orchestra, yeleft, ophicleide. Besides, Beethoven did not forget that Florestan was sleeping, and had no desire to rouse him from his slumbers until the duet was finished. Balfe, be wise and refund. Spare our tympanums and respect our nerves. If you wish to make a great noise in the world, do not attempt it through another's ophicleide. Take a friendly advice, and remember Beethoven is beginning to be understood.

On Tuesday the Barbiere was repeated. Madame Sontag awakened the old enthusiasm, and Signor Ferranti confirmed the impressions made by his Figaro on the preceding Thursday.

Wednesday was remarkable as being the first night of a series of Soirées Extraordinaires, or, more properly, extra nights, in which Mr. Lumley purposes affording the numerous visitors to London at the present moment an opportunity of enjoying every possible variety of opera and ballet entertainment. But for these entertainments we are at a loss to know how Mr. Lumley could employ his enormous company. Nine or ten prima donnas are not easy to manage, especially when a great success has been achieved and necessitates a run.

The third performance of Fidelio was given, and Cruvelli absolutely transcended her two previous efforts. As she gains confidence in her part she grows grander and grander, until she approaches the sublime, if she has not reached it already. Most of the principal artists from the Royal Italian Opera were present, and expressed their delight in loud applause. M. Costa was most enthusiastic of all in his demonstrations for la belle Cruvelli.

Don Giovanni was given for the second time on Thursday; and the Figlia del Reggimento, with extracts from the Due Foscari and the Elisir d'Amore, together with a variety of entertainments in the ballet department, made up the second Soirée Extraordinaire last evening.

The ballets during the week have been confined to the L'Isle d'Amour, Les Cosmopolites, Les Metamorphoses, of which we have nothing new to record, excepting that Carlotta Grisi appeared, and she is ever new as she is ever delightful.

To-night Cruvelli appears in Norma. Shall we have to record another prodigious success; or shall the star, which shone with so holy a light in the highest heaven of music, grow pale when it appears in a lower and a less pure atmosphere? We have no doubt as to the result.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The performances since our last have been, on Saturday, Masaniello, and the last act of Roberto; on Tuesday, Fidelio, the first time of performance; and on Thursday the Huguenots. Of the second only are we called upon to speak.

Fidelio had been announced so frequently in the Covent Garden bills, and withdrawn without explanation, that the subscribers and public had entirely lost all hope of seeing it performed at the Royal Italian Opera this year. There is little doubt but that the director was stimulated to bring out Beethoven's great work by the success it achieved at Her Majesty's Theatre. For the delays we cannot account. Various rumours were abroad as to the cause, the most rational of which was that an illustrious personage signified his wish that Fidelio should be cast with Mario and Madame Viardot, instead of Tamberlik and Castellan, and that it was consequently withdrawn from the bills until Madame Viardot came to London. Be this as it may, Fidelio was brought out on Tuesday with Castellan as Leonora and Tamberlik as Florestan, entitled Ferdinando in the Royal Italian Opera bills.

In the whole range of the lyric drama there is no character which demands so large an amount of talents and capacities in the artist, as Leonora. On this account only is Fidelio so seldom performed, few prime donne having the compass of voice to sing the music, however admirably their abilities may befit them for the impersonation of the part in other respects. The readers of the Musical World need not to be reminded of the profound admiration we entertain for Grisi's genius, nor the respect in which we hold the talents of Madame Viardot; yet neither Grisi nor Viardot, we are certain, could support the part with much effect. The music of Leonora is beyond the compass of Grisi's voice, and Madame Viardot is hardly fitted by nature or art for the character. We introduce these illustrious exceptions to show that we intend nothing harsh to the fair artist, or derogating from her graceful talents and accomplishments, when we say Madame Castellan is entirely unsuited to Leonora, both as regards mental and physical powers. Indeed, we consider it nothing less than an act of cruelty towards Madame Castellan to make her essay her talents in a part for which nature never intended her. Madame Castellan is an accomplished singer, an excellent musician, and, in certain characters, a most animated actress; but much more than this is required for Beethoven's Fidelio, and that much more Madame Castellan does not happen to possess. It is not a greater reproach to Madame Castellan that she cannot sustain Leonora or Norma, than it is to Grisi that she cannot play Linda or Maria. Every good artist has his speciality, and Madame Castellan's speciality does not lie in the grand tragic school. We do not find fault with the singer for being unequal to what was expected from her, but with the manager for taxing her powers beyond her strength. When Madame Castellan sustains a part like Marguerite or Isabella, she will always command our unreserved approbation. Of her Leonora, out of respect for her superior talents and amiability, we must hold ourselves silent.

Tamberlik's Florestano was perfect both in singing and acting. The admirable tenor was more striking than ever in Beethoven's music. In the cantabile of the scena in the prison he was encored with rapturous applause. Tamberlik's singing of this magnificent and intensely passionate song was the finest we ever heard. Rubini could not have surpassed it in pathos and expression.

Formes, as might have been expected, was very fine in Rocco. The music of the part, being written for a deep bass voice, suited him admirably. His acting was no less powerful than his singing. He came out with immense force in the grand duet with Pizarro, while every look and action in this most varying and trying scene betrayed the subtlest insight into the character. The whole performance of Rocco was worthy Formes's great reputation.

Tagliafico is always good, and when he gets a part that suits him well, Tagliafico is more than good. On the present occasion, having obtained a part that suited him well, Tagliafico was good. He showed a just estimate of Pizarro's character throughout, and gave all the music with power and discrimination.

Mdlle. Bertrandi pleased us much in Marcellina. Her appreciation of the music was excellent, and her singing was tasteful and correct. She did not betray the want of confidence we noticed in her first performance, and her intonation, in consequence, was irreproachable.

We have not a fault to find with the band. They played the two overtures—the same as those played at her Majesty's Theatre—splendidly and were encored in both. We were, however, somewhat surprised at finding Mr. Costa occasionally indicating the times at variance with the composer's intention. The Prisoner's Chorus was taken so fast that it lost all effect, and escaped even the semblance of an encore. This was unusual. We must do the chorus justice—it was none of their fault. They sang the grand finale admirably and with great power.

The dresses and mise en scène did not entirely satisfy us. We were sorry to find Madame Castellan being compelled to borrow Pierotto's dress from the wardrobe. The costume of a Swiss peasant is not identical with that of a Spanish boy, nor, if they were, was Madame Castellan's dress at all in character. Tagliafico, also, would have appeared more like what it was intended he should, had he donned the Spanish mantle and tunic, instead of using the old habiliment, worn in Riccardo in the Puritani, which did not sit well upon a Cavalier of Seville.

The scenery was well put upon the stage excepting the last scene, which was a decided mistake. The stage direction is, "a square before the castle," instead of which there was presented a strongly illuminated hall, with golden pillars, arabesques, and paintings in quaint device,—a scene, unless we very much mistake, which afforded a frame for Alboni's portly person in the last act of Cenerentola, when she warbled, with throat mellifluous, the "Non piu mesta." The scene was entirely out of keeping. Had Mr. Harris been present, this mistake could hardly have occurred.

We see by the bills that Tamburini is engaged. We are right well pleased at this. We shall now have the Don Giovanni and Mosé in Egitto.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(From the Daily Express.)

The third concert of the Philharmonic Society was given on Friday evening, in the Concert Room, in Great Brunswick-street, which was well filled by a brilliant and crowded audience. We subjoin the programme:—

PART I.

- Sinfonia—No. 7—Beethoven.
- Hungarian Song—Holzel. Herr Holzel.
- Duet Concertante—Pianoforte and Violoncello. Mrs. Joseph Robinson and Herr Ellsner.
- Grand Aria—"Judith." Madame Durand.
- Romanza—"Lieb aus der Kindheit"—Flotow. Herr Reichardt.
- Fantasia—Harp—"La danse de Fee"—P. Alvers. Madame Parish Alvers.
- German Song—"Straussli"—Holzel. Mdlle. Anna Zerr.
- Sestetto—"Che mi frena"—Donizetti. (Lucia di Lammermoor.) Mdlle. Anna Zerr, Madame Durand, M. Litter, Herr Reichardt, Herr Holzel, Mons. Jogand.

PART II.

- Overture—Melusina—Mendelssohn. (First time in Ireland.)
- Variations—Proch. Mdlle. Anna Zerr.
- Fantasia—Pianoforte—on Themes from L'Elisir d'Amore.—Thalberg. Mrs. Joseph Robinson.
- Duet—"Qui del Padre"—Donizetti. (Lucia di Lammermoor.) M. Littee and M. Jogand.
- Fantasia—Harp—On National Airs—P. Alvers. Madame P. Alvers.
- Terzetto—"Dos Bandel"—Mozart. Mdlle. Anna Zerr, Herr Reichardt, and Herr Holzel.
- Overture—Neron—Reissiger.

It will thus be seen that the entertainment was of a varied kind, as well in the selections as in the performers. In this respect, praise is due to the conductors for the energy and taste they displayed in providing for the amusement of the subscribers—setting an example which might well be followed by other Philharmonic Societies. Beethoven's symphony was rendered in a style creditable to band and conductor; although in some parts, more especially in the allegretto in A minor, the full meaning of the composer was scarcely developed. Herr Holzel's "Hungarian Song" served to display the power of a voice in some respects resembling that of Pischek. Herr Holzel's style is nervous and forcible, without exaggeration. Encored in the "Hungarian Song," Herr Holzel substituted another, which was well received by the audience. The talents of Mrs. Joseph Robinson as a pianist were displayed in a duet (for pianoforte and violoncello) with Herr Ellsner. Madame Durand is one of the French company now performing at the Theatre Royal, and her execution of the grand aria from Judith was marked by much feeling. Herr Reichardt has a very sweet tenor voice, and impassioned style. His romanza commanded an encore, and he substituted another air. Mrs. Parish Alvers gave some of her husband's compositions for the harp with great executive ability. The vocal "lion" of the evening was a Mdlle. Anna Zerr, a German prima donna (from Vienna and other capitals), whose reputation had preceded her to Dublin. This lady has a powerful voice, somewhat metallic in tone, but reminding us much of the voice of Heinefetter in her best days. Like that lady, too, although gifted by nature with feminine charms, she is slightly masculine in manner and deportment. Her first vocal effort (Holzel's "Straussli") displayed an extraordinary command of the mechanism of the voice, and at the same time much artistic taste in the management of light and shade. She received a very flattering encore, but, although she came forward twice to make her acknowledgments, she seemed indisposed to repeat the song, so much so, that when at last called forward again, by the repeated demand of the audience, she fairly turned her back upon them, and walked away. The kindness of the audience in thus welcoming a stranger was scarcely justified by the quality of her performance; and, as she showed no disposition to respond to a call dictated by good feeling, the audience were certainly quite right in taking her at her word and showed less anxiety as to her subsequent performances.

Mr. Levey, the old favourite of our Dublin musical public, gave a benefit concert on Monday evening at the Rotunda. The attendance evinced the esteem in which Mr. Levey is held—the rooms were nearly full. The Aria Buffa, "Il Bè cio" of Torrente, was given with effect by Herr Mengis; as was also a solo on the grand pianoforte (Fantasia on Irish airs), by Professor Glover. The first part concluded with a duet from Wallace's Maritana, "of Fairy Wand," in which Miss Rainforth and Herr Mengis elicited much applause. Rosini's Terzetto "Ti parli l'amore," by Miss Rainforth, Mr. Geary, and Herr Mengis, opened the second part. It was followed by a fantasia on the violin by Mr. Levey, accompanied by his son on the pianoforte. In this, as well as in a duet with Herr Ellsner, on airs from William Tell, Mr. Levey was loudly applauded. "Sulla Tomba," from Lucia di Lammermoor, was effectively sung by Miss Rainforth and Mr. Geary. "The Happy Switzer," by Herr Mengis, drew down a hearty encore. We must not omit to notice a ballad of Linley's, which was given by Miss Clarke with steadiness. Between the first and second parts of the concert the band of the 57th regiment played selections from the favourite operas.

Foreign.

VENICE.—The local journals speak in terms of the highest encomiums of the debut, at the San Benedetto, of a young barytone, Francesco Burdini, in the part of Ezio, in Verdi's Attila. His voice is described as of uncommonly fine quality, and his method as unexceptionable. Of all the barytone parts written by Verdi, that of Ezio is perhaps the highest in its range, yet this young artiste is described as playing the part night after night without evincing the slightest fatigue, and more than justifying the enthusiasm which his first performance excited. Other accounts describe M. Burdini's qualifications for the higher branches of Opera as unusual.

GRISI'S RUSSIAN DIAMONDS.—We are told after the curtain had fallen on Saturday, at the Royal Italian Opera, some excitement was occasioned by two or three servants coming forward and looking anxiously about the stage near the footlights. It soon transpired that Grisi, who had worn all her magnificent diamonds in representing the Borgian Queen, had had the misfortune, during the excitement of the closing scene, to lose several valuable stones from her tiara. An active sympathy pervaded the house until the audience were satisfied that the missing jewels had been recovered. —Morning Herald.

NEW YORK.—The following highly coloured and fantastic notice of Jenny Lind's first concert since her return to New York, from what Mr. Barnum terms "the most successful musical tour on record," is abridged from the New York Tribune of the 9th inst. :—

Ixion bidden to the banquet of the gods went, as we went with thousands more to Castle Garden, on Wednesday evening, sure that there could nowhere be a higher satisfaction in that kind. The supreme Soprano of the time,—a Tenor, now unsurpassed, although in his decline, except by Mario,—and a Barytone who divides with Ronconi the suffrage of the musical world, sang together. No opera could at this moment have been mounted upon any stage in the world with so sure and deserving elements of success as this concert. It was pleasant to repair to a feast of art, sure that it would surpass all genuine expectation, because the stroke of genius is always incalculable. There was some crowd around the garden gate; but the arrangements of the concert were so well made, that the vast audience of 7,500 persons were seated by means of the ushers, with the utmost rapidity and ease. At 8 o'clock the promenaders entered and filled all the space really available for seeing and hearing. The hall then looked the worthy arena of so great a triumph. A faint fancy of a crowded Coliseum could not but flit across the mind, with the consciousness of a triumph so much truer, and that, the triumph of a woman.

The moment the promenaders were still, M. Benedict advanced to the front and was most cordially received. He looks in perfect health, indeed he seems to smile anything else to scorn. The orchestra, with Burke at the head, then gave Weber's overture to Euryanthe, in the most spirited manner. There was a freshness and vigour in this performance that gave the key to the whole concert, which did not flag for an instant during the evening. That done Signor Salvi and Belletti sang the Voglio dire from L'Elisir d'Amore. Belletti looks the same as when he left us, and sings with the same fulness, richness, and ease. Signor Salvi we heard for the first time, and with the most unqualified pleasure. His voice is somewhat worn and past its prime, and with a slight occasional tendency to break, but the genuine artist reveals himself in the care with which he manages it to the best effect.

Jenny Lind then bounded forward and bent with that characteristic salutation in which the head is scarcely bowed and the eye does not lose for a moment its command of the audience. In that recognition of applause, which was universal, and cordial, and repeated, last evening, although without any tumultuous demonstration, there is nothing cringing or deprecating, but it is as noble and self-respectful as the genius which inspires it. It is a stately spectacle, that of thousands of men and women from all parts of the land, who have never met before and shall never meet again, uniting in friendly homage to a stranger and a woman, whose greatness compels it; and only statelier and more splendid is her reception of it. She was dressed in a magnificent silk brocade, and wore jewelled bracelets upon her arm. Upon her bosom she had roses, and a deep damask rose in her hair. Jenny Lind looked somewhat wearied, but she has never sung more wonderfully well than on Wednesday evening. The gushing gladness of satisfied love in the Come per me sereno, from the Sonnambula, leaped livingly from her lips—its satisfaction shadowed only by the languid sadness of joy in the introductory Care Compagne. The audience was electrified by this, and she acknowledged the applause, but without repeating the song. Mr. Burke's rich and rare violin solo was hardly heard as it should have been, because of the dying murmurs of delight at the singing, and because his tone is so delicate and soft—having entirely elided the fiddle from his instrument—that the huge hall enamoured consumed the whole.

Signor Salvi then sang the "Spirito gentil," whose exquisite echo lingered through all the summer in every listener's memory. It is just the kind of music adapted to this artist's organ and skill. He is essentially an Italian singer of Italian music, and incomparably the best tenor we have ever heard in America. We cannot follow the concert in detail. The characteristic Tyrolean duet of Jenny Lind and Belletti—the grotesque overture of Auber, whose genuine melodiousness is victorious over the dislike of his fantastic freaks—the sparkling trio from the Barber—the Gipsy's song from Meyerbeer's

Camp of Silesia, which drew down the most electrical encore of the evening—and the Bird-song, for ever fresh and fragrant, cannot be more noticed. But in the "Last Rose of Summer," Jenny Lind gave another proof of the truly great artist. None but such would have dared—singing a domestic ballad to oreigners in their own tongue, and to foreigners so full of extravagant expectation as, doubtless, the mass of the audience was—to have delivered it so simply. We confess never to have heard this song so perfectly sung. She gave it with a force of feeling and directness, a total absence of sentimentality and a profound tenderness, so remarkable, that the final line, "this bleak world alone," was filled, as a poet said, with the divine despair. One only ornament she allowed herself, a long, lingering, simple trill upon the "world"—whose dying fall was like that of audibly thrilling rose leaves trembling to the ground.

At the close of the concert Mr. Barnum was called for, and coming forward, he said that he was glad to be once more among the first American friends of Jenny Lind, and that, after the most successful musical tour upon record, she had returned,—as during her first engagement, he had promised she would return,—to sing in cheap two dollar concerts, in order that all might hear her; and he trusted that the entertainment of the evening was good earnest of his intention to fulfil that promise. Jenny Lind's next concert, this afternoon will comprise many of her sacred songs.

Dramatic Intelligence.

FRENCH PLAYS.—ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—We have to record a further series of new pieces from the Montansier, all of which have been successful. As the comic part of the season is now drawing to a close, Mr. Mitchell seems resolved to serve his patrons in one week with as much as would constitute a feast for a month at most theatres. On Monday last M. Ravel's first appearance was announced, and we repaired to the theatre eager to welcome one of the best comedians of our time. Ravel is not merely a caricaturist, many of his parts developing a fineness of conception which marks the true comedian. Unfortunately we were disappointed; M. Ravel had not arrived, and the manager was obliged to erase his name from the programme at a moment's notice. We were, however, compensated, by the announcement of M. Levasser in two new parts. The first is a pleasing, but not a very clever trifle, in one act, entitled Deux vieux Papillons. The story is very simple, and turns on the efforts made by an old beau to break off a projected union between his god-daughter and a young man whom he considers to be unworthy of her. The young lady having also conceived a prior attachment for the old gentleman's son, a captain just returned from the African army, the old beau challenges the young man to single combat. But the latter refuses, on the plea of the disparity of ages. The old man then assumes the disguise of his own son to effect his object, which is to get up a duel with his god-daughter's lover, and carry off the lady for his son. In the meanwhile the captain arrives, and manages the courting part of the business for himself, while the old man does the nighting department, disarming and wounding the disappointed lover. Things are wound up in the customary manner. The piece is evidently written for M. Levasser, who fills the parts of the younger and older man with remarkable talent. The elasticity of youth which he develops is the more effective after the exhibition of stiffness incident to advanced age. Every look, every gesture added to the effect of the assumed character. The voice was nicely modulated to tally with the rest, and the raskish, dandified costume, the grey spare wig, the bold and open forehead, were in excellent keeping. The other old butterfly ("papillon") was played with much humour by M. St. Amant, who excited considerable laughter in the disguise of an Arab prisoner. The small character allotted to Madame Scriwaneck was charmingly filled by that lady.

Deux vieux Papillons was followed by a burlesque called Titi à la Représentation de Robert le Diable. This scene is a capital vehicle for the display of M. Levasser's comic powers, both as an actor and singer, and is the best thing of the sort which we have witnessed for some time past. The peculiarities both of the poem and music are displayed with marvellous humour, and many a truth, to make both author and composer wince, is broadly conveyed. The part of Bertram was one of the most felicitous of Titi's recollections, and the duet between Robert and Isabella was amusing and grotesque in the extreme, whilst the trio between Alice, Robert, and Bertram convulsed the house with laughter. On Wednesday Mdlle. Scriwaneck took her benefit, the principal feature of which was her assumption of Déjazet's part in the piece entitled La Fille de Dominique. We have a strong recollection of Mdlle. Déjazet, and it is no small compliment to say that Mdlle. Scriwaneck went through the part most creditably. The three transformations were well sustained, and frequent bursts of applause rewarded the tact and intelligence displayed by the actress.

On Thursday M. Lafont took his benefit, and played with that refined and gentlemanly feeling which always distinguishes his acting. M. Lafont is an especial favourite with the aristocratic frequenters of the St. James's, and when he returns to London he is sure of meeting with a hearty welcome.

The short season of comedy and vaudeville is now terminated. Its success has been undoubted. We must now prepare to greet the incomparable tragedian, Mademoiselle Rachel, who will appear on Monday, June 2nd, in her great part of Phèdre. She will play four times a week during her stay in London, which, we understand, is to be limited to one month.

J. DE C.

HAYMARKET.—With that laudable desire to provide novelty and variety for his patrons, for which he has been so long recognised as one of the most popular of managers, Mr. Benjamin Webster has essayed the establishment of an operatic company at his little Theatre in the Haymarket. For this purpose he has brought together a tolerably good vocal force, a by no means indifferent chorus, and an efficient body of instrumentalists, in number twenty-eight. The operatic performances are to alternate with the dramatic, and are fixed for Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, the off-opera nights. The vocal corps include the names of Miss Louisa Pyne, Mrs. Harriet Cawse, Mr. Donald King, Mr. Corrie, Mr. Weiss, Mr. Caulfield, and Mr. James Bland. Mr. Mellon, the violinist and leader of the ballet at the Royal Italian Opera, is engaged as conductor.

So far so good. We have no doubt excellent use might be made of the above materials, but we question if Mr. Webster has commenced the right way. Auber's Crown Diam ds requires not only the utmost neatness and finish in the singing and perfection in the ensemble, but the highest animation and piquancy in the acting. Unfortunately, although the individual talent of Mr. Webster's new operatic company is not to be despised, extreme neatness and finish in the singing was not obtained on Monday night, while the ensemble was far from satisfactory. Miss Louisa Pyne is a most charming singer, and seldom sang more charmingly than on Monday, and Mr. Weiss has a fine, bold bass voice, and turned it to good account; but the tenor, Mr. Donald King, was out of his line in the music of the Opera Comique, and Mr. Corrie's comic singing is not striking. The verve and finesse of French comedy do not appear to be consonant to the feelings of our English vocalists; and we therefore deem it at best but questionable policy, especially at the present moment, to have their talents misapplied, or more properly, not made use of to the best advantage. The strangers who now crowd the streets of London would no doubt be attracted by an English operatic performance, but when they go to the Haymarket Theatre, expecting to hear English singers in English music—a novelty to them—they must feel sadly disappointed at having presented to them The Crown Diamonds of Auber, a work which they had heard times without number performed to perfection at the Opera Comique of Paris. Is this fair, we would ask, to the English artists? Would not their talents have been rendered more conspicuous in music which they knew how to appreciate, and in parts into the spirit of which they could more deeply enter? We do not say that the performance of the Crown Diamonds at the Haymarket was thoroughly indifferent, but we insist it was not what it might have been. Furthermore, we are inclined to think that an English opera would prove infinitely more attractive than a draught from the repertoire of the Opera Comique. The great success achieved by Miss Louisa Pyne in King Charles the Second might have warranted Mr. Webster in producing that opera—no bad specimen, by the way, of English lyric music, to be submitted to the visitors at the Grand Exhibition—or, if King Charles the Second could not have been given, there was Loder's Giselle; or, the Night Dancers, in which Miss Louisa Pyne's talents might be exhibited to perfection, not to mention many other works in which our English vocalists would stand a chance of winning fair reputations from the strangers.

We shall pause here, trusting that Mr. Webster will see his way more clearly and act accordingly, and not permit his vocal company to be drawn into disadvantageous comparisons. We shall now state a few particulars relative to the performance on Monday night.

Miss Louisa Pyne sang the music of Caterina very charmingly. She was in good voice, and the brilliancy of her execution was abundantly exemplified in every scene. Miss Louisa Pyne looked very pretty, and was occasionally animated in her acting; but we looked in vain for the piquancy and esprit which are the characteristics of the youthful queen. She was greatly applauded throughout the performance, and merited all the applause she obtained.

Mr. Donald King has a tolerable tenor voice; but his singing is not remarkable for expression or delicacy. Mr. Weiss was commendable as Rebollado, and gave the music with gusto. A little more finesse would have made it excellent. Mr. Corrie took pains with the part of Campo Mayor, but did not seem to apprehend the spirit of the character.

The most interesting feature of the performance was the first appearance of Miss Harriet Cawse, or, as she is termed in the bills, Mrs. Harriet Cawse, since her retirement from the stage some sixteen years ago. Many of our readers will doubtless remember this lady as a very clever seconda donna at Drury Lane, under Captain Polhill's and Mr. Bunn's management. Miss Harriet Cawse was a very popular singer, and was considered an actress of no mean pretensions in her day. Her voice was a mezzo soprano of fine quality, and her vocal attainments not inconsiderable. She appeared on Monday night to be in full possession of her original capabilities, and sang the music, more especially the inimitable barcarole duet, with skill and taste. Mrs. Harriet Cawse will prove an acquisition to our present English operatic corps.

Mr. Webster's new orchestra reckons, we think, eight-and-twenty performers. It is by no means a contemptible force, and might be made a good working one. Mr. Mellon, the conductor, however, must pay more attention to the training of his band. At present they do not amalgamate, and their playing is somewhat loose and independent. On Mr. Mellon himself we cannot confer much praise for his conducting the sparkling music of Auber. Most of the times were taken liberties with, and the nuances, so necessary to be attended to, seldom or never observed. The chorus was not ineffective, but they were generally too timid, and did not "come out strong," as the saying is. The opera was well received, and has been performed three times within the week.

ADELPHI.—An operetta, entitled Good Night, Signor Pantaloon, was produced here on Thursday. The piece and the music (the latter by M. Grisar) are of French origin. The story is slight, but pleasantly conceived and well told. It consists of the adventures of a youth (Lelio, Miss Woolgar), who, concealed in a basket, pays a forbidden visit to his ladye love at the house of an apothecary (Mr. Paul Bedford). The basket is thrown into the canal, but not until the lover has made his escape from it, and hidden himself in a closet. He afterwards swallows, by mistake, a sleeping draught, and, being taken for dead by the poor apothecary, he is deposited under a sofa, upon which piece of furniture his father, Signor Pantaloon, being on a visit to the apothecary, is about to take up his night's rest, when, to the surprise and satisfaction of all parties, the youth starts from his hiding place. The music is, some of it, very pretty, and is chiefly remarkable for its German character. It did not give much promise at first, but a song of Miss Woolgar's, and some concerted music, showed considerable strength of design and treatment. The writer's fault is a disposition to develop his ideas further than he can pursue them with vigour and success. This was the case with the overture, and it occurred more than once in the course of the piece. We shall recur to the subject next week. Ample justice was done to the music, both on the stage and in the orchestra, which, under the direction of Mr. Mellon, has become the most efficient of the minor theatres. Miss Woolgar, as the boyish lover, was as full of scapegrace vivacity as could possibly be wished, and Mr. Bedford's broad grotesque humour kept the audience, as usual, in continual merriment. The burlesque of Taming a Tartar, revived for Mdlle. Celeste's benefit, is, as the reader may know, a burlesque of the well-known farce of The Devil to Pay. The fun of the double transformation is kept up with due spirit by Mdlle. Celeste, as the wife of the basket-maker (cobbler in the original), and Miss Woolgar as the termagant lady, and the agency of the fairy powers, giving occasion for some excellent music and dancing. The piece is likely to become a very successful revival.

Reviews of Music.

"MANDOLINES ESPAGNOLES"—No. 1, LE CARNIVAL—No. 2, LA SERENADE—No. 3, LA DANSE. Adrien Talex. Jullien and Co.

These pieces are evidently written for the sole convenience of learners of moderate taste and moderate capacity, and as such they are not amenable to severe criticism. They are well written and lie easily for the hand, and, though neither the themes nor the passages present any striking novelty, they are suited to the purpose, and if correctly taught, will enable the learner, without any great tax either upon his mind or his fingers, to shine in the social, friendly circle with satisfaction to his parents and credit to his master. M. Adrien Talex's pieces have this distinction, that they look showy but are very easy to play; and this distinction, that there is very little modulation in them; and this distinction, that the benefit derived from their study is to strengthen and equalize the fingers, since there are a great many scales and arpeggio passages, the practice of which tends to this result.

Of the three pieces under the name of "Mandolines Espagnoles," we decidedly prefer the "Serenade," which has a pretty and plaintive, if not very new, theme in A minor, with an episode of some elegance in B flat, and a brilliant coda in A major. The "Carnival," in C major, is bustling and showy, but its general tone is less graceful. It will probably, however, produce a greater effect on the Oloio Polloi, if cleverly executed. "La Danse" is pretty; but somewhat common throughout. It is the easiest of the three, and will in all likelihood sell the best.

"FIRST NOCTURNE."—"SECOND NOCTURNE."—OP. 31.—MUSIDORA.—Polka. ADRIEN TALEXY. Jullien and Co.

The "Nocturnes" have the merit of being simple and unpretending. The title of "Nocturne," judging from the numerous examples that have been given to the world, since John Field of St. Petersburg first set the popularity of this species of solo a-going, always leads us to expect something outrageously difficult, through an insinuating outside, a crowd of trails de bravoure, and impossible applications of the tempo rubato, under the innocent and attractive signatures, piacevole, moderato con sentimento, tempo a piacere, &c.—a sort of Will-o-the-wisps that tempt to a quagmire or a snake's hollow. We have therefore to tender our thanks to M. Talex for having held out no such snares. His Nocturnes are both easy, and both andantino; the first, in F major, is designated amoroso, and this affected epithet is the only charge we have to lay against it, since from first to last it is quite as graceful as it is easy to execute. The vein amorous, however, is not in M. Adrien Talex, nor of him. Let him in the next edition put his pen across the word amoroso, and insert in its place, indifferente. The second Nocturne, in D flat, begins with a nice cantabile for the dexter hand, to which those young players possessed of a good tone will do well to impart tone. This cantabile afterwards appears at the heels of page 2 as an inner subject to a passage of notes reiterated a la Herz with very pleasing effect, and the whole concludes with a coda of arpeggios distributed with considerable speed, which makes a climax of positive apropos. We recommend this nocturne.

The "Musidora Polka" in B flat, requires no recommendation from us, being well known as one of the most popular and one of the most deservedly popular, because one of the "most best" (Hamlet) of the polkas, which have courted and won public applause at the world-renowned concerts of M. Jullien.

On the whole we must pronounce the music of M. Talex as more useful than original, more pretty than profound.

Miscellaneous.

Mr. FRANK BODDA'S MATINEE MUSICALE, was given at the Queen Anne Street Rooms, on Friday, 23d inst. The programme displayed a very judicious distribution of pieces of classical and bravura character, and combined the names of Miss Ransford, Madlle. Graumann, Miss Messent, Miss Birch, and Madame Macfarren, Signor S. Tamburini, Mr. Land, Signor Coleagno, and the concert giver, as vocalists, and Miss Kate Loder and Herr Hausmann, as instrumentalists; Signors Pilotti and Biletta officiating as conductors. A striking feature in the performance was the number of vocal quartets of Knyvett, Festa, Mendelssohn, &c. which were for the most part admirably rendered. Of these we must particularize Signor Biletta's choir, and highly characteristic composition of the "Poveretti," sung with much effect by Miss Ransford, Madame Macfarren, Mr. Land, and Signor S. Tamburini. Mr. Frank Bodda sang with Madame Macfarren the duet from The Sleeper Awakened, "Ah, fatal are those charms," to the highly dramatic character, of which both singers did great justice. He sung also a lied of Lachner, with violoncello accompaniment executed by Herr Hausmann, and the animated barcarole of Ricci,

"Sulla Poppa," in which last he was warmly encored. We have only space to mention of all the other vocal pieces Madame Macfarren's highly impassioned delivery of the exquisitely beautiful song "Zuleika," of Mendelssohn, and the preghiera from the Mose, in which all the artists present assisted. Herr Hausmann played a violoncello fantasia, and Miss Kate Loder a pianoforte version of the most popular "Carnaval de Venise," with their accustomed excellence. The rooms were crowded by a most elegant audience, and the concert went off with unqualified success.

MADAME UGALDE.—The celebrated prima donna of the Opera Comique at Paris will arrive in London to-morrow, to fulfil her engagement at her Majesty's Theatre. We have not ascertained in what opera Madame Ugdale will appear.

MISS LIZZY STUART, AND MR. GEORGE TEDDER, have announced an evening concert at Sussex Hall, for June 3, when they will be assisted by several artists of note, among whom we may mention Mrs. Alexander Newton, Miss Poole, the Misses Cole, and the miraculous contrabassist, Signor Bottesini. Mr. George Tedder is an excellent tenor singer, and popular withal, and his co-partner, Miss Lizzy Stuart, is a graceful and unpretending artist. Both, therefore, are entitled to the support of the public.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The success attendant on the two performances of Mendelssohn's Elijah already given, has induced the announcement of an additional performance on Friday next, the 6th instant. Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Dolby, Miss M. Williams, Miss E. Birch, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Formes will sustain the principal vocal parts.

MR. BOOSE'S Quadrille Band has had the honour of performing at each of her Majesty's State Balls this season.

Mrs. MOWATT, the American authoress and actress, has been performing at the Theatre Royal, Manchester, during the week. Mrs. Mowatt shortly returns to America.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A PROFESSOR—PLYMOUTH—If our correspondent does not object to insert his name we shall be happy to publish his letter.

Advertisements.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGES

FOR Improving the Voice, and removing all Affections of the Throat. Strongly recommended to Clergymen, Singers, Actors, Public Speakers, persons subject to relaxed Throats, and to all persons desirous of cultivating their Voices, and ensuring a good and clear articulation. They have also been found highly beneficial to those afflicted with Nervous, Hysterical, or Stomachic Coughs.

To be had in Boxes, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d. each, of every Medicine Vendor in the kingdom.

Testimonials of their efficacy are published with each Box, from

Mad. Grist	Miss Romer	Mr. Harrison	Mr. J. Barnett
Mad. Persiani	Mad. Albertazzi	Mr. Allen	Mr. George Linley
Mad. Eugénie Garcia	Miss Cooper	Mr. White	Mr. Rodwell
Mrs. Alfred Shaw	Sig. Lablache	Mr. Wess	Mr. Nelson
Miss Rainforth	Sig. Giubilei	Mr. Kroff	&c., &c.

CURES FOR THE UNCURED!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—Cure of a Red Leg of more than sixty years' standing.—Mr. Barker, of No. 5, Graham's Place, Drypool, near Hull, had ulcers on his leg from the age of 18 until upwards of 80, and although for many years he had sought the first advice in the country, nothing was found to cure them. He often suffered excruciating pain for long periods together, which incapacitated him from attending to his business. He had given up all hopes of getting a cure, when at last he was persuaded to try Holloway's Pills and Ointment, which he did, and however wonderful it may appear, the leg was thoroughly healed by their means, and by continuing to use the Pills alone after his leg was well, he has become in health so hale and hearty as now to be more active than most men of fifty. N.B.—The truth of this extraordinary statement can be vouched for by Mr. J. C. Reinhardt, 22, Market Place, Hull. Feb 20th, 1850.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in the following cases:—

Bad Legs	Coco Bay	Contracted and	Lumbago	Scurvy
Bad Breasts	Chiego-foot	Stiff Joints	Piles	Sore-heads
Burns	Chilblains	E'phanthiasis	Rheumatism	Tumours
Bunions	Chapped hands	Fistulas	Scalds	Ulcers
Bite of Mosche-	Corns (Soft)	Gout	Sore Nipples	Wounds
toes and Sand-	Cancers	Glandular Swell-	Sore-throats	Yaws
Flies		ings	Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar), London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 35s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

T. BOOSEY AND CO'S.

NEW VOCAL PUBLICATIONS.

AUBER'S "L'ENFANT PRODIGE."

- | | | |
|------------------------------------|---------|-----|
| 1. Il est un Enfant d'Israel | Romance | 2 0 |
| 2. Doux Sejour | Air | 2 0 |
| 3. Toi qui versas la lumiere | Air | 2 6 |
| 4. Ah dans l'Arabie | Air | 2 6 |

VERDI'S "RIGOLETTO."

- | | | |
|---------------------------------------|-----------|-----|
| 1. Un di se ben Rammemtomì..... | Quartetto | 4 0 |
| 2. Figlio, mio padre..... | Duetto | 4 0 |
| 3. Signori nè principe..... | Duetto | 4 0 |
| 4. Gortigiani, nil razza dannata..... | Aria | 3 0 |
| 5. Questa o quella per me..... | Ballata | 2 0 |
| 6. Parmi veder le lagrime | Aria | 2 6 |
| 7. Care nome che il mio core | Polacca | 2 6 |
| 8. La Donna è mobile | Canzone | 2 0 |

This Opera is considered to be Verdi's Chef D'Œuvre and the finest work produced for some years on the Italian stage.

ROSSINI'S NEW TANTUM ERGO.

For two Tenors and Bass. Performed at Mr. Hullah's Concerts with such immense success. Price 5s., with Piano Accompaniment, or 12s. instrumental score.

MEYERBEER'S ITALIAN ARIETTES

- | | |
|-------------------------|-----------------------------|
| 1. La Violetta | 2. Vola Vola |
| 3. L'Auretta messagiera | 4. Amor |
| 5. Inconsolabile | 6. L'Orfana—(all 2s. each). |

BEETHOVEN'S FIDELIO.

A new edition the finest and most perfect ever published, including every note of the music, with 3 Overtures, an English and German Text and a short memoir of Beethoven. Price 16s., in boards, forming a volume of Boosey's Standard Lyric Drama.

NEW ITALIAN SONGS.

- | | | | |
|-------------------|------------------------------|-----------|-----|
| Verdi..... | Di qua vargando..... | Barcarole | 1 6 |
| — | Quando le sero..... | Romance | 2 6 |
| — | La Tomba è imbetto | Duetto | 3 0 |
| Ronconi | La Solitudine | — | 2 6 |
| — | La Fidanza | Canzone | 2 6 |
| Donizetti | La Sultana | — | 2 0 |
| Niedermeyer | Vieni Elvira..... | Barcarole | 2 0 |
| Tamplini..... | Dormi dormi..... | Serenata | 2 0 |
| — | Fede é Bellezza..... | Duetto | 2 6 |
| Perugini..... | Il Desio..... | Romanza | 2 0 |
| — | L'Angelo Consolatore | Romanza | 2 0 |
| — | Fresca Fontana..... | — | 2 0 |
| — | Il voto del marinajo | Duetto | 2 6 |
| Romancesas..... | (Short Roman Airs)..... | — | — |
| — | Senza Amore duetto..... | — | 2 0 |
| — | La Partenza do..... | — | 2 0 |
| — | La Bella del Soldato do..... | — | 2 0 |

NEW FRENCH SONGS.

All the newest French Romances by Arnaud, Puget, Masini, Henrion, Quidant, &c., are published in Le Chansonnier du Jour, price 1s. each.

NEW GERMAN SONGS.

- | | |
|-------------------------------|-------------|
| 1. On Memory..... | Marschan. |
| 2. O, were my love..... | Oberthür |
| 3. Pretty Bird | Goldberg. |
| 4. On a spring night..... | Curschmann. |
| 6. The Sailor's farewell..... | Bosen. |

All Two Shillings each.

T. BOOSEY AND CO., 28, HOLLES STREET T.

NEW MUSIC.

THE WORLD IS A FAIRY RING, Ballad written by Eliza Cook, composed by Joseph Philip Knight; composer of Beautiful Venice, Gather ye Rosebuds, Ocean Dreams, Song of Early Days, Come away, Cavatina, The Happy day, The Old and New Year, Her cheek was Pale.
London: Z. T. Purday, 45, High Holborn.

CHAULIEU'S PIANOFORTE WORKS.

MESSRS. RÜST and STAHL, being the Sole Proprietors of the Posthumous Works of M. Chaulieu, beg to intimate their intention of publishing them as originally intended by the author—viz., in parts at 5s. each, and which will include the Harmonial Dial, twenty-four sonatas in the twenty-four major and minor keys; having before each one exercise, one prelude, and two improvisations in the same key, specially written for the English schools, six parts of which are already published. And also six other parts, comprising two Books of Studies in the modern style, Morceau de Salon, Album de Bal, &c., 5s. each, or the twelve parts in one volume boards, at £2 2s.

Rüst and Stahl, Pianoforte Manufacturers and Music Publishers, 320, Regent-street, opposite the Royal Polytechnic Institution.

LEE & COXHEAD'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

A NEW PIANOFORTE SCHOOL, by ALBERT KELLER, price 4s.

"We can confidently recommend this Pianoforte Tutor as the best extant: Mr. Keller has adopted the judicious method of arranging the scales and exercises amongst the lessons, by which plan the pupil is taught those essentials without turning to a formal book of scales, &c.,—the fingering is carefully marked without being crowded, and is evidently written by one who has had great experience as a teacher."

Also, "Delices de la Jeunesse," in 12 sets, price 2s. each, written expressly to follow the above Tutor, by C. W. Glover.

London: Lee and Coxhead, 48, Albermarle Street, and all Book and Music Sellers. Catalogues gratis.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate Designs by Brandard, arranged by ALBERT KELLER; the six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

The PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by EDWIN FLOOD. Price 2s.

MUSIC for the ORGAN or HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDEST—a collection of short interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDEST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS.

MUSIC for the FLUTE.

THE AMATEUR FLUTIST—a selection of favorite Airs from the Standard Foreign Operas, arranged in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY NICHOLSON, with an Accompaniment ad lib. for the Violin, Violoncello, and Pianoforte.

THE FLUTIST'S ALBUM—a collection of favorite Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, &c., arranged in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY NICHOLSON, with an Accompaniment ad lib. for the Piano, Violin, and Violoncello.

MUSIC for the VIOLIN.

THE AMATEUR VIOLINIST—A selection of favorite Airs from the Standard Foreign Operas, arranged expressly for the first position of the Violin, in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY FARMER, with an accompaniment ad lib. for the Piano, second Violin, and Violoncello.

THE VIOLINIST'S ALBUM—a collection of favorite Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, &c., arranged expressly for the first position of the Violin, in sets, price 1s. each, by HENRY FARMER, with an Accompaniment ad lib. for the Piano, second Violin, and Violoncello.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Farmer's Violin School." 5s.

SUSSEX HALL, LEADENHALL STREET, CITY.

MISS LIZZY STUART AND MR. GEORGE TEDDER beg to announce their Grand Evening Concert, on Tuesday, June 3rd, 1851. Vocalists:—Mr. Alexander Newton, Miss Lowe, Miss Lizzy Stuart, Miss Cole, Miss C. Cole, Miss S. Lewis, and Miss Poole; Mr. George Tedder, M. Henri Drayton, Herr Mengis, and Mr. Whitworth. Instrumentalists:—Signor Bottesini (his first appearance in the City). This celebrated and unrivalled artiste will perform on the contrabasso, Piano.—Miss Julia Woolf and Miss Eliza Ward; concertina, Master John Ward harp, Mr. Frederick Chatterton; conductors, Mr. Maurice Davies and Mr. Lavenue. Tickets, reserved seats 3s, body of the Hall, 2s, and gallery, 1s. To be had at the Hall, and of Cramer and Beale, Regent Street, the principal music sellers in the City, of Miss Lizzy Stuart, 5, Stamford Villas, Beauvoir Square, Kingland, and also of Mr. George Tedder, 4, Stamford Villas, De Beauvoir Square, Kingland. Concert to commence at eight precisely.

MUSICAL UNION.

HERR HALLE.—This eminent classical pianist is engaged for the remainder of the season. Herr Laub for the 5th, Bottesini for the 6th, and for the Director's Matinée all the available artists of European fame now in London. Vocalists to be expected for the last Matinée of the season. For the Third Extra Matinée, on Tuesday next, Sainton, Deloffre, Hill, Piatti, Hallé, and Bottesini are engaged.
J. ELLA, Director.

MR. CRIVELLI

BEGS to acquaint his friends and the public that a Third Edition of the "ART OF SINGING," enlarged and newly arranged in the form of a Grammatical System of Rules for the Cultivation of the Voice, may be had at his residence, 71, Upper Norton-street, and at all the principal Music-sellers.
• Soon will be ready, the French and German Translation.

Just Published.

CHARLES OLLIVIER'S

ROYAL MUSICAL REPOSITORY AND CIRCULATING
MUSICAL LIBRARY,
41 & 42, NEW BOND STREET.

VOCAL MUSIC.

The Fairest joys are fleetest,	E. J. Loder.	2s.
The Naiade's Call,	C. Pugn.	2s.
I dream of a Land,	C. Pugn.	2s.
The Fairies' meeting,	C. Pugn.	2s.
The Father's death,	Tomasek.	2s.
Henry the Fourth of France,	To Gabrielle.	2s.
The Dying Wife's farewell,	Rungenhagen.	2s.
Fidelity,	Brinley Richards.	2s.

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.

Grande Valse,	J. Rummel.	Solo, 3s.; Duet,	...	4s.
Deux Dramatique—Donna del Lago,	Renaud de Vilbæ	6s.
Fantaisie—Nuit de Noël,	D. Magnus.	2s.
German Illustrations—Six Lieder,	J. Rummel.	in 3 books, each	...	3s.
Zephyr—Nocturne,	W. H. Palmer.	2s.
Six Pensées Musicales,	Kuhe.	4s.

CUCKOO GALOP.

THE CUCKOO GALOP, as played by the Distins with immense success; to be had of the Publisher, Henry Distin, Sax Horn Manufacturer, 31, Cranbourn-street, Leicester-square, London. Price, with Cornet Accompaniments, 3s.; without, 2s. 6d. Sent post free.

SACRED HARMONY.

UNDER the especial PATRONAGE of Her Most Excellent MAJESTY.—Just published, price 31s. 6d.,

H. J. HAYCRAFT'S VOLUME OF SACRED HARMONY.

Contributors:—Kate Loder, Sterndale Bennett, Henry Smart, G. A. Macfarren, Dr. Walmsey, W. H. Holmes, Lovell Phillips, Brinley Richards, C. Lucas, Robert Barnett, &c.

"This is a judicious and interesting publication, containing works of high merit, and altogether possessing an interest not likely to pass hastily away."—Atlas.

London: Addison and Co.; and at the Editor's residence, 32, Queen's-road, Gloucester-gate, Regent's-park.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC BY TALEXY.

JUST published, the following pieces by ADRIEN TALEXY, whose compositions are now extremely popular in Paris and elsewhere.

1st and 2nd Nocturnes	2s.
Musidora Polka, Mazurka	2s. 6d.
Marie Fantaisie Mazurka	2s. 6d.
Flopp	2s.
Marquise Galop	3s.
Diane	2s. 6d.
Érivo Pollio Fantaisie	3s.
La Danse Fantaisie	3s.
La Sérénade	3s.
Le Carnaval	3s.

Jullien & Co., 214, Regent Street.

MOZART'S COMIC TRIO.

THE RIBBON for soprano, tenor, and bass, just published as sung at the Beethoven Quartet Society with the greatest success (see the Times notice of the concert on the 10th inst) at Messrs. Rousselot & Co. 68, Conduit Street, Regent Street, where may be obtained also prospectuses for their new cheap system for tuning the pianoforte, at 12s. per annum, once a month, &c.

MEYERBEER.

CRAMER, BEALE & CO. have just published a set of songs composed by Meyerbeer, the English version to Oliphant, also six new and favourite polkas to Razynske, price 2s. each; 301, Regent Street, and 67, Conduit-street.

HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.HERR ERNST,

Begs to announce that his

GRAND EVENING CONCERT,

Will take place on

MONDAY, JUNE 2nd, 1851.

Principal Vocal Performers.

MISS CATHERINE HAYES.MADLE. ANA ZERR.

(Prima Donna of the Opera, Vienna.)

MADLE. GRAUMANN.MISS BROWNE.*HERR REICHART.

(De Vienne, Premier Tenor del' Opera Imperiale.)

MR. AUGUSTUS BRAHAM.HERR MENGIS.*M. JULES STOCKHAUSEN.*VIOLIN.

Herr ERNST will perform Beethoven's Concerto, Papageno Rondo, and Caprice II Pirata.

PIANOFORTE.

M. SILAS will perform the Andante and Allegro Vivace, from his Concerto in C Minor.

VIOLONCELLO E CONTRA BASSO.

Signor PIATTI and Signor BOTTESINI will perform a duet.

The Orchestra will be selected from the Italian Operas and Philharmonic Concerts. Conductors, MR. LAVENU and MR. ECKERT. Leader, MR. WILLY.

Commence at 8 o'clock. Reserved Seats 10s. 6d., Tickets 7s. To be had at Cramer, Beale and Co., 201 Regent Street.

MISS CATHERINE HAYES

AND

MDLLE. JENNY LIND.

THE ONLY English Ballads sung by the above distinguished vocalists are, "Those happy days are gone," by Lavenue; "Why do I weep for thee," by Wallace; "O sing to me," by Osborne; and "My last thoughts of thee," by Maynard, sung by Miss Hayes; "Take this lute," by Benedict; "Oh, summer morn," by Meyerbeer; and the "Lonely Rose," by Balfe, sung by Mdle. Lind.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

THALBERG	Irish Airs.
SCHULZ	Méridie.
PRAEGER	Liebes Verlangen.
PRAEGER	Moment Joyeux.
RICHARDS	Moonlight Serenade.
RICHARDS	Pastorale.
RICHARDS	Danish Air.
ROCHEL	Clotilde.
BRISSEN	L'Arabesque.
KUHE	Styriennes.
OUHY	Les Pleurs du Priatems.
OUHY	Un Souvenir.
MORI	Romance sans Paroles.
MORI	Pensées Pendant l'Absence.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

FIDELIO.

WESSEL and CO.'S complete Edition (with English words) of this celebrated Opera, now performing at Her Majesty's Theatre and the Royal Italian Opera, may be procured by order at all the Music Libraries.

The Grand Scene, "O monster."—Sung by Madlle. Cravelli, ... 3s. 6d.

The Prison Air, "Oh! what dreary Gloom"—Sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, ... 3s. 6d.

The Grand Duet, "No greater Bliss"—Sung by Madlle. Cravelli and Mr. Sims Reeves ... 2s. 6d.

The Grand Trio, "Take heart, my son," ... 4s. 6d.

The Chorus of Prisoners, "Oh! what delight," ... 4s. 6d.

The Overture to Fidelio, for piano solo ... 3s. 6d.

Leonore, piano duet, ... 5s. 6d.

Wessel and Co., 229, Regent-street.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published,

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTE.

Publishers: Rudall, Rose & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 210 Regent-street; Keith and Prowse, 48, Cheap-side; and Cocks & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. SOIREEES EXTRAORDINAIRES.

The Week's Performances will include the talents of Madame SONTAG, Mdle. CAROLINE DUPREZ, Mde. FIORENTINI, Mde.
GIULIANI, Mdle. IDA BERTRAND, and Mdle. SOPHIE CRUVELLI; Mdle. MONTI;
Signori GARDONI, CALZOLARI, PARDINI, POULTIER, and SIMS REEVES;
Signori LABLACHE, MASSOL, F. LABLACHE, CASANOVA, SCAPINI,
LORENZO, FERRANTI, and COLETTI;
Miles. CARLOTTA GRISI, AMALIA FERRARIS,
Miles. Ross, Espar, Julien, Lamoureux, Allegrini, Kolenberg, Aussandon, Pascales, Dantonie, Soto;
MM. Charles, Ehrick, Gosselin, and Paul Taglioli.

Tuesday, June 3, 1851—LE TRE NOZZE, and L'ILE DES AMOURS.
Wednesday, June 4th—FIDELIO, and Second, Third, and Fifth Acts of GUSTAVUS III. Including the Grand Divertissement and Ball Scene.
Thursday, June 5th—DON PASQUALE, a Divertissement, the Last Act of LUCIA DI LAMMERMOON, and LES COSMOPOLITES.
Friday, June 6th—GRAND SOIREE EXTRAORDINAIRE, the particulars of which will be duly announced.

MRS. ANDERSON'S ANNUAL GRAND MORNING CONCERT.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY,
THE QUEEN.

MRS. ANDERSON

(Pianiste to Her Majesty the Queen, and Musical Instructress to Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal.)

Has the honour to inform her Patrons and Friends, that her Annual Grand

MORNING CONCERT

Will take place at the ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN,

ON FRIDAY, JUNE 20th, 1851,

Commencing at Half-past One o'clock precisely,

On which occasion, by an arrangement effected with the Directors, (in addition to several eminent Performers,) she is enabled to engage

ALL THE PRINCIPAL ARTISTES, AND ALSO THE

MAGNIFICENT BAND AND CHORUS

(Conducted by MR. COSTA)

OF THAT UNRIVALLED ESTABLISHMENT.

Full particulars will be speedily announced. Tickets and Boxes to be had of Mrs. Anderson, 21, Manchester Street, Manchester Square; at the Box Office of the Theatre, and at the principal Music Sellers and Libraries. Mrs. Anderson respectfully solicits an early application for Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets.

QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, HANOVER SQUARE.

MISS MESSENT AND MR. HERBERTE

BEG to announce that they will give a Grand Evening Concert at the above Rooms, on Friday the 6th of June, 1851, to commence at 8 o'clock. Vocalists—Mdle. Bertha Johannsen, Mdle. Graumann, Miss Poole, Mdle. Lavinia, Miss Browne, Miss Mesent; Herr Fischel, Mr. Frank Bodda, Signor Marchesi, Mr. Herberte. Instrumentalists—Pianoforte, Mdle. Coulon and Madame Goffrie; Violin, Herr Goffrie; Violoncello, Signor Piatti; Concertina, Signor Giulio Rigondi. Conductors—M. Frelon, Signor Billella, Mr. Robert Green. Tickets, 7s. 6d., Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; to be had of Miss Mesent, 8, Stratton Street, Piccadilly, Mr. Herberte, 43, Upper Seymour Street, Portman Square, and at the principal Music Warehouses.

MESSRS. H. & R. BLAGROVE'S

FIRST QUARTETT and SOLO CONCERT will take place on Thursday morning next, June 5th, at the Concert Rooms, 71, Mortimer Street, at 3 o'clock. Performers—Miss Ramsford, Madame Verdavanne; Messrs. H. Blagrove, Dando, Watson, Clementi, E. Blagrove, Rice, Hausmann, Guest, and J. L. Hutton.

Subscription Tickets for the Series, £1; Reserved Ditto, £1 10s. To be had only of Messrs. Cramer and Beale, and Messrs. Blagrove, 71, Mortimer Street. Single Tickets, 4s.; Reserved ditto, 6s.; and Family Tickets to admit three to one Concert, 10s.; Reserved ditto, 14s.; to be had at all the principal Music shops.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, Mr. COSTA.—FRIDAY NEXT, June 6, the third performance of Mendelssohn's ELIJAH. Vocalists—Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss E. Birch, Miss Dolby, Miss M. Williams; Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Formes. The orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 performers. Tickets, 3s.; reserved, 5s.; central area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter-hall; or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing-cross.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

FIRST NIGHT OF LA FAVORITA.

GRISI, TAMBERLIK, TAGLIAFICO, MARIO.

ON TUESDAY NEXT, JUNE 3rd, will be performed for the first time these three years, Donizetti's Opera,

LA FAVORITA,

With a splendid Mise en Scene, new Scenery, Costumes, &c.

Leonora,	Madame GRISI.
Inez,	Mdlle. COTTI.
Baldassare,	Signor TAGLIAFICO.
(His first appearance in that character).
Don Gasparo,	Signor SOLDI.
Alfonso XI.,	Signor TAMBERLIK.
(His first appearance in that character).
Ferdinando,	Signor MARIO.

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor,—MR. COSTA.

COMMENCE AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre.

GRAND EXTRA NIGHT.

SIGNOR TAMBURINI.

On THURSDAY NEXT, June 5th, a Grand Extra Night will take place, on which occasion Signor Tamburini will make his first appearance this season.

Full particulars will be duly announced.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

SIGNOR TAMBURINI.

THE DIRECTORS have great gratification in announcing that they have succeeded in effecting an engagement with Signor Tamburini, who, having been induced for the present to abandon his intention of visiting Italy, will, during the remainder of the season, sustain his most celebrated parts in the repertoire of the Royal Italian Opera.

Signor Tamburini will make his first appearance on Thursday next, June 5th.

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS

HAS the honour to announce that he will give two morning performances of Classical and Modern Pianoforte Music, at the New Beethoven Rooms, on Monday, June 23, and Wednesday, July 9th. Miss Catherine Hayes, Herr Ernst, Signor Piatti, and Signor Bottesini. Pianofortes Mr. Cipriani Potter, Mr. W. H. Holmes, and Mr. Brinley Richards. Subscription tickets one guinea, single tickets eight shillings; to be had of all music sellers.

HERR MOLIQUE'S

THIRD and last Concert of Chamber Music will take place on Wednesday evening, June 4th, at the New Beethoven Rooms, 37, Queen Anne Street, to commence at half-past eight o'clock. Vocalists, Mdle. Bertha Johannsen, and Herr Stockhausen. Instrumentalists, Mdle. Molique, Signor Bricealdi, Signor Piatti, Mr. Mellon, Herr Witt, Herr Molique, and Herr Schmidt. Triple ticket one guinea, single ticket half a guinea, to be had at Messrs. Cramer & Co. Regent Street; Ewer & Co., Newgate Street; and of Herr Molique, 9, Houghton Place, Amthill Square.

HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.

M. ALEXANDRE BILLET begs to announce a SERIES of THREE MORNING CONCERTS of CLASSICAL PIANOFORTE and VOCAL MUSIC, on MONDAYS, June the 2nd, 16th, and 30th, to commence at Three o'clock. Vocalists—Mme. Anna Thillon, Herr Stigelli, Herr Julius Stockhausen. Tickets, for a Single Concert, 5s.; Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; Subscription Ticket for the Series to the Reserved Seats, One Guinea. To be had of Wessel and Co., 229, Regent-street, and at the principal Musiciansellers.

PROGRAMME OF THE FIRST CONCERT.
MONDAY, JUNE 2nd.

PART FIRST.

- | | |
|---|-----------|
| 1. SONATA in A major, Op. 101 | Beethoven |
| 2. AIR, "De la prise de Jericho," (the "Fall of Jericho,") Mme. THILLON | Mozart. |
| 3. TROCKENE BLUMEN, ("Ye flowers all, that to me she gave") Herr STIGELLI | Schubert. |
| 4. POLACCA in E major (P'harité) | Weber. |

PART SECOND.

- | | |
|---|--------------|
| 5. RONDO CAPRICIOSO in E minor, Op. 14 | Mendelssohn. |
| 6. ROMANCES FRANCAISES, Mme. THILLON. | |
| 7. OB SIE WOHL KOMMEN WIRD! ("If she will come to pray upon my grave"), Herr STIGELLI | Stigelli. |
| 8. SELECTION OF STUDIES— | |
| A minor | Steibelt. |
| C major | Moschies. |
| F minor, Op. 25 | Chopin. |
| E major (Pezzo di bravura) | Potter. |
| E minor (Toccata) | Kalkbrenner. |

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Scrudley Villas, Studley Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Purkess, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, May 31, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Messrs. Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden.

No. 23—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, JUNE 7, 1851.

PRICE FOURPENCE.

CRUVELLI.

The reputation of the new prima donna at Mr. Lumley's establishment is now settled beyond controversy. Sophie Cruvelli has shown herself to be a dramatic singer of extraordinary genius, an actress scarcely inferior, if inferior to any. She has appeared in two characters, essentially different in every respect—Fidelio and Norma. Fidelio is the grandest part in German opera, Norma the grandest in Italian opera. Had Cruvelli only played one of them, the partisans of the opposite school might reasonably conclude that she was unequal to the other. But she has played both, and succeeded in both. She has but one thing now to do, to constitute her in the estimation of the public, an artist without a superior. Having triumphed in Fidelio and in Norma, failure in any thing else is unlikely. She must yet, however, achieve another step, to stamp her talent as universal. We have a lively remembrance of her Rosina, three years ago. Cruvelli must play Rosina, must sing "Una voce," and declare herself, what we firmly believe her, as great a comic as a tragic singer. We have every confidence in the result. Our first prophecy was fulfilled, why not the next?

We have said so much about Cruvelli's Fidelio that we have nothing left to remark. Her Norma, however, has opened a new field for speculation. It is not a more admirable and interesting than an original impersonation, bearing no resemblance whatever to the Norma of Pasta, Malibran, or Grisi. It is Cruvelli's Norma, and to make anything absolutely new out of Norma denotes, a priori, a high intelligence and a splendid talent. Cruvelli has recreated it. Norma, in her hands, is all but one of Shakspeare's women—not more sublime than human, not less passionate than grand. We have no comparisons to suggest; comparisons are unnecessary and obtrusive. We conclude with the simple assertion that, as a display of dramatic and vocal qualities of the loftiest order, the Norma of Cruvelli has not been surpassed in our time. It has possibly its faults, its weaknesses; but these only bring out its transcendent beauties in more splendid colours.

Our readers will, perhaps, understand why we have referred so often, and at such length, to the début of Cruvelli. There are many admirable singers whose position can be endangered by no new comer. But the apparition of real genius in the person of one so young and accomplished is a theme for hope and gratulation. Times have changed. The Italian star shines no longer alone in the heavens. New things are wanted—new operas as well as new singers. Who is to write them? Auber will not budge from Paris; Rossini remains lazily at Bologna; Meyerbeer is intractable; Mendelssohn is no more. There is no one in Italy, no one in Germany. The managers, then, must perforce look to England; and which of our composers would not be delighted to compose an opera for Sophie Cruvelli?

FIDELIO.

The reproduction of this masterpiece, in a somewhat new form and under circumstances of the greatest interest with which the rivalry of the two colossal establishments, that, under the name of "Italian Opera Houses," find at least half their support in the performance of French and German compositions, by German, French, Italian, and even English artists, can invest it, justifies a reconsideration of the only dramatic work of Beethoven, and an examination of its unbroken chain of beauties, which, since the first performance of the opera in this country, have kindled the purest delights, and stimulated the proudest aspirations of those musicians who, however sneered at by critics incapable of appreciating what merit they may possess, have striven artistically and not ineffectually to form an English school of dramatic music.

An article in a recent number of the Musical World entered at such length into the history of Fidelio as to leave nothing to be said upon this part of the subject.

Of the present performances of the opera at the Italian theatres it is not the province nor the purpose of this paper to speak. But of the novelty of form under which the masterpiece of dramatic music is now placed before the public, there are two things to be adduced. Firstly, the effect of the music suffers immensely from the translation of the text. This is equally the case, more or less, with all the operas that are the most attractive in the repertory of both the theatres devoted to Italian performances in this metropolis; but we feel that the injury done to Fidelio rises in importance with the superiority of the original to all other works that are brought forward under the same disadvantageous circumstances. In proportion to the difference in the degrees of merit of La Fille du Regiment and Fidelio, and to the difference in the art-standard by which these, and the variously styled operas of Auber, Rossini, Donizetti, Meyerbeer and Weber are to be estimated, is the extent of the injury done to their musical expression and general effect, by performing them with other words than those to which the composers set them. This objection would fall to the ground, or at least be considerably weakened, were they translated into English, since the advantage of having the general sense rendered intelligible to an English audience would, in some sort, counterbalance the disadvantage of having the particular expression occasionally distorted, and the sound of the whole modified or entirely changed. The objection would be also, in a certain degree, untenable, were the performance entrusted exclusively to Italian singers, on the pretext of the difficulty experienced in singing in a foreign language—although this difficulty should not be greater for them than it is actually for the German, French, and English vocalists, who take the most important characters in the opera, to sing in Italian. Secondly, the interpolation of recitatives, however well they may be composed, is strangely out of place, and no argument can sanction their introduction. The question is not whether Mr. Balfe or Mr. Costa be competent to make additions to a work of Beethoven. We will take it for granted that the interpolations are the best that could possibly be written; they are not the less obtrusive. Fidelio is written expressly with a view to the dialogues being spoken, not sung. They are so short and concise, as to expedite and relieve the several pieces, without dividing them so as to qualify the musical character of the work, or even break the connection between them. The music is made so to grow out of the dialogues as to suggest the evident idea that Beethoven took into consideration the speaking as an essential feature in the general design of his work, and we cannot but feel this on hearing a complete performance. In those most impassioned situations which afford scope for the highest musical expression, Beethoven has written recitatives—namely, before the grand aria of Leonore in the first act, and before the grand aria of Florestan in the second; also in a piece of plain declamation which has nothing to express, but to speak which would interrupt the continuity of an extended musical design. Beethoven has also written recitative in the solo of the Minister in the last finale. The introduction of other recitatives materially impairs the effect of these. In three places in the opera it is of absolute and paramount importance that the words should be spoken, not sung; the composer's intention being entirely frustrated by the alteration, and the wonderful dramatic effect of the original ruined. These are, first, the accompanied dialogue that precedes the duet in A minor in the prison scene, in which, as Beethoven wrote the accompaniment, and directed that the words should be spoken, there cannot be the slightest doubt of his intention: second, in the grand quartet, when, after the action has been interrupted by the sounding of the trumpet, Jacquino comes breathless to announce the arrival of the Minister, the effect of which, spoken, is beyond all description thrilling, but sung, no less indescribably tame; and third, the two lines spoken by Florestan and Leonore, between the quartet and the duet in G, which separate them in a manner so obviously intentional, that we have the right to speak of it as in the highest degree masterly. The tumultuous character of the former is divided from the rapturous feeling of the latter piece, by these two lines, which, being sung or—which is as bad—omitted, these two movements, so remote from each other in sentiment, but so closely related in key and so like in tempo, become joined together as one piece of music, and the effect of monotony takes the place of the most powerful possible contrast. One more argument, or rather another stubborn fact, against the propriety of these interpolations, is all but all-powerful; namely, that they greatly lengthen the opera, and, by giving undue proportion to the unimportant parts, materially impair the effect of the whole, and weaken the music of Beethoven. As nothing can possibly be said to justify the introduction of the ophicleide, long drum, and cymbals, into the elaborately complete score of Beethoven, we shall leave that matter to those whom it may concern, to settle accounts with their own conscience, and make the best of it. We proceed to consider Fidelio as it is, not as it is represented.

We have no hesitation in calling Fidelio the most perfect opera with which we are acquainted, and this we say with the immortal Don Giovanni, and a very familiar knowledge of its unexceptionable beauties, staring us in the face. This assertion requires explanation. Don Giovanni is a collection of pieces, all of the highest beauty, and all complete in themselves. That these several pieces are not designed with any especial regard to general relationship, individual contrast, or the completeness, the entirety of the whole, is proved—first by the evidence of the general effect; second, by the habitual omission of one or many of the pieces, without any injury to the consistency of the whole; and lastly, by the fact of Mozart having written a large number of pieces for occasional introduction, which constitute the appendix of the old printed scores, and which he would not have written had he been satisfied that the perfection of the original was such as to be destroyed by anything added or anything taken away. Fidelio, on the contrary, is written with an obvious design to form a complete whole; and this design is materially injured, if not wholly destroyed, by any omission or interpolation. Not only does the earnestness of the music increase, from first to last, with the increasing earnestness of the dramatic action; not only do the various pieces powerfully relieve each other, by contrast of form or of colouring, or by a continuation of the same feeling with a modified expression; not only do the elaborations of the musician, so richly crowded into the early pieces of the opera, yield entirely before the sway of the composer's imagination, as the more impassioned portions of the story are unfolded by the loftier emotions of the characters developed; each and all of these, and yet other points of design which our readers will easily recognise in the course of our analysis, indicate the intention of the composer to make a complete whole—not a collection of distinct pieces—and will, we believe, justify our assertion that Beethoven has succeeded, to a greater extent than any other composer whose operas have been given in England, in holding our attention from the first note to the last, by a chain of ever-growing power, and in producing a perfect lyric drama.

There are two points in which, to a superficial observer, the Fidelio may appear inferior to the great operatic masterpieces of Mozart—first, the comparative rarity of rhythmical tune; second, the less decidedly individual character of the several personages of the drama. To the first of these it may be well answered; that, though there may be rarity of tunes, there is no scarcity of melody of the most intellectual, refined, and impassioned character; and that the tunes, beyond expression beautiful, as they are, of "La ci darem," and "Vedrai carino," would be as wholly out of place in the exciting situations of Fidelio, as they would be in Donna Anna's cry of despair over the dead body of her father, or the awful entry of the Ghost in the supper scene of Don Giovanni. The concentrated interest of Fidelio to our feeling, and the unexceptionable fitness of every phrase to its situation, more than atone for the absence of sparkling lightness of character in the music. For the second point there is also a justification, which admits of deeper metaphysical discussion than we are able or disposed to undertake, but which may open a fruitful field for future speculation. It is only in the indifferent matters of life that powerful varieties of character manifest themselves; in situations of the highest passion all men employ the same expression. On this ground we feel it to be entirely true to dramatic propriety, that, after the unimpassioned pieces of the early scenes, in which the personality of Rokko, Marcelline, and Jacquino is distinctly portrayed, Beethoven should have confined himself to the expression of the words, in which he has been almost unprecedently successful, without attempting to individualise the characters of the different persons.

ERNST'S CONCERT.

THE Hanover Square Rooms were filled to overflowing on Monday night; the great violinist, in addition to his own services, having engaged the invaluable assistance of Miss Catherine Hayes, Signora Piatti and Bottesini, Mr. Augustus Braham, and others of lesser note. An excellent band was also provided, and the programme presented a highly attractive front. Much interest was attached to the fact that Ernst had written two new cadences for Beethoven's violin concerto, which he was announced to play, and all the connoisseurs and amateurs of the violin at present in London, flocked to the concert in consequence. The performance opened with the overture to Der Freischütz, played by the band in a most spirited and effective manner. Miss Browne manufactured the two exquisite airs from Otello, "Assisa a un pie d'un salice," and "Deh! calma, O ciel," into a sort of scena, without producing much effect. This young lady, who is not devoid of talent, should chasten her tendency to exaggeration. She should also be warned that a voice forced in the upper register loses its quality and power below. Mlle. Ana Zer sang the air of the Queen of Night, from the Zauberflöte, with such power and extent of voice as to elicit an encore. The singing of this lady is more extraordinary than agreeable. The great event of the evening was Beethoven's concerto. Ernst was never in finer force, in more magical play; he seemed to rise with his subject, and to be inspired by it. Ernst is the most impulsive of violinists, and hence his performances do not always indicate his utmost resources. On the present occasion he flung his whole mind and determination into his playing. He was listened to with breathless attention. Beethoven's concerto is a work full of inspiration, and is extremely complicated—elaborate, in parts. To the solo player it offers but few points for display; hence the reason for Ernst writing the cadences. But to write cadences for Beethoven's music and not to sacrifice Beethoven was a task of no easy accomplishment, and hazardous withal. Ernst, however, who is a thorough musician at heart, and entertains the profoundest sympathies for Beethoven's inspirations, had no difficulty to succeed. He wrote the cadences con amore, and, while considering the practicability of introducing every possible difficulty into his playing, never lost sight of the character and style of his author. The concerto itself was played magnificently. Ernst's power and breadth of tone were more conspicuous than ever, and his phrasing and expression as inimitable. The first cadence is of great length, but had it been twice as long it would have been doubly interesting, so wrapped were the audience in its dazzling effect. Henceforth let no one prate of wonders. Ernst, in his new cadences has mastered impossibilities. Some of the effects are creations, no one ever heard them before. Paganini might have had a vision of them on his death-bed, but posterity will owe them to Ernst. Shall we attempt to describe them? Shall we catch the rainbow, or transfix the wailing of an Eolian harp? As soon could we do one as the other, therefore we shall not essay either. Enough to say it is Ernst's most astonishing feat, and having said so, our readers may have some idea of the prodigious difficulties mastered with infinite ease by the prodigious violinist. Ernst's two other performances were the Rondo Papageno, and the Pirata fantasia. Of these—both composed by the great violinist himself—we have spoken so frequently that there is no need to enlarge upon their beauties as compositions, or the brilliancy of effect produced in the playing. Ernst retired after the concerto with the most tremendous applause, and was recalled by the entire audience. He was also immensely applauded in the rondo and fantasia.

Catherine Hayes may be emphatically styled the Queen of the Concert Room. The fair and accomplished artist must accept the term, part in compliment, part in reproach, seeing that she has not, since she achieved her triumphant success in Ireland and Rome, given us an opportunity of descanting on her great and acknowledged talents on the stage. It is our loss, and that of the public in general, that Catherine Hayes has not lent her powerful aid to one of the Italian Opera Houses. But we must be satisfied with what we get in the concert room, the more especially as the time is fast approaching when the "Irish Swan" sails for America, and will leave so many behind her to regret her departure. That Catherine Hayes will take Yankeeland by storm we have no doubt, and, with fair play for the Irish prima donna, we prognosticate as resounding and legitimate a success for her as was ever earned by singer. Catherine Hayes has claims to the favor and countenance of the Americans, to which few others have any pretensions. She is Irish, and that is enough to make her obtain a very caed mille falha of a welcome. May her successes be interminable, and may the bright star of Erin shed a light and a glory from north to south throughout the Great Western Continent. Above all, may she not be lost in the prairies, or devoured in the effulgence of one of Barnum's Comets, but return to us light in heart, weighed down by dollars, with her voice beautiful, and ripened by the Columbian gales. Whoever heard Catherine Hayes sing on Monday evening would have set down the last wish as entirely useless, since her voice seemed to stand in no need of improvement. She sang admirably, nay, magnificently; and produced an immense sensation. The "Ah! mon fils" (given by particular desire, in consequence of the impression created at her own concert), was rendered with irresistible effect, and set off the extensive compass of her voice and her dramatic energy to the greatest advantage. The clearness and brilliancy of the upper notes contrasted strongly with the power and depth of the contralto voice. Catherine Hayes invariably sings in tune. Of how many singers can this be affirmed? Her second song was the famous "Ah! non giunge," in which she essayed a totally different style of vocalization. Few essays in the brilliant school of singing could surpass this display. The feats of floriture were dazzling, and the long shake towards the end, spun out to the finest vocal thread, was quite magical. Loud and general applause followed both of Catherine Hayes's efforts, and she was recalled with enthusiasm after each.

Mr. Augustus Braham sang "Deeper and Deeper Still," and exhibited his magnificent voice to the greatest advantage.

Mlle. Graumann introduced a very pleasing and attractive ballad by F. Mori, which she sang tastefully and with expression. Madame Marra gave two lieder by an unknown composer, and displayed a charming soprano voice, and considerable musical feeling. Herr Reichart was favourably received in a Romance by Pacini, and M. Stockhausen sang two lieder by Mendelssohn and Schubert.

A duetto for violoncello and contra basso, by the two lion performers, Piatti and Bottesini, created a furor. It was as though—to depart from our lion metaphor—a rhinoceros contended with an elephant, and neither could obtain the mastery. Such an instrumental trial of strength was perhaps never before witnessed, Had Paganini come to life, and fiddle in hand encountered Ernst, the struggle for priority could scarcely have excited more interest, or created more applause. Each artist was on his metal, and surpassed himself. Italian art was never made more manifest, or rendered more triumphant than on this occasion. To describe the performance is impossible; to describe the effect on the audience is equally impossible. Not dealing in impossibilities we shall attempt neither, but consign both to the imagination of our readers.

M. Silas played the andante and finale from his concerto in C minor, and was ably assisted by the band. The two movements are excellent specimens of the young and talented composer's style.

In addition to the overture to Der Freyschutz, the band performed a MS. overture by Mr. Lavenu—a clever and spirited work—and the march from A Midsummer Night's Dream. Mr. Lavenu and Mr. Eckert conducted: Mr. Willy led.

HOELZEL.

Herr Hoelzel, one of the popular song composers of Germany, who is also favourably known as a concert-singer, laves to-morrow for Vienna. He has been in London some weeks, attracted, like so many of his compatriots, by the Great Exhibition of all Nations. Wherever Herr Hoelzel has sung he has been well received, and his compositions have been much admired. Three of them are before us, two to English and one to German words—"Quick, we have but a second," a drinking song; "My heart is far at sea," a ballad; and "Im Kahne," a lied. They are to be admired, not merely for their lively and fluent melody, but for the manner, at once simple and effective, in which the pianoforte accompaniments are written. Our favourite of the three is the drinking song, which is remarkable for spirit and geniality; but all of them merit the attention of our public vocalists, who too often throw away their ability on much inferior music.

Dramatic Intelligence.

FRENCH PLAYS.—ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—If we have not heralded the arrival of Mdlle. Rachel as we did some few years back, it is not that we appreciate the great tragédienne less; the contrary is the fact, for the more we see her, the more do we find subject for praise; the more we study her acting, the more astonished are we at the perfection revealed. But we have of late years got so accustomed to her yearly visit that we take it as a matter of course, and in consequence treat her as people do their best friends, without ceremony and with a hearty welcome. On Monday last, Mdlle. Rachel made her first appearance this season, in the character of Phédre. We know of no part in which the great actress appears to better advantage, as well from the interest of the piece itself, which contains more action than is usually found in French tragedy, as from the varied nature of the part, requiring a complete command of the most tender as well as of the most violent emotions, and demanding in the actress a continuous exertion to sustain the character. We have at various times dwelt on the piece, now as well known in this country as any of those of Shakspeare (would that he could find such an interpreter!) we shall therefore in the present instance confine ourselves exclusively to Mdlle. Rachel's interpretation of her part, recording such new effects as more mature study has developed in her acting. Phédre appears in the second scene overwhelmed with sorrow and despair, and yielding to the prayer of Oenone confides to her, her love for Hippolyte. Mdlle. Rachel threw a powerful interest into this long description of her struggles between love and remorse. She seemed as one who is exhausted by a gigantic effort in which the nerves have been completely shattered, and who feels predestined to some horrible fate; her whole frame thrilled with emotion when in the narrative of her sufferings any allusion was made to the object of her guilty passion. Terrified at the greatness of her iniquity, and yet appears powerless to avert her destiny. There was a world of unutterable woe in the trembling, hollow accents with which she uttered her last resolve, "Soleil, je te viens voir pour la dernière fois," which was given in a tone of anguish which created a strong feeling of compassion for this victim of the hatred of Venus, we had almost said of sympathy, which is still further heightened when she describes the tortures she has undergone, and her fruitless efforts to conquer her incestuous love. A fine burst of passion followed the mention by Oenone of the name of Hippolyte, and the triumph was so much the more meritorious in the actress, that the passage itself is mere clap-trap. The declaration of her love, in the second act, was distinguished by the most exquisite and most delicate nuances of tenderness and feeling. It is in such efforts that Mdlle. Rachel seems to us to have made marked progress, by a more complete elaboration of the details of the character. Undoubtedly her violent passages were delivered with no diminution of pathos or energy; but in those delicate touches which mark the more subtle working of the inward soul—in those scenes where the poet has scarcely dared to cope with his subject, in which, indeed, language is unable to express the sensations or delineate the outpourings and yearnings of the heart—in scenes like this declaration of her passion, in which she dares not boldly speak out, for the tongue refuses to divulge the feelings which wander on the lips, and yet are ever uppermost in the mind—we marked the improved genius of Mdlle. Rachel, and found that she had invested her impersonation with a more touching, a more tender, a more womanly character. Mdlle. Rachel not only utters the words written by Racine, but also conveys his hidden meaning—she fills up the portrait which he could only sketch out, and makes of it a most finished, a perfect ensemble. It is not in her words alone that we find the declaration of her burning passion, her love is best depicted in her eyes, in her attitude, in her gestures. She is by turns eloquent and tender, submissive and haughty; she pleads for her son's life, but—and here we mark the admirable tact of the actress—her words fell coldly from her lips; her appeal was passionless; she clearly conveyed that this was a mere pretence, and that the real object of her discourse was to raise a reciprocal feeling in the breast of Hippolyte. How admirably she expressed the first dawns of her affection; how delicately she explained her assumed hatred; and as she warmed with her subject, her love seemed to ooze out from every pore—from her flashing eye—from her suppliant hands—from her quivering limbs—as she bent forward to catch the faintest shadow of hope; and more than all, how bitter her despair and anguish when repulsed! How thrilling were her accents when she exclaimed—"Ah! cruel, tu m'as trop entendu." This scene was wound up to the highest pitch of horror when she snatched the sword from the scabbard and rushed forth to kill herself. This scene, we say again, was a master-piece of conception; it was elaborated with consummate tact and a powerful appreciation of character, joined to a perfect sentiment of the situation. It was remarkable by a minute attention to details which contributed to form a most complete whole. The same remarks apply also to the third act, when she learned the arrival of Theseus. The horror at this accumulation of crime was painted with startling truthfulness nor was her jealousy on being apprised of the love of Hippolyte for Aricie less fearfully portrayed. Mdlle. Rachel's delivery of the soliloquy with her immortal ancestors, in the fourth act, was sublime. No words can give the faintest idea of her reading of what is perhaps one of the finest conceptions in the French language. The passage commences with "Ou me cacher." We shall never forget the terror depicted on her countenance, when she fancies herself in presence of her ancestor, Minos, awaiting his sentence; nor the prostration of all animation when she appears before Theseus and confesses her crime, after having taken the deadly poison. Loud and continuous applause was bestowed on Mademoiselle Rachel, and when the curtain fell, a simultaneous burst of enthusiasm recalled the great actress before the audience. On Wednesday, Bajazet was performed, Madlle. Rachel taking the part of Roxane. This selection was judicious inasmuch as this part gives an opportunity for a display of one of Madlle. Rachel's great characteristics,—her cutting irony, which was admirably developed in the scene of reproach and recrimination which follows her discovery of the infidelity of Bajazet. The tender scenes were equally well portrayed; but the triumph of the actress was undoubtedly her sortez, which she uttered with intense violence and ungovernable fury. The suspicious character of Roxane, her penetration in detecting the hostile designs of her adversaries, her contempt of the consequences of her actions, were exhibited by the actress with wonderful tact, and presented an unrivalled triumph in histrionic art. Not a seat was unoccupied in the house; and the audience composed of the élite of European society, however much at variance on other questions, were on these occasions united in heart and soul in applauding this child of genius, this impersonation of the tragic muse.

J. de C—.

PRINCESS'S.—Dumas's play, "Madlle. de belle Isle" has already become, through the influence of Rachel and the French Theatre, pretty well known to the dramatic circles of London. The piece, a translation of which under the title of "The Duke's Wager," was produced here on Wednesday, is written with even more than the usual ingenuity of construction peculiar to French dramas of the kind. For the benefit of such of our readers as may not have seen the French play, we give a brief abstract of the story, which turns on the jealousy manifested by a young officer, Laon St. Mars (Mr. C. Kean) towards Lestelle, his betrothed wife (Mrs. C. Kean). The profligate, although not altogether heartless, Duke of Richelieu (Mr. A. Wigan) has laid a wager that he will obtain a midnight interview with the young lady in her own apartment. This interview, the Marchioness de St. Prie (Mrs. Winstanley), a discarded mistress of the Duke, is resolved to prevent. Lestelle has a father confined in the Bastille. The Marchioness, by means of the signet ring of the Duke of Bourbon, the prime minister, obtains for Lestelle, the privilege of visiting her father in the Bastille, on the very night that the Duke's wager is to be decided. Having thus secured the absence of her protégé, she contrives, by means of a darkened room, to pass herself on the Duke for Lestelle. Richelieu fancies he has triumphed, and a boastful letter that he writes on the occasion, falling into the hands of Laon, his suspicions are strongly excited against Lestelle, who, being unable to exculpate herself, by reason of a promise not to divulge her visit to the Bastille, lest it should place the Marchioness in danger, is thrown into an agony of perplexity and confusion, which is redoubled when a ring is produced by the Duke, which he has obtained in the dark from the Marchioness's hand, and which Lestelle had exchanged with her for the Minister's signet, which was to obtain admission to her father. Laon now leaves her and challenges the Duke, but as they are prevented from fighting by the interposition of the authorities, they determine to decide their quarrel with the dice-box, the loser in three throws engaging to destroy himself within six hours. The chance is against Laon, who employs the brief interval of life left him, in an interview with Lestelle. Meantime, the Duke of Bourbon being suddenly removed from the ministry, she is now enabled to exculpate herself by disclosing her secret, and Laon, freed from his suspicions, is released from his vow of self-destruction, by the profligate, though good natured, Richelieu.

Through the first three acts, the story progresses with unwavering interest and continuity. The last two acts, compared with what precedes them, hang fire a little. The duel by the dice box, with its cold-blooded ferocity and indifference, is unnatural and distasteful to an English audience, because it is inimical to English feelings. M. Dumas's language is more remarkable for point and elegance in the lighter portions than for vigour and concentration in the more serious scenes. Some of Richelieu's bon mots are both pertinent and fanciful. His exclamation on descending from the lady's window, by means of a vine, may serve as an example—"Venus took me up and Bacchus has brought me down." With regard to the impassioned scenes, it must be allowed that English ears, trained in the unrivalled beauty and strength of their native dramatic poetry, may possibly be a little spoiled in this respect. Mrs. C. Kean's conception of Lestelle differs from that of Rachel; but if the former lady's performance of Wednesday lacked something of the dignity and elevation of her incomparable rival, it made abundant amends in its simplicity and homeliness. Rachel's tragedy is heroic—Mrs. Kean's is domestic—the searing and blight of the household affections.

Mr. A. Wigan's Richelieu is pointed and easy, but he should contrive to infuse into his manner a little more of the polished elegance of the courtier. The mise en scene is beyond praise. A scene of the Marchioness's saloon, lighted up, combines taste and magnificence in as large a proportion as we ever remember to have seen on the stage. The play was listened to with profound attention by a house crowded from floor to roof, and was received at the fall of the curtain with marks of the most decided success. After the performers had been called forward, and Mr. Slous, the translator, acknowledged from his box a similar compliment.

HAYMARKET.—"The Crown Diamonds" has been repeated here four times during the week. Miss Louisa Pyne looks and sings as charmingly as ever. Although we think more finished and experienced contraltos might have been found than Miss Harriet Cawse, it would be unjust to deny to this lady considerable ability, histrionic as well as vocal. The orchestra is improving, the defects we hinted at last week are now disappearing under the experienced conductorship of Mr. Mellon. The house has been exceedingly well attended.

ADELPHI.—The history of the comic operetta produced at this theatre under the title of Good Night, Signor Pantalón, is somewhat singular. The English of Twice Killed, from the pen of Mr. Oxenford, brought out at the Olympic about sixteen years ago, and since acted at various theatres, including the Royal one in Windsor Castle, with Mr. and Mrs. Keeley as the chief characters, seems recently to have attracted the attention of the French dramatist, M. Lockroy. Omitting some of the minor incidents, transferring the scene from modern England to the Venice of the last century, and naming the dramatis personæ after the traditional characters of old Italian comedy, he has made of the farce the libretto of a comic opera, to which M. A. Grisar composed the music, and which, produced at the Parisian Opera Comique last February, has continued to be performed without intermission till the present day. This opera is now re-translated into English, and has been brought out, with all the music, at the Adelphi.

The performance of a comic opera, with regular concerted pieces, is no very easy task for a non-operatic company, and it is surprising how well it was done by the Adelphi artists. The Fanny Pepper of the old farce elevated into a Columbine, dressed in delicate attire and daintily powdered, was excellently represented by Miss Kathleen Fitzwilliam, whose song was the most effective solo in the piece. The demonstrations of terror, on finding herself an accomplice in the double murder, were very nicely managed, and brought out into strong relief the solid terror of Mr. Paul Bedford, who played the "Doctor," the Euclid Facile of the English farce. Miss Woolgar as Reckless, alias Lelio, was the smartest of audacious lovers, sparkling with the fascinations of a white suit trimmed with silver, and facing all difficulties with the most nimble audacity. The other ladies were well represented by Miss Collins and Miss Laura Honey, while Signor Pantaloni, the gentleman, who is disturbed while sleeping on the sofa, and who in the new version of the tale is made the father of the sleeper beneath, is played with grotesque drollery by Mr. Honey. The music is light and pleasing, and evinces that talent for illustrating dramatic situation peculiar to French composers. It was well sung, all the actors preserving the humour of the characters and their vicissitudes. The dresses were in elegant style, carrying the audience back to those quaint days of swords, powder, and high-heeled shoes, to which Mr. Thackeray is now so powerfully calling the attention of the metropolis.

The operetta, which may be improved by a curtailment of the earlier portion, was received with favour by a crowded audience.

DRURY LANE THEATRE re-opens on Monday, with a new play entitled "Ingomar the Barbarian," the principal part will be sustained by Mr. Anderson. "Azael, the Prodigal," in which Mr. Anderson will resume his original character, will be the half-price attraction for the Whitsuntide holiday makers.

VAUXHALL.—A grand bal masque was given on Thursday, (Ascot cup day), which was highly attractive. The fine weather has proved very beneficial to the Royal property, the visitors have, during the week, been very numerous.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

NORMA—SOPHIE CRUVELLI.

After the triumphant success achieved by Sophie Cruvelli in Fidelio it was natural to be expected that an unusual amount of interest would attach to her appearance in a second part; nor was the interest in the least abated when Norma was announced for her second performance. In fact, we have seldom known so much real curiosity excited about any event connected with operatic matters, even though there was no great difference of opinion as to the anticipated result. Some, certainly with a show of reason, argued that as Leonora and Norma were two totally distinct characters, as Beethoven's music was very different from Bellini's, and the talent required for the impersonations of so opposite a nature, it was possible that Sophie Cruvelli might be found wanting in Norma, from the fact of her being so transcendent in Leonora. Schroeder-Devrient, it was remembered, was admirable in Fidelio only, all her other assumptions being inferior. None of the celebrated Italian artists had ever attempted Fidelio, excepting Malibran (who was no Italian), who triumphed over all styles and all schools; and as Malibrans were not to be found every day, the chances were against Cruvelli, that her Norma would prove a great success. We are pleased to say that all speculation on the subject was soon completely set at rest. Before the first act of Norma was over, Sophie Cruvelli demonstrated that she was as profound a mistress of the grand as of the romantic school of acting, as perfect an interpreter of the brilliant as of the classic school of music.

We are not now writing under the influence of unusual excitement. We are not entering upon our habitual task, after having risen from the performance with our hearts and eyes filled with the singer. We have not hurried away from the intoxications of the stage, with our senses dazzled and our brains reeling. We are not writing one, two, or three hours after we had seen and heard Norma. Days have passed over, a week has flown by since that event. We need not, therefore, improvise an apostrophe, but descending from Pegasus, take our seat upon the tripod.

The recollection of Cruvelli's Norma induces us to consider our own fitness for the critical office. Are we qualified to animadvert upon such a performance in all its details, its subtleties, and its profundities? What do we possess that should enable us to set our judgment side by side with so much lofty genius, with such consummate art, such power, vitality, and observation? Would not the critic do well if he pondered awhile before harsarding an opinion on such an artist—would he not do better if he hesitated long before he gave a dissentient voice? Unhappily we critics are not men imbued with modesty. We never contemplate how much, or how little, we know of the art about which we write, or how much it is necessary to know. It is enough, if we have general ideas; these are sufficient for the public. Is there one critic in a thousand capable of sounding in all its depths, grasping in all its grandeur, the Lear of Macready, the Phédre of Rachel, the Norma of Cruvelli? Do not the critics, for the most part, draw their conclusions from the general effect produced, from certain received conventionalities, supposed indispensable, from parts rather than the whole? Do they not take a superficial view, looking only at the surface? After all what more can be expected from writers, who, generally speaking, are by no means thoroughly versed in the art they profess to criticise, who bring neither love, enthusiasm, nor observation to their labours?

Had there being any difference of opinion about Cruvelli in the articles of the press, it might have been imagined that we were setting ourselves up as advocates of the new Norma. No such thing. Every paper was loud in her praise, and in some instances the writers were fired with real enthusiasm. What we object to, and what called for the remarks contained in the above paragraph, was the air of patronage and condescension with which, even in their most fervid eulogies, some of Messieurs, the critics, extended the hand to the singer. Now to us this is far more preposterous than downright censure. But such is always the case, when incapacity undertakes to point the road to genius. The public after all are the true critics, and the journalists, in the end, must bow to them, and subscribe to their fiat.

And what must be the fiat of the public?—what the opinion of all truly capable of judging of the singer's talents—musicians, and professors of song, and composers for the voice, and actors of choice—lovers of Macready and Rachel?—that Cruvelli, without a single exception, is the greatest Norma which the stage has produced. Many, we have no doubt, will be startled at this assertion; but they will live to be convinced, and will echo what has been just pronounced. We were no false prophets when we predicted the future of Alboni. We were not much mistaken when we foretold Tamberlik's greatness. It is not often we are oracular. We do not pronounce opinions, ex-cathedra, until we are tolerably assured of their soundness. We now assert, unhesitatingly, that Sophie Cruvelli will be acknowledged before long the great singer of the age.

Although we are diffident of entering into an analysis of Cruvelli's Norma, we can speak of the effect it produced upon ourselves and others. As far as concerned ourselves, we were never more profoundly moved by any performance. What impressed us most we cannot say. The grandeur and sublimity of the acting was so interfused with the incomparable and rapturous singing that we could not—cannot even now, when our enthusiasm has cooled—select either acting or singing for individual praise. Both together constituted a perfect and complete whole, such as, we feel assured, we never witnessed before.

The principal beauty of Cruvelli's Norma, as it appears to us, is the classic grandeur and power with which it is sustained throughout. It is impossible to believe that in the sublime transfiguration of the Druid Priestess we behold the same artist who supported the tender and devoted wife, shrinking from universal observation, and made heroic only by holy love. It is impossible to imagine that underneath the towering dignity, the loftiness of deportment, the severity of look, as shown in the delineation of Norma, we have before us the gentle, feminine, real and simple Leonora, who goes on errands and runs to open prison doors. How opposite in their natures are the two parts of Norma and Leonora! Not less far asunder in everything which constitutes character than in dress. And this is the reason why no artist, previous to Cruvelli, ever attempted the two assumptions with any degree of success, except Malibran; and with that great singer the performances were equal. So it is with Cruvelli. You cannot say which is best—Leonora, or Norma! Both are imbued with the divinest inspiration; both are pregnant with the profoundest insight into the human heart; both are instinct with life and truth.

When Cruvelli comes on in the first scene of Norma, your eyes are instantaneously filled with a great presence. The tall and singularly graceful form, the intellectual and beautiful countenance, the proud head and inspired look, the ease and dignity of the motions, and the reposeful attitudes, recalling the finest sculptures of Greece, constitute a picture positively sublime. Sophie Cruvelli wins your heart with a look. Before she utters a word she has taken you captive in her thralls. You are her slave for ever; but she will not drag you at her chariot wheels. She will keep her serfs for ever captivated by her genius, but she will not use them unkindly. Sophie is as good as she is great; consequently she must be one of the best girls in the world.

There is nothing in Cruvelli's Norma we admire more than the affecting manner in which she clings to her children. Here the great heart of the mother shows itself with irresistible effect. Cruvelli, in this respect, as in every other, proves herself an original thinker. In all other Normas we always considered that the children were treated with strange indifference. Cruvelli has struck a new chord in the character of Norma. She has made the mother's love a principal element in the impersonation. That she is right there can be no doubt. Peruse the book, and behold the effect.

To mention the beauties we discovered in Cruvelli's Norma, would be to fill the pages of the Musical World with praises on the singer and actress, which we shall not attempt, and do not desire. All we would do, as conscientious critics and strenuous supporters of the great in all art, is to impress upon our readers the necessity of going to see and hear Cruvelli, and if they do not find her all we have described, provided they go unprejudiced and with free judgments, let them evermore set us down as unsafe guardians of the trust reposed in our opinions by the public. We have some credit—we are proud to own it—and would stake its existence on the truths we have above advanced.

So far for ourselves. The effect produced on the public by Sophie Cruvelli in her first performance of Norma may be briefly discussed. Immediately before her entrance the house was hushed into breathless silence. As soon as she appeared she was saluted by a tremendous burst of applause. Even in her obeisance to the public she did not lose sight of the character she was assuming. Her slight act of deference had in it infinite haughtiness and dignity. The act and the mode of doing it brought to our recollection Macready in his first entrance in Coriolanus, when, although the audience cheered him for several minutes, he never turned round, and only acknowledged their applause by an imperceptible bending of the head. Indeed, on several occasions, both in Fidelio and Norma, Cruvelli reminded us forcibly of Macready, in her abstraction, and in her intense appreciation of character. A slight tremulousness, which, however, did not interfere with her intonation in the smallest degree, might have been observed in the opening invocation; this soon gave way, and complete confidence was established. The invocation was powerfully and grandly delivered, and with an entire new reading. We shall refer more circumstantially to this and other particulars next week, when we shall enter more fully into details of the performances. The first great hit of the night was produced in the cabaletta to the "Casta Diva." Cruvelli had worked the effect up to a climax with the most consummate art, and never was consummate art responded to with more enthusiasm, and never was enthusiasm more legitimately won. As a mere effort of vocalization the "Casta Diva" was astonishing, but the mind which shone through all made it irresistible. We never heard such a sensation produced in Bellini's scena, even by Jenny Lind, who sang it so splendidly. After this brilliant display, Cruvelli's performance may be termed a grand chain of triumphs which increased in intensity to the fall of the curtain in the second act. The pieces which obtained the most applause were "O non tremare," enthusiastically encored, but not repeated, owing to some mistake; the whole of the following scene; the long duet with Adalgisa in the second act, and the last scene. In all of these Cruvelli elicited immense applause, and a general recall after each. At the end of the operas she was summoned three separate times before the curtain.

We would fain enter more deeply into the merits of a performance which has filled us with intense delight and surprise. We shall, however, forbear until next week, when we promise our readers a more lengthy analysis. We saw Sophie Cruvelli last night a second time in Norma. Again were we impressed with its entire originality, its profound and manifold beauties, its classic grandeur, its subtlety, its intensity, its individuality. Again were we enraptured with the tones of the divine voice, so powerful, so sympathetic. Again did we feel ourselves elevated above all criticism by passion and energy, almost superhuman, by truthfulness which has never been surpassed, by ideality, which only belongs to the loftiest genius. If Cruvelli had only spoken the words instead of singing them, her performance might have been placed side by side with the grandest impersonations of Rachel.

Having noticed the principal events of the week, we hasten to record the other performances, which possessed great, if not equal interest. On Tuesday the Tre Nozze was repeated and proved highly attractive. Sontag was as irresistible as ever; Lablache as unguent and titanic, and the other artists in their best vein. The opera was received throughout with great favor, and Sontag recalled manifold times.

On Wednesday the third Soirée Extraordinaire was given. Fidelio and Sophie Cruvelli attracted a dense and fashionable audience. The performance created immense interest from beginning to end. Cruvelli was recalled after each act, and three times after the grand duet in the prison scene. Sims Reeves, also, came in for his due share of applause. Coletti improves in Pizarro. The ensemble was good, but why have the principals absconded from the "Prisoners Chorus?" Three acts of Gustave followed, in which Madame Fiorentini was incapacitated from appearing by indisposition. This was a decided drawback to the evening's entertainment; many of the visitors, no doubt, being desirous to hear the fair and accomplished artiste. Mdlle. Caroline Duprez was in excellent voice and sang the page's music with charming effect. Carlotta Grisi in the pas de folles, created the usual enthusiasm.

On Thursday, Don Pasquale was given for the first time this season. Norina is one of Sontag's most delightful impersonations, and the music suits her voice and style to perfection. The accomplished artist was never in finer force and never warbled with more irresistible effect. All through the opera her singing was inimitable, and the finale, a brilliant and dazzling display of vocalization, excited the audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. To speak of Lablache's vocal and histrionic thunders and wonders in the Don is unnecessary: they are stereotyped in the public mind, and cannot pass into oblivion. Signor Ferranti made an excellent Doctor Malatesta, and Calzolari displayed unusual spirit in Ernesto. He was enthusiastically encoored in the Come e gentil, which he sang most charmingly.

The last act of the Lucia was also given for Mdlle Caroline Duprez and Sims Reeves, in which both artists were loudly applauded.

Norma was repeated last night, with two acts of Masaniello.

The ballet performances of the week present nothing new. Carlotta Grisi, upon whose exquisite talent every adjective in the vocabulary of praise has been lavished in the vain hope of describing that which is indescribable in language—Carlotta Grisi, the most incomparable dancer the world has seen—Carlotta Grisi, the poetess, whose feet are wings that bear her to the highest sphere of ideal beauty—Carlotta Grisi, who, in short, is Carlotta Grisi, to be more than which is impossible, to be less than which would be not to be herself—is about to leave us; she takes her benefit, and makes her last appearance this season on Wednesday. The ballet will be, as the heaven without the moon, illumined by the faint light of small and distant stars; or as the earth at mid-day, when the sun is three parts of him eclipsed; or as the light of heaven to the eye—quenched; or as the future to him that doubteth he has a soul; or as the universe to Demogorgon which sensed not; or as the bed of a late sea parched up by a sun-quake.

Auber's Enfant Prodigue is announced for Thursday. Madame Ugalde the celebrated prima donna of the Opera Comique, has been engaged to strengthen the cast, which includes Sontag, Massol, Gardoni, Coletti, &c.

The whole resources of the establishment will be made available to give eclat to the chef d'œuvre of Auber.

D. R.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Fidelio was repeated on Saturday night, to a crowded house, and with increased success. We have nothing new at present to say about the execution, and as Mr. Macfarren has this week commenced a series of papers on the masterpiece of Beethoven, we consign to his superior judgment all that relates to the drama and the music.

The indisposition of Mario caused Norma to be substituted in place of Lucrezia Borgia, which had been announced for Tuesday night. The house was crowded by a brilliant audience, and it is therefore reasonable to suppose that the change did not give rise to any great amount of disappointment. Norma is justly regarded as one of the greatest parts of Grisi, who, to the classic model bequeathed by Pasta, has added much that is undoubtedly her own. As a display of insulted dignity and impetuous feeling, the Norma of Grisi has never been surpassed by any representation on the lyric boards. It is an overwhelming burst of passion from beginning to end. All minor considerations are merged, or wholly lost, in the one grand sentiment. There is no attempt at elaboration of details; one colour is predominant, one end pursued, and the whole presents a striking and magnificent picture. It will not be forgotten that in 1847, when Jenny Lind played Norma in another place, Grisi, who had almost stamped the part with her own image came forward and made an old triumph a new one, by means of the irresistible sway she held over the public, who could not see, and refused to admit any other possible realization of the character of the Druid priestess than that to which they had been accustomed. A more formidable opposition, in the far deeper, more finished, poetical, suggestive, and intellectual impersonation of another aspirant, who at the present moment attracts so large a share of public attention, has only tended to produce the same effect upon Grisi. Her Norma is as glowing and splendid as ever, and on Tuesday night raised the same degree of enthusiasm as on previous occasions. It would be superfluous to enter into details about a performance so universally known. We need only say that each and all of the great points came out with the accustomed strength, and excited the accustomed emotion. The "Casta Diva" was immensely applauded; the "Oh non tremare" (in the trio) vociferously encoored; the "Vanne si" (where Norma reproaches Pollio) received with cheers; and the fall of the curtain, on the first act, followed by an unanimous call for "Grisi," who came forward amidst reiterated plaudits. In the second act, the forcible points are not so numerous; but the duet "Deh con te," with Adalgisa, produced a large share of approbation, while the final duet with Pollio (the well-known "Qual cor tradisti") and the appeal to Oroveso, "Deh! non volerli vittime," where Norma intercedes for her children, sung and acted with intense feeling, roused the audience to a second exhibition of enthusiasm; and again, at the fall of the curtain, Grisi was compelled to reappear, not once but twice, to receive handfuls of bouquets and continued peals of applause.

The rest of the opera was remarkably well played. Tambrlik's Pollio is by many degress the best we remember. He invests that very ungrateful part with such an interest that, at the end of the opera, the audience rather sympathize with the misfortunes of the Roman Proconsul than despise him. Tamberlik was in fine voice, and gave the aria, "Meco all' altar," with prodigious energy, and the duet with Adalgisa, in the same scene, with the utmost tenderness. But his most telling point was the passage, "Ah troppo tardi," in which Pollio extols the worth, and solicits to share the fate, of Norma. A more genuine display of passionate vocal declamation than this we have rarely listened to. The Orovoso of Formes is decidedly original. We have already, on a previous occasion, remarked upon the beauty of the last scene, in which Formes, with a subtle discrimination of character, represents the hard priest transformed into flesh and blood, and melted to tears by the dreadful position of his daughter, Norma. This fine piece of acting was as impressive as before, and stamped the Orovoso of the German singer as a creation of his own. The Adalgisa of Mademoiselle Bertrandi was graceful, pleasing, and unaffected; but it wanted a little more life and energy, especially in the scene where the young priestess relates the history of her love to Norma. The opera went off with great eclat from first to last.

The re-engagement of Tamburini, who made his first appearance on Thursday in Don Giovanni, is a step to be commended. Ronconi, it appears, cannot be brought to terms, while Salvatori, although a fine actor and a good singer, has been found wanting in that important requisite, a voice. Under these circumstances, not to speak of his unquestionable merits, we were not surprised that Tamburini should be received with the welcome due to an old and deserving favourite of the public. His re-appearance was an event of twofold importance, inasmuch as it restored to the theatre a dramatic barytone, of which it has been greatly in want since the commencement of the present campaign, and was the means of bringing Don Giovanni before the public for the first time this season at the Royal Italian Opera. The house was crowded to suffocation, and we understand some hundreds of persons were sent away from the pit, unable to find standing room. Tamburini's reception was of the heartiest kind, and his performance of Don Giovanni, in which character he has no rival at present on the stage, presented all those salient qualities to which it owes its celebrity. The profligate nobleman, with insinuating manners, imperturbable effrontery, and daring courage, was portrayed to the life. The courtier-like bearing of Tamburini in the scenes with Elvira and Donna Anna, his bland persuasiveness in the duet with Zerlina, "La ci darem," his reckless shamelessness in the confidential interviews with Leporello, and his haughty demeanour in the final rencontre with the statue, were as forcible and appropriate as ever. Though the ravages of time may be traced in the voice of Tamburini, which has chiefly suffered in the higher notes, there is no evident falling off in the taste and spirit of his singing, and the encores that followed the drinking song and the serenade testified to the genuine effect he produced upon the audience. In short, the successor of this accomplished artist, in the arduous part of Don Giovanni, has yet to be found, and until he be found we have reason to be well satisfied with what we have got.

The great novelty, in the execution of Mozart's chef d'œuvre, was the unexpected appearance of Tamberlik in the part of Don Ottavio, a circumstance explained in the following circular, which was distributed in every part of the house:—

"The directors have extreme regret in announcing that in consequence of the severe cold under which Signor Mario is suffering it is not possible for him to sing to-night. The indulgence of the audience is therefore respectfully requested towards Signor Tamberlik, who has, at a very short notice, most kindly offered to perform the part of Don Ottavio."

The immediate feeling was one of great disappointment; but the duet with Donna Anna, in the first scene, convinced the audience that their favourite, Mario, had found a worthy substitute, while the subsequent scene with Donna Anna, where she recounts the story of her father's death by the hand of the libertine, and that the grand finale to the first act, in which Don Ottavio defies Giovanni, were acted with such unusual energy, that disappointment was converted into unanimous satisfaction. But the culminating point was, of course, the "Il mio tesoro," which famous air it is our duty to say, we have never heard so magnificently sung by any other singer. The style was perfect, the expression varied and glowing, and the volume and quality of tone displayed in the upper notes—especially in the well known passage (first introduced by Rubini), where the sustained note, F, is carried on to the height of B flat—we have not heard equalled, even by Duprez, when he was the prince of tenore di forza. The encore was tumultuous. The air was repeated with increased effect, and Tamberlik, who finished the second time on the high B flat, with immense power, was once more recalled by the audience. In a word, his Don Ottavio is, without comparison, the best we have seen. There is no lassitude or indifference in the opening scenes; the points Mozart intended are all there; and, instead of a walking gentleman, with a song, as Rubini and others have made it, we have a character for which the sympathies are engaged from first to last, and when the grand point arrives our admiration and delight are all the greater. There is not much for Don Ottavio to do in the majority of the scenes in which he appears, but, that what there is may be rendered effective, Tamberlik has proved beyond controversy. His performance on Thursday night raised him to a point in the estimation of the audience beyond which none of his cotemporaries have been able to soar, and the "indulgence respectfully requested" in his behalf, on the part of the management, was accorded with enthusiasm. Another novelty in the cast was Mdle. Bertrandi, whose Donna Elvira is decidedly the best thing she has played. Without reaching the excellence of Corbani, the best Elvira we have seen upon the stage, Mdle. Bertrandi sang the very difficult music of that beautiful but ill-appreciated character so correctly, and with such decision and inviolable good taste, that the most exacting admirers of Mozart must have felt entirely satisfied.

The other principal characters—the Donna Anna of Grisi, the Zerlina of Castellan, and the Leporello of Formes—need not be dwelt upon. It is enough to say that they exhibited their accustomed excellence; that Grisi, in the recitative and aria of the first act was as grand and dramatic as she is wont to be—that the "Batti, batti" and "Vedrai carino," sung with great sweetness by Castellan, were both encores—and that the last scene of Leporello, perhaps the most original and elaborately finished of all the impersonations of Herr Formes, was never more striking, impressive, and true to character and situation. We have often praised the Commandatore of Tagliafico, and his execution of the sublime music of the finale to the second act, confirmed us in the opinion that the part has rarely, if ever, found so efficient a representative. Polonini's Masetto is perfect in its way; his acting is natural and humorous, and his singing invariably correct and good. Among the encores was the "trio of the masks," by Grisi, Bertrandi, and Tamberlik. We must remark, however, that the singers are too apt to respond to the demands of a minority, in coming forward to repeat their airs. The only unanimous encore last night—the only one that could not be resisted with deference to the public—was that accorded to the “Il mio tesoro,” and it is worthy of observation that among all the performers engaged in the opera, Tamberlik was the slowest to accept the compliment.

The general performance of the opera was admirable. Costa and his orchestra shone to the highest advantage, and we have not heard the finale to the first act, the sestet, “Sola sola,” or the great last scene, with Giovanni, Leporello, and the statue of the Commandatore, go so unexceptionably well. The military band, however, was more out of tune than ever, both in the first and second acts. Surely some remedy might be found for this. The effect of the trombones behind the scenes, when the statue, in the churchyard, accepts the invitation to supper of Don Giovanni, is very solemn and appropriate; but on Thursday night these instruments were probably so far off, at the commencement, that they were inaudible, and the statue had to sing his first solo without accompaniments. Some reform in the management of the supper scene is absolutely essential. We are tired of stating that Don Giovanni should have no company at table, since, as the book shows, his observations are exclusively directed to his servant, Leporello, which would be a curious anomaly on the part of so polite a cavalier in the presence of ladies. But if this point cannot be conceded, the table might be placed elsewhere than in the middle of the stage, so as to do away with the excessive absurdity of a number of domestics coming in to carry off the remains of the feast, at the approach of the statue, as though to clear the stage for a pas de trois for Don Giovanni, Leporello, and the ghost of the Commandatore. Such scenic mistakes go far to destroy the awful effect intended to be conveyed by the music and the situation; and people are inclined, in some places, to laugh rather than be impressed and edified at the fate of the unrepentant profligate. Moreover, they are so easy to remedy that their obstinate retention is unpardonable.

The principal artists were recalled at the end of the first act, and after the second Tamberlik came on alone.

To night Norma will be repeated. Meanwhile Madame Viardot is expected, and Sappho will not be far behind.

CATHERINE HAYES IN LIVERPOOL.

(From the Liverpool Times, May 29.)

The fifth concert of the Philharmonic Society took place on Tuesday evening, and was decidedly the most pleasing and satisfactory of the season. The audience was both numerous and fashionable. Miss Catherine Hayes sang under circumstances somewhat disadvantageous, as she had appeared on the preceding evening at a concert in London. She had not even the advantage of a rehearsal, and, never having sang the music of Semiramide in English, she gave the airs allotted to her from that work in Italian. Notwithstanding these untoward events, Miss Hayes not only succeeded, where many artists would have failed, but created a furor only equalled in the Philharmonic-hall by Jenny Lind's singing of “I know that my Redeemer liveth.” Those who have only heard Miss Hayes when she previously appeared in Liverpool, labouring under severe indisposition, can have no idea of her truly wonderful vocal powers, which far exceed our anticipations,—though we expected much, after reading the eulogistic notices of The Times and other metropolitan journals. She is now in the full vigour of health and spirits; her late visit to Italy having evidently been highly beneficial to her, while her voice is in its prime. Its compass extends over three octaves, each note of which is full and pure, while her taste, expression, and intonation are all that the most exacting critic could desire. In the florid airs of Rossini, and the pathetic invocation from the Prophete, by Meyerbeer, Miss Hayes was equally happy; and, while her clear, ringing, and flexible soprano astonished in the one, the rich, voluptuous tones of her contralto notes ravished the ear in the other. In the Semiramide selection the most noticeable feature of her singing was the cavatina, “Bel raggio,” a brilliant display of florid vocalism, which Miss Hayes gave with graceful ease and tasteful expression. In the duet, “Ebben a te ferisci,” in which occurs the air, “Giorno d'orrore,” Miss Hayes was equally pleasing, her intonation and expression being equally appropriate to the sentiment conveyed by the words. In the Masaniello selection there was nothing for Miss Hayes to sing. Miss Hayes compensated for the omission by giving an Italian aria, the name of which has escaped our memory, in which she absolutely revelled in brilliant difficulties with such evident ease as to excite the audience to enthusiasm. A repetition of the air was warmly demanded. To the surprise of the audience, in whose ear her brilliant high notes were still ringing, she commenced that lovely and expressive air from the Prophete, “O, mon fils !” rendered famous by Viardot Garcia, and sang it throughout with so much feeling as to increase the previous excitement to an extent rarely witnessed amongst our staid audiences. In this air the voluptuous richness of her contralto tones was most advantageously displayed, and the whole performance rendered a triumph of vocal genius. Miss Hayes is now undoubtedly one of the first singers of the day, and we rejoice that, in the present dearth of great talent, and the abundance of pretentious mediocrity, we have still a native prima donna whom we can safely place alongside those of any other nation. Miss Hayes we understand, goes to America in the autumn, where, judging by the success of the Lind and Parodi, a career of unequalled good fortune awaits her.

Reviews of Music.

“TRIO FOR PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN AND VIOLONCELLO.”—(Op. 1.)—CHARLES EDWARD STEPHENS.—Schott and Co.

Mr. Stephens is one of the many of our native professors who, for the pure love of art, and without an eye to self, continue to labour year after year in the composition of instrumental pieces of the most important class. Mr. Stephens is well known as one of the most active, assiduous, industrious, persevering, enthusiastic, and undaunted members of the Society of British Musicians. He has written symphonies, overtures, quartets, &c. &c. merely for the love of writing them, since his sole reward has been a solitary performance at one of the public concerts of the Society, immediately followed by the descent of the drop scene of oblivion. A man must have, not only courage, but implicit faith in his own genius, and inward contempt for the world's indifference, who can thus persist in writing under such unfavourable circumstances. What is called a public is as deaf to a symphony of Mr. Stephens' as a rock on which a ship splits is to the cry of the sinking mariner. But Mr. Stephens is a good swimmer, and will not sink, but paddles about in the hopes of eventually reaching the strand, or being picked up by some charitable schooner passing by, and not dismantled. In other words, Mr. Stephens, spurred on by hope of ultimate appreciation, continues to write, and will continue to write, till eye and ink fail him.

He may console himself with the reflection that many a genius, even greater than his own, and talent more accomplished and persevering, has thus laboured for pure love, with tray and teen and small returns. Lucky is it, indeed, for the art that such men exist, for out of their number springs the impetus which pushes from behind the unhorsed car of progress.

The trio in question is a work of extended plan, and unquestionable merit. The first movement begins with a large chant for the violin, accompanied by a simple arpeggio on the piano. The chant is afterwards given to the violoncello in octaves with the first named instrument, the pianoforte accompaniment being still limited to the simple arpeggio afore-mentioned. The second motive, in the dominant, has the fault of being too much of the colour of the first, although the brilliant passage which follows it helps it out, and cuts the monotony short. The reprise of both subjects is effectively managed, and the accompaniments varied with skill. The adagio, in A minor, begins with an expressive cantabile for the violoncello, of which a good singer on that very vocal instrument could not fail tirer partie. The subject is then given in duet with the violin; a good passage in full harmony for the piano then follows, in which, however, there are too many sequences of sevenths. This leads to another motive in the relative major for the violoncello, in its turn giving way to the reprise of the first subject for the two instruments. Some more remplissages for the piano, in the key of C, succeed. The theme is again given in duo, with a florid accompaniment for the piano in unison, and the movement concludes in the major with what is partly a new subject, and partly a modification of the harmonious remplissage already alluded to. There is nothing particular to say about the scherzo and trio, in F minor and B flat, except the prolongation of the rhythm (nine bars instead of eight), in the theme of the scherzo. The movement, though unpretending, is spirited and clever. Perhaps the best written of the four pieces is the finale, allegro vivace, in F major. The theme has a freshness about it which is hardly to be remarked in its predecessors. The second subject, a la marcia, is bold, and well-contrasted with the other. The whole movement is so well worked that we even forgive the pedantic introduction of the somewhat weak fugue, with stale sequences. This is short, however, if not sweet, and leads back to the reprise of the first subject gratefully and without effort. The next appearance of the second theme in F is equally good, and the coda is brilliant and energetic.

Although the trio of Mr. Stephens is not elaborately difficult, it requires a good finger to be touched effectively, and good stamina to be sustained unflinchingly; but the composer himself is known to be an excellent pianist, and has addressed his work to the appreciation of those who understand and have a command of the instrument. From an Op. 1 we have rarely experienced more satisfaction at the pages of a British musician.

Provincial.

LEEDS. — (From a Correspondent). — THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. — This Society gave its Concert last evening. The band performed Auber's popular overture to "Fra Diavolo", and the first movement of Mozart's Symphony Jupiter, in a most creditable manner; Mr. Bowling led, and kept the players well together. The Chorus, as usual, displayed excellent training in "To thee mighty Neptune," (Mozart's Idomeneo), — Barnett's Madrigal, "All creatures," — "Pretty Maidens" (Don Giovanni) and Locke's music in Macbeth. The latter served to introduce to a Leeds audience Miss M. B. Marsh (of the Liverpool Concerts), who, in the solos and recitatives of the first Soprano ("Let's have a dance, &c."), showed a cultivated voice, very pure in the higher notes. This was more particularly evinced in the Rondo "La Morale" (Don Pasquale) which she rendered with excellent effect. Miss Marsh received an encore in Balfe's "Woman's Heart," which she gave with much naïveté. We believe she is a pupil of Balfe's. Misses Gill, Brown, and Milner assisted in the concerted music, and gave their solos effectively. These ladies are our popular local vocalists. Kalkbrenner's trio for piano, violin and violoncello, was rendered by Messrs. Spark, Bowling and Williamson with great spirit and precision. Mr. Spark, as conductor, was most efficient.

LIVERPOOL. — Madame Fiorentini and Signor Calzolari were the vocalists at the fourth concert of the Philharmonic Society, which took place at their Hall, on Tuesday evening. Madame Fiorentini possesses rare natural advantages for succeeding in the profession she has chosen, for she is young, handsome, and of a good figure. Her voice is a soprano, of great sweetness, purity, and extensive compass. She sings with taste and truthful intonation, and overcomes difficulties with ease. She was encored in a Spanish song and two duets with Calzolari, scarcely sufficient to enable her to develop the full extent of her powers. Signor Calzolari is a very tasteful singer: he cannot fail to please; his style is correct. Herr Lidel displayed much talent in a fantasia on the violoncello, and Mrs. Beale was deservedly applauded for her pianoforte performance in Hummel's Septuor. The choir sung a madrigal of Wilbye's, the "Rat-a-plan" chorus from the Huguenots, and Weber's "Lutzow's Wild Hunt." The two first were coldly received, but the latter, which was sung with spirit and precision, met with a well-merited encore.

On Tuesday evening, the Festival Choral Society gave their fifty-first public performance at the Music Hall, before a numerous audience, when Handel's oratorio, Joshua, was performed. The principal vocalists were Mrs. G. Holden, Miss Whitnall, Mr. Ryalls, and Mr. Armstrong. Miss Whitnall made her début at this society, and gave general satisfaction. The chorus singers deserve honourable mention for their exertions, and were rewarded with encores to the following choruses, viz., "May all the Host," "Hail, mighty Joshua," and "See, the Conquering Hero comes." Mr. John Richardson presided at the organ, and Mr. G. Holden acted as conductor.

Original Correspondence.

ON THE TWELVE BINARY PROGRESSIVE CADENCES IN THE MINOR MODE.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR, — In the Musical World of the 5th of August, 1848, I presented your readers with my method of progressive cadences, which serve both for the major and minor modes. These under consideration are applicable only to the minor mode. It may be remembered by some that I mentioned the fact of Abbé Vogler having applied arithmetic to ascertain the exact number and situation on the scales of all the harmonious intervals, or duads and chords in music. Secondly, I mentioned that Schnyder went further, by applying arithmetic to find out all the ground sequences in music — a very important and ingenious discovery this was. And lastly, I apply the same agent to find out all the progressive binary cadences; by which method their exact situations in the major and minor modes are ascertained. This information is much wanted, as no two works in music give the same variety and names to the cadences, and none of them bear uniformity or method, without which, no scientific subject can be well understood. It may be recollected that I stated in 1848, that, arithmetically considered, there are two descriptions of harmony, viz. : — primary and secondary; the one by adding and subtracting one and three; the other by adding and subtracting two. I also stated that no cadences could be made on the secondary harmonies in the major mode. Now I will show that such can be the case in the minor mode, and the observant reader will discover that they produce a beautiful effect. It is unnecessary to present your readers with the six complete tables of the primary and secondary harmonies; they will perceive, however, that the names I gave to the cadences in the major mode are here carried out in the minor mode, extending even to the six secondary cadences; their names therefore will not be difficult to remember, if the one manifold principal be regarded.

The Six Secondary Binary Progressive Cadences, by adding and subtracting two.

III	to I	is called	...	Secondary final.
III	"	V	"	Secondary half.
VIIw4	"	V	"	Secondary minor half.
V	"	VIIw4	"	Secondary inverted minor half.
V	"	I	"	Secondary independent final.
I	"	VI	"	Secondary inverted independent final.

It will be seen by the above figures that III represents an augmented chord, which, therefore, requires preparation. The sign w4 means with the raised 4th, or as I call it in my essay on Fugue the Interdominant.

The Six Primary Progressive Cadences in the minor mode, by adding and subtracting one and three.

II	to I	is called	...	Minor independent final
III	"	IV	"	Minor independent broken
4	"	V	"	Minor inverted broken.
IIw4	"	V	"	Minor independent half.
III	"	VI	"	Minor interrupted.
III	"	VIIw4	"	Minor independent.

In conclusion, I will mention, as examples, that the triads from IIw4 to V would, in the key of A minor, be B D sharp, F to E, G sharp, B; and that the triads from III to VIIw4, in the same key would be C E G sharp, to G sharp, B D sharp. If all the 24 cadences I have forwarded to the Musical World were employed by able musicians, their music would present many novel and striking effects.

I am, yours obliged,
FRENCH FLOWERS.

GREAT EXHIBITION.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—In your number of the week before last, you say, Mr. J. J. Cooper performed on the opening day. This surely must be a mistake, for I not only find the name of Mr. George Cooper, the eminent organist, in the printed programme, but I was present to hear him play Mr. Charles Horsley's march from "David," one of the compositions mentioned in the paragraph to which I allude. I presume, therefore, it must be an error, which, doubtless, you will not fail to notice, in the next number of your interesting journal.

I am, your obedient servant,
29th May, 1851. VERAX.

HAYDN'S AND MOZART'S QUARTETTS.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

Penzance, 2nd June, 1851.

SIR,—Can you or any of your numerous subscribers, inform me, whether any of Haydn's or Mozart's Violin Quartetts have been arranged, either as solos for the pianoforte, or trios for the piano, violin or cello. I cannot discover that these beautiful compositions have ever yet been published in this form, either in this country or on the continent, although those of Beethoven have been done in both these ways.

Perhaps you will insert this in your next number.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

Miscellaneous.

THE GRAND ORGAN, erected by Messrs. Gray and Davison, in the north gallery of the transept of the Great Exhibiton, and which was used at the ceremonial, on the 1st of May, for the accompaniment to the vocal music performed, has been removed, by the desire of H.R.H. Prince Albert, to the centre of the east gallery of the nave, where it can be both seen and heard to great advantage.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.—On Thursday next, the 12th inst., a "Full Choral Service" will be celebrated for the purpose of founding a "Choir Benevolent Fund." The service will commence at 12 o'clock, and at the conclusion a selection of anthems by the most eminent composers will be performed by upwards of 120 voices, all members of the various cathedral and collegiate choirs in the kingdom. Mr. Turk will preside at the organ. Mr. G. Gray is the Provisional Secretary, and deserves the greatest praise for his strenuous exertions in furtherance of the object in view, and for making the necessary arrangements for so large meeting of choristers.

MELODIST'S CLUB.—At the meeting on the 29th ult. the prize for the best melody offered by E. S. Snell, esq., was awarded to Mr. Land, for a song entitled "The Vesper Dream," the words by Mr. E. J. Gill.

MESSRS. H. AND R. BLAGROVE'S QUARTET CONCERTS.—The first of the series took place on Thursday morning, at the Concert Rooms in Mortimer Street. Want of space compels us to defer a detailed notice this week, suffice it, for the present, that Beethoven's trio, in B flat, was excellently played by Madame Verdavaue, (piano), Mr. H. Blagrove, (violin), and Mr. Hausmann, (violin-cello), and that everything went off to the satisfaction of an elegant audience. Mr. J. L. Hutton was announced as the accompanist at the pianoforte. The next concert will take place on Friday evening the 20th inst.

MADAME CHARTON, the pearl of the Opera Comique, has been singing at one of the recent concerts given by Her Majesty, at Buckingham House.

M. ALEXANDRE BILLET'S CONCERTS.—M. Alexandre Billet, the eminent pianist, gave the first of a series of three concerts at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Monday last, which was well attended and went off with the greatest éclat. The learned professor was aided in the vocal department by Madame Anna Thillon and Herr Stigelli. Madame Thillon sang a beautiful air by Mozart, which, however, the composer did not originally intend for French words. She also delighted her audience by her delicate and finished rendering of two "Romances Françaises." Mad. Thillon preserves all that archness of look and manner, that beauty of face and figure, that voice and piquant execution, which have long rendered her so generally popular. It is therefore needless to state that her reception was in the highest degree flattering. We wish some of our own vocalists would catch the inspiration and impart some of Madame Thillon's warmth of manner into their northern coldness. Herr Stigelli sang a lied by Schubert, and a composition of his own. This gentleman has now definitively gained a position as a first-rate concert-singer, independently of his high reputation on the Italian stage. The concert donor, M. Billet, commenced operations with Beethoven's sonata in A major, op. 101, a noble composition which notwithstanding its length, was attentively listened to out.

We commend M. Billet for placing this at the commencement of his concert, and following it up with lighter pieces, not requiring such close and continued attention. Weber's Polacca, (L'hilarité) in E, a piece of great liveliness and character, was the next. This composition is a companion to Weber's well-known "La gaité," in E flat, equally showy, and worthy the attention of ambitious amateurs. Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso is also a most admirable composition for amateurs—not too difficult, yet requiring a firm touch and great correctness, as well as an amount of expression that, properly displayed, will not merge into an excess of misplaced sentiment. The Andante is superb, and the Allegro reminds us of the Midsummer Night's Dream music, being of that airy, fairy-like, flitting description, in which the composer so much delighted.

M. Billet finished with a selection of intricate studies, by Steibelt, Chopin, Potter, and others.

We need hardly observe that this gentleman fully sustained his fame as one of the first pianists of the day. If the French Revolution injured our volatile neighbours it conferred at least one benefit upon us, viz:—the causing M. Billet to reside permanently here. He played on Monday upon a capital instrument—one of the "Fonda's" of Kirkman and Son, and his exertions were rewarded with the loudest plaudits.

H. L.

DRURY LANE THEATRICAL FUND DINNER.—This Anniversary Festival took place on Wednesday, in the Freemason's-hall, and was celebrated by a very large assembly of theatrical amateurs and artists. The toasts, besides the ordinary loyal sentiments, comprised the Chairman, Mr. Harley; the immortal memory of Garrick; the Vice Presidents; the Sub-committee of Drury Lane; Mr. Anderson; the Stewards, and the Ladies. The collection after dinner was very considerable, and Mr. Harley's speech on the objects and prospects of the institution, gave an excellent report of the prosperity of the fund. The musical arrangements under the direction of Mr. Lindsay Sloper, were highly effective. The chief features in the performance were Miss Dolby's Scotch Ballads, her style of singing, which is too well known to need a comment; Mr. John Macfarren's Carnaval de Venise on the pianoforte, was brilliantly executed; and Signor Bottesini's miraculous fantasia on the doublebass; besides these, there were songs and glees, by Misses E. Birch, Land and P. Horton; Messrs. King, Bromley, Genge, Machin, Cowell, Binge, Shoubridge, Stretton, Land, Lawler, Beale, Borroni and Jones; and a harp solo by Mr. G. Taylor. Mr. B. B. Cabbell, was in the chair.

MISS AUGUSTA PURCELL'S CONCERT.—This took place at the Music-hall, Store-street, on Wednesday evening. The programme was of the usual length on these occasions, and comprised between twenty and thirty pieces. We were just in time for a pretty song of Mrs. J. Passingham's, charmingly sung by Miss Poole, and encored. Madame Goffrie followed in a fantasia on the pianoforte, and made the instrument talk excellent faïrerie (i. e. the language of fairies) under her light and brilliant fingers. Then came Madame Lavinia, in "Una voce poco fa." This young lady has a voice of extensive compass and good quality, and powerful in the upper notes. She went through Rossini's aria in such a manner as very nearly to elicit an encore; and in the second act, sung Glover's ballad, "The blind girl to her harp," accompanied on that instrument by Mr. J. Thomas, who afterwards played a fantasia. Miss Bassano sang a cunzonetta of Marras in a charming manner. Miss Eyles was fortunate in the choice of Macfarren's fine dramatic song from The Sleeper Awakened—"Gone, he is gone." The attempt was equally bold and successful. Miss Eyles is a vocalist of considerable promise. Miss Mes-sent, who arrived late to fulfil the sixth professional engagement (public and private in the course of the same day) sang Donizetti's popular aria from Belley "Le crudele il cor," with her usual taste. Mr. Herbert gave two songs with much expression. After Miss Augusta Purcell had twice sung Rodwell's ballad, "Charming May," we left. The room was well attended.

MANCHESTER.—The organ committee have cleared £25 by the late performance of the Messiah at St. Paul's Church, which sum has been appropriated towards the liquidation of the debt upon the organ. The result is highly creditable to all concerned, and especially so to those gentlemen who gratuitously added in the realisation of the above praiseworthy object.—Manchester Courier, 24th May.

MR. COOPER has announced two Quartett Concerts for Mondays the 9th and 16th inst.

PANOFKA'S VILANELLA.—In our account of Mr. Aguilar's concert, last week, we omitted to state that Mr. Panofka's Vilanelle, for four voices, was admirably sung by Miss Birch, Mdlle. Graumann, Herr Stigelli, and Sig. Marchesi, and was well received by the audience. It is a composition of pleasing character, well written for the voices, and very effective.

MISS LIZZY STUART AND MR. GEORGE TEDDER'S CONCERT.—Miss Stuart and Mr. Tedder procured a goodly array of talent, both vocal and instrumental, for the special delight and wonderment of the down-east folks, and the consequence was an admirable and successful concert. The vocalists were Mrs. A. Newton, Miss Lowe, the Misses Cole, Miss Poole, Mr. Drayton, Mr. Whitworth, and the concert givers. The instrumental department was also unusually strong, including the unrivalled contra basso Signor Bottesini, Misses Woolf and Eliza Ward, pianists; Master John Ward, concertina; and Mr. F. Chatterton, harp. Mr. Lavenu and Mr. Maurice Davies conducted. The encores were numerous. The first was awarded to Miss Stuart and Mr. Tedder. Russell's "Come Brothers arouse," was unanimously recalled, and Miss Stuart in "Annie Laurie," loudly encored. Signor Bottesini created the most tremendous sensation, and proved satisfactorily to those who heard him for the first time, that he is unrivalled upon his instrument. Mr. F. Chatterton, were he a Red Indian, would be denominated "Leaping Fingers," while Miss Woolf and the Wards would unquestionably be considered "Conjurers" anywhere. The rooms were excessively full, and the concert afforded much gratification to the audience.

H. L.

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—On Wednesday a grand miscellaneous flower show was held at these gardens by the South London Floricultural Society, and, favoured by the fineness of the weather, a large number of visitors assembled. The gardens are now delightful, and present a mass of foliage and flowers of great beauty. Everything wears a fresh and smiling appearance, and, independently of the thousand and one attractions of the place, those of nature are alone sufficient to attract multitudes of visitors. Five spacious marquees were erected for the occasion of the flower show; and these, though by no means filled with specimens, contained sufficient to interest spectators and to afford good materials for prizes. Amongst the competitors were many of the most eminent growers, but the amateurs occupied a respectable position. The display of azaleas and pelargoniums was, perhaps, the best in the collection. A marked improvement since last year was exhibited in the pansies. The stand of twenty-four dissimilar blooms, exhibited by R. H. Rettidge, Esq., and which gained the Victoria silver medal, were remarkable for their beauty; as also was the collection of twelve varieties of pelargoniums, shown by Mr. N. Gaines, who also received a Victoria medal. The show of grapes was not very large; but those exhibited by Mr. Corney, the extensive florist and horticulturist of Bury-street, Lower Edmonton, attracted great attention, and gained one of the extra prizes—a bronze medal. They were of the black Hamburg sort, and for size, quality, and lustre we have rarely seen them equalled. The show gave great satisfaction to the thousands who thronged the marquees. M. Jullien has added his powers to that already possessed by the orchestra; and Koenig, Winterbottom, Lavigne, Lazarus, Sonnenberg, and other eminent solists, are arrayed under his direction. The Exhibition Quadrilles, and the State March, as performed at the opening of the Crystal Palace, are great novelties in style, and accompaniments have a most remarkable effect in the open air orchestra. In addition to the features usually to be found in the gardens, a room has been appropriated to chicken-latching, so that the curious may see the whole process of incubation. The elephants' promenade occasions some most amusing incidents, and their docility is illustrated in a very striking manner. The fireworks that accompany the diorama shone through the gates of Mr. Danson's magnificent Temple of Janus, are exceedingly brilliant; and the set piece that illuminates the vast transparency closing the entertainment, elicits universal admiration, both for its diversity of colours and its magnitude. We must not close our notice without calling the attention of those who may not be aware of the fact, to the large piece of ground laid out as a refreshment garden, and fitted up in a tasteful and picturesque style. The scale of prices laid down by the worthy host, Mr. Woolf, are within the means of all, and the quality of the article furnished is most excellent—features sadly wanting in many places of out-door recreation. Taking the nature of the entertainment, and the general character of the visitors, we do not know a place that affords a better evening's amusement than the Surrey Zoological Gardens.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.—Haydn's Creation will be performed on Friday 13th inst.

NOVEL EFFECTS OF AN ENCORE.—The Madrid correspondent of the Times says, "Madrid is perfectly tranquil, but had it not been for the good sense of the people it might have proved otherwise the night before last, at the Circo theatre, where, because the audience demanded the repetition of a song, the presiding municipal authority sent for and ordered two companies of artillerymen to enter the place with fixed bayonets, and turn the spectators out of doors. The soldiers acted with remarkable prudence, and thus prevented the awful consequences which might have ensued."

MR. JOHN CLINTON, the eminent professor of the flute in the Royal Academy of Music, a member of the Philharmonic Society &c., made a visit to this city within the present week. Some few of the admirers of that instrument were delighted in hearing that gentleman's extraordinary abilities on his newly invented flute, which forms one of the wonders of the Great Exhibition. Mr. Clinton has long been known to the musical world, and added much to his celebrity as an essayist on the merits and demerits of that charming instrument, and with great credit has further distinguished himself by the completion of a desideratum so long wished for and required. Amongst the recent improvements, a new system of fingering was considered absolutely necessary for the acquiring a more perfect intonation, although obviously objectionable to the profession generally. Mr. Clinton has, however, at last, after great labour, surmounted this difficulty, by preserving the old system of fingering and thereby rendering a purity of tone resembling a fine rich voice whilst power and equality, with perfection of tone throughout, are happily afforded.—Bristol Times, 10th May, 1851.

FRENCH DRAGOONS IN LONDON.—A proposition has been made to the Government to send the band of the 9th Dragoons to London, during the Exhibition, as a specimen of the military music of France. M. Sax, who is the manufacturer of the greater number of the musical instruments used by such bands, was the first to originate the idea, and has made an application to the Minister of War on the subject which has been warmly supported by M. C. Dupin, the president of the French committee.—Galignani's Messenger.

DAGUERRETYPE PORTRAITS.—Mr. Beard, of King William Street, has recently added another to the many improvements he has succeeded in making in the Daguerreotype process. This latest improvement consists in a mode of enamelling the silver plate, by means of which it is not liable to be tarnished, and it may even be washed like an oil painting, without sustaining any injury. The advantage does not stop here, however, for under this improved process, the colors acquire a brilliancy and depth of tone hitherto unattainable, and some of the specimens now exhibited in Mr. Beard's gallery, will bear comparison with the best miniatures. The earlier Daguerreotype portraits appear so harsh and crude in contrast with those now produced, that it is difficult to persuade oneself they are results of the same process.—Times.

Advertisements.

MR. CRIVELLI

BEGS to acquaint his friends and the public that a Third Edition of the "ART OF SINGING," enlarged and newly arranged in the form of a Grammatical System of Rules for the Cultivation of the Voice, may be had at his residence, 71, Upper Norton-street, and at all the principal Music-sellers.
* Soon will be ready, the French and German Translation.

PARTNER WANTED

IN a Music and Pianoforte Business, situated in one of the leading Streets in London. It consists of a good ready money Town and Country connexion. The share of the business will be about £600, which is the actual value of the Stock, but a portion of the Capital can remain at the usual rate of Interest. Apply, first to A. B. at Messrs. P. B. Fuld and Co.'s, 33, Villiers Street, Strand, London.

HEALTH WHERE 'TIS SOUGHT!

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Cure of a disordered Liver and Stomach, when in a most hopeless state.—Extract of a letter from Mr. Matthew Harvey, of Chapel Hall, Airdrie, Scotland, dated the 15th of January, 1850.—To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your valuable Pills have been the means, with God's blessing, of restoring me to perfect health, at a time when I thought I was on the brink of the grave. I had consulted several eminent Doctors, who, after doing what they could for me, considered my case hopeless. I had been suffering from a Liver and Stomach complaint of long standing, which during the last two years got so much worse, that every one considered my condition as hopeless. I, as a last resource, got a Box of your Pills, which soon gave relief, and by persevering in their use for some weeks, together with rubbing night and morning your Ointment over my chest and stomach, and right side, I have by their means alone got completely cured, and to the astonishment of myself and everybody who knows me.

(Signed) MATTHEW HARVEY.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—
Ague Constipation of the Bowels kinds all Liver complaints Tumours Bilious Com- Consumption Fits Lumbago Ulcers plaints Debility Gout Piles Worms of all Blisters on the Dropsy Head-ache Scrofula or King's Weakness, from Skin Dysentery Indigestion Evil whatever cause
Bowel complaints Erysipelas Inflammation Sore Throats &c., &c.
Colic Jaundice Tic-Douloureux

Sold at the Establishment of Professor Holloway, 244, Strand, (near Temple-bar, London, and most all respectable Druggists, and Dealers in Medicines throughout the civilised World, at the following prices—1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box. There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

H.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients in every Disorder are affixed to each Box.

BEETHOVEN QUARTETT SOCIETY.

HERR ERNST will play conjointly with Messrs. Cooper, Hill, and Rousselot, at the sixth and last evening performance, on Wednesday, June 11th, at 27, Queen Ann-street, at eight o'clock. Quartetts—Beethoven No. 6 in B flat, and No. 11 in F minor; Mendelssohn, No. 5 in E flat, and the posthumous. Tickets at Messrs. Rousselot and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published,

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTE.

Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 219 Regent-street; Keith and Prowse, 48, Cheapside; and Cocks & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 5d.

NEW MUSIC.

THE WORLD IS A FAIRY RING, Ballad written by Eliza Cook, composed by Joseph Philip Knight; composer of Beautiful Venice, Gather ye Rosebuds, Ocean Dreams, Song of Early Days, Come away, Cavatina, The Happy day, The Old and New Year, Her cheek was Pale.
London: Z. T. Purday, 45, High Holborn.

CHAULIEU'S PIANOFORTE WORKS.

MESSRS. RÜST and STAHL, being the Sole Proprietors of the Posthumous Works of M. Chaulieu, beg to intimate their intention of publishing them as originally intended by the author—viz., in parts at 5s. each, and which will include the Harmonical Diet, twenty-four sonatas in the twenty-four major and minor keys; having before each one exercise, one prelude, and two Improvisations in the same key, specially written for the English schools, six parts of which are already published. And also six other parts, comprising two Books of Studies in the modern style, Morceau de Salon, Album de Bal, &c., 5s. each, or the twelve parts in one volume, boards, at £3 2s.

Rüst and Stahl, Pianoforte Manufacturers and Music Publishers, 220, Regent-street, opposite the Royal Polytechnic Institution.

SACRED HARMONY.

UNDER the special PATRONAGE of Her Most Excellent MAJESTY.—Just published, price 31s. 6d.,

H. J. HAYCRAFT'S VOLUME OF SACRED HARMONY.

Contributors:—Kata Loder, Starndale Bennett, Henry Smart, G. A. Macfarren, Dr. Walmesley, W. H. Holmes, Lovell Phillips, Brinley Richards, C. Lucas, Robert Barnett, &c.

"This is a judicious and interesting publication, containing works of high merit, and altogether possessing an interest not likely to pass hastily away."—Atlas.
London: Addison and Co.; and at the Editor's residence, 33, Queen's-road, Gloucester-gate, Regent's-park.

MISS CATHERINE HAYES

AND

Mlle. JENNY LIND.

THE ONLY English Ballads sung by the above distinguished vocalists are, "Those happy days are gone," by Laveny; "Why do I love thee," by Wallace; "O sing to me," by Osborne; and "My last thought of thee," by Maynard, sung by Miss Hayes; "Take this lute," by Benedict; "Oh, summer morn," by Meyerbeer; and the "Lonely Rose," by Balfe, sung by Mlle. Lind.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

THALBERG	Iris Airs.
STREICH	Les Hirondelles.
PRAEGER	Moment Joyeux.
J. HERZ	La Sylphide.
MORI	Romance sans Paroles.
SCHULE	Méridie.
MÜLLER	Anna Bolena.
RICHARDS	Moonlight Serenade.
RICHARDS	Pastorale.
OURY	Un Souvenir.
SILAS	Nocturne.

And, AMARANTH, by E. SILAS. Also, Six new and favourite Polkas by KAZYNSKI, Price 2s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

CRAMER'S STUDIES.

THE First Volume of this Work is now Published in the upright form, newly revised and corrected by the Editor, and divided into four parts. Price, 6s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

MOLIQUE'S NEW SONGS,

SUNG BY MDLLE. BERTHA JOHANNSSEN.

"COTTAGE FAIR," (Hüttelein)	2s. 0d.
"O, were my Soul a Melody," (Wär meine Seele)	2s. 0d.
"When the Moon is brightly shining," (Ständchen)	2s. 0d.
"Oh, that my woes were distant," (Owär mein Leid)	2s. 0d.
"The pinks my garden perfuming," (In meinen Garten)	2s. 0d.
"Come all ye glad and free," (Schefflerlied)	3s. 0d.

Wessel and Co., 229, Regent Street, London.

MEYERBEER.

A SELECTION OF SONGS, BY G. MEYERBEER. The translation by THOS. OLIPHANT, ESQ.

No. 1. May song	8. She and I
2. The Rose Bud	9. The Young Mother
3. The Fisher-maiden	10. Christening song
4. Nella	11. The Four Rosebuds
5. The Monk	12. Sabbath Song
6. My Heart's Garden	13. The Misanthrope
7. Barcarolle	14. Song of Thanksgiving, trio.

Cramer, Beale & Co., 301, Regent Street.

BLUMENTHAL'S NEW WORKS.

CONSOLATION	4s. 0d.
Primevère	4s. 0d.
Violette	3s. 0d.
Marche Militaire	3s. 6d.
Trois Mazurkas (3rd set)	4s. 0d.
Scène de Ballet	4s. 0d.
Nocturne Improvisé	3s. 0d.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 301, Regent-street.

NEW SONGS BY J. P. KNIGHT.

THE MERRY MULETEER,	2s.
Queen of the Silver Bow,	2s.
Matilda of Zell,	2s.
What Pleasant Sounds,	2s.
The Voice of the Summer,	2s.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 301, Regent-street.

MISS EMMA BUSBY'S MATINEE MUSICALE

WILL take place at the BEETHOVEN ROOMS, 76, Harley Street, on JUNE 12th, to commence at Three o'clock precisely. Vocalists—Mdlles. Johanssen and Graumann. M. Stockhausen. Pianoforte—Miss Emma Busby and M. Tellefsen. Violin—Herr Deichmann. Violoncello—Signor Piatti. Tickets, Half-a-Guinea each, may be had at the principal Music-sellers, and at Miss Busby's residence, 18, Upper Gloucester-place, Dorset-square.

HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.

M. ALEXANDRE BILLET begs to announce a SERIES of THREE MORNING CONCERTS of CLASSICAL PIANOFORTE and VOCAL MUSIC, on MONDAYS, June the 2nd, 16th, and 30th, to commence at Three o'clock. Vocalists—Mme. Anna Thillon, Herr Stigelli, Herr Jules Stockhausen. Tickets, Half-a-Guinea each, may be had at the principal Music-sellers, and at the principal Music-sellers.

PROGRAMME OF THE SECOND CONCERT.
MONDAY, JUNE 16th.

PART FIRST.

1. SONATA in A major, (Ma Cousine).	Macfarren.
Allegro non troppo, e tranquillo, A major.
Andante semplice, A minor.
Vivace assai, Scherzo, C major, E major.
Prestinissimo assai, alla Tarantella, A major.
2. MORGENSTUND { German Lieder. } Mendelssohn.
WOHIN? { M. STOCKHAUSEN, } Schubert.
"I heard a streamlet gushing."
3. O ABANY! DEAR ABANY, Song from Oberon, Mme. THILLON. Weber.
4. CAPRICE in C major Haydn.

PART SECOND.

5. SONATA in C minor, Op. 35. Dussek.
Allegro ed assai agitato, C minor.
Adagio patetico ed espressivo, E flat major.
Finale Grotesque, Allegro molto e giocoso, C major.
6. "WHO IS SYLVIA?" { M. STOCKHAUSEN. } Schubert.
"HARK, HARK THE LARK." { } Schubert.
7. L'ORNEAU MORT, ROMANCE. { Mme. THILLON. } Violon.
JEAN NE MEURT PAS, CHANSON-NETTE { } E. Armand.
8. SELECTION OF STUDIES:—
F Sharp major. Henselt.
G minor (l'appassionata). W. S. Bennett.
G major. Moscheles.
C Sharp minor. Chopin.
A minor. Thalberg.

MR. COOPER'S QUARTETT CONCERT

WILL take place on Monday Evening, June 16th, at 71, Mortimer Street, Cavendish Square. Programme:—Quartett in F minor, Messrs. Sain-ton, Cooper, Hill and Rousselot, Haydn. Sonate, Piano and Violin, Messrs. Stern-dale Bennett and Cooper, Mozart. Quartett, A minor, Sain-ton, Cooper, Hill and Rousselot, Mendelssohn. Duett, two Violins, in D minor. Sain-ton and Cooper. Spohr. Quartett, Posthumous, Cooper, Sain-ton, Hill and Rousselot, in B flat, Bee-thoven. To begin at 8 past 8 precisely. Single Tickets 7s. and Family ditto to admit 4 persons £1 1s. May be had at Addisons, Regent Street, Ewer, Newgate Street, and Mr. Cooper, 3 Windsor Cottages, Haverstock Hill.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR MR. COSTA.—On FRIDAY, next, 13th June, Haydn's CREATION. Vocalists, Miss Birch, Miss Catherine Hayes, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Formes. The Orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets 2s.; Reserved 5s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's Office, 6, in Exeter Hall, or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross.

MR. FREDERICK CHATTERTON,

HARPIST to Her Majesty the Queen of the French, and H.R.H. the Duchess of Gloucester, has the honour to announce his seventeenth annual Morning Concert, on MONDAY NEXT, June 9th, 1851, at WILLIS'S GREAT ROOM, King Street, St. James's, to commence at two o'clock, on which occasion, Twelve Amateur Ladies, his pupils, will perform on Twelve of Erard's Harps, a Grand March, composed in honor of the Prince Albert. Vocal—Misses Birch, Bummel, Blanche Youngs, Messent, Ransford, Cole, Mary Rose, Sutton, Lemaire, Arregotti, Bodda. Instrumental—Mdlle. Coulon, Rosina Collins, Rousselot, Goffrie, Regondi, Frederick Chatterton, and his Juvenile Harpists, the Lockwoods. Conductor—Mr. Kiallmark. Tickets, 7s. each. To be had at all the principal Music Shops, and of Mr. Frederick Chatterton, 8, Duchess Street, Portland Place.

MISS DOLBY AND MR. LINDSAY SLOPER

BEG to announce that their Annual Grand Morning Concert will take place at the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS, on TUESDAY, JUNE the 17th, to commence at two o'clock. They will be assisted by Miss Birch, Miss E. Birch, Mdlle. Graumann, Signor Stigelli, Herr Reichart, and M. Stockhausen, Herr Ernst, and Signor Bottesini. The orchestra will be complete. Leader, Mr. Willy. Conductors, Mr. C. Lucas and Herr Schimon. Tickets Seven Shillings, to be had at the principal Music Warehouse, of Miss Dolby, 2, Hinde Street, Manchester Square, and of Mr. L. Sloper, 7, Southwick Place, Hyde Park. Stalls, half a guinea each to be had only of Messrs. Cramer and Co., 301, Regent Street, of Miss Dolby, and of Mr. L. Sloper.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE Subscribers and the Public are respectfully informed that the SEVENTH CONCERT will take place on MONDAY NEXT, the 9th inst. Programme:—Sinfonia, No. 2 (grand), in D, Haydn; Concerto, No. 2, violin, Mr. Blagrove, Spohr; Overture, Carlolan, Beethoven; Sinfonia in A, No. 7, Beethoven; Overture, Ruler of the Spirits, Weber. Vocal Performers—Madame Chanton, Mr. Sims Reeves, and M. Jules Stockhausen. Conductor—Mr. Costa. Single Tickets, £1 1s.; Double Tickets, £1 10s.; Triple Tickets, £3 5s.; to be had at Messrs. Addison and Co.'s, 210, Regent-street.

MADLLE. COULON

HAS the honour to announce that her ANNUAL MORNING CONCERT will take place at the Hanover Square Rooms, on WEDNESDAY JUNE 11, when she will be assisted by the following celebrated artists:—Vocalists: Mesdames Birch, E. Birch, Messent, Graumann, Messieurs Herberts, Lefort, Marchesi, and Sa. Tamburini. Instrumentalists—Messieurs J. Herz, Frélon, P. Chatterton, Sain-ton, and Rousselot. Conductors—Messieurs Billela, Frélon, and Lindsay Sloper. Reserved Seats, Half-a-Guinea; Single Tickets, 7s.; may be had at all the principal music warehouses, and of Madlle. Coulon, 48, Great Marlborough-street.

MISS KATE LODER

BEGS to announce that her Matinée Musicale will take place on SATURDAY, JUNE 14th, 1851, to commence at half-past two o'clock, at the NEW BEETHOVEN ROOMS, 27, Queen Ann Street, Cavendish Square. Vocalists, Miss Dolby, Miss Williams, Madlle. Macfarren, Miss Messent, Madlle. Ferrari; Miss Pyne, Miss Ley, and Miss Louisa Pyne. Herr Reichart, Signor Ferrari; Mr. T. Williams, and Mr. F. Bodda. Instrumentalists, Messrs. H. Blagrove, Watson, Dado, and Lucas, who will perform Miss Kate Loder's Quartet in E minor, Mr. Richardson, and Miss Kate Loder. Conductor, Mr. W. C. Macfarren. Tickets 10s. 6d. each; Reserved seats, 18s. To be had of Miss Kate Loder, 36, Manchester Street, at Messrs. Cramer and Beale, Addison and Co., and R. and O. Ollivier.

MESSRS. KIALLMARK & GIULIO REGONDI

HAVE the honour to announce that they will give a MORNING CONCERT, at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Saturday, June 14, to commence at half-past 2 o'clock precisely. Vocalists—Mesdames Catherine Hayes, Pyne, Louisa Pyne; Messrs. Marras, Menjis, Paltoni, and Whitworth. Instrumentalists—Piano, Mr. Kiallmark; violin, Signor Sivori; violoncello, Signor Piatti; contra basso, Signor Bottesini; guitar and concertina, Signor Giulio Regondi. Conductors—MM. Frélon and Kiallmark. Reserved Seats, 15s., to be had only of Mr. Kiallmark, 32 A, Fitzroy-square; and Signor G. Regondi, 29, Albany-street, Regent's Park. Tickets, 10s. 6d., to be had at all the principal music warehouses.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. SOIREES EXTRAORDINAIRES.

The Week's Performances will include the talents of Madame SONTAG, Mdle. CAROLINE DUPREZ, Mde. FIORENTINI, Mde.
GIULIANI, Mdle. IDA BERTRAND, Mdle. UGALDE, and Mdle.
SOPHIE CRUVELLI.

Madlle. MONTI;

Signori GARDONI, CALZOLARI, PARDINI, POULTIER, and SIMS REEVES;
Signori LABLACHE, MASSOL, F. LABLACHE, CASANOVA, SCAPINI,
LORENZO, FERRANTI, and COLETTI;
Mlle. CARLOTTA GRISI, Mlle. AMALIA FERRARIS,
Mlle. Rosa, Esper, Julian, Lamoureux, Allegrini, Kolenberg, Aussandon, Pascales, Dantonie, Soto;

MM. Charles, Ehrick, Gosselin, and Paul Taglioni.

Tuesday, June 10th, 1851, FIDELIO, and other Entertainments.

Wednesday, June 11th, Mlle. CARLOTTA GRISI'S BENEFIT, and last appearance, NORMA. The First Act of LE DIABLE A QUATRE, Selection from IL MATRIMONIO SEGRETO, the First Act of.

LES METAMORPHOSES, Selection from GUSTAVE III., LA ESMERALDA, and LES COSMOPOLITES.

Thursday, June 12th, Auber's New Grand Opera, IL PRODIGE, and other Entertainments.

Friday, June 6th—GRAND SOIREE EXTRAORDINAIRE.

MADLE. CARLOTTA GRISI

Has the honour to announce that her

BENEFIT AND LAST APPEARANCE

Will take place on WEDNESDAY, JUNE 11th, 1851, when will be presented Bellini's celebrated Opera,

NORMA.

Norma,	Madlle. SOPHIE CRUVELLI.
Adalgisa,	Mde. GIULIANI.
Pollione,	Signor PARDINI.
Flavio,	Signor MERCURIALI.
Oroveso,	Signor CASANOVA.

In the course of the evening, the First Act of the admired Ballet,

LE DIABLE A QUATRE.

Masourkas, Madlle. CARLOTTA GRISI.

A selection from Cimarosa's Opera,

IL MATRIMONIO SEGRETO.

Geronimo, Signor LABLACHE.
Il Conte Robinson, Signor F. LABLACHE.

To be followed by the First Act of the celebrated Ballet,

LES METAMORPHOSES.

The Sprite, Madlle. CARLOTTA GRISI.

A selection from Auber's Opera,

GUSTAVE III.

Including the admired Aris by Madlle. CAROLINE DUPREZ.

A selection from the admired Ballet,

LA ESMERALDA.

Comprising the celebrated Truandaise.

Esmeralda, Madlle. CARLOTTA GRISI.

Also the New Divertissement, entitled

LES COSMOPOLITES.

In which Madlle. CARLOTTA GRISI and Madlle. AMALIA FERRARIS, M. CHARLES, and M. PAUL TAGLIONI, will appear.

A Grand Classical, Dramatic, Miscellaneous, Concerted

MUSICAL ENTERTAINMENT,

N ITALIAN, FRENCH, ENGLISH, SPANISH, AND GERMAN,
Will take place on

MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 16th, 1851.

Selected from the following Authors:

Weber, Spohr, Cherubini, Spontini, Rossini, Gluck, Mercadante, Cimarosa, Beethoven, Zingarelli, Purcell, Auber, Mozart, Meyerbeer, and Mendelssohn;
And embracing many highly interesting novelties.

On this occasion will appear Mesdames

SONTAG, CAROLINE DUPREZ, ALAYMO, GIULIANI,
IDA BERTRAND, FIORENTINI,
MARIE CRUVELLI, and SOPHIE CRUVELLI.

The valuable assistance of Madame UGALDE, of the Opera Comique at Paris, has also been secured.

Signori GARDONI and CALZOLARI, Mr. SIMS REEVES and Signor PARDINI, Signori COLETTI and FERRANTI, F. LABLACHE, BALANCHI, MASSOL, and LABLACHE.

Some of the original Manuscripts of the celebrated PAGANINI having been discovered, the Direction has secured them, and M. FIVORI (engaged expressly for this occasion) will execute

THE CELEBRATED CONCERTO,

And also the so much admired

"STREGHE, or, "WITCHES DANCE."

These Pieces have never been performed by any but Paganini.

Boxes, Two Guineas; Pit Stalls 15s.; Pit Tickets and Gallery Stalls, 5s.; Gallery, 2s. 6d.; may be had at the Box Office of the Theatre.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

SECOND NIGHT OF DON GIOVANNI.

ON TUESDAY NEXT, JUNE 10th, will be performed for the second time this Season, Mozart's celebrated Opera.

DON GIOVANNI.

Donna Anna,	Madame GRISI.
Elvira,	Madlle. BERTRANDI.
Zerli,	Madame CASTELLAN.
Don Giovanni,	Signor TAMBURINI.
(His second appearance this season).
Leporello,	Herr FORMES.
Masetto,	Signor POLONINI.
Il Commendatore,	Signor TAGLIAFICO.
AND
Don Ottavio,	Signor TAMBERLIK.

The Opera will be supported by a triple Orchestra and double Chorus.

EXTRA NIGHT.—FIRST NIGHT OF LA FAVORITA.

On THURSDAY NEXT, June 12th, will be produced Donizetti's Opera,

LA FAVORITA.

Leonora,	Madame GRISI.
Inez,	Madlle. COTTI.
Roldano,	Signor TAGLIAFICO.
Don Gasparo,	Signor SOLDI.
Alfonso XI.,	Signor TAMBERLIK.
AND
Ferdinando,	Signor MARIO.

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor,—M R. COSTA.

COMMENCE AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre.

MRS. ANDERSON'S GRAND ANNUAL MORNING CONCERT.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY,

THE QUEEN.

MRS. ANDERSON

(Pianiste to Her Majesty the Queen, and Musical Instructress to Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal.)

Has the honour to inform her Patrons and Friends, that her Annual Grand

MORNING CONCERT

Will take place at the ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN,

ON FRIDAY, JUNE 20th,

Commencing at Half-past One o'clock precisely.

VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL PERFORMERS.

Mesdames Grisi, Viardot, Castellani, Angri, Anna Zerr, and Chanton. Signori Mario, Tamberlik, Tamburini, Ronconi, Bianchi, Tagliafico and Polonini, Herren Formes, Pischek, Stigelli, Stockhausen, and Rieschert. Pianoforte, Mrs. Anderson, and Miss Anderson Kirkman (niece of Mrs. Anderson). Violins, Signor Sivri and M. Sinton (Violin solo to Her Majesty the Queen). Contra Bass, Signor Bottesini. Conductor, Mr. Costa. The whole of the magnificent Band and Chorus are engaged to perform on this occasion. Mrs. Anderson respectfully solicits an early application for Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets.

Tickets and Boxes to be had of Mrs. Anderson, 21, Manchester Street, Manchester Square; at the Box Office of the Theatre, and at the principal Music Sellers and Libraries.

MUSICAL UNION.

FIFTH MATINEE.—Tuesday next, half-past 3:—Quintet, G

Minor, Mozart; Ave Maria, solo, violoncello, Schubert; trio, D major, op. 70, Beethoven; quartet E flat, op. 44, Mendelssohn. Artists:—Ernst, Deloffre, Hill, and Seligmann (violinist from Paris). Pianoforte, Herr Halle. Strangers' admissions to be had, half-a-guinea each, at Cramer and Co.'s, Regent-street. No artists admitted without tickets from J. ELLA, Director.

The Director's Matinee is fixed for the sixth Meeting, June 24th, at which Ernst, Sivori, Sinton, Laub, Deloffre, Hill, Piatti, Bottesini, Pauer, and Hallé, will perform

MISS GODDARD

BEGS to announce that her FIRST GRAND CONCERT will take place on WEDNESDAY EVENING, June 25, at the QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover-square, when she will be assisted by the most eminent Vocal and Instrumental talent.

Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; Single Ticket, 7s.—to be had of Cramer, Beale, and Co.; and at the principal Music Publishers; and of Miss Goddard, 14, Clarendon-road Villas, Notting Hill.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Studley Villas, Studley Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid, To be had of G. Purkiss, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, June 7, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Messrs. Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden.

No. 24.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, JUNE 14, 1851.

PRICE FOURPENCE.

THE MUSICAL SEASON OF 1851.

WHAT we predicted has come to pass. The musical season of 1851 has disappointed everybody. Until very lately the Italian Operas were doing very badly, and were only rescued from bankruptcy by their immense subscriptions. The theatres have not fared so ill for many years past. Drury Lane has been more than once closed, while the managers of the Princess's, the Haymarket, and the "minors," have been at their wit's end to find means of drawing the public. Until the great Rachel arrived Mr. Mitchell had no occasion to rub his hands together with satisfaction; his comedy and his vaudeville scarcely paid what they cost the enterprising director to bring them over. All the world was asking, about two months since, what Jullien intended to do? Jullien, more keen-sighted than all the world, sat, with arms folded, supine and inspeculative—Jullien, who cannot afford to fail in anything he undertakes, undertook nothing; but modestly contented himself with protecting the Surrey Gardens from becoming the sign of an absolute vacuum.

All the pianists in the world were expected in England; but none of them came, except Thalberg, who brought the score of an Opera, instead of a new fantasia for the piano, and has staid away from the arena of public exhibition, like another Cincinnatus. Whether Thalberg will eventually be dragged from his plough remains to be seen. Madame Pleyel, and Liszt, and Leopold de Meyer, were too knowing to come to England for nothing. Vieuxtemps, already as near to us as Paris, preferred remaining in France, picking up a few hundreds of 20 franc pieces in the French provinces, to walking about Regent-street with his hands in his pockets. Joseph Joachim, not less wary, kept to his post at Leipsic. Sivori came; but we doubt much if that admirable violinist has gained more than enough to pay his expenses. Ernst was already in possession of the field; but even Ernst can hardly be supposed to have reaped a golden harvest. The fact is, the Crystal Palace has absorbed both the curiosity and the money of the public, and there was nothing left to remunerate artists, foreign or native.

The crowd of mediocrities, in the shape of singers and players on instruments, attracted by the Great Exhibition, has surpassed that of any known season. From the mass may be singled out Bottesini, the contrabassist, who is unrivalled; Menter, a very good violoncellist, from Stuttgart—Laub, a young and promising violinist; and Pauer, an excellent pianist, from Prague. Mr. Ella has brought forward all these—besides Seligmann, another violoncellist, from Paris—at the Musical Union; but his extra matinées have not been remunerative. The fame of the institution over which he presides, however, has been augmented by their means, and Mr. Ella can afford to sacrifice £100, or more, for such a return. At the Philharmonic Bottesini only has appeared. In revenge, we have had M. Haumann, the violinist, who has not been heard at the Musical Union.

From the host of singers let us particularly distinguish Madame Anna Zerr, a dramatic vocalist of great reputation in the principal towns of Germany, whose specialty has hitherto been unappreciated in England. Madame Zerr's province is the stage, and we can believe that the eminence she enjoys has been well earned. In the concert-room half her accomplishments count for nothing; her style and energy, essentially German, are not yet sufficiently understood to be applauded according to their deserts, and her marvellous execution, for this reason, has merely excited astonishment. Nevertheless, the unanimous opinion of Vienna, Berlin, and other emporiums of musical taste, cannot be rejected with indifference. We repeat, therefore, that Madame Anna Zerr has yet to be recognised. That, as soon as the public become familiar with her talent, she will be cited as one of the most extraordinary vocalists of the day, we have not the slightest doubt. When we have mentioned Madame Marra Volmers—who is engaged at the Royal Italian Opera, to sing the music of the Queen of the Night, in Zauberflöte—Herr Wolf, a quaint, and Herr Reichardt, an agreeable tenor, we have specified all worth specifying, in the long army of foreign singers, who have this season besieged our shores, like a flight of locusts. They must return as they came, together with the players upon instruments of every denomination—empty-handed.

The only institution that has been a real gainer by the Great Exhibition of All Nations, from first to last, is the Sacred Harmonic Society, whose performances have been literally crowded to over-flowing. We must say that this speaks well for the taste of our foreign visitors. On the other hand, the kind of entertainment established by this society is new to them. Nothing of the kind can be heard abroad, except, occasionally, at the great festivals of the Rhine and other parts of Germany. The freshness of novelty, therefore, added to the importance and grandeur of the performances sufficiently explains the continued and increasing attraction of the Sacred Harmonic Society.

The Italian Operas have recently been "looking up." At one house the genius of the new prima donna, Sophie Cruvelli, has given a new impetus, and Fidelio and Norma have saved the extra nights from being losing speculations. At the other the attractions of the Huguenots, Lucrezia Borgia, and Don Gio- vans, with their powerful casts, and the growing reputation of Tamberlik, have been for some time filling the theatre. Things are likely to go on better, now, to the conclusion. We hope so. It will make a good end of a bad beginning.

FIDELIO.

(Continued from our last.)

The four overtures to Fidelio are said to have been written at different periods after the completion of the opera, which is, we think, corroborated by the intrinsic evidence of the compositions themselves. We are therefore justified in deferring the examination of them until we have considered the rest of the music, which will enable us to refer to such portions of the work as we find illustrated in these compositions more clearly than we might otherwise be able to do.

To commence with the opening duet of Marcellina and Jacquino. The Porter of the prison loves the Jailor's daughter, and urges his suit; Marcellina prefers Fidelio, but likes to coquet with his rival, who was encouraged by her before Fidelio was engaged by her father. Jacquino, whenever he hopes to prevail with her, is called away by a knocking at the gate, and on his return is obliged to begin again from the beginning, with all his fruitless persuasions. The character of the music is ceaselessly playful and strongly dramatic. There is much in it that reminds us of Mozart. We may instance, first, the never-ending elaboration of the phrase in the opening symphony, which is carried through the whole duet, in a manner so easy and natural, and so entirely free from pedantry, which no composer has attained to the same extent as the author of Don Giovanni. Next, the outline of the whole is symmetrical as the first movement of a symphony, and, in fact, an epitome of the grandest form of instrumental composition; but the dramatic action never stands still, and the expression of the words is never abandoned to the necessities of musical construction. Then the phrase beginning at the words, "Wenn du mir nicht freundlicher blickest," has all the feeling of some of the happiest thoughts of Mozart, a coincidence that may more or less be recognised in the phraseology of the whole movement. The style of the instrumentation, open, bright and piquant, all the parts delicately written, and all as important as if they belonged to a concertante, rather than to an orchestral piece, is peculiarly Beethoven. It is remarkably clear, notwithstanding the complicated nature of the music, which, from the many intricate points of imitation, might, with a less skilful treatment of the orchestra, have resulted in obscurity and confusion. A musical point of great interest in this duet occurs when Jacquino, hesitating and stammering, declares "Ich habe zum Weib dich gewählt." Here occurs a curious instance of the inverted pedal, the dominant being sustained by the violoncellos and bassoons, while the basses and violas in octaves, answered by the acoustic instruments, carry on a point of imitation which passes in a manner quite original through the minor key of the second of the scale—the only modulation justifiable by rule or feeling during the continuance of a pedal. This passage may be regarded as the second or dominant subject of the movement, and its recurrence, at the words, "So wirst du dich nimmer bekehren," in the original key of the movement, with the orchestral distribution so modified as to accommodate the transposition and to produce an equal effect, is what especially gives unity to the whole. To continue our analogy of the symphony form, the second part of the movement is admirably conducted, and develops the chief subjects with great skill; the repeated recurrence in different keys of the opening phrase, as Jacquino becomes more and more importunate, is an effective application of the knowledge of a profound musician to the true embellishment of his lighter ideas. One more remark upon this charming piece, and we may dismiss it to the appreciation of our readers; we would call attention to the abrupt introduction of the chord of C, when Jacquino is first interrupted by the knocking at the gate—which proves how much may be made of so very little, if that little be skilfully handled.

Jacquino is now called away by Rokko, and Marcellina left to her householdry and her own reflections. These are all upon Fidelio, and her air, "O wär ich schon mit dir vereint," unfolds her anticipations of the delights of conjugal felicity. This is a charming little romance, in two verses, with a short coda, the accompaniment being elaborated, with new figures, in the second verse. Although this song is a clearly defined unbroken melody, and the expression it conveys, notwithstanding the larger part of it is in a minor key, by no means of an earnest, much less pathetic character, we are ready to concede to the misappreciators of the music of Fidelio, that something more "pretty" (a word which has a peculiar and especial, and personal and touching, significance in our dictionary of qualifications)—we say we own that something more "pretty," as distinct from "beautiful," would have been better in keeping with the sentiment of the charming coquette, than what Beethoven has allotted to Marcellina in this situation, where the words are so essentially homely, and the feeling so unequivocally domestic, that, with all our love, we cannot but own the quaintness of the music to be somewhat out of place.

Leonore, in the disguise of Fidelio, arrives with the box of letters, the fetters, and basket of provisions, fatigued by her over exertion. She is welcomed by the loving Marcellina, and the approving Rokko, who commends the excellent manner in which for six months his young assistant has fulfilled his office, promising him his full reward in the love of Marcellina. Jacquino is jealous, and the supposed Fidelio anxious. Here we have the popular quartet in canon, "Mir ist so wunderbar," in which we most admire—first, the clear simplicity of the melody, and next, its novel and ingenious treatment. The subject is first sung by Marcellina, as a bass to the harmony of the two clarionets, supported by the violin and violoncello, pizzicato, as double-bass to the voice. Next Leonore has the subject, beneath which a new bass is added, and while the previous harmony is assigned to the flute, in a higher octave, the first voice has a counterpoint melody, which admirably contrasts and heightens the effect of the chief subject. Rokko and Jacquino have successively the subject and the accompaniment of the orchestra, and the counterpoint of the other voices becomes more complicated with the entry of each new part. Finally, a chord of the seventh, on the key note, instead of the accustomed full-close, introduces the coda. We cannot sufficiently admire the still mystery of the orchestral effect in the opening symphony, produced by the combination of the violas, in two parts, and the violoncellos, in two parts; while every one must like, with us, another expression given to the same feeling, by the accompaniment already described of the first two solos. We think, perhaps, all the more of the calm beauty of this opening, since in the last two solos of the coda, the chattering repetition of notes in the accompanying voices, and the ceaseless elaboration of the figure in the orchestra, not only destroy the fortunate impression conveyed by the beginning, but fail to relieve it with anything nearly so good. That this quartet always does and always will produce a great effect in performance, we ascribe entirely to the originality and beauty of the first part. We should like the whole still better were the latter part, while varied, not less simple than the rest.

Rokko promises that the wedding of Fidelio and Marcellina shall take place the day after the governor's shortly expected departure for Seville, to give his monthly report of the state prisoners under his care. This creates a new embarrassment for Leonore. The air of Rokko, "Hut, man nicht auch Gold beineben;"—the moral of which is that who sits down to table with nothing but love for dinner will surely rise hungry—is full of the blunt character of the hearty old man. It is a ballad, in our modern acceptation of the definition—that is, a song of two verses. But each verse comprises a change from 2-4 to 6-8 time, and a resumption of the original measure. As in all the pieces of this early portion of the opera, before the higher passions of the various characters become developed, we see in this the ingenious contrivances of the musician effectively brought in to embellish the first conceptions of genius. We need only refer to the point of imitation between voice and orchestra, in the coda to each verse, and to the elaboration of the accompaniment in the first portion of the second verse. The orchestral effect throughout is peculiarly bright and open. This is, however, only a particular instance of what is the general characteristic of the score; and it is worth the notice of the musical student that all this breadth and brightness should be produced by the simplest of means. We may especially call attention to the small number of parts in the harmony, which, without any approach to meagreness, is often expressed in two parts only, and rarely exceeds three, the violins being, to a remarkable extent, either written in octaves, or doubled, in the octave below, by the two violas. The song of Rokko is an exception to our assertion, that Fidelio is not remarkable for the strictest individuality in the music of the several characters. It is a fine embodiment of the kind old jailor, belongs to him, is of him, and would be wholly out of place if assigned to any other character in the drama. Up to the last note we find purpose and well-fulfilled intention in what the composer has so successfully placed before us, throughout this excellent, though comparatively trifling, piece. The chuckling self-satisfaction of the last repetition of the words "das Gold,"—a thought extra to the whole, after the whole is finished—with the two chords of the orchestra playing planissimo, make us feel inwardly a kind of mental smacking of the moral lips at the imaginary relish of a titbit of intelligence.

Leonore then endeavours to persuade the good-natured old jailor to let her share his labor of attending upon the state prisoners; and Rokko, after describing the terrors of the duty to be undertaken, consents that his intended son-in-law shall visit with him all the cells, except the dungeon of that mysterious prisoner, who has been for nearly two years confined, whose history is a profound secret, and whose sufferings must shortly be closed by the exhaustion of nature. This dialogue introduces the trio, "Gut, Söhnchen, gut," in which Rokko encourages the betrothed of his daughter to be of good heart, and promises to obtain immediately the governor's permission for Leonore to enter into all but the one secret dungeon. Marcellina delights in the thought of Fidelio's co-operation with her father, by which she feels that the supposed bond between them will be strengthened; while Leonore, under her pretended zeal to assist the old man, endeavours to mask the intensity of her own personal anxiety. The music here assumes a higher character than in anything that has preceded it in the opera; the expression becomes more marked and much more earnest; the plan more extended and less superficially obvious; and the melody less definitely rhythmical, but more generally extended, or continued, over the whole movement. There are two points worked with considerable elaboration throughout this trio, which, for the better perception of them, it may be as well to indicate on the outset, more especially as they occur at the commencement. These are—first, the figure of four notes upon which is formed the two bars of opening symphony; second, the vocal phrase with which the movement begins on the words, "gut, Söhnchen, gut." The broken, expressive solo of Rokko comes to a full close on the key note. That of Leonore, which follows it, is of a more impassioned character. It opens in the same bold spirit as the previous solo, by her assuring the old man that she has the courage he requires; and here the opening vocal phrase and the figure of the symphony are recurring to, with new, good, and appropriate effect. The beautiful passage on the words "Für hohen Lohn," when Leonore equivocates between her supposed and her real situation, in declaring that love will, for high reward, endure high sorrows, is appropriately repeated when Marcellina speaks in a single sense of her own affection, and recurs also, in a modified form, later in the movement. This solo comes to a half close on the dominant. The solo of Marcellina is much more simple than either of the preceding; and a most charming continuation of the passage to which we have referred, brings us to a full close on the keynote, up to which place we have had no modulation but the most transient and unimportant. A short passage, on a tonic pedal, brings us now to a half close on G, preparatory to the introduction of an effective passage, in the fifth of the original key of F, which is brought in opportunely, to relieve the long continuance of the original tonic. This passage, first delivered by the three voices alone, and afterwards, with some prolongation, by the orchestra, with voices, is broad and fresh, and well embodies the various exclamations of happiness of the three different characters. We now come to a full close in C, and from this point the modulations become more extreme and frequent. A phrase in E flat minor—when the old man says he shall soon become the prey of the grave, and that he needs assistance, while the faithful Leonore owns herself the prey of grief, but speaks of the balsam of hope—and what grows immediately out of it, especially a point of imitation between the soprano and bass voices, preceding the effective and unexpected half close on C, that leads to the return to the original key, are singularly beautiful. Here begins the coda, in an accelerated tempo; and from here to the end we have no more modulation, but a continued succession of the most beautiful melodic phrases in the same key. The most striking of these is the truly lovely passage of alternation, for the two soprano voices, beginning at the words, "Ich gab die Hand," which, after a felicitous interrupted cadence, and a half close in C, is repeated with the parts reversed. In this we have a beauty equal to Mozart, but wholly apart from him, and unlike him in all but the amount of its loveliness. Then, with a prolonged tonic pedal, and a symphony based upon the opening vocal phrase, this very charming trio ends.

(To be continued.)

CRUVELLI'S FIDELIO.

(From The Times.)

It is a fact worth noting that the fifth performance of Fidelio drew the largest audience yet assembled to listen to the chef d'œuvre of Beethoven. The splendid performance of Mademoiselle Cruvelli, as Leonora, has produced a visible effect upon the public. The progress which the art of music has made within the last few years can alone explain the influence of a work like Fidelio upon audiences accustomed to the lighter effusions of the Italian school. The chief honour however, is due to the young and already great dramatic singer, who, in so short a time has won for herself the respect and admiration of all who regard music as something higher than a mere frivolous amusement. Mademoiselle Cruvelli, in choosing the arduous part of Leonora for her debut, consulted nothing but her own enthusiasm. She who for the last three years has been delighting Italy and Germany in the operas of those modern composers who exclusively appeal to the popular feeling, has shown her estimation of the English taste by making her first essay before the English public in the one dramatic essay of the "high priest of the orchestra"—Beethoven—who made no sacrifices to the popular idol, who wrote from the heart alone, and by the pure force of genius gave birth to a master-piece that can never perish. Much as we have said of the Leonora of Mademoiselle Cruvelli, had the performance of last night been her first, we should have felt it our duty to have said a great deal more. She was in glorious voice, and sang and acted with an earnestness and a power that we have not seen surpassed by any artist at the Italian Opera. Among the audience was observed Mademoiselle Rachel, whose frequent and flattering marks of approval no doubt acted as an additional stimulus to exertion, and enabled Mademoiselle Cruvelli to excel all her previous efforts. We have rarely witnessed a more genuine impression produced upon an audience than that which followed the conclusion of the second act. Mademoiselle Cruvelli was compelled to appear twice, with Mr. Sims Reeves, at the fall of the curtain.

CRUVELLI'S NORMA.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

We had seen Mdle. Cruvelli in Fidelio three times before we read the announcement that Norma was to be her next character, and, consequently had a right to look for a result very different from that of ordinary first assumptions. An artist who can not only grapple successfully with Fidelio, (as trying a part as is to be found in the operatic range), but produce so vivid and striking a personation as to create the furor which Mdle. Cruvelli has created, might fail in realising the recognised idea of Norma, or, in placing a new and satisfactory picture before the public; but she could not give birth to a mediocrity—an empty nothing. Beethoven's energetic wife and Bellini's outrageous wife are spirits of a very different order; an artist who has succeeded triumphantly with the one, might, without deteriorating from her reputation, be wrong with the other, but not be feebly wrong—not without something to declare the presence of genius.

Mdle. Cruvelli's earlier notes did not give full promise of the popular triumph she subsequently attained. We say of the popular triumph, because in the first scene the mass of the audience usually look for some of those sky-rocket effects (doubtless very wonderful, however little akin to the character of the music) with which other Normas have astonished them. The most perfect Norma, to certain ears, is she who can hold, and will hold, longest on the last note given from the altar steps. "I look only at the stop watch, my lord," as Sterne's critic says, complaining of the length of one of Garrick's pauses. Mdle. Cruvelli did little for the stop-watch people. She delivered the passages in which she warns the Britons against rushing into war, with a cold, proud power, as of one who, revealing the will of her God, scorned to garnish the message with unbecoming ornaments of her own invention. In the same spirit she essayed the "Casta Diva," which she sang with a purity of intonation, worth a hundred clap-trap flourishes. She preserved the idea of the queenly priestess, and her liquid notes gushed forth pure and silvery as the light of the deity she was addressing. We may mention a point occurring here, which showed her attention to the real business and meaning of the scene. Stage necessities require, of course, that the air shall be delivered to the audience, though the object of Norma's apostrophe—the moon—is at the back of the scene. Cruvelli at first raised her arms appealingly to her deity, and then by degrees led away the action, as it were in so natural a manner, that the evident anomaly did not present itself to the mind. This is doubtless a trifle—but it is in attention to such trifles that the superior artist is frequently declared. We then discovered how thoughtful and well-conceived had been Mdle. Cruvelli's first cold, high manner of treatment. When the devotional address is over, and the priestess, merging in the woman, has to deliver her impassioned anticipation of the return of Pollio, Mdle. Cruvelli, suddenly discarding the hierarchical manner, burst out into a rapture of song, so eloquent, so ardent, and so thrilling, that the house, hitherto cold, fired up in an instant, and answered her with a succession of plaudits which seemed interminable. Thenceforth her progress was a march of triumphs. The beautiful scene with the younger priestess, where Norma, rendered tolerant by her own love, encourages the girl's recital, draws from her, step by step, the story of her amour, and promises her protection, was given with an admirable mixture of reserve and tenderness, the womanly sentiment seeming each moment on the point of revealing itself too warmly, and as constantly checked by the recollection of her position. Then, when the thunderbolt falls, and her own faithless Roman is pointed out by the now hopeful girl, as her lover, Cruvelli's acting was superb. The music flowed from her lips as it were mechanically, and her object seemed to be to rid herself of some bewildering mist, which was raising ghastly images before her eyes. The glowing ferocity with which she regarded Pollio as he entered, and the fierce and hurried questions she hurled at him, were appalling. She was not a raving and frantic woman, but the incarnation of intense love turning into as intense hate. The priestess, before whom a nation had quailed, was suddenly stricken, and the anger which would have sent an inferior nature tossing like the chafed sea, passed rapidly with her into a tremendous stillness, broken only as the woman's heart throbbed for utterance of its agony. The masterly treatment of this most difficult scene gave us the highest opinion of the intellect, as of the powers, of the young artist. Finally, when Pollio seeks to drag Adalgisa away, and the excess of Norma's indignation flows over and drowns all other sentiment, Mdle. Cruvelli's denouncing tones came out loud and terrible; while the point where Adalgisa rushes to the side of Norma was as striking as it was apposite. As the girl clings to her, Norma, menacing and defying Pollio, with her right arm outstretched, places her left hand upon the head of Adalgisa, and forces her down into a crouching position, as if the better to throw over her the axis of protection. The curtain dropped upon this tableau, which took the house by storm.

The scene in the second act, where Norma, resolved to destroy the offspring of her ill-fated love, is turned from her purpose as she gazes upon the sleeping children, was given by Mdle. Cruvelli with a settled sorrow, an earnestness of affection, in admirable keeping with her reading of the character. The melancholy air with which she turned to receive Adalgisa, and the womanly piteousness with which she extorted from the latter a pledge of protection for the children, did not surprise us by their beauty, because we have seen the agony of Leonora in the prison cell of her husband. But we cannot speak more highly of this part of the performance, than to say that it was a worthy companion picture to that intense and absorbing dungeon scene. Mdle. Cruvelli's voice came out in all its freshness and strength in the great duet, "Deh ! con te li prendi," which, so far as she was concerned, was a superb piece of vocalization. In the subsequent call to arms, "Guerra, guerra !" her notes rushed upon the ear like trumpet calls, and animated action seconded her vocal energy. Perhaps, however, her finest passage in this act was in the duet with Pollio, "In mia mano alfin tu sei," in which her first exultation, her torturing triumph over him, her agitated utterance while she rocked herself hither and thither, and actually crouched in the extreme of gratified vengeance, were purely and sublimely tragic. The fiery summons to the crowd, the declaration of guilt, the sudden disclosure that she herself is the unworthy woman, were electric, and if anything could be required to complete the picture, it followed in the agonised pleading to Oroveso for the lives of the children. Throughout all these trying scenes the voice was resonant and vigorous, and the execution, though never forced into notice, so as to interfere with the general tone of the performance, always admirable, and, where opportunity served, brilliant in the extreme. But the crowning glory of Cruvelli's Norma was not so much that the music throughout was given with a musician's skill guiding a magnificent organ ; not so much that the part was acted with an observant energy which missed no point ; but that the artist had so completely fused the efforts of vocal and of histrionic skill, that, as the curtain fell, the spectator felt doubtful whether he had been witness of a noble tragedy illustrated by music, or a superb opera strengthened by fine acting.

The enthusiasm of the house was prodigious. Mdlle. Cruvelli was called for at the end of each act ; and when she appeared with her fellow-performers, a second call was raised, in order that she might receive alone the compliments intended for her own individual merits. At the end of the opera wreaths and flowers were flung to her. Never was there a more genuine success—never was success better deserved.

ERNST.

(From the Morning Post.)

THE extraordinary genius of Herr Ernst as a violinist has long been known and admired by musical Europe. His wonderful execution of thirds, sixths, octaves, tenths, full chords, staccato, and legato arpeggios, harmonics, single and double, in the most difficult positions, his marvellous bowing, sympathetic tone, and great powers of expression, have for many years been the delight and astonishment of all who understand or take an interest in his unapproachably beautiful and perfect instrument. The most distinguished connoisseurs of Germany, France, Russia, Holland, Belgium, and England, have successively paid him homage ; and if any critics should now be clever enough to find out that he is not a great artist, we will say that they have come too late with their discovery. The difficulties he masters are enormous. There is scarcely a passage in his compositions which does not require the largest possible amount of digital skill, or the possession of glowing and refined musical feeling, for its execution. With half the study and toil to which he has subjected himself, Herr Ernst might possibly, like many other fashionable solo players, have succeeded in producing an effect upon the masses sufficiently great to extract plenty of money from their pockets ; but he is thoroughly conscientious ; and having, like his great predecessor, Paganini, devoted himself to the task of developing, to the fullest extent, the capabilities of his favourite instrument, he has scorned to take advantage of the ignorance of the general public, or to owe his fame and fortune to anything but the voices of his brother musicians. To be able even to play his fantasia on airs from Otello as he plays it, would take half a life's labour. Many an hour of severe application and self-denial must have been expended upon those chromatic and diatonic runs in thirds—those passages in which a subject is played throughout in full chords, and a multitude of notes are included in one legato bow. Unremitting must have been the labour which produced that extraordinary facility with which a number of notes are thrown in sparkling showers from one staccato down bow, and the most alarming leaps (where the violinist can trust only to a practised ear) are taken with unerring certainty. Equally great must have been the study which enables him to articulate distinctly the tremendously rapid divisions, requiring incessant changes of position, which the Otello fantasia contains ; and to realise the exquisite gliding effects produced in it by the occasional use of one string only. But this, though a fair test of Herr Ernst's executive genius, is only one of his triumphs. Other wonders are achieved in his fantasias on Ludovic, Il Pirata, and Hungarian Airs, the Rondo Papageno, and his arrangement of Schubert's Erl König, subject and accompaniment, for violin alone. With regard to his powers of expression, and true musical feeling, we need only remind our readers of his interpretation of the subtle poetry and profound thought which abound in the chamber music of the great masters, of the breadth and purity of style he displays in Spohr's Scena Cantante (concerto in A minor), the passionate intensity he throws into Mendelssohn's splendid concerto in E minor, the thrilling pathos of his charming Elegie, and the freakish humour of his well known Carnaval de Venise.

With such extraordinary abilities, and possessing so universal a fame, it would have been strange indeed if Herr Ernst's benefit concert had not been crowded to excess, or if the distinguished beneficiaire had not been most enthusiastically welcomed on appearing before his numerous admirers. Gratitude for the past pleasures he had afforded them, coupled with a lively sense of "favours to come," prompted this vigorous demonstration. The announcement (pregnant with interest) that Beethoven's only violin concerto was to be played for the first time by the great violinist, produced a degree of excitement quite unusual at concerts of this description. The somewhat gloomy salle of Hanover-square presented a most animated aspect when Ernst entered the orchestra, and the confiding enthusiasm of the expectant audience, expressed in four hearty rounds of applause, produced, doubtless, a highly exhilarating effect upon the performer, who, from the very commencement of his arduous task showed himself to be in the happiest possible vein. Beethoven's concerto is a very fine composition, though the passages assigned to the solo instrument are not always thoroughly violinistic. Ernst, however, contended triumphantly with all obstacles. Where it was impossible for him to impart an individual and independent brightness to his part, lofty musical feeling came to his aid, and enabled him to realise the author's conception by becoming an important portion of a great whole. On such occasions, he blended his tones with the confluent and responsive music of the orchestra with admirable skill. In the course of the piece he introduced two cadences, built upon the leading subjects of the first and last movements. Both of these were perfect masterpieces of musicianly and mechanical skill, and richly merited the enthusiastic applause bestowed upon them. Herr Ernst also performed his Rondo Papageno, and the fantasia upon airs from Il Pirata, the merits of which performances are too well known to need present criticism. Beethoven's concerto was the grand feature of the evening, and its magnificent execution on the occasion may rank amongst the great violinist's grandest achievements.

LEON REGNIER.

A very young violinist of this name has arrived in London backed by the strongest recommendations from no less an authority than Auber himself, supported by others from Théophile Gautier, the celebrated feuilletoniste of La Presse, and the Duc de Guise, an illustrious patron of the arts. Léon Regnier first distinguished himself by gaining the premier prix at the Conservatoire. But he did better than that. He studied hard, and acquired a command of his instrument, which, at his age, may be pronounced extraordinary. Having performed, in public and private, at Paris, with brilliant success, Léon Regnier has come to London, in the hope of making himself heard by our connoisseurs and amateurs of the violin. The forthcoming concerts at Her Majesty's and the Royal Italian Opera, present an excellent opportunity for bringing forward the talent of this youthful and gifted fiddler, whom we have had the pleasure of hearing in some pieces of Vieuxtemps, and in the grand sonata ("Kreutzer") of Beethoven, which enables us to testify that the recommendations and reports in his favor adduce nothing more than the truth.

HERR WOLF.

This popular German tenor, who made so great an effect at the Beethoven Quartet Society, has been suddenly recalled to his post at the Karntnerthor, the principal opera of Vienna, and has consequently been compelled to abandon several lucrative engagements in London, and the provinces of the empire. Herr Wolf's originality, and his pleasing and finished style of singing, gained him a great many admirers in this country, and his promised return, next year, will be hailed as one of the most agreeable musical expectations of the season.

Reviews of Music.

"COMPLETE METHOD FOR THE OBOE."—A. M. R. BARRET.—(First Oboe at the Royal Italian Opera.)—Jullien and Co.

What M. Barret has to say about the Oboe cannot fail to interest every amateur and admirer of the instrument. An accomplished master himself, he is anxious to impart some of the secrets of his skill to others. Hence the present work, which is not unreasonably styled a "complete method," since it leaves nothing untouched that has any bearing on the subject.

The preliminary remarks of M. Barret are various and instructive. The nature of the oboe is comprehensively described. Its qualities of tone and mechanism, its compass and keys, value as a solo and orchestral instrument, relation to other instruments, mode of manufacture, &c., are discussed at length, with equal clearness and simplicity. M. Barret considers the present improved oboe, with lengthened bell, fourteen keys and two branch keys, and compass from lower B flat to G in alt, a perfect instrument. He repudiates the system of fingering invented by Herr Boehm in its application to the oboe, since it diminishes the compass and deteriorates from the beauty of the tone. Not the least important chapter in the "method" is that which is devoted to the manufacture of reeds. M. Barret maintains, with justice, that every oboe player should be able to make his own reeds, since a reed that may be precisely suited to the peculiar formation of the mouth in one performer may be wholly unfitted to another. M. Barret supplies a great number of suggestions, accompanied by a plate in which the tools, materials, and perfect reed are illustrated, the whole progress of manufacture throughout its successive stages being laid before the eye of the reader.

The form of M. Barret's instructions is that adopted by the best writers of elementary treatises, beginning at the beginning, and gradually arriving at the desired point where perfection may be attained by a zealous and earnest student. His rules for the position in which the instrument should be held, the manner of inserting the reed in the mouth, the best means of acquiring the scales with equal volume and quality of sound on every note, are as succinct and straightforward as they are admirable. Nothing can be better of their kind and nothing more useful, appropriate, and consequently, improving, than the exercises, which progress in musical interest as the pupil gradually advances. They consist of forty short lessons, four sonatas in the regular form, fifteen grand studies, and two airs with variations. With the proviso that these compositions, all written in two parts, betray an excessive tendency to chromatic harmony, we may commend them unreservedly. They are all original, which is a great advance on the old system of cutting up popular operatic airs into slices for the use of learners, a system which cannot be too speedily abolished, as bad in every respect.

It is unnecessary to enter into further details about M. Barret's Complete Method for the Oboe. Let it suffice that no work of the same length and utility, treating of the character and mechanism of the splendid orchestral instrument which M. Barret plays to such perfection, has previously been given to the world. The work is dedicated to Lord Westmoreland, a worthier patron than which distinguished nobleman could not have been chosen. It is already adopted by the Royal Academy of Music in London, and might be adopted with advantage by all the musical academies in Europe.

"LA GORLITZA."—Composed and dedicated to Miss Phillips. —John Stenson Major.

"THE STATE POLKA."—Dedicated to the Committee of the Crystal Palace.—ALPHONSO MATTHEY.—W. J. Horn.

The Gorlitz of Mr. Major, in F, is spirited and rhythmical. The best part of it is the trio, in B flat, which recalls one of the prettiest of the contredances of Henri Herz, without, however, being a copy of it.

The State Polka of Mr. Matthey may pass muster as an unpretending trifle. The second phrase of the first part (in A—the key of the polka is supposed to be D), is lively enough, but the trio, in G, is somewhat common.

"THE STANDARD LYRIC DRAMA."—Volume the eighth.—FIDELIO, —Rendered into English from the German by J. Wrey Mould. —Revised from the orchestral score by W. S. Rockstro.—T. Boosey and Co.

The publication of Beethoven's opera at the present moment, when, from its simultaneous production at the two Italian Operas, and its having been the means of bringing before the public a new prima donna of the highest genius, it excites an unusual amount of interest, is singularly apropos. The new volume of the Standard Lyric Drama will be found a boon to those who are desirous of exploring the rich mine of Beethoven's genius. The whole of the music is given, and, although only with a piano-forte version of the score, the leading points for the different instruments in the orchestra are indicated throughout—a precaution which cannot be too highly commended for its utility and suggestiveness. Three of the four overtures which Beethoven wrote to Fidelio are presented; the first, and second in C, called Leonora, and the last, in E, the best known of the four, and always entitled Fidelio. To the amateur also the new volume of the "Standard Lyric Drama" will prove acceptable. The libretto is printed in full, and is prefaced by a brief and interesting memoir of the composer. Many curious and instructive particulars connected with the composition of Fidelio are inserted; among which we may mention the various distributions of the dramatis personæ from the year 1805 when the opera was first produced, as far as 1849, when the German company last performed at Drury Lane. In the next edition we would recommend the editor to add the cast of parts now given at Her Majesty's Theatre and the Royal Italian Opera, being fully as interesting as any which have preceded them. The almost unparalleled sensation which Mdlle. Cruvelli has created, and continues to create, in her impersonation of the heroine at the elder house, to say nothing of the splendid acting and singing of Tamwerlik, in Florestan, and the graphic and masterly performance of Formes, in Rocco, at the rival establishment, render this imperative. Had the editor delayed the publication of the work a few days longer we have no doubt he would have added two casts of characters so remarkable in certain points.

Mr. J. Wrey Mould has effected his share of the work with more than his usual tact and skill. The translation betokens that scrupulous fidelity to the original which we have had occasion to notice in former volumes of the Standard Lyric Drama, and which, even more than harmonious phrasing and poetic expression, appears to be the aim of Mr. Mould. Indeed, in order to obtain as close a translation as possible, he appears to us to have surrendered too much of the liberty allowable to a writer who transfers thoughts from one language into another, especially when rhyme is to be preserved. Mr. Mould's last, however, is to be lauded, as exhibiting great facility in versification, and a thorough acquaintance with the peculiarities and idiomatic modes of expression in the German tongue.

Mr. W. S. Rockstro has also accomplished his work in a highly commendable manner. The pianoforte score is rendered carefully and conscientiously, and displays Mr. Rockstro's powers of condensation in a most advantageous light.

M. LEVASSOR'S "HEURE DE RECREATION."

ON Tuesday morning M. Levassor gave one of the most agreeable entertainments that it has been our lot for some time to be present at. The St. James's Theatre was filled by a most fashionable audience; and for one hour the peals of laughter never ceased, except when he told his charmingly pathetic story of "Blondette," in which his remarkable versatility was applauded to the echo at the conclusion. M. Levassor is the most finished of artists. His wonderfully expressive features enable him to produce every effect he wishes, in the most legitimate manner, and every thing in his hands has double force from the absence of all effort; lacking John Parry's inimitable musical powers, he is a far greater actor; and we know not which to admire most—his old bachelor, with the altered tone and look of every succeeding ten years so strikingly and nicely delineated—his heart-broken peasant reciting the death of his betrothed—his unfortunate victim to the influenza—his fifth-rate actor on the occasion of his benefit, playing a grand part for the only time in his life—or best of all, his quick-witted gamin, "Titi" giving his companions an account of Robert le Diable, which he had witnessed at the Opera the preceding Sunday evening. The quaint notions of the plot and action, the odd artistic bill of the music, the fire of atrocious puns; and—which must be seen to be believed, as showmen say—the dancing of the nuns in the Incantation scene, altogether threw the audience into such literally painful convulsions, that those who think the higher classes never laugh heartily, must henceforth attribute their apathy rather in a want of power on the part of the entertainer, than of appreciation on their own.

M. Levassor reminds us more of Charles Mathews than any one we have seen; we almost fancied that we could trace a resemblance in his physique. His two first scenes were given in simple evening costume, but the gentleman suffering from the grippe, the beneficiaire, and Titi were personations, and in each of these the "make up" was as admirable as it was simple. He must have been very much pleased with the honest success of his entertainment. French fun usually goes well with an English audience, because those who really understand it laugh audibly to shew that such is the case; and those who do not, laugh just the same for fear they should be thought to lack the necessary educated perception; but with M. Levassor's hearers, on Tuesday, all the applause and laughter combined was evidently most spontaneous and appreciative.

Some more of these amusing matinées are announced. We cordially recommend our friends to go and hear them; and we are sure they will thank us for conducting them to so agreeable an hour's entertainment.

MR. WILLIAM LORRE, the violoncellist, for many years member of the Philharmonic and Opera bands, expired on Wednesday, after a lingering attack of pulmonary consumption.

Original Correspondence.

ORGAN PERFORMANCE AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

DEAR SIR,—Your notice of my first performance on the large organ by Willis, in the Great Exhibition, was correctly quoted from the printed programme, except the date, which on the said programme was Friday, May 2, not "on the opening day," as printed in your extract.

I wrote to you immediately upon the appearance of the inaccuracy, to call your attention to it; and I should not have again troubled you on the subject, but for the letter signed "Verax" in the current impression of your valuable publication.

Yours very truly,

16, St. Mary's Road, Canonbury,
June 10, 1851.

J. THOMAS COOPER.

A NATIONAL OPERA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

34, College Place, Camden Town,
June 2nd, 1851.

SIR,—I have read with much interest the letters of your able correspondent, "Philo-Musica," on the subject of establishing a National Opera; and as a young vocalist, aspiring to fame, I beg to say that I am ready and desirous of assisting in any scheme that may be set on foot, in furtherance of our object.

I remain, Sir, your obedient Servant,

ELLIOT NORMAN.

ENCORES AT THE OPERA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR—I was delighted, as everybody must have been, with the performance of Fidelio on Tuesday last. It did high honour to the manager, the performers, and the orchestra, and was a noble tribute to the immortal memory of Beethoven.

But I was annoyed and irritated by one thing—a thing, indeed, which you have noticed on other occasions, but which has never been reprobated in language sufficiently strong—the abominable practice of encores. It is always offensive on the stage, but was quite intolerable during the performance of the most dramatic, interesting, and affecting opera that ever was written. No spectator of an opera like Fidelio, while his sympathies and feelings are strongly roused by what is passing before him, can ever dream of anything so utterly heartless: and, accordingly, it was not the audience, but knots of impertinent claqueurs scattered over the house, who pertinaciously insisted on interrupting the march of the scene, chilling the warmth of the action, and destroying all dramatic illusion, by calling for repetition of some of the most pathetic passages. The performers, to do them justice were by no means prompt to obey so barbarous a call: Mademoiselle Cruvelli, in particular, used as much "passive resistance" as she durst venture upon, was at last dragged forward with visible reluctance. She is too intelligent not to be aware of the disadvantage under which she was laid. The best acting must be in a great measure mechanical. The most impressive attitudes, movements, and gestures, must be previously fixed upon, and repeated, with little variation, at every performance. But if repeated on the instant, the mechanism is laid bare, and what at first appeared the warm impulse of feeling is shown to be the cold result of method. When Cruvelli, at the end of an impassioned concerted piece, threw up her arms with a buoyant gesture of confidence and hope, we sympathized with the feelings of Leonora; but when she went through this movement over again, at the word of command of a few impertinent vociferators, we saw nothing but the actress repeating her part. The applause at the end of an encoired passage is always faint and cold; and the reason is evident.

By inserting this remonstrance, or appealing, in your own way, to the common sense of our opera-managers, music-directors, and performers, you may do something to abate a nuisance, the continued existence of which shows the low position still held by opera as a branch of the drama. Let people encore the concert the concert-exhibitions in operas of Verdi or Donizetti, but let them not profane the genius of Beethoven.

Your constant reader, H.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Don Pasquale was given for the second time on Saturday, when the Queen and Prince Albert attended.

On Tuesday, Fidelio was repeated, and Norma on Wednesday. On both occasions Cruvelli surpassed all her previous efforts. The performance on Tuesday attracted a crowded audience. Cruvelli was in immense voice, and excited a furor. More transcendent singing we never heard than on the Tuesday night. The more we hear Cruvelli the more forcibly are we reminded of Malibran. Voice in quality, extent and power, impulse, energy, impetuosity, and occasional recklessness, all bring to our recollections the grand artist who was snatched away from us "with the sunshine in her eyes," as N. P. Willis says of Melanie. But the gods have made us amends—they have sent us Cruvelli to fill her place.

The performance of Norma, on Wednesday, was equally grand, and created equal enthusiasm. The cabaletta of the "Casta diva," given with more force and power than ever, elicited a hurricane of applause, and the old points were received with the old demonstrations.

But deeply as we were moved, and intensely as we were delighted by the performance, Wednesday was to us a blank day in the calendar of our yearly enjoyments, for was it not Carlotta Grisi's last appearance?—was not the sun of the ballet about to be withdrawn from our eyes for a long and miserable year? Yes, the sun of the ballet did set on Wednesday night, but left such a track of glory behind as they who saw can never forget. It was as the splendour of a tropical setting, when "day dies like the dolphin," each moment changing its hues, the last the loveliest, till all is night. So faded, with manifold change, and all of beauty, from our swimming eyes, the divine Carlotta, the ethereal, the poetical, the æsthetic, the incomparable, the mountain of light, the Koh-i-noor of all hearts, How Carlotta danced on her farewell night, how she moved, how she looked, how she smiled—nay, how she did any one of these—would fill volumes. But our readers, all of whom, doubtless, have lived in the radiance of Carlotta's glance, and rejoiced in the beams of her sunny face, will be able to form in their imagination how Carlotta looked, smiled, and danced, in her ultimate efforts to please her ardent and constant admirers. Never was public favourite received with a warmer demonstration, feted throughout with more frequent and generous heart-bursts, or recalled at the end with more strenuous and suggestive vociferations. When Carlotta retreated behind the curtain, the footlights appeared to go out, the chandelier to be quenched, the whole house to grow dark. The sun of the ballet had set indeed.

On Thursday, Auber's Enfant Prodigue, under its Italian title Il Prodigio, was produced for the first time in this country. The immense preparations which it was known were being made to get up Auber's new masterpiece in the highest splendor and completeness, and the unusual strength given to the cast, acted as powerful attractions. The engagement of Madame Ugalde, the eminent singer from the Opera Comique at Paris, for the especial purpose of playing Nefte, and the fact of Massol appearing in his original part of Reuben, in which he created so profound a sensation at the Grand Opera, also tended to excite the curiosity of the public. Rosati, too, was to make her first appearance this season in Lia. Altogether the attractions were numerous and powerful, and, as a matter of course, the house was filled in every part.

The story of the Enfant Prodigue has been already made known to the readers of the Musical World. We need not, therefore, transcribe it here. Scribe, the great dramatic tactician of the age, in point of scenic effect, never displayed a readier invention than in his idea of the grand staircase in the temple of Memphis. No stage business which was ever conceived has surpassed, or even equals it, for the exhibition of masses of people and for showing them off in the most advantageous light. We cannot very well understand why a staircase should be made the place of revelry and carousal. But Scribe's magic pen takes us to the interior of an Egyptian temple, and we subscribe to all he would indicate. We ask no questions. We see and are satisfied. The effect is enough for us. The treatment of the story of the Prodigal Son is simple and touching, and the episodes, although they may be said to subtract from the unity and truthfulness of the tale, are perhaps necessary for the variety demanded in the subject of a grand opera.

How Auber has treated Scribe's book has also been shown to our readers, and our opinions of the music of the Enfant Prodigue have been chronicled. We need, therefore, only repeat our former assertion, that we consider the Enfant Prodigue a chef-d'œuvre of the master only inferior to Masaniello and Gustave, and inferior to them only in prodigality of invention and spontaneity of thought. The ballet music is perhaps equal to that of La Muette, or Gustave.

The distribution of parts was as follows:—Reuben—Massol; Asael—Gardoni; Jeftete—Madame Sontag; Amenophis—Signor Mercuriali; Nefte—Madame Ugalde; Bocchoris—Coletti; Canope—Signor Scotti; Menethon—Signor Scapini; Lia—Mdlle. Carolina Rosati; Nemroud—Signor Casanova.

The general getting up of the opera cannot be too highly commended. The mise en scene is the most splendid and complete we have seen on any stage. The scenery is exquisitely painted and is a triumph of the scenic art for Mr. Marshall, who, on the present occasion, has really transcended all the previous efforts of his pencil. Every scene displays the exceeding care and pains, no less than the talent, of the artist. In the interior of the Memphian temple, the details are carried out with extraordinary fidelity, every minute compartment on the walls and ceiling—and there are several hundred—having its appropriate emblem, or device, in beast, bird, insect, or hieroglyphic. Mr. Marshall assisted his knowledge of Egyptian painting by immediate reference to Panckancke's "Description de l'Egypte," and Champillion's "Monuments de l'Egypte et de la Nubie." He also consulted the Nineveh marbles at the British Museum.

The above authorities likewise furnished hints for the costumes, which are of the most costly and magnificent kind, and are appropriate in every instance. Nothing can be more striking than the contrast of the dresses. In the first scene, where Amenophis departs from the tent of Reuben, we see the Jewish shepherds and maidens with slaves in one group, and in the other the travellers on their way to Memphis, comprising camel-drivers, water-carriers, horsemen, merchants, with their trains and attendants, &c., &c. Here we behold no dazzling costumes; all is quiet and appropriate, the prevalence of the Hebrew attire throwing a sober gravity over all. The next scene is of a different kind. We are in the grand square of Memphis, and festivities are going forward. The place is alive with pleasure seekers, dancers, musicians, and idlers. The dresses are here gorgeous and striking in the extreme. Crowds of people in garments of all nations, and of various avocations, cross the square. Here we behold Egyptian traffickers, slave-drivers from the coast not yet called "Gold," vendors of wares from the banks of Ind, swarthy inhabitants of Nubia, wine-bibbers, boatmen, porters, &c., together with the officers, soldiers, retainers, standard-bearers, and the general populace employed in the procession, all dressed in their proper attires, and presenting a coup d'œil which baffles description. The subsequent scene is still more striking and magnificent. The sanctuary of the great temple reserved to the mysteries of Isis is revealed. The orgies of the initiated are exposed. The priests, crowned with flowers, and seated on cushions of cloth of gold, or reclining on the steps in a state of voluptuous ease, are tempted by the fascinating almées, who pour out wine for them from their golden ewers into golden goblets. This scene is one of amazing grandeur and brilliancy. The grand staircase occupies the whole extent of the stage from the foot of the curtain to the extreme wall at the back, and is filled with priests and almées. While the priests drink, and dally with some of the almées, others dance. And here the scene becomes as intoxicating as the draughts swallowed by the priests. The eye is absolutely "dazzled and drunk with beauty" as it follows the whirl of the dance, or attempts to rest upon the glare of the scene. The voluptuous beauty of the music, the dazzling splendour of the dresses, the tempting glances and inviting arms of the almées, together with the magnificent grandeur of the place, are perfectly overpowering, and we forgive the priests of the sanctuary for yielding to their temptations.

The completeness and ensemble of Mr. Lumley's ballet corps was never made more manifest than this year when the grand operas of the French school were first introduced into the repertoire of Her Majesty's Theatre. In the grand opera ballets constitute a most important feature of the performance, and the choregraphic army of Her Majesty's theatre being the most complete and accomplished belonging to any theatre in Europe involves one great element of success. Never was Mr. Lumley's corps de ballet seen, perhaps, to such perfection as on Thursday night. The amount of their exertion was indeed unusual, seeing they had to act as well as dance, to mime as well as pose. The dancing in the pas des poignards was exquisite, and was well entitled to the thunders of applause it obtained.

Mdlle. Caroline Rosati was welcomed with all the fervour usually bestowed on an old favourite. Her dancing is as delightful as ever, as replete with her peculiar specialties, as vigorous, as pointed, as elegant and graceful. She was immensely applauded in her pas both in the grand square and in the interior of the temple, and was recalled after each and received with enthusiasm.

Of the principal singers we can speak in terms of the very highest praise. To Massol is due the principal honours. His Reuben is one of the finest and most touching performance we ever witnessed on the operatic stage. No mawkish sentimentalism pervades his pathos; his feeling is genuine and manly, and seems to come direct from the heart. The scene in the second act, when Reuben demands from the bystanders news of his son, and hears he is dead, produced an electric effect. The expression infused into the lines—

"Oh! duolo estremo!

Figlio, ah! figlio io piu non ho"— was sublimely true in the delineation of intense mental agony. Massol's superb voice came out with prodigious power on more than one occasion in the scene; and, the last act, when he recovers his son, and blesses God for his restoration, his singing was as grand as any we have ever heard. Massol has now taken his stand among the greatest living bary-tones.

To the exquisitely graceful talent of Madame Sontag the part of Jeptels is admirably suited. The gentleness and the simplicity of the young maiden who gives up her lover awhile to the fascinations of the world, confident in her own powers, were charmingly assumed. Madame Sontag, in the scene in the temple with Boccoris, acted with unusual energy, and sang with more fire than ever. Her great efforts in the opera were the romanza in the first act, "Via seconda il suo desire," and the air from Haydée introduced in the fifth act, both of which were immensely applauded.

The novelty of the evening was the fair and piquante Madame Ugalde, who made her first bow to an English audience. Madame Ugalde is the pet of the Parisians and the idol of the Opéra Comique. At the last named theatre she has been considered for four years past the legitimate successor of Cinti Damourau, and has been the chief means of replenishing the treasury. Madame Ugalde's voice is decidedly French. It is not of great power, but is extensive in compass, and possesses much sweetness and extraordinary flexibility. The last quality is decidedly its specialty. Madame Ugalde can execute passages with a facility and rapidity we have rarely heard equalled, never surpassed. She sings like a musician and a thorough artist, and in her acting betokens singular esprit and fine comic powers. Her acting is perfectly free and easy, and her attitudes are always graceful and striking. While according the fair debutante this merit, we must own that we do not think she has been heard to the best advantage in the part of Nefte, which is somewhat out of her line. Although we have been no niggards of our praise, we shall be glad to make an addition thereto when we have heard Madame Ugalde in one of her own parts. Madame Ugalde was received throughout with great favour, and made a decided impression in the couplets of the Chamelier, and the aria, "Si di menfi e di Babilonia," in the fourth act. In the former she did not avail herself of the unanimous encore awarded her.

Gardoni's Azael was excellent in every point of view. He looked well, sang well, and acted well, and, moreover—a thing not to be contemned on the stage—was dressed magnificently and becomingly in the second, third, and fourth acts.

Coletti exhibited his fine voice and energetic style in Boccoris, and was loudly applauded in his opening aria, "Azzuro ciel sereno." A little more indication of the voluptuary in the temple would not have been amiss.

The band was in splendid force, and went to perfection. We certainly never heard it go so well on any former occasion. Much of this is undoubtedly due to Balfe, who was determined that Auber should have the benefit of all his talents and energies, and put his shoulder to the wheel accordingly.

Of Mr. A. Harris, under whose direction the mise en scene was got up, it would be quite impossible to speak in terms of too high praise. With a stage so circumscribed as that of Her Majesty's Theatre, he has literally worked wonders, and has achieved far more than what others have done with a wider field for their operations. The scene in the temple is a masterpiece of ingenuity and skill. Throughout the opera, in every scene, the tact and generalship of Mr. Harris was made manifest.

The opera was received with immense applause throughout, which, we opine, would be quadrupled, were there less delays between the acts. Of course some time is required before such huge machinery can work well, and we have no doubt that to-night, when Il Prodigio will be given for the second time, there will be a considerable economy of time.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday Norma was repeated; Grisi renewed her triumphs, and Tamberlik again proved himself unrivalled as Pollio. The house was crowded.

On Tuesday Don Giovanni was given for the second time. The house was filled to overflowing. Tamburini was as vigorous as ever, and Tamberlik achieved a more brilliant success, in "Il mio tesoro," than at the previous performance. The Queen was present, just in time to hear that celebrated air, and remained until the conclusion of the opera. So pleased was her Majesty with Mozart's chef d'œuvre, which she heard for the first time, that she requested it might be repeated on Saturday for her special gratification. Don Giovanni will accordingly be repeated to-night.

On Thursday the first performance of Donizetti's La Favorita, although it drew a crowded audience, was by no means propitious. Mario had not recovered from his indisposition, and should not have been allowed to come before the public under the circumstances. He sang the first romance of Fernando delightfully, but, thenceforward to the end, his resources gradually failed him. It gave us pain to see so great and popular an artist as Mario labouring under the inconvenience of such an anomalous position. He had much better have been at home by the fire-side; and we trust, until he is completely restored to health, he will not be allowed to come forward again.

Grisi acted and sang in the character of Leonora magnificently. She supported, indeed, the whole weight of the opera, and her performance, from first to last, was a series of splendid "hits." Her execution of the cavatina could not be surpassed for strength, animation, and facility. In the last scene she had all the labour and all the honours to herself; and, as though to atone for Mario's loss of voice, her own power seemed continually to increase. At the fall of the curtain she came forward, alone, to be applauded and cheered by the public, at once delighted and grateful for her unparalleled exertions.

The music of Alphonso IX. was transposed for Signor Tamberlik, from the barytone to the tenor register. The Cavatina and romance were both very finely sung; but the transposition did no good to the concerted music. We must strongly reprehend such a liberty being taken with the work of any composer. Although not the warmest admirers of La Favorita, we cannot admit that the ideas of an able musician like Donizetti should be altogether transformed, for the mere purpose of strengthening the cast of an opera. Signor Tambar himself might very reasonably have objected to it.

Tagliafico's Baldassare was as fine a representation of that character as we have ever seen. He both sang and acted admirably. Signor Tagliafico is assuredly one of the most rising members of the establishment.

Mr. Costa and his band were as great and effective as usual. The music of Leonora, Fernando, and Alphonso was considerably altered and continually transposed, which did not, however, interfere with the precision and correctness of this splendid cohort of instrumentalists. The chorus was neither so steady nor so effective as we could have wished. There were, nevertheless, some grand points of ensemble. The ballet was mercilessly curtailed; but what was given was rendered sparkling and attractive by the charming talent of Louise Taglioni. We do not think, nevertheless, that La Favorita is ever likely to become as great a favourite in England as it has been, for so many years, in Paris. Those who desire to peruse a long and detailed analysis of the drama and the music, are referred to the Musical World, vol. 25, 1847, at which period it was produced at Her Majesty's Theatre, on that memorable evening when Gardoni made his first appearance in London. This was also the first season of the Royal Italian Opera, which opened its doors to the public on the 6th of April.

Madame Viardot Garcia and Signor Ronconi have both arrived, and will, it is stated, appear in a few days.

Dramatic Intelligence.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—MADEMOISELLE RACHEL.—The tragedy of Polyculte was played on Friday, June the 6th, to a densely crowded house, eager to witness the one scene of the fifth act, in which Mdle. Rachel created so great a sensation last season. Altogether we never sat through a more tedious play than Polyculte, which consists of a love intrigue made subservient to a religious controversy. Rachel herself could not infuse one spark of warmth into the first four acts without infringing on propriety. Even when it is discovered that her husband is a Christian, her attendant abusing him accordingly, Pauline checks the free expression of her feelings not from a sense of devotion, but from a sentiment of duty towards her husband. In short, during the first four acts Pauline is little better than a frigid picture of propriety. Undoubtedly the different shades of emotion are admirably exhibited by Mdle. Rachel, but they are all subdued and toned down, so as to act simply as foils to the one great speech in the fifth act. Here the transformation is marvellous. Pauline's husband has died the death of a martyr, and she is herself made convert by the example of his courage and devotion. A complete change takes place in her demeanour. Her reserve is cast aside; holy passion radiates in her looks; the glow of enthusiasm burns in her eyes; a desire for martyrdom is evident in her physiognomy; and the whole feeling with which she is inspired is poured forth in the sublime declaration—"JE CROIS." Mdle. Rachel was never more grand than in this speech, which equals her finest inspirations. Overwhelming applause followed its delivery.

The tragedy was followed by Le Moineau de Lesbie, which is well adapted to show the versatility of Mdle. Rachel's acting, without possessing any intrinsic merit of its own. Her Majesty and Prince Albert were present.

On Saturday last, Messrs. Scribe and Legouve's drama of Adrienne Lecouvreur was played for the first time this season.

We stated our opinion last year of the merits of this piece, and see no reason for altering it on more mature consideration. Like all pieces written to exhibit the peculiar excellence of an actor, it betrays symptoms of its origin, in patchiness and want of unity in design. Where too much is aimed at, little can be produced; the author is made the slave of the actor, and the consequence is detrimental to both. What is gained in particular parts is lost in the general effect. Adrienne Lecouvreur might just as well be played in distinct scenes, with Mdle. Rachel alone upon the stage. It is an attempt to combine all the excellencies of Mdle. Rachel—her pathos, her irony, her indignation, being successively developed. A convenient medium for showing off the powers of the actress is thus obtained, but at the expense of the drama as a work of art, and with no absolute advantage to Mdle. Rachel as an artiste. We must, however, add that, whatever may be the opinion of its literary merits, the drama of Adrienne Lecouvreur was hailed on Saturday with enthusiastic demonstrations of applause. Mdle. Rachel's appearance in the second act, attired in the magnificent costume of Roxane, as she slowly advanced, book in hand, studying the part of the Ottoman princess, was the signal for a universal outburst of enthusiastic welcome. Her description of her first rencontre with Maurice was replete with tenderness and charming simplicity; and in the interview with her lover, she recited the fable of "The Two Pigeons" (by Lafontaine), Deux pigeons s'aimaient d'amour tendre, to perfection. We join in the surprise of Maurice that such simple and affecting verses should be found in a book of fables, even though the author be La Fontaine. The emotion of Adrienne when her jealousy is awakened was admirably conveyed by Mdle. Rachel, and when, in the third act, the actress is brought into contact with the "grande dame" her rival—the poor comedienne with the powerful Duchesse de Bouillon—in the struggle which ensues the advantage is all on the side of the actress. Mdle. Rachel created an immense sensation by her sarcastic reply to the threat of the Duchess, "Te vous perdrai;" her peculiar accentuation and the feeling of contemptuous irony which she throws into the words "Et moi, je vous protège," were inimitable. The invocation to Corneille, also called down a burst of enthusiastic applause. The emotion on learning the death of Maurice was portrayed with exquisite feeling. But the triumph of the evening was the scene from Phédre. No words can convey the expression of savage fury with which she assails her rival in the words of the great poet, or the wild delight which flashed in her eyes and illumined her whole face as she exulted in her vengeance.

The dying scene, when Adrienne is distracted by physical agonies and mental wanderings, brings out Mdle. Rachel's talent for detail in a manner that was perfectly intelligible to all. She had not here to produce an ideality. Absorbed by all the realities of suffering, she represents each phase of agony, each step in the workings of the poison, with heart-rendering minuteness. The feeling created was far from agreeable, but that it was most intense and absorbing there can be no doubt. We repeat, however, that the play of Adrienne Lecouvreur is not to our liking, although it affords such ample scope for the exhibition of Madlle. Rachel's extraordinary genius. Were that great artiste to withdraw from the stage, the fate of M.M. Scribe and Legouv  s drama would be sealed for ever.

On Monday, Her Majesty and Prince Albert were present, at the second performance of Adrienne Lecouvreur, and so great was the effect produced by Madlle. Rachel's powerful acting, that at the end of the play Her Majesty sent for Mr. Mitchell and directed him to express to the great tragedienne the gratification she had received from her performance.

We must not pass over in silence the great progress made by M. Raphael since last year. His enunciation is now strikingly clear and distinct; his manners are becoming and gentlemanly. He infused considerable warmth into Maurice de Saxe's description of the siege of his palace—which, by the bye, is bombastically written, and demands much tact on the part of the actor to avoid falling into exaggeration. Madlle. Avenel also deserves a word of praise, for her impersonation of the part of the Duchess. That of Michonna, the best conceived in the piece, was but indifferently rendered by Mr. Chotel, who nevertheless attempted a great deal. Regnier is not to be replaced in the character. J. de C.—

MARYLEBONE.—On Monday this theatre was opened under the management of Miss Fanny Williams, with most promising auspices, the house being crammed. The performances consisted of a piece of the melo-dramatic kind, called "Life's a Lottery," a farce in one act, and a burlesque, entitled "Joan of Arc." In the first and last of these pieces, the fair lessee and Mr. Wyld have the principal share. The novelty of the evening was the appearance of Mr. James Dael, a provincial actor and manager. As a mimic, he seems to possess powers of no ordinary kind. His assumption of the character of a drunken pot-boy and an old itinerant female ballad singer, were full of rare humour and whim; but we will wait and see more of this gentleman who was ably supported by Mrs. Barrowcliff, another provincial importation. We trust that the destinies of this little theatre, over which a cloud has lately been hanging, are about to brighten.

Provincial.

SHEWSBURY.—Messrs. Hay and Adams gave the concluding Classical Chamber Concert of the season on Friday evening week, in the Music Hall. The attendance was numerous and fashionable; and the hall was fitted up in an elegant manner, under the superintendence of Mr. Blower. The programme comprised the following selection:—Quartet, for piano-forte, violin, viola, and violoncello, Mendelssohn, Op. 1; Solo, piano-forte. Wallace and Blumenthal; Trio, pianoforte, violin, and viola, Mozart, Op. 14; Solo, violin; Solo, pianoforte, with quintet accompaniments, Hummel, Op. 56; Overture, Oberon, Weber. The whole of these pieces were admirably rendered. Mr. Hay's pianoforte solo was a highly effective performance; and Mr. Hayward's violin solo (a fantasia on popular airs) was a treat of itself worth the cost of a concert. The performances finished with the National Anthem. Messrs. Hay and Adams have incurred considerable expense in getting up these concerts, and we trust when they commence the winter series they will receive that support from the public to which they are so well entitled.

REIGATE.—The members of the Reigate Choral Society gave a concert at the Town Hall, on Tuesday evening last. The room was crowded. The selection of the music was judicious. The whole of the programme was carried through with perfect smoothness. It requires no small amount of discretion and firmness to weld a body of amateur singers. No mistake occurred on Tuesday evening. Each solo was correctly given; the duets were nicely rendered; the choruses were sung with precision, which was striking far an amateur society. The voices were sustained by an harmonium, under the touch of Mr. E. Thurnam, the conductor. All the pieces went off well; but some few deserve particular notice. Mr. Read sang "Now Heaven in fullest glory shone," (Creation) very well; the boys, especially Byfield and Katterna, one in "But thou didst not leave his soul in hell," the other in "Them that are weak," sang with ability. Amongst the choruses the following deserve notice:—Kent's "Blessed be thou, Lord God of Israel," "And the glory of the Lord," (Messiah); "How excellent thy name," (Saul); "Then round about the starry throne," (Samson); "Father, Omnipotent," (Death of Abel). The secular music was well rendered. The best pieces were "Hark, Apollo strikes the lyre," two Madrigals, "Now is the month of Maying," and "Down in a flow'ry vale," with the old favourite "Red Cross Knight," which was well sung by Messrs. Morrison, Byfield, Jeaters, and Knight. Jeaters was encored in "Life is not all a barren waste," and then sang the "Death of Abercrombie." The concert gave great satisfaction.—(Reigate Paper.)

Miscellaneous.

MISS MESSENT'S AND MR. HERBERT'S CONCERT.—It is said that M. Jules Janin came over here to laugh at the Exhibition, but forgot the purpose of his mission in admiration of what he was sent to depreciate. A similar process is probably going on among the foreign scoffers at English vocalists, each of our musical visitors from the continent exclaiming, in the words of Weber, when he came over here—"I really see no reason why the English singers are to be so much abused." True, we have no vocalist occupying the foremost rank in the highest branch of the art—no Pastas or Malibran—no Grisis, Linds, or Cruvellis; but he who despises the lark or the linnet merely because it is less musical than that of the nightingale, libels Nature, and in reality loves neither lark, linnet, nor nightingale. Among our groves of native songsters—daughters of the "mountain nymph, sweet Liberty," Miss Messent holds her way with the best. This young lady, in conjunction with Mr. Herbert, took a benefit, on yesterday evening, at Hanover-square, to a crowded audience. The executants were numerous and talented. The vocalists were Herr Fischek, Sig. Marchesi, and Sig. Calcagno—Mr. Herbert and Mr. Frank Bodd  —the Misses Messent, Poole and Browne—Mdlles. Lavinia, Graumann, and Johansen. The instrumentalists were Herr and Mad. Goffrie, Sigs. Piatti, Giulio, Rigondi, and Mdlle. Coulon. The selection combined the classical and popular, as far as can ever be reasonably expected at a miscellaneous concert, with a mixed audience. When we reached the rooms, Mr. Herbert was singing, with his usual taste and feeling, a cavatina of Lillo. This was followed by the comic duet of Rossini, "Ai capricci della sorte," given with due dramatic effect, by Mdlle. Graumann and Sig. Marchesi. The fair beneficaire then, with her pretty intelligent face and small sylph-like form, stepped forward and forthwith elicited an encore in Donizetti's graceful cavatina "Quel guardo il cavaliero." Herr Fischek also was encored in a German version of "Non piu audrai." Madlle. Graumann delivered two charming German songs charmingly—the one by Meyerbeer, the other by Molique. Then came Sig. Piatti, with his violoncello, and he too was encored as usual. After Miss Poole had sung Mendelssohn's song, "The first violet," with the pure and impassioned simplicity natural to her, Herr and Madame Goffrie wound up the first act with a duet for pianoforte and violin, and made as charming and loving an ensemble as could be wished from man and wife on such an occasion. Rossini's quartet, "Cielo il mio labbro," which opened the second act, was given with due effect by Miss Messent, Mdlle. Graumann, and Messrs. Herbert and Marchesi, after which Mdlle. Lavinia, another of the Muse's children of promise, sung Rossini's popular cavatina "Una voce poco fa." This youthful vocalist, who unites to a sparkling and dramatic style, a voice of great compass and power, and is fast rising in public favour, elicited, as she invariably does, marks of the most decided approbation. Mdlle. Lavinia, who is by birth an English woman, is about to visit Italy, whence there can be little doubt she will return an accomplished dramatic singer. A pretty comic duet, descriptive of a quarrel between "Two cousins," and written for the occasion, by Mr. C. W. Glover, was sung by Miss Poole and Miss Messent with so much vivacity as to obtain an encore. After the duet, as we had been most uncritically unwell all the evening, we came away, leaving behind us, among other good things, Thalberg's "Tarantella," played by Mdlle. Coulon, a talented young pianist; two Swedish songs by Mdlle. Johannsen, and Mr. Grattan's song, "The Zephyr," sung for the first time, by Miss Messent.

THE CITY AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY gave their annual concert on Whit-Monday last, at Anderson's Hotel, Fleet-street. Three professionals were engaged to assist them—Mrs. W. Dixon, who sang Benedict's charming ballad, "By the sad sea waves" (encored), and Lindley's "Little Nell." Miss Greenwood sang "Come hither, pretty fairy," and Loder's graceful romance, "The Lily of St. Leonard's," with her usual taste; and Mr. Augustus Eames, who was unanimously encored in a violin solo—the same, if we remember rightly, that he performed at the Lyceum Theatre, in the burlesque of the Olympic Devils.

MADAME VERDAVAINNE's last concert was given on Friday evening, the 6th instant, at the New Beethoven Rooms. Mendelssohn's quartet in E flat, No. 5 (allegro and adagio), was played with great effect by Messrs. H. Blagrove, Clementi, R. Blagrove, and Hausman. Madame Zimmerman sang an air from Der Freischütz, and Mr. Benson two ballads—"Meeting and parting," and "Just like love," in a very pleasing style. Madame Verdavainne performed Neuland's Recollections of Germany on the guitar in a light and delicate style, and was well accompanied on the piano-forte by Master Verdavainne. Her most successful piece, however, was Bertini's Grand Polonaise, for piano, with quartet accompaniments, which was honoured by loud and well-merited applause. She also played Thalberg's Russian Airs, and one of Osborne and De Beriot's duets, for piano and violin, in a very spirited manner. In the latter Madame Verdavainne was ably assisted, on the violin, by Mr. H. Blagrove. Madame Lemnair sang Meyerbeer's air, "O Prêtre de Baal," Gordigiani's "Speranza del mio cor," and "Di tanti palpiti," from Tancredi, in a manner that showed her to be an adept in various styles of music, and a clever vocalist. Mr. J. B. Chatterton, played a fantasia on the harp, which elicited and deserved the most genuine plaudits. A solo was also given on the Melophone by Mr. J. B. Tournour, in an effective manner. The concert gave great satisfaction to a numerous and fashionable audience.

RONCONI.—This eminent barytone arrived in London on Tuesday, and is announced to make his first appearance next week. Madame Ronconi has also arrived.

HERMANN.—This talented and well-known violinist has arrived in London for the season.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The oratorios of the Messiah and Elijah have been drawing immense audiences. There is nothing to say about the performance of these masterpieces.

HERMINE RUDERSDORF.—Among recent arrivals must be mentioned this accomplished German vocalist, whom we trust to have an opportunity of hearing in London.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The Creation was performed last evening to an audience literally cramming the building. We have only time to say that Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Birch, Formes, and Reeves sang Haydn's music beautifully. We shall give full particulars in our next. The Creation will be repeated next Friday, and judging from the large number of foreign artists that we personally saw turned away from the doors for want of room, we would recommend our foreign friends now in London to make an early application for tickets, or they will be unable to hear Haydn's masterpiece.

AUBER'S "CORBEILLE D'ORANGES."—The last work of the great French composer has been declared by all Paris a chef d'œuvre and Alboni's success has been unparalleled at the Académie Royale. Auber composed the music for the superb soprano-contralto con amore, and has sounded the lowest depth of her voice and soared into its highest regions with such admirable skill as to produce an effect perfectly incredible. The composer of Masaniello has surpassed the composer of Il Barbiere in a grand vocal display. The rondo finale to the Corbeille d'Oranges is more dazzling and captivating than the rondo finale to Cenerentola—at least Alboni's singing makes it appear so. We have a long letter from our own Correspondent at Paris in which the success of the opera and Alboni are dwelt upon at length. Press of matter of the highest importance alone precluded its insertion. We shall publish it in extenso next week.

ALBERT SMITH has announced his "Overland Mail" for the evenings of June 18, 25, and July 2, when his spirited and amusing lecture will be delivered for the 200th time in public. Two hundred times, then, will Albert Smith have delighted British audiences with two hundred good things at the least. May he never cease delivering lectures on Overland Mails as long as they put money in his purse, and may we be always present.

ON THE ANCIENT EGYPTIAN HARP, TIMBREL, AND SISTRUM.

After Noah left the Ark we find he built an altar and returned thanks to God, after the manner of the children of Seth; and in the 31st chap. Genesis. 27th ver., where we find that Laban having overtaken the fugitive Jacob on the mountains of Gilead, says to him, "Wherefore didst thou flee away secretly, and steal away from me, and didst not tell me, that I might have sent thee away with mirth and with songs, with Tabret and Harp." This proves that the discoveries of Jubal were preserved by the descendants of Noah; and also that instruments of wind, strings, and percussion were then in use. After the miraculous escape of Moses through the Red Sea, the Hebrews break out in a song of praise and thanksgiving to the Lord, which song was accompanied by Miriam the sister of Aaron, together with all the women; and Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out with her, with timbrels and with dances, and Miriam answered them, saying, "Sing ye to the Lord," &c., and is an early instance of women being permitted to bear a part in the performance of religious rites, as well as of vocal music being accompanied by instrumental, and by dancing. The instruments with which these songs were accompanied are decided by all the ancient authorities, to have been the ancient cymbal, made exactly like our modern tamborine, but the name timbrel was applied to all kinds of instruments of percussion. Now as Miriam was an Egyptian, and just escaped from the country where she had been educated, it is natural to suppose that the dance used now, and established afterwards by the Hebrews in the celebration of religious rites, was but the continuation of an Egyptian custom. After the death of Saul there appears to be little doubt that the lyre was greatly improved and many strings added to it, for we find it used with six, eight, ten, but not exceeding twelve or fifteen in number; and mention is made that David returning from the conquest of Goliath, met the women of the Hebrew City singing and dancing with Timbrels and Sistrums, which latter instrument belonged to the Egyptians, and consisted of a bar of metal formed into an oval, and terminating in a handle; this handle was on a line with some small pieces of iron, bent a little at both ends, and extending from one side of the oval to the other, and these being struck with a small metal stick, produced various sounds. Bruce says, "In Abyssinia it is used in the quick measure, or in Allegros. In singing psalms of thanksgiving, each priest has a Sistrum, which he shakes in a very threatening manner at his neighbour, dancing, leaping, and turning round, with such indecent violence, that he resembles rather a priest of Paganism, from whence this instrument was derived, than a Christian." The Abyssinians have a tradition, that the Sistrum, Lyre, and Tamborine were brought from Egypt into Ethiopia by Thot, in the very first ages of the World.—Tomlinson's Lectures on Ancient Music.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

G. E. H. SHREWSBURY.—Let us assure our correspondent that news from the Provinces is always welcome, and that Shrewsbury is one of the towns of our predilection. The oftener we hear from our correspondent the more shall we be pleased.

A CONSTANT READER.—Our correspondent is informed that we prefer, on all occasions, a short original paragraph to any extracts from papers. We have made room for as much of his inclosure as we could find convenient space for.

Mademoiselle Coulon's, Miss Busby's, and Mr. Chatterton's concerts will be noticed in our next.

Advertisements.

CURES FOR THE UNCURED!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—Cure of a Red Leg of more than sixty years' standing.—Mr. Barker, of No. 5, Graham's Place, Drypool, near Hull, had ulcers on his leg from the age of 18 until upwards of 80, and although for many years he had sought the first advice in the country, nothing was found to cure them. He often suffered excruciating pain for long periods together, which incapacitated him from attending to his business. He had given up all hopes of getting a cure, when at last he was persuaded to try Holloway's Pills and Ointment, which he did, and however wonderful it may appear, the leg was thoroughly healed by their means, and by continuing to use the Pills alone after his leg was well, he has become in health so hale and hearty as now to be more active than most men of fifty. N.B.—The truth of this extraordinary statement can be vouched for by Mr. J. C. Reinhardt, 23, Market Place, Hull. Feb 20th, 1850.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in the following cases:—
 Bad Legs Coco Bay Contracted and Lumbago Scurvy
 Bad Breasts Chiego-foot Stiff Joints Piles Sore-heads
 Burns Chilblains Elephantiasis Rheumatism Tumours
 Bunions Chapped hands Fistulas Scalds Ulcers
 Bite of Mosche-Corns (Soft) Gout Sore Nipples Wounds
 toes and Sand-Cancers Glandular Swell- Sore-throats Yaws
 Flies ings Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar,) London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patient's are affixed to each Pot or Box.

MR. CRIVELLI

BEGS to acquaint his friends and the public that a Third Edition of the "ART OF SINGING," enlarged and newly arranged in the form of a Grammatical System of Rules for the Cultivation of the Voice, may be had at his residence, 71, Upper Norton-street, and at all the principal Music-sellers.

* Soon will be ready, the French and German Translation.

MEYERBEER'S SONGS.

ENGLISH Version, edited by FRANK ROMER, are now published by Campbell, Ransford, and Co., British and Foreign Musical Presentation Library, 56, New Bond-street.

STRADIVARIUS VIOLIN.

TO BE SOLD, a Stradivarius Violin. May be seen at No. 56, George-street, Portman Square.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published.

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTE.

Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 210 Regent-street; Keith and Prowse, 48, Cheapside; and Cooke & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

CHAULIEU'S PIANOFORTE WORKS.

MESSRS. RÜST and STAHL, being the Sole Proprietors of the Posthumous Works of M. Chaulieu, beg to intimate their intention of publishing them as originally intended by the author—viz., in parts at 6s. each, and which will include the Harmonia Dial, twenty-four sonatas in the twenty-four major and minor keys; having before each one exercise, one prelude, and two Improvisations in the same key, specially written for the English schools, six parts of which are already published. And also six other parts, comprising two Books of Studies in the modern style, Morceau de Salos, Album de Bal, &c., 5s. each, or the twelve parts in one volume, boards, at £2 2s.

Rüst and Stahl, Pianoforte Manufacturers and Music Publishers, 230, Regent-street, opposite the Royal Polytechnic Institution.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

THALBERG	Iris Airs.
STREICH	Les Hirondelles.
PRAEGER	Moment Joyeux.
J. HERZ	La Sylphide.
MORI	Romance sans Paroles.
SCHULZ	Mélodie.
MÜLLER	Anna Bolena.
RICHARDS	Moonlight Serenade.
RICHARDS	Pastorale.
OURY	Un Souvenir.
SILAS	Nocturne.

And, AMARANTH, by E. SILAS. Also, Six new and favourite Polkas by KAZYNSKI, Price 2s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

CRAMER'S STUDIES.

THE First Volume of this Work is now Published in the upright form, newly revised and corrected by the Editor, and divided into four parts. Price, 6s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

MOLIQUE'S NEW SONGS,

SUNG BY MDLLE. BERTHA JOHANNSEN.

"COTTAGE FAIR," (Hüttelein) ...	2s. 0d.
"O, were my Soul a Melody," (Wär meine Seele) ...	1s. 0d.
"When the Moon is brightly shining," (Ständchen) ...	2s. 0d.
"Oh, that my woes were distant," (Owär mein Leid) ...	2s. 0d.
"The pinks my garden perfuming," (In meinen Garten) ...	2s. 0d.
"Come all ye glad and free," (Schifferlied) ...	3s. 0d.

Wessel and Co., 229, Regent Street, London.

BLUMENTHAL'S NEW WORKS.

CONSOLATION	4s. 0d.
Primevère	4s. 0d.
Violette	3s. 0d.
Marche Militaire	3s. 0d.
Trois Mazurkas (3rd set)	4s. 0d.
Scene de Ballet	4s. 0d.
Nocturne Improptu	3s. 0d.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent-street.

Just Published.

CHARLES OLLIVIER'S

ROYAL MUSICAL REPOSITORY AND CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY,

41 & 42, NEW BOND STREET.

VOCAL MUSIC.

The Fairest joys are fleetest,	E. J. Loder.	2s.
The Naiad's Call,	C. Pugn.	2s.
I dreamt of a Land,	C. Pugn.	2s.
The Fairies' meeting,	C. Pugn.	2s.
The Father's death,	Tomaschek.	2s.
Henry the Fourth of France,	To Gabrielle.	2s.
The Dying Wife's farewell,	Rungenhagen.	2s.
Fidelity,	Brinley Richards.	2s.

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.

Grande Valse,	J. Rummel.	Solo, 3s.;	Duet, ...	4s.
Duo Dramatique—Donna del Lago, Renaud de Vilbac	5s.
Fantaisie—Nuit de Noël,	D. Magnus.	2s.
German Illustrations—Six Lieder, J. Rummel.	in 3 books, each	3s.
Zephyr—Nocturne,	W. H. Palmer.	2s.
Six Fencées Musicales,	Kuhe.	4s.

NEW MUSIC.

THE WORLD IS A FAIRY RING, Ballad written by Eliza Cook, composed by Joseph Philip Knight; composer of Beautiful Venice, Gather ye Rosebuds, Ocean Dreams, Song of Early Days, Come away, Cavatina, The Happy day, The Old and New Year, Her cheek was Pale.

London: Z. T. Purday, 45, High Holborn.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

PIANO SOLO.

Engel, Louis.	Op. 22. Une fleur languissante.	Morceau de Salon.
Gottschalk, L. M.	" 4. La Chasse du jeune Fleury	Morceau de Concert.
Schott, A. T.	National Bouquet, The Thistle, Shamrock, and the Rose.
Thimer, Emile.	Op. 4. Nocturne.]
"	5. Scherzo.
John, Charles.	Fuorvi Galop.
Kuhn, W.	117. Homage à Londres.	Waltz.
Stany, Ludw.	Rhein und Main, Nos. 10 & 11.	Two Polkas.
"	" Nos. 12 & 13.	Two Galops

PIANO DUETS.

Brasser, C. F.	Op. 121. Fleurs Teutoniques.	Six Rondinos.
Schott, A. T.	National Bouquet, The Thistle, Shamrock, and Rose.

VIOLIN AND PIANO.

Beriot, Ch.	Op. 76. 3me Duo Concertante.
--------------------	------------------------------	--

VIOLIN, WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO OR ORCHESTRA.

Fils, Fr.	Op. 2. Sehnsucht nach der Schweiz.	Variations.
Alerd, Delphin.	" 31. Souvenirs de Mozart.	Fantaisie.

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's Street.

SACRED HARMONY.

UNDER the especial PATRONAGE of Her Most Excellent MAJESTY.—Just published, price 31s. 6d.,

H. J. HAYCRAFT'S VOLUME OF SACRED HARMONY.

Contributors:—Kate Loder, Sterndale Bennett, Henry Smart, G. A. Macfarren, Dr. Walmley, W. H. Holmes, Lovell Phillips, Brinley Richards, C. Lucas, Robert Barnett, &c.

"This is a judicious and interesting publication, containing works of high merit, and altogether possessing an interest not likely to pass hastily away."—Atlas.

London: Addison and Co.; and at the Editor's residence, 32, Queen's-road, Gloucester-gate, Regent's-park.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR MR. COSTA.—FRIDAY next, June 20, will be repeated Haydn's CREATION. Vocalists, Miss Catherine Hayes and Miss Birch, Mr. Sims-Reeves, and Herr Formes. The Orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets 3s.; reserved, 5s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter Hall, or at Mr. Bowley's, 53, Charing Cross.

MISS BASSANO AND HERR KUHE

BEG to announce that their ANNUAL GRAND MORNING CONCERT will take place at the QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover-square, on TUESDAY, the 24th of JUNE, 1851. Vocalists—Mesdames Catherine Hayes, Birch, Eliza Birch, Johannsen, and Bassano; Messrs. Stigelli, Marchesi, Jules Stockhausen, and Fischek. Instrumentalists—Madame Parish Alvars Messrs. Ernst Piatti, and Kuhe. Conductors—Messrs. Brinley Richards, Robert Green, and Biletta. Tickets, Half-a-Guinea; Reserved Seats, Fifteen Shillings each. To be had of all principal Musiciansellers, and of Miss Bassano, 19, Osnaburgh-street, Regent's-park, and of Herr Kuhe, 18, Princess-street, Cavendish-square.

NEW BEETHOVEN ROOMS, 27, QUEEN-ANNE STREET, CAVENDISH SQ.

MR. BENSON

BEGS to announce to his Pupils and Friends, that his EVENING CONCERT will take place on WEDNESDAY, June 18th, 1851. Vocalists—Miss Birch, Miss Phillips, and Miss Dolby; Mr. Benson, Signor Marchesi, and Mr. R. H. Phillips. Instrumentalists—Pianoforte, Mr. W. Sterndale Bennett; Violin, Mr. Willy; Violoncello, Mr. Lucas; Flute, Mr. Richardson; Conductor, Mr. Lindsay Sloper. To commence at eight o'clock. Tickets, 10s. 6d. each. To be had at all the principal Music Sellers, and of Mr. Benson, 11, Bloomfield Terrace, Fimlico.

MR. G. A. OSBORNE'S MATINEE MUSICALE

WILL take place at the Hanover Square Rooms, on FRIDAY, June 27th, when he will be assisted by Miss Hayes, Jules Stockhausen, Signor Sivori, and Signor Piatti.—Reserved seats, half a guinea; may be had at the principal music warehouses, and of Mr. Osborne, 43, Devonshire-street, Portland Place.

MUSICAL UNION.

ERNST, Piatti, Hallé, Deloffre, and Hill, at the EXTRA MATINEE of the MUSICAL UNION next Tuesday. Quartet in D, No. 10, Mozart; sonata in F, piano and violin, Beethoven; litanie violoncello solo, Schubert; quartet, No. 7, E minor, Beethoven; pianoforte solos, Chopin and Mendelssohn. Tickets, half-a-guinea each for visitors, to be had at Cramer and Co.'s Regent's rect. Members admitted at 7s. each.

J. ELLA.

At the Directors' Matinée, June 24th, Ernst, Sivori, Sainston, Laub, Deloffre, Hill, Piatti, Bottesini, Pauer, and Halle, will perform. No free admission will be given.

MR. COOPER'S QUARTETT CONCERT

WILL take place on Monday Evening, June 16th, at 71, Mortimer Street, Cavendish Square. Programme:—Quartet in F minor, Messrs. Sainston, Cooper, Hill and Rousselot, Haydn. Sonate, Piano and Violin, Messrs. Sterndale Bennett and Cooper, Mozart. Quartet, A minor, Sainston, Cooper, Hill and Rousselot, Mendelssohn. Duet, two Violins, in D minor. Sainston and Cooper. Spohr. Quartet, Posthumous, Cooper, Sainston, Hill and Rousselot, in B flat, Beethoven. To begin at 8 precisely. Single Tickets 7s. and Family ditto to admit 4 persons £1 ls. May be had at Addisons, Regent Street, Ewer, Newgate Street, and Mr. Cooper, 3 Windsor Cottages, Haverstock Hill.

MISS DOLBY AND MR. LINDSAY SLOPER

BEG to announce that their Annual Grand Morning Concert will take place at the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS, on TUESDAY, JUNE the 17th, to commence at two o'clock. They will be assisted by Miss Birch, Miss E. Birch, Mlle. Graumann, Signor Stigelli, Herr Reichart, and M. Stockhausen, Herr Ernst, and Signor Bottesini. The orchestra will be complete. Leader, Mr. Willy. Conductors, Mr. C. Lucas and Herr Behimon. Tickets Seven Shillings, to be had at the principal Music Warehouse, of Miss Dolby, 2, Hyde Street, Manchester Square, and of Mr. L. Sloper, 7, Southwick Place, Hyde Park. Stalls, half a guinea each to be had only of Messrs. Cramer and Co., 201, Regent Street, of Miss Dolby, and of Mr. L. Sloper.

HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.

M. ALEXANDRE BILLET begs to announce a SERIES of THREE MORNING CONCERTS of CLASSICAL PIANOFORTE and VOCAL MUSIC, on MONDAYS, June the 2nd, 16th, and 30th, to commence at Three o'clock. Vocalists—Mme. Anna Thillon, Herr Stigelli, Herr Jules Stockhausen. Tickets, for a Single Concert, 5s.; Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; Subscription Ticket for the Series to the Reserved Seats, One Guinea. To be had of Wessel and Co., 229, Regent-street, and at the principal Musiciansellers.

PROGRAMME OF THE SECOND CONCERT.

MONDAY, JUNE 16th.

PART FIRST.

- | | |
|---|--------------|
| 1. SONATA in A major, (Ma Cousine)] | Macfarren. |
| Allegro non troppo, e tranquillo, A major. | |
| Andante semplice, A minor. | |
| Vivace assai, Scherzo, C major, B major. | |
| Prestissimo assai, alla Tarantella, A major. | |
| 2. MORGENSTURM { German Lieder. | Mendelssohn. |
| WOHN! { M. STOCKHAUSEN. | Schubert. |
| "I heard a streamlet gushing." | |
| 3. O ARABY! DEAR ARABY, Song from Oberon, Mme. THILLON. | Weber. |
| 4. CAPRICE in C major | Haydn. |

PART SECOND.

- | | |
|---|----------------|
| 5. SONATA in C minor, Op. 35. | Dumek. |
| Allegro ed assai agitato, C minor. | |
| Adagio patetico ed espressivo, E flat major. | |
| Finale Grotesque, Allegro molto e giocoso, C major. | |
| 6. "WHO IS SYLVIA?" { M. STOCKHAUSEN. | Schubert. |
| "HARK, HARK THE LARK." { | Schubert. |
| 7. L'oiseau mort, ROMANCE. { Mme. THILLON. | Vivier. |
| JEAN NE MENT PAS, CHANSON-NETTE { | E. Armand. |
| 8. SELECTION OF STUDIES:— | |
| F Sharp major | Hensell. |
| G minor (l'appassionata) | W. S. Bennett. |
| G major | Moscheles. |
| C Sharp minor | Chopin. |
| A minor | Thalberg. |

AMATI VIOLONCELLO

TO be Sold, the Property of a Gentleman. It is considered a beautiful specimen of the Cremona maker, and worth $300. To be seen at Messrs. Wessel and Co., 229 Regent Street, Corner of Hanover Street.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

A Grand Classical, Dramatic, Miscellaneous, Concerted

MUSICAL ENTERTAINMENT,

IN ITALIAN, FRENCH, ENGLISH, SPANISH, AND GERMAN,

Will take place on

MONDAY, JUNE 16th, 1851.

Selected from the following Authors:

Weber, Spohr, Cherubini, Spontini, Rossini, Gluck, Mercadante, Cimarosa, Beethoven, Zingarelli, Purcell, Auber, Mozart, Meyerbeer, and Mendelssohn; And embracing many highly interesting novelties.

On this occasion will appear Mesdames

SONTAG, CAROLINE DUPREZ, ALAIMO, GIULIANI,

IDA BERTRAND, FIORENTINI,

MARIE CRUVELLI, and SOPHIE CRUVELLI.

The valuable assistance of Madame UGALDE, of the Opera Comique at Paris, has also been secured.

Signori GARDONI and CALZOLARI, Mr. SIMS REEVES and Signor PARDINI, Signori COLETTI and FERRANTI, F. LABLACHE, BALANCHI, LORENZO, MASSOL, and LABLACHE.

Director of the Music, Mr. BALFE.

Some of the original Manuscripts of the celebrated PAGANINI having been discovered, the Direction has secured them, and Sig. SIVORI (engaged expressly for this occasion) will execute

THE CELEBRATED CONCERTO,

And also the so much admired

"STREGGHE, or, "WITCHES DANCE."

These Pieces have never been performed by any but Paganini.

The Concert will commence at TWO O'CLOCK.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

Overture ...	(Fernando Cortez) ...	Spontini.
Te deum Laudamus, to be sung by all the PRINCIPAL SINGERS and FULL CHORUS	Mozart.
Duetto, Mdlle. CAROLINE DUPREZ and Mdlle. IDA BERTRAND, "Di conforto un raggio solo" (La Vestale)	Mercadante.
Aria, Signor CALZOLARI, "Alma adorata" (Maria di Rohan)	Donizetti.
Quartetto, Mdlle. GIULIANI, Mdlle. IDA BERTRAND, Mr. SIMS REEVES, and Signor BALANCHI, "Il tempestoso letto del vasto." ...	(Oberon) ...	Weber.
Scena, Madame SONTAG, "Epurgianti" (Templario)	Niccolai.
Duetto, Signor GARDONI and Mons. MASSOL, "Allons chercher Renaud" ...	(Arnida) ...	Gluck.
Aria, Madame UGALDE ...	(Le Calde) ...	A. Thomas.
Grand Selection from the celebrated Mass in C	Beethoven.
"Gloria," "Qui tollis," "Quoniam," Mesdames. SONTAG, FIORENTINI, ALAYMO, CAROLINE DUPREZ, UGALDE, GIULIANI, IDA BERTRAND, and CRUVELLI; Signori GARDONI, CALZOLARI, SIMS REEVES, PARDINI, COLETTI, MASSOL, LORENZO, BALANCHI, FERRANTI, F. LABLACHE, and Signor LABLACHE.

PART II.

Overture ...	(Anacreon) ...	Cherubini.
Quintetto, Madame SONTAG, Madame GIULIANI, Signor PARDINI, Signor F. LABLACHE, and Signor LABLACHE, "Sento, oh Dio" ...	(Cosi fan tutti) ...	Mozart.
Grand Scena, Mdlle. CRUVELLI, "Ocean! Du Ungeheur!" (Oberon)	Weber.
Trio, Three Tenors, Signori GARDONI, CALZOLARI, and SIMS REEVES, "Vivo Bacco"	Curschmann.
Aria, Madame SONTAG (by desire), "The soldier third" (Artaxerxes) ...	Concerto Violin, Signor SIVORI.	Dr. Arne.
Recit, "Ah, scostati," Madame FIORENTINI. (Cosi fan tutti)	Mozart.
Aria, "Smanie implacabile," Madame FIORENTINI. (Cosi fan tutti)	Mozart.
Trio, Three Sopranos, Mesdames SONTAG, CAROLINE DUPREZ, and CRUVELLI, "Le faccio un inchino." (Matrimonio Segreto)	Cimarosa.
Recit, "Oh! qual tristo parlar," Mr. SIMS REEVES.	Gluck.
Aria, "Fin dalla prima infanzia," (Iphigenia in Tauride)	Gluck.
Scene from ARMIDA. "Jamais dan ces bleus"	Gluck.
Mesdames SONTAG, FIORENTINI, ALAYMO, CAROLINE DUPREZ, UGALDE, GIULIANI, IDA BERTRAND, and CRUVELLI; Signori GARDONI, CALZOLARI, SIMS REEVES, PARDINI, COLETTI, MASSOL, LORENZO, BALANCHI, FERRANTI, F. LABLACHE, Signor LABLACHE, and CHORUS.

PART III.

Overture ...	(Midsummer Night's Dream) ...	Mendelssohn.
Chanson Mauresque, Mdlle. CAROLINE DUPREZ "Je suis une fille maure" (L'Etoile de Seville)	Balfe.
Serenata, Sig. GARDONI, "Or che in cielo" (Marino Fallerio)	Donizetti.
Aria, Made. UGALDE, "La Tyrolienne" (Betty)	Donizetti.
Duetto Buffo, Sig. F. LABLACHE, and Sig. LABLACHE, "Qui fra voi" (Eliza e Claudio)	Mercadante.
Romanze, Mdlle. ALAYMO, "Roberto te che adoro" (Roberto il Diavolo) ...	Violin Solo, Sig. SIVORI.	Meyerbeer.
Tersetto, Made. FIORENTINI, Made GIULIANI, and Sig. PARDINI, "Ah! che ascolto" (Der Freischutz)	Weber.
Swiss Air with Variations, Made. SONTAG, and Chorus	Eicher.
Finale, "Vadasi via di qua" Mesdames CRUVELLI, CAROLINE DUPREZ, FIORENTINI, ALAYMO, UGALDE, IDA BERTRAND, GIULIANI, and SONTAG; Signori GARDONI, CALZOLARI, SIMS REEVES, PARDINI, COLETTI, MASSOL, LORENZO, BALANCHI, FERRANTI, F. LABLACHE, and LABLACHE	...	Martini.

Boxes, Two Guineas; Pit Stalls 15s.; Pit Tickets and Gallery Stalls, 5s.; Gallery 2s. 6d.; Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets may be had at the Box Office of the Theatre.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

SECOND NIGHT OF LA FAVORITA.

ON TUESDAY NEXT, JUNE 17th, will be performed for the second time this Season, Donizetti's Opera.

LA FAVORITA.

Leonora,	Madame GRISI.
Inez,	Mdlle. COTTI.
Baldassare,	Signor TAGLIAFICO.
Don Gasparo,	Signor SOLDI.
Alfonso XI.,	Signor TAMBERLIK.
Ferdinando,	AND
...	...	Signor MARIO.

EXTRA NIGHT.—ROBERTO IL DIAVOLO.

On THURSDAY NEXT, June 19th, will be performed (for the fourth time this season), Meyerbeer's Grand Romantic Opera,

ROBERTO IL DIAVOLO.

With the following powerful cast—

Alice,	Madame GRISI.
Isabella,	Madame CASTELLAN.
Elena,	Mdlle. LOUISE TAGLIONI.
Bertramo,	Herr FORMES.
Alberio,	Signor ROMMI.
Eraldo,	Signor POLONINI.
Il Priore,	Signor TAGLIAFICO.
Cavaliere,	Signor L'UGI M EI and
Rambaldo,	Signor SOLDI.
...	...	AND
...	...	Signor STIGELLI.
Roberto,	Signor TAMBERLIK.

In the Second Act the incidental Divertissement will be danced by Mdlle. Louise Taglioni and M. Alexandre. In the Third Act the Bacchanal of the Nuns in the Grand Cloister Scene will be danced by Mdlle. Taglioni, with a numerous Corps de Ballet.

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor,—M R. COSTA.

COMMENCE AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre.

On FRIDAY NEXT, JUNE 20th. Mrs. ANDERSON'S GRAND MORNING CONCERT will take place, commencing at half-past One o'clock precisely. For particulars see advertisement.

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS'

TWO MORNING PERFORMANCES OF CLASSICAL AND MODERN PIANOFORTE MUSIC, will take place on Monday, June 23, and Wednesday, July 7, when he will be assisted by Signore Piatto and Bottesini, and Mr. Cipriani Potter. Miss C. Hayes and Herr Ernst are already engaged. Single Tickets, 8s., may be had at all the principal music warehouses; and of Mr. Brinley Richards, 8, Somerset-street, Portman Square.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 1, Strand Villas, Studley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Purkess, Dean Street Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, June 14, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Messrs. Myers & Co., 23, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden.

No. 25.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, JUNE 21, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

CRUVELLI.

The new prima donna has now taken her position so firmly with the public, that she no longer stands in need of advocacy. Her merits are appreciated, and her claim to be placed among the brightest of the stars, that, from time to time, during the last quarter of a century, have shone in the operatic hemisphere, is no longer disputed by any whose opinions are of weight, or whose disinterestedness entitles them to authority.

That Cruvelli has failings we shall not attempt to deny. What young artist is without them? Malibran had faults at twenty-nine. Cruvelli has equalled Malibran at twenty-two. For our own parts we would not give a straw for a singer, or an actress, who, at twenty-two, offered no points amenable to the strictures of criticism. The absence of faults at such an age would simply prove a great facility in the acquirement of first principles, and large powers of imitation—a close and correct copy of preceding models, and a happy organisation, physical and intellectual. But it would not prove the possession of genius, the gift of invention, the noble faculty of creation. There are many admirable and accomplished artists; but genius appears at intervals, few and far between.

We pretend that Sophie Cruvelli is a genius; and it is because we are convinced of it that we hail her as the successor of Malibran. If this be acceded, the fact of her executive means being as yet imperfect—of her conception, at times, aiming at deeper and more varied expression than her physical resources, in their present condition, enable her, entirely, and at all times, to realise as she imagines them,—tells in favour of our argument. They who dream of nothing higher than what they have learned by rote, who aspire to nothing greater than that which they have acquired from the example of others—to imitate whom successfully is the end of their ambition—cannot be said to be endowed with the gift of genius. Cruvelli is none of these; she imitates none; emulates none; she thinks for herself, and aspires for herself. Stirred by the fire that burns within her, she cannot be tied down to rules and dogmas.

That which preserves Cruvelli from what would be otherwise an imminent danger, is her profound insight into character. Her conception is always true and just, while her execution continually varies. The one proceeds from a judgment that never errs; the other from impulse, which may possibly lead her astray. Thus, while her Fidelio and her Norma are never precisely the same, on two consecutive evenings, they are, nevertheless, always Fidelio and Norma.

Whether Cruvelli makes an effect in this scene, or in that scene, in this point, or another, is never the result of calculation. She does not calculate. She sings and acts on the impulse of the moment; but her performance must always be impressive, because it is always true to one idea, always bears upon one object—the vivid realisation of the character she impersonates to the apprehension of her audience. If she would improve, Cruvelli must depend upon daily and indefatigable attention to the abstract study of her art, rather than upon attempts to refine and perfect particular points in particular characters. To progress as a singer, she must practice, with earnestness and indefatigability, the sofleggi and the general routine of vocal exercises. To improve in her acting, she must study at home—her poses, her gestures, and all the mechanism of the stage. Like all geniuses, so absolutely is Cruvelli the creature of impulse, that let her pass a day, a week, a month, in working up to the utmost degree of refinement, a certain passage, or a certain dramatic effect, it is an even chance that, on the night of performance, she will altogether overlook the idea of what she has been preparing in advance, and do something even better and more striking, a l'improviste.

But, argue as we can, on abstract principles, Cruvelli has made her way. Difficulties have not abashed her. She did not quail before Fidelio, the grand creation of Beethoven, which she has now played six times. (To night she performs it for the seventh.) It is probable that no other singer has ever appeared so often, in so brief a period, and with a success continually increasing, in this masterpiece of the German opera. She did not quail before Norma—Norma, the chief assumption of Pasta, and of Grisi—Norma, which no other singer, Jenny Lind unexcepted, has approached without trembling, and which the incomparable Malibran herself refrained from essaying in London. Cruvelli has appeared four times in Norma, and the impression she produced in this character, the sublimest in the range of Italian opera seria, was not less deep than that which attended her Fidelio. Her next essay will probably be Semiramide; and here again she ventures upon holy ground, invades the domain of Pasta, and of Grisi, Pasta's legitimate successor. She will triumph again, nevertheless.

Suppose a critic were to fall foul of Cruvelli, to see no merit in her Norma, very little in her Fidelio, and to imagine numberless faults in both; we should be sorry for this critic, and should find some difficulty in believing him candid. Suppose, however, the same critic were soberly to pronounce a French composer, of no invention and less acquirement, a great musician—nay, one of the greatest of musicians; we should, then, not be surprised to find him setting down Cruvelli as a singer of no pretensions. The weak judgment, or the strong prejudice, that could lead to the one conclusion, might easily induce the other, and we should be content to accept the alternative. If a French composer of no invention and less acquirement be a great musician, nay, the greatest of musicians, Cruvelli is not a great singer—and vice versa. Suppose a forthcoming opera, by the same French composer, were spoken of, by the same critic, in the same breath as Fidelio; we should pity that critic; though if the forthcoming opera turned out to be a masterpiece, we should abandon Cruvelli, as a delusion. But, on the other hand, supposing we had ourselves enjoyed the advantage of hearing the opera, of this French composer, at Paris; we should, then, entertain no fear for the result. Of course, this is but pleasantry. No such critic, no such composer, and no such opera exist. All the critics in the world, however, would be unable to hide a great light under a bushel, without speedily setting fire to the bushel; and all the critics in the world—much less the one in supposition, single-handed, or even with the powerful assistance of another in supposition—would be unable, were they ever so inclined, to reduce a great and highly gifted artist like Cruvelli, to the level of a common-place pretender. If such critics exist, they had better, therefore, repent and mend their ways—put on their spectacles, and see and understand an excellence, which, one day, they will perforce be made to acknowledge and pay homage to. It was suggested to us lately, that a critic, who really underrated Cruvelli, did not intend what the literal translation of his words into nonsense appeared to convey; but that his writing had two meanings, the exoteric and the esoteric, the outward seeming and the hidden truth. We are inclined to this belief, from the fact that until the advent of a certain French composer, the critic who underrates Cruvelli believed in Mendelssohn; and we must insist, that to admire sincerely the music of Mendelssohn and the music of the composer to whom we allude, at one and the same time, is an impossibility—since, if either be good, the other must necessarily be the opposite.

We have little more to add, and may safely leave Cruvelli to herself, to accomplish the career she has so gloriously begun. She has all in her favour—extreme youth, a magnificent voice, fire, industry, enthusiasm, and, to crown all, GENIUS. Of what else does she stand in need? The truth is that our feeble advocacy can no more avail her than the feebler sneer of a wrong-judging critic can injure her. The public in these matters is the best judge. The public may be spurred on to appreciate real merit more quickly and keenly; but the public cannot be laughed out of its faith; and in the long run is no more likely to be cold to genius than to embrace a cheat. The public has delivered its verdict, unmistakeably, in favour of Cruvelli, and what the public has decided it is beyond the power of any critic to impugn.

Let it not be imagined that we are pleading for Sophie Cruvelli. She stands in no want of our logic, being already a creature of splendid talent, and still more splendid promise.

We can believe anything, however great, of her "to come"—for if, at twenty-two, she has attained so high a degree of excellence, what may not be expected of her before she has reached thirty?

JENNY LIND IN AMERICA.

Without pretending to understand what the following article from the New York Herald may happen to signify, we present it to our readers as a curiosity. Everybody knows that Mr. Bennett, the editor and proprietor of the New York Herald, was at one time the fiercest supporter of Mr. Barnum, in the "Jenny Lind," as in other speculations:—

BARNUM AGAIN IN THE FIELD—PROBABLE FLARE-UP BETWEEN NAPOLEON AND JENNY LIND.

The Napoleon of showmen has a most remarkable fertility of transparent genius in the production and array of novelties and amusements, his movements continually attracting the public eye. In the exhibition of curious humbugs he has no rival and his raree-shows of all kinds extend east and west, north and south. Some of the newspapers for a week past have been publishing notices that somebody has been sending this showy Napoleon ten dollars, and other persons have certified, also, that they have received by letter a similar sum of money to be applied to some purpose as yet undivulged. This new style of creating a sensation, however, in which Barnum went to the trouble of taking the lead, was a total failure, and accordingly we are now treated to a card from Napoleon, which is published in all the journals which are edited by his "literary bureau." Here is the document:—

JENNY LIND'S LAST CONCERTS.

The public are respectfully informed that the engagement between Mdlle. Jenny Lind and myself for 150 concerts, having contained certain conditions on which the same might be terminated either at the end of sixty or of one hundred concerts, it has been determined to limit them to the latter number; and as ninety-one concerts (besides those given for charity) have already taken place, these are only nine remaining, of which positively but one will be given in New York, viz.—on Friday night, June 6th, at Castle Garden. It has been determined to give the eight last concerts in Philadelphia and Boston. The concert to be given for the benefit of the orchestra on Wednesday night, June 4th, is, of course, not included in the above. The public's obedient servant,

P. T. BARNUM.

Now, this announcement appears to be a flare-up. It is accompanied by editorial remarks of the same tenor, all emanating from Barnum's literary bureau of editors, poets, philosophers, and critics, a few of the comments being a little improved by the journalists, for the sake of variety of expression. But what is the meaning of it all? Would Barnum or Jenny Lind give up the receipts of fifty profitable concerts? If we are to rely on the telegraphic reports which have flashed over the wires from one end of the country to the other, the receipts up to this time must have amounted, according to the statements of the literary bureau, to about a million and a half of dollars. Bah! Not a bit of it. We suspect rather that the runners, agents, advertising, authors, wood cuts, biographies, and general machinery, including the literary bureau, have cost an enormous sum, and have diminished the special profits of Napoleon. We have always believed that Barnum made a great business mistake in the outset, last summer; that his determination to carry the people by storm, at a large figure for tickets, was foolish; and that he never would fulfil his pledge, that all the public should have a chance to hear the Nightingale. He would not be advised. He surrounded his speculation with complicated machinery, at a vast expense, not only with a determination to sweep the public at will towards paying a heavy tribute to his treasury, but to manage the press, and to stifle criticism. The blunder is now apparent, and all the stories about Jenny Lind's fatigues are monstrous masses of unmitigated moonshine. Jenny Lind is in the enjoyment of the best health and spirits, and can as well sing in one hundred more concerts as in those she has already given. In fact, she is stronger and more powerful in voice than she was last summer. What folly is it, then, to attempt a thing of this kind upon the public! No! Let the truth be told. The actual fact is, that Barnum finds the payment of one thousand dollars for each concert to Jenny Lind, and her expenses, added to his vast and expensive machinery of poets, critics, runners, &c., &c., is a losing business—that it touches his pocket, which is not so deep as a well or the California mines, and the diggings of which are getting scanty. If the enthusiasm of last year could be revived, he might have a chance; but all the efforts of his literary bureau, of his philosophers, poets, transcendental critics, socialist editors, cannot resuscitate the original excitement. Great have been the struggles up to the latest hour to establish Jenny Lind as a divinity, and so she is. Every day the transcendental poets have striven for her "apotheosis," and they have succeeded. At all events, these wonderful lovers of the spiritual music in the toes of the Fox girls, and of the perfect melodies of Jenny Lind's voice, declare that if she is not a divinity, she at least is the impersonation of all art, and of the music of the spheres, and of everything musical—past, present, and to come—and so she is. We repeat, what is the meaning of all this? Do the poets, philosophers, and socialists intend to have a convention and nominate Jenny for the Presidency? Or, do they intend to make her the goddess of their new religion? We know very well that she has been heartily received by the democracy. So was Fanny Elssler, who, at Baltimore, was drawn in her carriage by the excited multitude. So was Fanny Kemble in the days of her dramatic career. Elssler got the admiration and the start of the people by her legs, and Fanny Kemble charmed them by her black eyes. We never knew, however, that these things had really anything to do with the democracy of the age, or with the march of improvement. Really, really, Barnum ought to know human nature better—that enthusiasm running into folly, such as we have had instances of in the last thirty years, cannot be renewed and repeated, except for a very, very brief season. Jenny Lind, as a woman, deservedly enjoys the esteem of the public; and as an artiste, her rank entitles her to very great admiration; but there are, in this country, several quite equal to her, and more are coming. The plan of exalting her to the seventh heaven, and degrading thereby all other artistes, may be a good speculation while it lasts, but it is not a system which can endure, and will not bear philosophical examination. It is, besides, an unjust system. Jenny Lind, in Italian comic opera, is equal to any artiste of any age. There her power is fully seen; in her acting and vocalization she is the greatest alive. In the grand opera she is inferior to Grisi, to Parodi, or to Sontag; and in English, Scotch and Irish ballads her exhibitions are weak, unfinished, and out of character, as will be seen when Catherine Hayes visits this country next autumn, and sings the same compositions. Let Barnum bring down his prices and his expenses to a proper level, and he can yet complete his one hundred and fifty concerts without difficulty; but we rather suspect it is a breaking up of the engagement or partnership between them, and that Jenny Lind will take the field on her own hook, and succeed alone better than with the complicated machinery with which she has been surrounded.

N. B.—Our view is correct. The following card of Miss Lind speaks for itself.

A CARD.

(To the Editor of the Herald.)

The remarks appended to the card which Mr. Barnum publishes this morning, relative to the termination of his contract with Miss Jenny Lind, are calculated, in some degree, to mislead the public with regard to her future intentions. Miss Lind has never authorized the statement that these concerts are to be her last in America; the only publication she has consented to is, that of the close of her engagement with Mr. Barnum, after one hundred nights. The fatigue and exertion incidental to such continuous efforts make it necessary for her to enjoy, for some time, repose and relaxation. After that she may, if her strength permit, make a short tour in western New York and Canada, in order not to disappoint those who, from expecting to hear her at home, have refrained from visiting the Atlantic cities.

I am, sir, yours respectfully,
MAX HJORTSBERG, Sec. to Miss Lind.

We shall feel obliged to any one initiated in the mysteries of the Yankee press to unravel the mystery. Our ingenuity is unequal to the task.

THE ENFANT PRODIGE.

THE following communication from the Director of the Royal Italian, in reference to Auber's celebrated opera, appeared in a recent number of the Morning Herald. It will be read with interest.

(To the Editor of the Morning Herald.)

SIR,—My attention has been called to an article in your paper of yesterday, headed "Her Majesty's Theatre," which commences with the following paragraph:—

"To the surprise of everybody, Mr. Lumley, as in the case of the Fidelio, has been secretly at work upon the Enfant Prodigue of Auber, the exclusive right to which was supposed by the simple public to have been in the hands of the director of the Royal Italian Opera. But we find otherwise."

I am most unwilling, sir, to intrude myself on the notice of your readers, but having, at the commencement of the season, announced the opera of the Enfant Prodigue to be the exclusive property of the directors of the Royal Italian Opera, I feel, from a sense of duty towards the subscribers to this establishment, as well as to myself, that I have no alternative but to request the favour of the insertion in your columns of the following document, which is an exact copy of a notice served on the lessee of her Majesty's Theatre.

(Copy.)

(To Benjamin Lumley, Esq., Her Majesty's Theatre.)

"SIR,—Having seen in the public papers of Saturday last, an announcement of your intention of representing at her Majesty's Theatre, on Thursday, the 12th inst., Auber's opera L'Enfant Prodigue, under the title of Il Prodigio, which opera, so long ago as March last, I had publicly advertised as the 'exclusive property of the directors of the Royal Italian Opera,' I immediately proceeded to take legal advice upon the subject, and I now take the earliest opportunity of informing you, and I hereby give you notice, that by virtue of a certain assignment, bearing date the 2d day of January last, and made between Messrs. Brandus and Co., of Paris, publishers of music, of the one part, and myself, the undersigned Frederick Gye, of the other part, the said Messrs. Brandus and Co., as assignees of Messrs. Scribe and Auber, authors of the poem, musical composition, or opera of L'Enfant Prodigue, sold and made over to me the entire and absolute property, copyright, and right of representation, within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and the British Colonies, of the said opera, without excepting or reserving any part of it thereout. And I further give you notice, that if after this notice you shall produce, or allow the said opera, or any part thereof, or any adaptation or translation thereof, or of any part thereof, to be produced or represented at Her Majesty's Theatre or elsewhere, without my consent in writing first had and obtained for that purpose, that any and every such production or representation will be at your own peril, and that I shall hold you responsible under the several statutes in such case made and provided, or otherwise as I may be advised.

"Dated this 11th day of June, 1851."

"Yours, &c.,

"FRED. GYE.

The origin of the assignment referred to is at any time open to your inspection.

It is a source of very great regret to me, that in the management of a great establishment such as Her Majesty's Theatre, standing so high in the estimation of the public, a fair and honest rivalry is not alone had recourse to; for I believe that the field of public patronage is sufficiently wide for both Operas. I will offer no further comment on the transaction, but leave my subscribers and your readers to judge between the lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre and myself.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

FRED. GYE.

Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, June 14, 1851.

Being ignorant of the merits of the case, we leave it as it stands, without taking any part in the discussion.

CATHERINE HAYES.

(From the Cork Southern Reporter, June, 12th, 1851.)

This eminent and rarely-gifted artiste is about to bid farewell to England, to make a professional tour in the American States. The name of Catherine Hayes is not unknown in the land of the far west. The high reputation she has so long enjoyed all over Europe was not likely to be circumscribed, even by the barriers of the broad Atlantic; it spread itself abroad on the winds, and was wafted to the mighty hills and valleys of Columbia. In no part of the world is talent and genius so much respected and sought after as in America. In America, Malibran's genius was nurtured and brought to light, and fed fondly with the oil of commendation. Malibran's reputation, achieved in America, first opened the eyes of artistic Europe to American appreciation and American support.

Catherine Hayes possesses more than ordinary claims to the sympathy of the Americans. It is not alone her resplendent talents, her exquisite voice, her magnificent singing, and the grace and beauty of her person, which will direct her to their affections and enthroned her there; two other circumstances will tend to place her in the lofty position she is destined and entitled to occupy. The first of these is the strict decorum of conduct by which her artistic career has invariably been regulated. Catherine Hayes is, in short, "a good girl," and a lady, in the highest acceptance of these terms. Although young, lovely, and celebrated, her character is not only beyond the possibility of reproach, but beyond the pale of suspicion; calumny itself, with its perverted vision, and its hundred crooked tongues, has never dared to sully her whiteness: the snow on the peak of Slieve Donard is not more pure and spotless than the name of Catherine Hayes. This fact, in conjunction with her great abilities and superior attainments, will account for the unusual intimacy enjoyed by Catherine Hayes with the nobility and gentry of England and Ireland. The aristocracy of both countries rejoiced in her acquaintance, courted her society, and fêted her; the first dignitaries of the Church were proud to acknowledge her as their friend. How far this circumstance will weigh with the American public may be readily surmised.

And who shall attempt to estimate the impression which the "Swan of Erin," will produce in her Irish ballad singing on an American audience? How her hearers will be moved with "The Harp that once thro' Tara's Halls," or "Savourneen Dheelish," we can easily understand. We know how touchingly beautiful is Katy's voice, how irresistible the pathos and expression of her singing, how simple, unpretending, and pure is her style. Since the days of Miss Stephens—another Katy, by the way, although not another Irish Katy—no ballad singing has been heard which can bear the slightest comparison to that of Catherine Hayes, and, above all, no Irish ballad singing. Never was heard human organ more finely and peculiarly attuned to Irish minstrelsy. There is a plaintiveness in the tone, a sadness, a wail—a voice of beauty in mourning, as it were, for departed joys—which adapts it beyond all other voices for the sorrow and the tears that pervade Irish music.

But Catherine Hayes can surprise and astonish no less than please and delight. In the brilliant displays of Italian music she is no less at home than in the simple ballad school. Her voice has great power, great extent, and infinite beauty in the quality. It is a voice, too, of unusual flexibility and facility, and is managed with consummate art. The intonation is invariably true, and this we take to be the highest and rarest charm in the human voice. Catherine Hayes's high notes are clear and limpid, and fall upon the ear like some exquisitely-toned silver bell. They are penetrating notes, too, and go directly to the heart. The middle tones are round, mellow, and peculiarly strong in a soprano. Indeed, many good judges assert that the voice was originally a contralto, and that education alone had the effect of bringing it up so high. This we happen to know not to be the case. If education effected anything, it was to strengthen the middle part. When Catherine Hayes first appeared at the Royal Italian Opera, three years ago, her voice had not that fulness and sonority in the middle register which certainly now constitutes one of its greatest charms. She was then very young, and had not attained that physical power which now enables her to infuse so large an amount of dramatic energy into her singing. Catherine Hayes also possesses the low tones of a contralto, of considerable beauty and power, and uses them with the greatest judgment and finest effect.

Such a voice, so powerful, so rich, so pure, and of such extent, necessarily enables the singer to essay a variety of styles. We find, therefore, that Catherine Hayes is enabled to sing the soprano music of Lind, the mezzo-soprano of Grisi, and the contralto of Alboni, with equal ease and effect. This wondrous voice finds but one parallel among modern cantatrice. We have heard Catherine Hayes, at one concert, sing the grand scena from Der Freischütz, the "Casta Diva" from Norma, the "Ah! mon fils" from the Prophète, besides English, Scotch, and Irish ballads, and all with unequivocal success. Meyerbeer's song, in the Prophète, requires unusual extent of voice, unusual power, and intense dramatic feeling. We have attended Catherine Hayes's performance of Bertha, in the Prophète, and have been delighted and enchanted with her; after hearing her sing "Ah! mon fils," we should like to see her in Fides, and entertain a strong suspicion we should be still more enchanted and still more delighted.

The reputation won by Catherine Hayes in this country was won honourably and legitimately. She came to England unheralded by puff, unsupported by faction. She arrived at a time when nearly all the musical talent of the world was congregated together in London. The Lind fury was raging at its highest. The public ear was enwrapped in the "Swedish Nightingale." The public eye was dazzled by the brilliancy of the new star. Or, if any escaped the intoxicating lustre of the Lind planet, they were absorbed in the radiance of a Grisi, an Alboni, a Persiani, or a Viardot. Never was period less suited for the début of a young artiste. Jenny Lind at Her Majesty's Theatre, and Grisi, Viardot, and Alboni, at the Royal Italian Opera, occupied every position in the lyric drama, or monopolised the entire favour of the public; but the talent of Catherine Hayes was not to be concealed. Although she was engaged at a moment fatal to a debutante, although she appeared in one of Jenny Lind's most popular parts, and when the "Nightingale," too, was playing the same part at another theatre, in spite of prejudice, name, and prestige, she achieved a grand success, and was rewarded with the unreserved admiration of the public and the entire press. But Catherine Hayes, at that time, was not the perfect artist she is at the present day. Her progress has been such as to astonish her most ardent admirers. Still very young, the last few years have imparted power and finish to her singing, which previously appeared to require strengthening and ripening. An admirable musician, and a sedulous and most zealous artist, Catherine Hayes, since her advent to this country, has applied herself to the thorough mastery of her profession with heart and soul, and the result has been she has constituted herself an honour and a glory to her art.

The success achieved last year by Catherine Hayes throughout Ireland is unparalleled in the history of music in this country. The Lind sensation in America alone can be compared with it. The whole of the Emerald Isle, from north to south, from east to west, was taken captive in the singer's thrall. The people were literally frantic wherever Catherine Hayes appeared and sang. The public press teemed with eulogies. All classes were moved alike with the "Swan of Erin." The educated were enraptured with the purity and graces of her style, and that inimitable method which might be quoted as a model. The general public were carried away by her delicious voice, so limpid and so fresh, the glowing warmth of her expression, and her genuine Irish feeling. By the former, the brilliancy of execution, and the dazzling feats of fortitude, exemplified in Italian and French airs, were more prized; while the simplicity, truthfulness, and exquisite beauty of her ballad singing, were far more welcome to the latter. In short, the artist won all hearts in a few months; and had it been possible for a Queen to have been chosen from among the Irish themselves, there is not the least doubt but the Emerald throne would be occupied by Catherine Hayes.

After her Hibernian triumphs last year, Catherine Hayes repaired to Rome and some of the Italian States, and created a furor wherever she went. The dilettanti of the Opera were enchanted with her, and the theatres where she appeared were crowded to excess at every performance. No Englishwoman had previously excited a corresponding sensation in Italy. When at Rome, where there are always a number of English residents of rank and fashion, Catherine Hayes was received in the best society and treated with marked distinction and favour. In fact, so eagerly was the society of the handsome and intelligent Irish prima donna sought after by the English aristocracy of Rome, that she was seriously inconvenienced in her professional avocations, and was compelled in consequence to hasten her departure from Rome.

As an actress, Catherine Hayes, like Jenny Lind and Persiani, does not reach the grand tragic sublime of Pasta, Grisi, or Cruvelli. Indeed, her sylph-like figure and perfectly feminine features, are directly opposed to the weight and gravity of a Semiramide, a Medea, or a Donna Anna, while the natural tones of her voice have nothing of the superhuman in them, so essential in characters of the high classic stamp. The strongest passions of a woman, however, including love, hate, revenge, and despair, find an admirable interpreter in Catherine Hayes; witness her Norma and Lucrezia Borgia, which possess infinite dramatic merit. In characters of the tenderly passionate kind, Catherine Hayes feels a ground that gives her a more sure footing. Her Norma and Lucrezia are striking and powerful; her Aminta, Lucia, and Linda, are irresistible, from their truthfulness and intensity. The principal features in Catherine Hayes's acting are abandonment to the individuality of her character, fine conception, peculiar power in realizing dramatic abstractions, expression, feeling, energy, and spirit of perseverance, which is sure of carrying her triumphantly through the most arduous assumptions. Catherine Hayes never trifles on the stage. To her, art is the means that conducts to eternal fame. In her dramatic qualifications we must not overlook singularly handsome and expressive features, a graceful and well-formed person, motions easy and unconstrained, and a whole bearing which suggests the perfection of elegance and gentility.

In Sacred Music, Catherine Hayes is equal to any vocalist of the present day. The solemnity of her expression, a certain religious feeling, which appears native to her, the purity of her voice and her faultless intonation, admirably befitted her for the delivery of church music, and the music of the Oratorio. Those only who have heard Catherine Hayes in Mendelssohn's Elijah, can form an idea of the sublimity and effect of her singing in Sacred Music.

Reviews of Music.

MENDELSSOHN'S CELEBRATED "CRADLE SONG."—Arranged for the Pianoforte.—J. R. LING.—Duff and Hodgson.

We cannot admire the manner in which Mendelssohn's simple and beautiful cradle-song has been manufactured into a fashionable drawing-room piece by Mr. Ling, who, for the most part, evinces as much discretion in the choice of themes as taste in their arrangement. Mendelssohn, moreover, does not write melodies that look well in the warehouse of the fantasia-mongers. What he has written is best left to its own merits, which are quite sufficient to attract the attention of a large class of admirers, among whom we are proud to rank ourselves. Under these circumstances, it is unnecessary for us to criticise Mr. Ling's piece, which, had it been founded on a more shoppy tune (one of the consumption ballads, for instance, or one of the Nigger melodies), might have passed muster as a showy piece of its kind; but, since it only succeeds in mutilating and disfiguring a thought of intrinsic beauty, we cannot by any consideration, be induced to commend it. Mendelssohn's music is holy ground, and he who approaches it should take off his shoes, and walk barefoot, reverentially.

"CHANT DES CROATES."—Marche Favorite.—Arrangé pour Piano.—J. R. LING.—Joseph Williams.

The "Chant des Croates," which M. Blumenthal has rendered famous, comes more properly within the province of the fantasia-makers, of whom Mr. Ling is certainly one of the most able. He has twisted the candid Croation tune into a capriccio, which, by its brilliancy, fluency, and moderate difficulty, will appeal, we have little doubt, successfully, to a large number of players. After a short introduction in G, the canto of the Croats is given to the left hand in the same pitch, with an accompaniment of chords for the right. It is then given to the right hand in octaves, with an accompaniment in triplets for the left. It then devolves again to the left with a brilliant arpeggio for the right, the key of G being preserved throughout four pages, without modification. Subsequently occurs an episode in E flat, of two pages duration, in which the subject is prettily played with. The whole concludes with a coda, demanding considerable extension of finger, rapid execution, and much foresight. This is the best part of the fantasia, which we can recommend with conscience.

"YES! I DEARLY LOVE THEE."—Ballad.—J. R. LING.—H. Fentum.

On the present occasion Mr. Ling has been more successful as a vocal writer than as an instrumental. The ballad before us is in A flat, with sweet chords. The melody, not strikingly original, is nevertheless graceful and agreeable, and fully expressive of the words, which are above the ordinary class. It is as simple and unpretending as it is well written, and cannot fail to prove a desirable chamber song.

"THE GIPSY SCHOTTISCHE," for the pianoforte. D. MAGNUS.—Charles Ollivier.

The best part of this Schottische (in D) is the first phrase, which, although it reminds us of a subject from the overture to La Dame Blanche, is appropriately characteristic, and from its marked rhythm is well adapted for dancing. The second part, page 2, consists of little more than a progression of chords, and is therefore not so applicable to the purpose. On the other hand, the commencement of the trio in G is lively and pretty, but the same objection holds with regard to its second part. The writer is evidently a good musician, but is too ambitious of displaying his scholarship.

"DUO DRAMATIQUE," pour piano, sur les motifs de "LA DONNA DEL LAGO," REAUD DE VILBAC.—Charles Ollivier.

Everybody knows the grand duet of Elena and Huberto in Rossini's sparkling opera, La Donna del Lago; we need, therefore, do no more in its respect than take off our caps and avow our continued allegiance to its beauty; and everybody knows the other beautiful airs of the introduction to this ever fresh, charming, and unjustly mutilated work; we therefore need do no more in their respect than ditto, ditto. M. Renaud de Vilbac has manufactured these old friends into a brilliant pot-pourri, which, if length be a distinction, is distinguished by length. But let us be just. Length is not the only remarkable quality of M. Vilbac's pot-pourri, and, although we certainly prefer to hear the motivi cantabile and cabaletta of the lady of Loch Katrine, from the vigorous and mellifluous throats of Grisi, Mario, and Tamberlik, M. de Vilbac has connected them together in so easy and graceful a manner, and has sprinkled them over with so many light and brilliant passages, that two competent performers can hardly fail to render his pot-pourri an agreeable and effective pianoforte duet.

GERMAN ILLUSTRATIONS.—SIX LIEDER selected from the best composers—Book 1, SULEIKA—MENDELSSOHN—LIEBESBOTSCHAFT—A. FESCA. Book 2, WIEGEN-LIED—A. FESCA; An Adelaide—C. KREBS. Book 3, DRE GILLETEN—FER. GUMBERT—AUF DEM BERGE—LINDBLAD. Transcribed for the pianoforte by T. RUMMEL.—Charles Ollivier.

In his arrangement of Mendelssohn's first song of "Suleika," in E minor (which must be carefully distinguished from the second in E major, comprised in the set of six songs, dedicated to Miss Dolby), Mr. Rummel has shewn himself, not only an able adapter, but a real appreciator of fine music. He has respected every note of the original, has preserved the harmonies of Mendelssohn untouched, and, while giving the full vocal effect of the melody on the piano, has contrived to adhere, with unswerving strictness, to the character and design of Mendelssohn's accompaniments. The "Suleika," as it stands in Mr. Rummel's selection, may take its place by the side of the best Lieder ohne worte, since it is as beautiful as any of them, and equally well suited to produce effect as a solo piece. We have rarely indeed seen an arrangement more commendable for skill, judgment, and irreproachable good taste. Mr. Rummel has dedicated his arrangement to Miss Emma Goodman, a young, talented, and promising pianist.

Fesca's song, No. 2 in book 1, called "Messenger d'Amour," in B minor, bolero style, has, it would seem, inspired Mr. Rummel with less reverence, since he has taken the liberty of ornamenting it with a variety of florid passages which, while they enable the executant to display his power over the instrument, do not in any way affect the interest of the melody, which might be represented by a very minute algebraical equivalent. We, therefore, cannot quarrel with Mr. Rummel for taking liberties with Herr Fesca, since what he has added decidedly enhances the effect of the song as a pianoforte piece.

Another song of Fesca's—Wiegen-lied (cradle song), in B flat, a tame, monotonous, but not altogether unsoothing effusion, which opens the second book, is treated by Mr. Rummel with more respect, the alterations being confined to simple transpositions of the situation of the accompaniment, which he has effected very cleverly. This lied might pass without censure, as a pretty and inoffensive trifle, were it not for a transition from B flat to B natural, and back again, which occurs twice in the last two lines, page 12, and is exceedingly unnatural and obtrusive.

The next song of the second book, "An Adelaide" (To Adelaide), by one Krebs, well known in his native soil as a prolific writer of moonlight ballads, is in the sentimental style, with B flat for a key. After the opening symphony Mr. Rummel, in order to give the opening canto with due effect on the violoncelle part of the instrument, and to preserve intact the arpeggio von Krebs, is enlarged to the expedient of laying out his plan in three staves instead of the ordinary two—two staves for the left hand and one for the right, the last in the middle, whereby the tune is stove in the centre (to keep it warm) and stands, for which it is well suited, in the order of a parenthesis, leaving it to the discretion of the executant to omit it altogether, which it is not unlikely he will do, since nothing will be lost by its absence, but much confusion eschewed. This lied concludes with a recapitulation of the theme, with an accompaniment after the manner of Schubert's "Ave Maria," of which, nevertheless, it was but a glimmering reflex. Bref—Herr Krebs's "An Adelaide" is one of the feeblest musical apostrophes ever addressed to a lady with so pretty a name. Mr. Rummel, notwithstanding, must be praised for the skilful manner in which he has arranged it.

Of the two songs contained in the third and last book, that in F, of Lindblad, a popular Swiss composer, is the simplest and the best. It is in the ballad style, and Mr. Rummel has arranged it in the happiest manner, preserving with equal completeness both the melody and accompaniment of the original. The song of Gumbert, in G flat, is longer, more ambitious and more difficult, and less interesting in an equal proportion. In page 20, Mr. Rummel has considerably increased the difficulty by an elaborate arpeggio passage in the bass. Doubtless this lied will find admirers, from its showy character; but there is a want of freshness in the melody which is not atoned for by the great display in the harmony and accompaniment.

To conclude, we can strongly recommend these arrangements of Mr. Rummel as among the best of their kind which have come under our notice, and should he proceed with them, a wide field is open before him, which it is evident he possesses both the taste and the industry to explore with advantage.

Dramatic Intelligence.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—FRENCH PLAYS.—On Friday, the 14th, Corneille's tragedy of Les Horaces was performed. As regards the play itself we know of no tragedy in the French classical repertoire more replete with interest and legitimate excitement. All the parts are good, those of the men more particularly fall little short of the demi-gods of antiquity; the language put into their mouths is majestic, and, in several instances, sublime; the sentiments expressed are of the highest order of patriotism and self denial; the love of country, as an abstraction, is predominant in the breasts of all, banishing other emotions. In the midst, however, stands one solitary exception—Camille. She alone comes out as an individuality, totally apart from the stern and unbending beings who surround her. Her brother, her father, her sister, even her lover, to whom she is entirely and exclusively devoted, have no feeling in common with her. To her, patriotism, glory, honour are nothing; and even her country is a thing to curse when it stands in the way of her affection for her lover. It is true that she hesitates for a moment, when calculating the fatal consequences of this family duel. Whatever the issue—whether Rome or Alba conquer, whether the Horatii or the Curiatii be victors; her heart bleeds at the fatal necessity—the horrible fatality of such an alternative. Yet she evidently leans to Curiatius, though influenced by selfish considerations and opposed to persons who stand forth as models of inhuman virtue. Camille is not a creature to be pitied. She is a heroine, a martyr to one feeling, and that feeling makes us excuse the absence of every other. Her love is her only sentiment. She is so exclusively swayed by it that we are carried away by its grandeur, moved by the excess of her devotion, and without reflection sympathize with her feeling and join with her, heart and soul, in the curse which she invokes upon the infant republic.

Of all the characters of this noble poem, however, that of Camille would seem, on a first reading, to be the most insignificant. We confess that such was our opinion until Mademoiselle Rachel gave it a life and character. The wonderful byo-play by which, during the recital of her lover's death, she is enabled, without uttering a single word, to tell an elaborate tale of internal grief; the change from insensibility to an agony of despair, and the concluding paroxysm of fury, must always produce an immense effect, on account of their force and reality. It is difficult to find words to express our admiration of Mdlle. Rachel's acting. When we say that we have already proclaimed her perfect, it would seem absurd to report any further progress, any new excellence. The fact is, however, that every new study of Mdlle. Rachel's impersonations reveals some new feature, something not before noticed, from the impossibility of conceiving at once all the excellence of her portraiture. The attitudes, aided by her exquisitely classical drapery, the subtlety with which the meaning of every line was elicited, the eloquent gestures, the perfect command over the voice, now broken with anguish, now swelling with indignation, form an ensemble of histrionic excellence that at once astonishes and awes the spectator. Camille is certainly one of Madlle. Rachel's most magnificent creations. It were almost hereby to say so, but we feel justified, after mature reflection, in submitting our opinion, that if Pierre Corneille wrote the tragedy of "Les Horaces," Mademoiselle Rachel created the part of Camille.

On Saturday last, we saw Mademoiselle Rachel in a part entirely different from those in which we have hitherto been accustomed to see her. Of the play itself, Mademoiselle de Belle-Isle, we shall give no description. Those who are curious on the matter had better refer to the account given in this paper of the translation, now being played at the Princess's Theatre, under the title of The Duke's Wager. In the original there is no very high order of literary merit, nor do the characters excite in any way our sympathies, with the sole exception of the heroine. We may add that the play is not put on the stage with that completeness to which we have been accustomed at this theatre. Excepting Mdlle. Rachel and M. Raphaël, the parts are very indifferently cast. The walking gentlemen representing Dukes, Counts, Barons, Marquises, and others of the same genus, resemble a collection of "Pères Nobles" and "Confidantes," from the heroic ages downwards. They are so accustomed to scan their words, and round their periods, that they seem to have lost the faculty of talking common prose. The elegant Richieu is as stiff as a drill serjeant; Le Duc d'Aumant, besides being unshaven, is minus his best teeth which is fatal to his enunciation. The others have no cause to complain of the scarcity of amorous adventures; and the gallantry and persiflage of the wits of the dissipated courtiers of Louis XV. becomes sheer impertinence proceeding from such a source. The part of D'Aubigny was, however, well played by M. Raphaël. He had no easy task to bear up against the mediocrities by which he was surrounded. Mdlle. Rachel's part, which was that of a simple, modest, unassuming young girl, with no knowledge of court intrigues, offers but little scope for the display of the great powers with which the incomparable tragedian is endowed. There are no violent scenes of passion or despair, yet Mdlle. Rachel moved us to tears by her simple, earnest pleading for her father's liberty. Her dress was simple in the extreme, and befitting one whose father had been an inmate of a state prison upwards of three years. Her demeanour was that of a gentlewoman of high birth; her emotion warmly expressed but never verging upon rant. All was sobered down to suit the character; every look, every gesture, measured to the part. A more complete transformation we never witnessed. We cannot go so far as to say that Mdlle. Rachel is as great in comedy as in tragedy. The play of Mdlle. de Belle-Isle gives no fair criterion of her powers; and we opine that the present company is not at all equal to comedy. Where all the actors are bad, with one or two exceptions, the ensemble must suffer, and even the greatest actress of modern times loses much of her brilliancy by this entourage of inferior artistes, who, instead of aiding, help to mar her best effects.

On the whole, however, we were much pleased with this new conception of the great tragedienne. Her success was unequivocal, and, if the applause was not so loud or so frequent as usual, the emotion excited was genuine and unanimous. Though there was nothing to give room for powerful expression or to excite a storm of applause, all must have sympathised with the plain, simple, and unassuming heroine, and have treasured up in their memory the numerous beauties of Mdlle. Rachel's impersonation.

We understand that Victor Hugo's drama of Angelo will be shortly produced. We can also assure our readers that the new play of Valeria will be given, all the difficulties which stood in the way of its representation having been removed to the satisfaction of the great autocrat of dramatic literature.

J. DE C—.

On Tuesday afternoon M. Levassor gave his second entertainment, entitled Une Heure de Récréation Comique. The programme announced three chansonnettes and two scènes comiques, performed in costume. The chansonnettes were, "Le Magister du Village," "Un Homme à Marier," and "l'Histoire de Cendrillon;" the comic scenes, "Le Père Latreille" and "Les Tribulations d'un Choriste." Nothing could be better calculated to display M. Levassor's qualities as an artist than these sketches, each following the other without pause, and all perfectly distinct in their characteristics, and presenting a set of pictures in which a most careful and minute study of the comedy of every-day life is revealed in a few pregnant touches. M. Levassor presents a striking example of what intelligence, taste, and devoted study can accomplish, in the face of considerable difficulties. With a voice which could never have inspired him with any gratitude to nature, he is able to convey every variety of musical expression, and the very defects of his organ are skilfully turned to advantage in the production of absurd and unexpected effects. His versatility is apparently inexhaustible; in the course of an hour he is jovial and tender, youthful and decrepit, drunk and sober, refined and vulgar, eccentric and common-place, gliding without effort through every grade of humanity, through every stage of life. In the Magister du Village, the homely moralities of the old village dominie were given with refined sentiment, and the burst of senile gaiety in the refrain winding up each stanza received a fresh shade of expression at each recurrence. The second chansonnette is a sort of lyrical "Colebs in search of a wife," in which a bachelor is represented in the unsuccessful pursuit of matrimony through five decennial periods, from youth to the brink of the grave. The characteristics of each stage, and the gradual transition from youth to extreme age, were indicated with wonderful truth. In Le Père Latreille, which was sung in costume, we have a picture of a talkative old drunkard worthy of Charlet's pencil. His entrance, rolling round the edge of the scene and advancing to the front with an attempt to convert his unsteadiness into a gingerly swagger, had a most ludicrous effect, and transported one at once to the barrières, where the effects of the vin bleu may be studied on a score of such individuals. The scene in which are set forth the miseries of a chorus singer is already familiar to us, but the accuracy of the portrait, and the every-day truth of its absurdities, render it always acceptable. M. Levassor was not allowed to adhere to the strict measure of entertainment promised in the bill, and when the programme was exhausted, a call was made for "Titi à la représentation de Robert," to which he graciously acceded. That M. Levassor is thoroughly appreciated by the supporters of the St. James's was evidenced by a very full audience; and the thorough enjoyment they manifested at the performance.

HAYMARKET.—Ambroise Thomas's admirable little opera buffon, Le Caid, done into tolerable English, and called, The Cadi; or, Amours among the Moors, was produced on Wednesday, and met with a favourable reception, in spite of its being misunderstood by the singers, and not appreciated by the public. The great mistake was producing the Caid at a theatre but newly devoted to opera. In order to understand a burlesque well, it is necessary to understand the original which suggests the exaggeration. The visitors to the Haymarket were not accustomed to opera, and consequently could not be supposed to enter into the merits of its travestie. But the artists themselves did not appear to comprehend the wide and essential difference between the opera comique and the opera buffon. Miss Louisa Pyne sang charmingly, the music being exactly suited to her, and acted with spirit and animation, but it was all real, there was no caricature. The same may be said of Mr. Weiss, who played the Drum-Major, and Mr. Donald King, who played Biroteau. It was not surprising, therefore, that the fun of the opera was entirely lost. After some few rehearsals, when the singers begin to know what they ought to be about, and the spectators gain a glimmering of the composer's intentions, we have no doubt the Cadi will prove attractive, as the music is exceedingly pretty, and the opera has been got up in a most creditable manner.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Il Prodigio was repeated on Saturday for the second time and proved infinitely more attractive than on the Thursday, inasmuch as the long delays between the acts were considerably reduced, and the fourth and fifth acts were merged into one, thereby effecting a great saving of time. The only thing to be lamented is the necessity for cutting some of the music. But this could hardly be avoided. The Enfant Prodigue is a very long work, and although it is in no part tedious or trivial, to keep attention alive for five hours is perhaps beyond the power of any opera. That the Enfant Prodigue is the longest work ever produced at Her Majesty's Theatre is proved by the unusual fact that no ballet or divertissement is given after the opera, the ballets in the second and third acts being found sufficiently long and important to preclude any subsequent entertainment of the kind. Indeed it would be hardly fair to give any ballet after the exquisite music and the brilliant dances of the Enfant Prodigue. In our last notice we said that the dance-music in the Prodigo was only inferior to that of Masaniello or Gustave. Repeated hearings have so raised it in our estimation that we are inclined to place it by the side of these masterpieces of the operatic ballet. Never was Auber's melodic genius made more manifest than in the airs de ballet of the Prodigo, all of which have a freshness and a charm worthy the immortal author's happiest moments of inspiration. It appears to be the opinion of some rigid critics of the present day, that the introduction of ballets into grand operas is a questionable act of policy. For our part we agree entirely with French composers on this head, and consider the ballet an indispensable element of the grand opera. What would Guillaume Tell be without its airs de ballet? In fact we are of opinion that Rossini's chef-d'œuvre has never been heard to thorough advantage in this country, because the ballet has been sacrificed. Of one thing there can be no question, that the ballet music in the Enfant Prodigue is among its very greatest attractions, and Balfe no doubt was of our thinking, since he would not permit a single bar to be excised. The manner in which the different dances are got up at Her Majesty's Theatre, with its unparalleled corps, no doubt tends to the attraction; but neither the talents of M. Paul Taglioni, which were never made more manifest than in the divertissements in the new opera, nor those of the costumer, whose taste and knowledge of effects were never rendered more conspicuous, could procure for the ballet the sensation it creates every night, with music less captivating and graceful than that of Auber.

In addition to the ballet music, the pieces which continue to obtain the most share of public applause are, Jettele's first song, exquisitely sung by Madame Sontag; the two romances of Nefte, in the first and fourth acts, warbled with infinite volubility and surprising brilliancy by Madame Ugalde—who has already become an immense favourite with the habitués of the theatre; Massol's appeal song in the second act, which nightly produces an overpowering effect; Azaël's aria in the last act, charmingly sung by Gardoni; and the arietta of Boccoria, given by Coletti with great power and expression. To these morceaux the public attention is especially drawn by the admirable singing of the principal artists: but, if not so attractive, no less delightful to us is the concerted music, which abounds in beauties of the most piquante and graceful kind. Indeed some of the music is perfectly irresistible, and instantaneously declares the master hand of the composer of La Muette.

On Tuesday, the third repeat of Il Prodigio attracted a large crowd of fashionables. The Queen, Prince Albert, and sue were present. Her Majesty testified her approbation of the performance, in every scene, in a manner not to be mistaken. The opera decidedly gains with the public nightly, as the music becomes better known, and the singers get better acquainted with their parts. The working and machinery now goes so smoothly and freely that nearly an hour is saved in the performance. This is a great matter with an anxious and impatient audience.

Gustave was announced for Wednesday—a grand extra night—but, in consequence of Mdle. Caroline Duprez' indisposition, was changed for Norma, with Cruvelli. The visitors to Her Majesty's Theatre on Wednesday night had no cause to lament the alteration. Cruvelli was in splendid force, and created a furor. She was recalled several times during the performance, and twice at the end, and received with the utmost enthusiasm.

Il Prodigio was given for the fourth and fifth times, on Thursday, and last night.

Fidelio to-night—with, first time, for some years, the popular ballet La Sylphide, in which Marie Taglioni, the young, the charming, the hilarious, the bounding, with her fire-new laurels from Warsaw—where, in presence of the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia, by the magic of her twinkling feet, she created a revolution of hearts, and obtained an ovation similar to those awarded to her illustrious relatives in the palmiest days of the ballet—will make her first appearance this season. That Marie will be welcomed with enthusiasm there can be no doubt. She reckons among her admirers all the habitués of Her Majesty's Theatre.

Many novelties are in preparation. Thalberg's new opera is being rehearsed. Semiramide will be produced shortly, and Ernani, both for Cruvelli. The public should be grateful for such plenteous fare.

The first grand concert for the season took place on Monday morning, in presence of a crowded and fashionable audience, attracted by a programme in which the whole strength of the company was announced to take part. With the exception of M. Mussol, who did not appear, the pledges of the advertisement were fulfilled to the letter. We cannot pretend to enter into a detailed description of a performance comprising nearly thirty pieces, vocal and instrumental; nor, indeed, is it necessary, since a large part of the programme was absorbed by popular and well-known compositions, the novelties of importance being few and far between. We shall therefore adhere to the principal features.

The announcement of some of the original MSS. of the celebrated violinist, Paganini, with Signor Camillo Sivori as executant, excited a vast deal of curiosity. Paganini's compositions have for the most part, been a sealed book to amateurs and professors of the violin. It is unnecessary to premise, that during the lifetime of the great Italian violinist they were never published, and that certain fragments, which since his death have found their way into print, have generally been suspected as spurious. It is, perhaps, to this, in a great measure, that the mysterious fame of Paganini as a composer may be traced. There is always a price set upon that which cannot be easily obtained; and none knew this better than he, who, as a mere executant, won for himself a higher reputation than any other instrumental performer of whom the history of the art makes mention. We are led to believe that Paganini was well aware of his comparative deficiency in those qualities which help to form a great musician—invention and science—and that, feeling it impossible to make a name as a composer at all worthy of association with that which he enjoyed as a violinist, he adopted the precaution of withholding his works from the world. Notoriously jealous of the new effects he had discovered in the mechanism of his instrument, which were of course set forth and illustrated in his compositions, the best way of keeping them to himself was to prevent his MSS. from falling into the hands of the music publishers. He accordingly refused all applications for purchasing the copyright of his pieces, and at his death bequeathed them to an institution in his native town, with the proviso that they should never be engraved. We are further induced to this conclusion by the specimens submitted yesterday to the public, which enjoyed the advantage of Signor Sivori's admirable talent, and were consequently brought forward under the most favourable auspices. We own that our disappointment was not great, since we never entertained a very high notion of Paganini's genius as a composer, except of morceaux de caractère, chiefly remarkable for the novel turn of their traits de bravoure and the wide field they opened to the ambitious executant. Those, however, who have been taught to regard Paganini as a composer of large endowments and striking originality, must have been fairly surprised at listening to such an unmitigated platitude as the "concerto" in E flat—a concerto, so called, but in reality nothing better than a fantasia. Hardly less must they have been disappointed at Le Stregghe (or "Witches' Dance") which, compared with some of the more modern solos of Viëstemps and Ernst, is little better than a bagatelle. Signor Sivori did his utmost to give effect to these compositions, and exhibited his usual beauty of tone, purity and elegance of style, and wonderful command of the instrument; by far the most noticeable piece of execution, however, was the cadenza, introduced into the concerto, which was not by Paganini, but by Signor Sivori himself. In the "Witches' Dance," a variation, introducing double harmonies, was that which created most curiosity. Signor Sivori was immensely applauded, and recalled after both his performances; but we think the honour was due rather to his own talent as a violinist than to the music attributed to Paganini. He was accompanied by the orchestra in a very unfinished manner—so much so, indeed, that it led to a doubt whether he had enjoyed the previous advantage of a rehearsal.

The overtures to Fernand Cortez (Spontini), Anacreon (Cherubini), and A Midsummer Night's Dream were allotted to the band, and the Anacreon was played in first rate style under the spirited direction of Mr. Balfe. When the third part of the concert began, however, the performances had already extended to so great a length that the overture by Mendelssohn was passed over and the vocal music proceeded with. After two or three pieces, however, there was a call for the "Midsummer Night's Dream." What began with a few voices soon engaged the sympathy of the majority, and Mr. Balfe, very wisely acceding to the expressed wish of the audience, opened the score, and the overture was performed, not so well as could be desired, or as it would doubtless have been, introduced in its proper place, but well enough, at all events, to satisfy the public, who naturally objected to being deprived, without notice of the chef d'œuvre of one of the greatest composers for the orchestra, and one of the prominent features of the programme.

The vocal selection was as attractive as variety and great names could make it. Madame Sontag's perfect style and faultless vocalisation were strikingly exhibited in "The soldier tir'd," and in Eckert's "Swiss air, with variations"—the latter of which was encored and repeated. Mdle. Caroline Duprez, although apparently indisposed, displayed her usual neatness and facility in "Je suis une fille Maure," from Balfe's opera L'Etoile de Seville. Madame Fiorentini's fine soprano voice imparted due weight to the solo vocal part in the "Inflammatus," from Rossini's Stabat Mater; and Madame Ugalde created the utmost sensation by her prodigious volubility in the grand air from Le Caid, the well-known opera of Ambroise Thomas, which owes much of its fame in Paris to the talent and popularity of the charming prima donna of the Opera Comique. In the Tyrolienne from Belly Madame Ugalde also made a great effort, but in this she had the recollections of the incomparable Alboni to fight against. Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Gardoni, and Signor Calzolari had each a solo. That of Mr. Sims Reeves, the fine air, "Fin dalla prima infanzia," from Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauride, was sung by our English tenor with a classical feeling that betokened a thorough appreciation of the music. The dashing trio of Curschmann, "Vivo Bacco," by the three first tenors of the establishment, was one of the most successful pieces in the programme. Another trio, the popular "Le faggio un inchino," from Il Matrimonio Segreto, brought the talents of Madame Sontag, Mdles. Caroline Duprez and Ida Bertrand, into effective combination; and a third, "Te sol, quest' anima," the best piece in Verdi's Attila, faultlessly executed by Mdle. Sophie Cruvelli, Signors Gardoni and Coletti, obtained a recall for the executants. The buffo duet, "Un segreto" (Cenerentola), brought out the comic verve of "the great Lablache" and his clever son Frederick in a forcible manner and to the evident amusement of the audience. Mdle. Marie Cruvelli, the contralto, whose recent appearance at Madame Puzzi's concert was so favourably noticed, in a duet with her gifted sister Sophie, "Sappi che un rio dovere," confirmed the good impression she made on that occasion. Mdle. Marie Cruvelli is evidently a singer of experience and accomplishments, with a voice both flexible and agreeable, and the duet, one of the gems of Rossini's forgotten opera, Bianca e Faliero, was received with unanimous applause. One of the most genuine sensations in the course of the whole concert was produced by the aria, "Nel dolce canto," which, for some unexplained reason, was deferred almost to the end, although its place in the printed bills was that of the first piece in the third part. Those who did not remain to hear Mdle. Cruvelli sing this animated composition of Benedict and De Beriot lost one of the most brilliant displays of vocal facility for a long time heard in a concert room. The extraordinary compass of this young lady's voice, which is as full and beautiful in the bass as in the treble register, has here fine scope for development, and advantage was taken by Mdle. Cruvelli of the abundant resources with which nature has endowed her. Her ornaments, cadences, and floriture, as original as they were elaborate, were executed with an energy and finish that left nothing to desire. The applause was enthusiastic, and the demand for repetition unanimous; but, with her usual good sense, Mdle. Cruvelli was satisfied to return to the stage and bow her acknowledgements to the audience. Mdle. Alaymo sang "Robert, toi que j'aime" with great expression; and Mdle. Giuliani took part in several pieces with her accustomed ability and correctness. We can only find space to add that among the full pieces were a "Te Deum" by Mozart, a quartet from Oberon, a trio from Der Freischütz, a selection from Beethoven's First Mass in C; a quintet from Mozart's Così Fan Tutti; a scene, with chorus, from Gluck's Armida; and Martini's laughing trio, "Vadasi via di qua," in which all the principal singers joined in chorus. Mr. Balfé conducted the entire concert (except in the violin solos of Signor Sivori) with his accustomed zeal and talent. Had the programme been half as long it would have been at least twice as entertaining. "Enough is as good as a feast."—Times.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The third performance of Don Giovanni, on Saturday night, demands a short record for more reasons than one. First, Her Majesty the Queen, at whose special desire the opera was repeated, arrived at the beginning, and remained until the end. Second, the audience was, perhaps, the largest ever congregated within the walls of Covent-garden Theatre since it opened as the Royal Italian Opera, many hundreds being sent away from the doors. And, lastly, there were some changes in the representation of the scene where the statue comes to sup with Don Giovanni, which, if not accomplishing all that is desirable in the shape of reform, in a great degree modified the absurdities against which we have so constantly felt bound to protest, as subversive of the combined effect intended by dramatist and composer. The attendance of the highest personage of the realm on two consecutive occasions to listen to such a work as Don Giovanni is a good sign. The immense confluence of the public at this third representation, within the space of little more than a week, is also a good sign; and the desire (now for the first time evinced) on the part of the management to restore to the finest scene in the Italian lyric drama that solemnity which has been too frequently transmuted into an empty joke, to the utter destruction of the music, is a matter of congratulation to all who have faith in the art as a medium of expressing the loftiest poetical ideas. On Saturday night the table at which Don Giovanni is feasting was placed near the "wings," instead of in the middle of the stage, whereby the ridiculous necessity of its being removed by domestics at the entry of the statue was done away with. Another improvement was observed in the costume of the ghost, which was whiter, more nearly approaching the semblance of a stone statue, and consequently more favourable to the scenic illusion; and, to conclude, the company of hybrid imps, a sort of cross between ghouls and torch-bearers, who were accustomed to drag Don Giovanni into the midst of an inexplicable tableau at the back of the stage, were replaced by some respectable-looking fiends, in flaming attire, who capture the person of the condemned libertine, and are supposed to cast him into a burning gulf—the representation of which catastrophe was admirably managed, the effigy of the Don bearing a sufficiently strong similarity to Tamburini, and the gulf being painted with appropriate horrors. Such decided improvements (which we are given to understand, were suggested by the Queen herself) are to be highly commended; but the commendation would have been without reserve could we have added that the courtesans introduced at Don Giovanni's supper table, without authority from the libretto, had been abandoned. Time, however, may effect this also, and we shall continue to look forward with the hope, at some future period, of seeing Mozart's chef d'œuvre performed literally in accordance with the bequests of tradition and the rules of dramatic propriety.

The general execution of the opera was admirable. The singers were all in good voice, and worked zealously at their tasks. We have also much pleasure in recording that only two of the many "encores" were accepted—the trio of the masks in the first finale, and the "Il mio tesoro" of Signor Tamberlik, which latter was so vehement and unanimous that it could not be decently resisted.

We notice the second performance of La Favorita on Tuesday night merely to record that Signor Mario was so much restored that his performance of Fernando was almost equal to his best efforts when in perfect health. He sang both his airs divinely, and in the first duet emulated Grisi in energy and spirit. Both the accomplished artistes were recalled at the fall of the curtain. The house was crowded to overflowing.

On Thursday Roberto il Diavolo was repeated to another crowded house. The performance was very striking, but presented no new points for criticism.

To night Mde. Pauline Viardot Garcia makes her réentrée in Meyerbeer's grand opera, the Prophète. On Thursday, we believe, Ronconi will appear in the Barbieri, much to the delight of the subscribers and the public, who comprehend the services of the little great man—the Italian Kean. Meanwhile Mr. Gye must be making a rapid fortune, and Sappho will shortly be placed in rehearsal.

FIDELIO.

(Continued from our last.)

Pizarro, the governor of the prison, enters with a detachment of soldiers, and the great gates are opened to admit them. Here we have a march, which, in our esteem, forms a kind of resting place for the hearer's attention before entering upon music of the most intense passion, which illustrates the lofty and really poetical character of the drama. In the music that precedes this march, the most unimportant piece in the opera, we find the most felicitous application of musicianly skill and contrapuntal elaboration supplying the place of that expression of powerful feeling with which the remainder of the opera is so eminently replete. The ideas are all light, because the dramatic action calls for nothing earnest; but the music is saved from triviality by the interesting and truly artistic manner in which they are treated. It is only in the trio when, for the first time, the character of Leonore and the situation in which she is placed begin to be unfolded, that any expression of the higher order is aimed at; but even in this the contrivance is still striving for mastery over the feeling of the artist, and we are much more pleased than excited by the effect it produces. The march has nothing whatever to express, and in it nothing whatever is expressed; it is not grand, nor brilliant, nor solemn, nor lively, nor elaborate, nor anything, in fact, more or less than a piece of rather quaint, and certainly pleasing indifference, a piece of careless quietness before the outbreak of the fiercest passions. The instrumentation is somewhat original, but rather piquant and peculiar than powerful. The phrase that opens the second part is melodious, and the gradual progression to D minor smooth. The transition from this key to B flat is bold, though perfectly simple, and therefore striking; while the passage of contrary motion, for three bars previous to coming on the dominant of G minor, has a broad and expansive effect.

The governor gives directions for the placing of the watch about the prison. Rokko delivers to him the letters brought by Leonore. He reads many, with impatience at the commands and reprimands with which they are fraught. One from a confidant awakens his earnest attention. It tells that the minister, suspecting some of the state prisoners to be unjust victims of arbitrary power, has started, privately, for the purpose of investigating Pizzaro's administration of his office, and intends to surprise him with a visit. Pizzaro is embarrassed at the thought that Florestan, who has for long been supposed dead, will be discovered among the prisoners, when the thought that one bold deed will free him from his difficulties fills the tyrant with a fierce and demoniacal energy. This introduces the wonderful song "Ach, welch ein Augenblick!" in which the furious tumult of the wildest passions is delineated with a truth that is almost sublime. The spirit of dreadful exultation with which the song opens is checked by the remembrance of the indignity which has provoked the vengeance of the implacable Pizzaro, and this again is interrupted by the cry of ecstasy with which he exclaims—

"Nun ist es mir geworden Den Mörder selbst zu morden."

The intensity of expression given to this feeling is still heightened on the recapitulation of the several ideas that constitute what we may regard as the first part of the movement, when the modulations become more extraneous. The burst into D major, at the recurrence of the phrase already cited, when the tyrant rejoices that "now," (and the word is given with almost superhuman emphasis), it is for him to murder the man who would have been his assassin, is prodigiously fine. This, however, is not the climax. There is a still more powerful passage, conveying the same desperate feeling of savage exultation, at the words "Triumph, der sieg ist mein!" in which, most particularly, we recognise the likeness to a prominent passage in the fine song of Caspar in Der Freischütz, expressive of a similar passion, of which song, indeed, the wonderful conception of Beethoven was unquestionably the prototype. The torrent of passion is stayed for a moment, and the close of the song delayed for a still more powerful climax, by the subdued muttering of the chorus, who are terror-stricken at the wild manner of their governor—"He spake of death and wounds!—how earnest must it be!" The abrupt change of key with which this is introduced and the gradually stealing crawl of the modulation, which brings us back to the original tone, produces an effect that cannot be felt without a shudder. The conclusion is worthy of the whole, and this is the utmost that can be said in admiration of it. There are two things that call for special notice in what we may call the mechanism of this piece of music. These are, first, the peculiar coloring that is given to the whole by the somewhat singular employment of the two trombones, which are now introduced for the first time into the score, and which are only employed in this opera, as in the Don Giovanni and Zauberflöte of Mozart, to give a peculiarity of coloring, not a mere accession of noise to the orchestra: second, the very low notes to which the chorus parts are confined, until immediately before the very end of the movement—to which, no less than to the strange harmonies by which they are introduced, is to be ascribed the thrilling effect which they cannot fail to convey.

Pizzaro dismisses the guard to their posts, directing a trumpeter to keep watch on the tower, and give instant signal of the approach of any party on the road from the capital. He resolves to try to win old Rokko to his purpose, doubtful, whether, without his aid, he can accomplish it. We have now what we are almost tempted to call the best piece of the whole opera, and only hesitate in the declaration of such an opinion of its pre-eminent excellence, from the conviction that we shall be so fascinated by the beauty of some of the later movements as to be, in considering them, for the time, forgetful of the transcendent beauty of this which we are now about to examine—namely, the duet "Jetzt, Alter, hat es Eile." We find in this duet, a complete masterpiece of dramatic declamation, illustrated by the most vivid of possible orchestral coloring; and we might with justice dismiss it to the examination of our readers, saying simply—read the words, and find their all powerful meaning truthfully and most powerfully rendered in the music—but that in the fulfilment of this task of analyzing the work, which more than any in all the range of dramatic music excites us, and making as it were a chart of the manifold beauties it contains, we may forego the satisfaction of entering fully and carefully into the description of this very highly interesting portion of it. Pizzaro addresses the old gaoler in terms of rough but forced familiarity, the inward devil manifest in his tone, although the assumed friend is sought to be implied in his words. He tells him, suddenly, abruptly, or, we may say bluffly, because he cannot even pretend gentleness, that his fortune is made, that he will become a rich man. Then, throwing him a purse, he says, with truly ironical expression, that this is but an earnest of what will follow, and the audience, who know his designs, feel a deep import in the meaning his tone conveys. The simple hearted Rokko, in the most natural, innocent, and suspicionless manner, begs Pizzaro to say, in earnest, in what he may serve him. The governor, instead of a direct reply, resuming his rough, unbroken manner, goes on—"Thou hast acquired cold blood and undaunted courage"—and then, with the same tone of deep irony as before, "through your long service under me in the prison." This last half parenthetical phrase being set to the same music as that phrase in Pizzaro's first solo which seems one-third to tempt, and two-thirds to threaten, in saying that the gold is but the commencement of the favors he intends to heap upon his listener, thus gives the key to the expression intended in the former passage. The gaoler, with his wonted simplicity, asks again, "What shall I?—speak," to the same music as was before assigned to him. Then Pizzaro, with one word—that word a whole language—the entire power of speech concentrated in two syllables, suddenly throwing off all counterfeit, precipitates the old man into the depths of his evil purpose, and casts at once a spell over the character, and constitution, and feelings of his client, which shuts for ever the daylight out of his heart. "Mörder," says the governor, and with such intensity of meaning in the word declaimed, that we revolt with instinctive horror, and natural terror, at the crime, from the awful perversion of instinct and outrage of nature in the criminal who names it. To descend to technicalities; here the most consummate genius is displayed, in the wonderful application of the extremest resources of the all skilled musician's art to the impressive setting of this deep-meaning word. The sudden change of key, the peculiar distribution of the harmony, the still more extraordinary resolution of it upon a more poignant, a more unusual, and a more startling dissonance for the second syllable, and, most of all, the singular interval of the voice part, conduce to an effect that is always beyond admiration. The blank wonder, scarcely varying from disbelief, of Rokko, is also finely rendered in his monosyllabic exclamation, on the resolution of the second discord. The rugged manner of Pizzaro is well resumed in the expostulation, "But listen to me—you tremble—are you a man?" and then he assumes a slimy, false expression, serpentlike in purpose, and almost in power of fascination, when saying, "We may not delay—the state requires that the bad subject should quickly be removed from our path." The unexpected modulation to G, the peculiar phrase assigned to the oboes and violoncellos, and the equally peculiar tone produced by this combination of instruments, give marvellously the meaning of the beginning of this solo; and the fiercer manner, and the return to the key of F sharp minor, for the last words, distinguish forcibly between the naming of the deed and the sophistical attempt to justify it. The exclamation of Rokko, still of incredulous surprise, gives occasion for the repetition of the previous musical phrase, now in the key of F sharp minor, with the addition of the clarionets to the former instrumentation, which serves to bring out still more than before the peculiarity of tone in the former combination, with the repetition of the words now declaimed with more emphasis than at first; and this seems to awaken the jailor from his temporary torpor, and he appears to recoil with repugnance from the being who has sought to tempt him, by the utterance given to the repeated ejaculation, "My lord, my lord!" while the other reiterates, "You still hesitate?" Pizarro now contemplates the death of Rokko, as the necessary means of security for his own safety; while the latter, shuddering at the thought of having had such a proposal made to him, firmly resolves that, let what may happen, he will never be an agent in the crime proposed. These various feelings of equally firm resolution are finely expressed in an ensemble of the two voices, the opening of which is one of the most striking points in this very remarkable composition. We have a dominant pedal in the key of C sharp minor, with a strangely original passage for the violins in octaves, the piercing, screaming wildness of which has an effect most startling, and this is succeeded by the grave firmness of the various resolves to which the previous agitated excitement was the incentive. We have then a curious unisonous passage, which equivocates between the keys of C sharp minor and E major, wherein Rokko declares to his lord, that to take life is not his duty. This is given in a tone of fear for himself, but confidence in his determination, and is interrupted by Pizarro with a tone of reckless desperation worthy of Don Giovanni's awful defiance of the Guest of Stone; and the incarnate fiend of Beethoven's marvellous creation exclaims, that himself will do the deed, since the courage of the other fails him. A continuation of this passage, but with the tone modified from the fury of defiance to the bitterness of sarcasm, goes on to order Rokko promptly and cheerfully to descend to that man—"that man," with our recollections of the old jailor's account to Leonore of the sufferings of the one, the secret, the unapproachable prisoner, calls up in the hearer a feeling of painful sympathy and apprehension. "Thou knowest —," continues Pizarro, in his first abrupt and intimidating manner; to which Rokko replies interrogatively, "He who scarcely lives, who hovers like a shadow?" This passage recalls, and most likely at first suggested to the composer, a point of considerable note in the last overture to this opera (the overture to Fidelio, in E). We refer to a passage in the introduction, beginning in the key of C, and modulating almost imperceptibly into the key of E, where the violins have a figure of arpeggio in triplets, in contrary motion to the similar figure of the violas and violoncellos, while the basses and some wind instruments have sustained harmony. The hovering, mysterious effect of the passage, in its present situation, is eminently picturesque (the word is, we are sure, admissible), and, like the description of the apothecary in Romeo and Juliet, is an illustration of how, under circumstances of most engrossing excitement, the mind, when contemplating an act, be its import how powerful soever, can delay, dreamily, blowing bubbles of the imagination, creating forms and phantasies out of the circumstances which surround, or the means which lead to such an act's fulfilment. A few notes of rapid recitative convey Pizarro's order that it is to "that man" that Rokko must descend, while he will wait at a short distance, and there, in the decayed cistern of the dungeon, prepare a grave for the prisoner. An example of our great composer's peculiar husbandry of his resources is in his employing the two trombones for the first time here, upon a single chord, at the word "Cistern," and using them only in two other places, also for a single chord in each, throughout the whole duet. The effect is prodigiously heightened, in proportion to the scarcity of the means exerted to produce it. "And then—and then?" demands the gaoler; and this is responded to by a marvellous point of musical declamation. "Then shall I quickly, disguised into the dungeon steal," is the sense of Pizarro's words—but the full signification can be found only in the music. A passage of unison, for some bars, in crotchets, till the last word, "schleichen," the first syllable of which is drawn out for two semibreves and a crotchet descending semitonically, then the second of the three chords, for the trombones—then the words—"One blow," by the voice unaccompanied—and then "and he is dumb," with a note to each syllable accompanied in unison by the basses pizzicato:—language would but degenerate, in the vain attempt to describe the appalling effect this climax produces; no written praise, no unexpressed admiration can reach it. The major key introduces an ensemble with great freshness, in which Pizarro and Rokko variously reflect—Rokko on the happy end in death of the long protracted sufferings of the prisoner; Pizarro on the insufficiency of his vengeance from the too easy death of his victim. Pizarro now recurs to the mock honesty of manner, the bluntness with which the duet opens—"Now old fellow—you understand me? you make a signal." He repeats the description of the part he purposed to fulfil in the dreadful tragedy he is preparing, but with an entirely different expression, seeming to feel the delight of a kind of cannibal epicure, in imagining every possible variety to the feast of horrors, in which he already revels by anticipation. A very singular train of modulations, well worthy of the examination of the student, leads us once more to the diminished seventh on D sharp, the chord with the trombone, the two notes for the voice alone, the four notes accompanied pizzicato, the reprise of the ensemble, the excitement of which is now considerably increased by the additional colouring in the orchestra, and a short and effective coda, bring this unique composition to a conclusion—an extension of the opening phrase of the ensemble constituting the final symphony. In considering the marvellous music, of which we have just given rather a catechologue than a description, upon which we less mean to make a comment than to pay a tribute, we are struck with a feeling more resembling awe than anything else of human emotion with which we are familiar, at the more than human mastery of the composer; and we own, with that mixed sense of exultation and reverence which constitutes the highest admiration, that in this piece the dramatic powers of the musician are exerted to their very utmost possible extent—that musical expression approaches as nearly as possible to perfection.

(To be continued.)

M. ALEXANDRE BILLET'S CONCERTS.

(From the Times)

The second of these classical entertainments took place on Monday afternoon, in the Hanover-square Rooms, before a full and attentive audience. Besides the fine sonata of Dussek in C minor (Op. 35), which M. Billet had already introduced to the public, and a selection of studies from the most eminent masters, the programme offered a grand sonata in A major (entitled "Ma Cousine"), the composition of Mr. Macfarren, and a capriccio in C major, of Haydn, both of which were equally acceptable as interesting novelties and as works of distinguished merit. Mr. Macfarren's sonata is a masterly composition, of large plan and elaborate development. Haydn's capriccio is one of those piquant and animated presto movements of which the composer has given so many striking examples; it is literally unknown except to the "Book-worms" of the piano, who will not allow a single page of a great master to escape them. M. Billet played these pieces in his usual vigorous and energetic style, and was rewarded with the highest applause. The capriccio of Haydn produced such a marked effect that it is not likely to remain longer in unmerited obscurity.

The vocalists were Madame Anna Thillon and Herr Stockhausen. The gentleman sang some of his native lieder in a chaste and artistic manner. Madame Thillon, besides Weber's "Araby, O, Araby" (Oberon), and one of those sparkling French romances which she has made her special property, introduced a novelty of decided beauty and originality—a romance, unpretending and brief, called "L'Oiseau Mort," the composition of M. Vivier, the celebrated horn player, who in this plaintive and charming specimen of vocal writing has indicated a talent for composition, which, properly cultivated, may raise its possessor to an eminence as an inventor equal to that which he has long enjoyed as a mere executant. The story related by the words of "L'Oiseau Mort" is the lament of a young girl over a favourite bird, which lies dead before her. The attraction of the melody is in its touching simplicity, and the peculiar character of the accompaniment is in exquisite keeping. This little gem was sung to perfection by Madame Thillon, and received with the warm applause it merited. We believe that M. Vivier has composed a great number of romances and chansonnettes of the same kind, which are highly esteemed by the critics and singers of the continent.

Miscellaneous.

MR. KJALLMARK and SIGNOR REGONDI'S CONCERT.—The Concert of these well known artists took place at the Hanover Square Rooms on Saturday Morning last. An excellent programme was provided. The Beneficiaires performed several times during the morning; Mr. Kjallmark played a grand trio by Beethoven, in conjunction with Signori Sivori and Piatti; the Kreutzer Sonata of Beethoven with Sivori, and a concertina duet for concertina and piano with Signor Regondi, in all of which he sustained his reputation as a pianist. Signor Regondi played a solo, by Thalberg, on the guitar, and, besides the duet with Mr. Kjallmark mentioned above a morceau de concert for the concertina, entitled "Les Oiseaux" which was remarkable for the brilliancy of the passages, and the facility with which they were played. The "morceau" will, without doubt, become a "pièce de resistance" for all performers on that favorite instrument, as it is melodious and well harmonized and is well written. The vocal performers, were Miss Catherine Hayes, the Misses Pyne, Signori Marras and Paltoni. The latter obtained great applause in "La Danza" of Rossini. The instrumentalists were Signori Sivori, Piatti, and Bottesini, the conductors M. Frelon and Mr. Kjallmark. The room was crowded by a fashionable audience.

MISS DOLBY and MR. LINDSAY SLOPER'S CONCERT.—The annual grand morning concert of the above popular artists came off on Friday, at the Hanover-square Rooms, and attracted a crowded and fashionable audience. The selection was of the best kind, comprising among others the overtures to Faust, Anacreon, and Prometheus; songs of Mozart, Mendelssohn, and Rossini, with a few, and but a few, vocal popularities interspersed, and Beethoven's concerto (No. 4) in G major, for the pianoforte. The band, which was carefully chosen, under the conductorship of Mr. Lucas, and the leadership of Mr. Willy, played the three overtures admirably. With such a thoroughly efficient force, and with Mr. Lindsay Sloper at the piano, nothing less than a perfect performance could be anticipated for Beethoven's Concerto. And such was the case. Mr. Sloper was in first-rate play, and brought all his talents and energies to illustrate in the most faithful and happiest manner the noble inspiration of the master. Not only in classical feeling for his author, and that depth of expression which the music of Beethoven, more, perhaps, than of any other composer, necessitates, but in brilliancy of execution, perfect finish, and largeness of style, did Mr. Lindsay Sloper exhibit his capabilities as a pianist of the best school. He was warmly applauded in each movement. Mr. Lindsay Sloper also played a Lied ohne Worte, from book 7, and a study in F minor, by Mendelssohn, the first of which was an excellent specimen of graceful and expressive playing, and the last of mastery and power over the finger-board. Miss Dolby's share of the programme included the recitative and aria, "Eccomi sola," from Guglielmi's Romeo e Giulietta; with Miss Eliza Birch, the popular duet from Semiramide, "Serbami ognor;" the contralto part in a quartet of Schimon, with Miss E. Birch, Herr Reichart and Herr Stockhausen; a song by Esser, called "The Minstrel's Curse;" with Mdlle. Graumann, Mendelssohn's duet, "Herbattlied;" and George Lindley's ballad, "Ida." Miss Dolby sang throughout most charmingly, and was recalled several times. In Esser's song, and Linley's ballad, she produced a marked sensation by that perfect simplicity and grace which have been so long acknowledged as characteristics of her style. Ernst played his "Rondo Papageno," as usual, with immense success, and was received at the end with volleys of applause. Another feature of the entertainment was a concertino on the contra-basso, played with marvellous power and skill, by Bottesini, who has become one of the greatest lions of the day, and whose performances invariably excite the utmost astonishment and delight. Among the other vocalists, we must single out for especial notice Herr Reichart and Herr Stigelli, both of whom sang in a most agreeable and pleasing manner. Mdlle. Graumann was also heard to advantage. The concert afforded the most evident gratification.

MADLLE COULON'S CONCERT.—Madlle. Coulon, one of our youngest and most promising pianistes, gave her annual morning concert at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, on Wednesday, the 11th instant, to a crowded and fashionable audience. The programme was of a moderate length, but the selection, both instrumental and vocal, was irreproachable. The fair beneficiaire performed with great taste and remarkable facility, and displayed in the difficult passages more power than we should have imagined her to possess, judging from the graceful tone of her mind and feelings. In the "Mossé" fantasia of Thalberg, Mdlle. Coulon delighted her audience although the piece does not contain beauties of the classical school in which we should have been glad to hear Mdlle. Coulon. The duet by J. Herz, in which the composer assisted Mdlle. Coulon, also went off with considerable éclat. The vocal portion of the concert was confined to the Misses Birch, Miss Messent, and Mdlle. Graumann; Signori S. Tamburini and Marchesi and Mr. Herbert, all of whom acquitted themselves in a creditable manner. We must not omit to mention that Mdlle. Coulon, with Messrs. Rousselot and Sainton, performed Mendelssohn's magnificent trio in C minor, which alone was worth going to the rooms to hear. M. Sainton also performed a violin solo admirably, as did Mr. F. Chatterton (one of our first harpists), and a M. Frelon performed upon a new instrument called "l'Orgue à Percussion," which was well received, and appeared to excite some curiosity among the audience.

H. L.

CONCERT FOR THE SOCIETY OF FEMALE MUSICIANS.—This concert was as good as those of preceding years, and we trust will prove as remunerative. The room was crowded to excess. A first-rate band had volunteered its services, and many of the most distinguished professors now in London came forward to aid the directors in forwarding their benevolent design. The evening's amusement commenced with Cherubini's overture to Les Deux Journées, which was closely followed by Mr. Augustus Braham's Handelian song, in which he displayed a considerable portion of his father's singular ability in pronunciation and emphasis of the words. Herr Formes was unanimously encored in "Largo al factotum," which he sang splendidly, and Mademoiselle

Johannessen, a Danish lady, received great applause in a cavatina from Ernani. This lady has great flexibility of voice, and created a very favourable impression, particularly in some of Jenny Lind's Swedish melodies. Madame Anna Zerr sang an aria from the Zaubersföte, in which she reached F in alt with apparent ease, much to the astonishment of her auditors. We are clearly of opinion that this lady's singing upon the stage would create much sensation, her style being dramatic and well calculated for effect in that arena. Miss Birch sang as well as ever, and Mr. Williams's clarionet accompaniment deserves great praise. The Misses Pyne also received much applause, and Miss Dolby exhibited her fine voice and admirable method in a classical cantata by Miss Laura Barker, called "Cenone," which we think is decidedly clever. Herr Pischek and Reichart both sang with great effect. We should like to see Herr Pischek's name more often in the concert programmes of the season. The other vocalists were Mrs. Noble, Miss Kearns, and Miss M. Williams; Mr. Williams, and Mr. Lawler. The instrumentalists were Madame Parish Alvars, who displayed much execution on the harp. Signor Bottesini, whose wonderful performance on the contra basso created quite a furor, as it invariably does, and who was instantly and vociferously encored, and Herr Pauer, a young pianist of great promise, who performed Weber's "Concert Stüch," in which he evinced much taste, and was ably backed up by the band. The concert was too long, but appeared to give perfect satisfaction to the audience, as indeed could alone be the result of such a combination of first-rate talent and excellent management.

MR. H. C. COOPER. (From a Correspondent).—This eminent artist, whose masterly performances on the violin we have had frequent occasions to notice, gave a concert of classical instrumental music, on Monday Evening, the 16th instant, at the Concert Rooms, Mortimer Street. The performance closely resemble those of those lately given by the Beethoven Quartett Society, and comprised the following chefs d'œuvre:—Quartetts in D minor, No. 38—Haydn; Sonata in B flat, No. 4, pianoforte and violin—Mozart; Quartette in A minor, Op. 13—Mendelssohn; Grand Duet (two violins) in D minor—Spohr; Quartett, Posthumous, in B flat—Beethoven. When we state that the artistes who appeared on the occasion were Messrs. W. S. Bennet, P. Sainton, H. Cooper, Hill, and Rousselot, we need scarcely say the several pieces were rendered with the precision, good taste, and finish which invariably characterise the public performances of these talented artistes. The room was well filled. Amongst the audience we noticed many distinguished amateurs and professors who fully participated in the enthusiasm the performance elicited.

HERR KAUFMANN AND SON have announced a series of grand musical performances, the first of which takes place on Tuesday, when they will exhibit their newly-invented instruments, the Harmonichord, Orchestrion, Chordaulodin, Symphonium, and Trumpet Automaton.

DIORAMA OF THE HOLY LAND.—At the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly, a grand moving diorama of the Holy Land is being exhibited, painted by the artists of the "Panorama of the Nile." This pictorial exhibition is illustrative of the Exodus of the Israelites; Mount Sinai; Ruins of Petra; the capital of Edom; Bethlehem; Hebron; Nazareth, and city of Jerusalem, &c. The whole is admirably arranged and painted. A coup d'œil of the holy city first attracts the eye of the spectator; after which Jerusalem is illustrated within its walls, representing the social life of the inhabitants, and presenting views of the principal streets, gates, and churches, as well as of the most remarkable buildings. Tyre—Sydon—Beyrout—the Sea of Galilee—Plain of Esdraelon—Samarra—Mount Carmel—Lebanon and its venerable cedars—as also various other places of interest in Syria and Palestine—next pass before the eye in rapid succession; and the whole concludes with a gorgeous and admirably executed representation of the Mosque of Omar (occupying the site of Solomon's Temple), painted from the only drawing that has been made (as we are informed) of that jealously guarded edifice. Where the whole is so cleverly arranged and executed, it would be invidious to make many selections by way of "points" in the general picture; nevertheless, we must call attention to the highly picturesque view of the "Ford of the Jordan," the "Wady Garundel" valley, Petra, Sidon, Beyrout, and of the city of Jerusalem itself. Besides being a Diorama of high interest and merit, the pictorial representations of the Holy Land are agreeably accompanied by musical illustrations, which, aided by explanatory observations of each view by an intelligent interpreter, render it one of the most attractive and instructive exhibitions in the metropolis.

MRS. ALEXANDER NEWTON and MISS ELIZA WARD, gave their second Chamber Concert at No. 5, Percy Street, Bedford Square, the residence of Mrs. Alexander Newton, on Monday evening last. They were assisted by Miss Mary Farmer, Miss Rose Braham, Miss Messent, Miss Lizzy Stuart, and Madame Zimmerman, Mr. Winter and Mr. George Tedder as vocalists; and Miss Eliza Ward, Mr. Viotti Collins, Mr. George Collins, Mr. Frederick Chatterton, Master J. Ward, and Mr. Sauvlet, instrumentalists. Mrs. A. Newton was conspicuous among the singers for the grand aria, "Gli Angui d'infern," and the opening cavatina from Sonnambula, both of which were admirably given, and M. Sauvlet, the Netherlands flautist, who did wonders on his instrument, with his left hand only, although he had two hands perfectly available. In this attempt at miraculous display, M. Sauvlet has been surpassed by the Hibernian flautist, Bill Hickky, who plays variations on one hole. We must not omit mentioning how much gratified we were by Mrs. Alexander Newton's "Robin Adair," an excellent specimen of pure ballad singing. The rooms were crowded. The next soirée is announced to take place on Monday evening.

M. SZEKELY, the "Hungarian Pianist," as he styles himself, gave the first of a series of two concerts on Thursday evening, the 12th inst, at the New Beethoven Rooms. Mr. Szekely played several times in the course of the evening, and received much applause. Various well known artistes assisted, and Mr. Hopkinson conducted. The concert gave general satisfaction.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The Creation was again performed last night, and if possible to a still more crowded audience than last week. Miss Birch, Catherine Hayes, Reeves, and Formes, as before, were the principal vocalists. In consequence of the success attendant upon the series of performances, arrangements have been made to continue them during next month. Mendelssohn's Elijah will be again performed next Friday; the last performance of this Oratorio drew the largest amount of the series. Country visitors or foreigners before coming to London should previously secure tickets or they will run great risk of disappointment.

THE MUSICAL UNION.—M. Baugniet is busy in completing a most interesting tableau of the musical lions of the London season of 1851, who have been engaged at the Musical Union; comprising portraits of Ernst, Vieuxtemps, Sivori, Sainton, Laub, Hill, Deloffre, Piatti, Menter, Bottesini, Eckert, Bennett, Pauer, Hallé, and also that of the Director.

BOSWISTO, The well known chef d'orchestre, has arrived in town for the purpose of conducting Mr. Weippert's Quadrille Band.

MR. GEORGE HAWKINS, the vocalist, destroyed himself last week while labouring under a fit of temporary insanity. He was in his fifty-second year.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

In future the Subscription for Stamped Copies of the "Musical World" will be FIVE SHILLINGS PER QUARTER. The unstamped Quarterly Subscription will remain at Four Shillings.

The Quarter's Subscription being now due, Subscribers are respectfully requested to forward their Subscriptions without delay. If by Post Office Order, payable to Messrs. Myers and Co., at the Post Office, Charing Cross.

Advertisements.

HEALTH WHERE 'TIS SOUGHT!

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Cure of a disordered Liver and Stomach, when in a most hopeless state.—Extract of a letter from Mr. Matthew Harvey, of Chapel Hall, Airdrie, Scotland, dated the 15th of January, 1850.—To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your valuable Pills have been the means, with God's blessing, of restoring me to perfect health, at a time when I thought I was on the brink of the grave. I had consulted several eminent Doctors, who, after doing what they could for me, considered my case hopeless. I had been suffering from a Liver and Stomach complaint of long standing, which during the last two years got so much worse, that every one considered my condition as hopeless. I, as a last resource, got a Box of your Pills, which soon gave relief, and by persevering in their use for some weeks, together with rubbing night and morning your Ointment over my chest and stomach, and right side, I have by their means alone got completely cured, and to the astonishment of myself and everybody who knows me.

(Signed) MATTHEW HARVEY.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—
 Ague Constipation of the Bowels kinds Liver complaints Tumours
 Asthma Consumption the Bowels kinds Lumbago Ulcers
 Bile Com. Consumption Fits Piles Worms of all
 Debility Gout Rheumatism kinds
 Blotches on the Face Head-ache Scrofula or King's Weakness, from Skin Dysentery Indigestion Evil whatever cause
 Bowel complaints Erysipelas Inflammation Sore Throats &c., &c.
 Colic Jaundice The-Douloureux

Sold at the Establishment of Professor HOLLOWAY, 244, Strand, (near Temple-bar, London, and most of the respectable Druggists, and Dealers in Medicines throughout the civilized World, at the following prices—1 s. 1d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 3s. each Box. There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients in every Disorder are affixed to each Box.

VOCAL SCIENCE.

AT the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS on FRIDAY, June 27, at Half-past Two o'clock, Signor ANELLI has the honour to announce that he will deliver the First of a Course of FOUR LECTURES ON VOCAL SCIENCE, and the Art of Forming and Cultivating the Voice, by a new and concise method, by which pupils can learn singing in half the usual time, and which has been approved by the first masters, including the high authority of CAUSCHETTI. The Lecture will be illustrated by Miss Livingstone and Miss Menville. Conductor, Mr. Frederic Anelli, who will perform "Souvenir des Operas" on the Pianoforte. Reserved Seats, 5s.; Single Tickets, 3s.; Family Tickets (for Four), 8s. To be had, with the Syllabus and Plan of the "Method," at the principal Music Shops. Terms for Tuition—Single Lessons, One Guinea; Twenty-four Lessons, Twelve Guineas; Forty-eight Lessons, Twenty Guineas. Pupils in classes of four at half the above terms.

M. BOSISIO.

MR. JOHN WEIPPERT has the honour to announce to the Nobility and Gentry that he has effected an engagement with the above distinguished Composer, who has just arrived from Paris with an entirely new selection of music, composed by him expressly for the present season. M. Bosisio will be the Leader of "John Weippert's Band," which is formed of the finest Artists in Europe. Apply only at John Weippert's Quadrille Office, 21a, Soho-square.

NEW PIANOFORTE STUDIES

BY ALEXANDRE BILLET.

"Rosalie," in A flat	2s. 6d.
"Margaret," A	2s. 6d.
"Helene," E minor	2s. 6d.
"La Sylphide," F	3s. 6d.
"Romanza" (for the left hand), G flat	1s. 6d.
"Chant du Marin," in D flat	3s. 6d.
"L'Appassionata," C minor	3s. 6d.
"La Circassienne" (Octave Study), B major	2s. 6d.
"La Gondole," F sharp major	2s. 6d.
In the press, Six New Studies by Charles Mayer (of St. Petersburg), Op. 149.

SACRED HARMONY.

UNDER the especial PATRONAGE of Her Most Excellent MAJESTY.—Just published, price 31s. 6d.,

H. J. HAYCRAFT'S VOLUME OF SACRED HARMONY.

Contributors:—Kate Loder, Sterndale Bennett, Henry Smart, G. A. Macfarren, Dr. Walmley, W. H. Holmes, Lovell Phillips, Brinley Richards, C. Lucas, Robert Barnett, &c.

"This is a judicious and interesting publication, containing works of high merit, and altogether possessing an interest not likely to pass hastily away."—Atlas. London: Addison and Co.; and at the Editor's residence, 32, Queen's-road, Gloucester-gate, Regent's-park.

CRAMER'S STUDIES.

THE First Volume of this Work is now Published in the upright form, newly revised and corrected by the Editor, and divided into four parts. Price, 6s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

PIANO SOLO.

Engel, Louis.	Op. 22.	Une fleur languissante.	Morceau de Salon.
Gottschalk, J. M.	" 4.	La Chasse du jeune Henry	Morceau de Concert.
Schott, A. J.		National Bouquet, The Thistle, Shamrock, and the Rose.
Theimer, Emil.	Op. 4.	Nocturne.
John, Charles.	5.	Scherzo.
Kuhner, W.		Furor Galop.
Slany, Ludwig.	117.	Homage to Londres.	Waltz.
"		Rhein und Main, Nos. 10 & 11.	Two Polkas.
"		" Nos. 12 & 13.	Two Galops

PIANO DUETS.

Brunner, C. F.	Op. 121.	Flours Teutoniques.	Six Rondinos.
Schott, A. J.		National Bouquet, The Thistle, Shamrock, and Rose.

VIOLIN AND PIANO.

VIOLIN, WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO OR ORCHESTRA.

Beriot, Ch.	Op. 76.	3me Duo Concertant.	Variations.
Alard, Delphin.	Op. 2.	Belmsucht nach der Schweiz.	Pastorale.
"	" 21.	Souvenir de Mozart.

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's Street.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published,

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTE. Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 210 Regent-street; Keith and Frowse, 48, Chancery-lane; and Cocks & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

BLUMENTHAL'S NEW WORKS.

CONSOLATION	4s. 0d.
Primevère	4s. 0d.
Violette	3s. 0d.
Marche Militaire	3s. 6d.
Trois Mazurkas (3rd set)	4s. 0d.
Scene de Ballet	4s. 0d.
Nocturne Impromptu	3s. 0d.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent-street.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

THALBERG	Iris Airs.
STREICH	Les Hironnelles.
PRAEGER	Moment Joyeux.
J. HERZ	La Sylphide.
MORI	Romance sans Paroles.
SCHULZ	Mélodie.
MÜLLER	Anna Bolena.
RICHARDS	Moonlight Serenade.
RICHARDS	Pastorale.
OURY	Un Souvenir.
SILAS	Nocturne.

And, AMARANTH, by E. SILAS. Also, Six new and favourite Polkas by KAZYNSKI, Price 2s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

NEW MUSIC.

THE WORLD IS A FAIRY RING, Ballad written by Eliza Cook, composed by Joseph Philip Knight; composer of Beautiful Venice, Gather ye Rosebuds, Ocean Dreams, Song of Early Days, Come away, Cavatina, The Happy day, The Old and New Year, Her cheek was Pale.

London: Z. T. Purday, 45, High Holborn.

ST. MARTIN'S HALL, LONG ACRE.

Under Immediate Patronage of H. R. H. the Duchess of Kent, and Her Grace the Duchess of Buccleugh.

HERR KAUFMANN and SON from Dresden, will have the honour of giving THREE GRAND MUSICAL PERFORMANCES, on Tuesday evening, the 24th; Friday evening, the 27th; and Monday evening, the 30th of June, when they will introduce for the first time in this country, their newly invented Instruments, viz.:—Harmonichord, Orchestra, Symphonium, Chordal-lodion, and Trumpet Automaton. To commence at 8 o'clock precisely. Admission—Stalls, 7s., Unreserved Seats, 5s., to the upper part of the Hall, 2s. 6d., to be had at the Hall, and all principal Music Sellers.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

IT is respectfully announced that on TUESDAY EVENING it will be performed for the sixth time in this country Auber's Grand Opera,
IL PRODIGE,

(recently produced with immense success at the Académie de Musique, Paris, under the name of L'Infant Prodigue.)

Jeffele	Madame SONTAG.
Nette	Madame UGALDE.
Reuben	M. MASSOL.
Azele	Signor GARDONI.
Amenofi	Signor MERCURIALI.
Nemrod	Signor CASANOVA.
Canope	Signor SCOTTI.
Monoton	Signor SCAPINI.
Boccoris	Signor COLETTI.
Lia,	Mlle. CAROLINA ROSATI.

The Couplets of the Chamberlain, in the fourth act, will be sung by Madame UGALDE. The new scenery by Mr. Charles Marshall. In the Second and Third Acts a Grand Divertissement (composed by M. Paul Taglioni) comprising the celebrated Pas de Poignards, by Mlle. Carolina Rosati, supported by Mlles. Kohlenburg, Rosa, Esper, Julien, Lamoureux, Dantonis, Aussendon, Pascals, Allegrini, Soto, Soldansky, Emma, Eliza, Lavinia, Beale, and the ladies of the corps de ballet. The Opera to commence at half-past 7 o'clock. Applications for boxes, stalls and tickets to be made at the box-office of the theatre.

On Wednesday, FIDELIO (eighth time), Leonora, Mlle. SOPHIE CRUVELLI, being the last time it can be given before the end of the Season; with, first time this season, "LA PROVA D'UN OPERA SERIA," principal characters by Signor Calzolari, Signor Lablache, Signor F. Lablache, and Madame Ugalde.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR MR. COSTA.—On FRIDAY next, 27th June, an Extra Performance of Mendelssohn's ELIJAH. Vocalists—Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss E. Birch, Miss Dolby, Miss M. Williams; Mr. Sims Reeves and Herr Formes. The Orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets 3s.; reserved, 5s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter Hall, or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross.

NEW BEETHOVEN ROOMS,
27, QUEEN ANNE STREET, CAVENDISH SQUARE.

PROGRAMME

OF

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS'

FIRST PERFORMANCE OF

CLASSICAL AND MODERN PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 23rd.

To commence at Three, and terminate at Five.

PART I.
Trio in C Minor, Op. 1.—Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello—Messrs.	BRINLEY RICHARDS, ERNEST, and PIATTI	...	Beethoven.
Allegro con Brio.
Andante Cantabile con variazioni.
Minuetto—Trio.
Finale—Prestissimo.
ARIA—Crudel! Ah no mio ben—Miss CATHERINE HAYES	Mozart.
SOLO, PIANOFORTE—MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS
"The Vision"—Romance	Richards.
Characteristic Pieces, No. 4 (Schnell und beweglich).	Mendelssohn.
Lied ohne Worte in E
The Fountain	Sternoble Bennett.
CONCERTINA—CONTRA-BASSO—SIGNOR BOTTESINI	Bottesini.
PIANOFORTE DUETT—Andante con Variazioni, Op. 63—MR. CIPRIANI	POTTER and MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS	...	Mendelssohn.

PART II.
SONATA IN A MAJOR—Pianoforte and Violin—	MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS and HERR ERNEST	...	Mozart.
Allegro Molto.
Andante.
Finale—Presto.
RONDO—Scherzando—Miss CATHERINE HAYES	Bellini.
SOLO, PIANOFORTE—MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS,
Moonlight Serenade
"Angela"—Romance	Richards.
SCHERZO—The Rivulet and the Birds

Broadwood's Patent Grand Piano Fortes will be used at these Concerts. The Vocal Music will be accompanied by Mr. CIPRIANI POTTER. Subscription to both Concerts, One Guinea. Single Tickets, Eight Shillings each.

MR. CRIVELLI

BEGS to acquaint his friends and the public that a Third Edition of the "ART OF SINGING," enlarged and newly arranged in the form of a Grammatical System of Rules for the Cultivation of the Voice, may be had at his residence, 71, Upper Norton-street, and at all the principal Music-sellers.

* Soon will be ready, the French and German Translation.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

SECOND APPEARANCE OF MADAME VIARDOT.

SECOND NIGHT OF LE PROPHETE.

ON TUESDAY NEXT, JUNE 24th, will be performed Meyerbeer's Grand Opera,

LE PROPHETE.

Fides,	Madame VIARDOT.
Bertha,	(Her second appearance this season).
Jean de Leyden,	Madame CASTELLAN.
Count Oberthal,	Signor MARIO.
Serjeant,	Signor TAGLIAFICO.
Peasants,	Signor SOLDI.
Geona,	(Signor ROMMI and
Mathiasin,	Signor RACHE.
Faceano,	Signor STIGELLI.
	Signor POLONINI.
	Herr FORMES.

The Chorus in the grand Coronation Scene of the Third Act will combine the powers of the Full Orchestra, the Military Bands, the Chorus and Organ. The Incidental Ballet in the Skating Scene will be supported by Madlle. Louise Taglioni and M. Alexandre, and comprise the celebrated Quadrille des Patineurs.

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor,—MR. COSTA.

On THURSDAY NEXT, JUNE 26th, a GRAND EXTRA NIGHT will take place. Full particulars will be duly announced.

COMMENCE AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre.

Signor RONCONI has arrived, and will make his first appearance in a few days.

BEETHOVEN QUARTETT SOCIETY,

27, QUEEN ANNE STREET, CAVENDISH SQUARE.

M. SCIPION ROUSSELOT

BEGS to announce that he will give, for his Benefit an

EXTRA EVENING PERFORMANCE,

Being the last meeting this season, on WEDNESDAY, July 6th, 1851, at eight o'clock; Quartetts to commence at a quarter-past eight; when the following eminent artistes will appear:—

Violins, HERR ERNST,	...
Messrs. P. SAINTON, H. COOPER,	...
And Signor CAMILLO SIVORI,	...
Viola, Mr. H. HILL,	...
Violoncello, M. S. ROUSSELOT.	...
Contra-basso, Signor BOTTESINI.	...
Vocalist, Miss DOLBY.	...
Pianoforte, Mlle. COULON.	...

The programme will include a Duet for Violin and Tenor, by Spohr, performed by Messrs. Sivori and Ernst; a Duet for Violin and Contra-basso, played by Messrs. Sivori and Bottesini; and a Quintett (No. 3) with Contra-basso, originally composed by S. Rousselet, for the late celebrated Dragonetti, performed by Messrs. Ernst, Cooper, Hill, Rousselet, and Bottesini.

Reserved seats half-a-guinea. The Members, Subscribers of the Society, will have a right to a Reserved Seat for the usual price of the Subscription. Unreserved Seats seven shillings, to be obtained of Messrs. Rousselet and Co., 66, Conduit Street, Regent Street, and at the principal Music Sellers.

MISS BASSANO AND HERR KUHE

BEG to announce that their ANNUAL GRAND MORNING CONCERT will take place at the QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover-square, on TUESDAY, the 24th of JUNE, 1851. Vocalists—Messdames Catherine Hayes, Birch, Eliza Birch, Johannsen, and Bassano; Messrs. Stigelli, Marchesi, Jules Stockhausen, and Pischek. Instrumentalists—Madame Parish Alvars, Messrs. Ernst, Piatti, and Herr Kuhe. Conductors—Messrs. Brinley Richards, Robert Green, and Biletta. Tickets, Half-a-Guinea; Reserved Seats, Fifteen Shillings each. To be had of all principal Music-sellers, and of Miss Bassano, 19, Osnaburgh-street, Regent's-park, and of Herr Kuhe, 18, Princes-street, Cavendish-square.

THE QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, HANOVER SQUARE.

MISS GODDARD

BEGS to announce that she will give her First EVENING CONCERT on WEDNESDAY, JUNE 26, 1851, when she will be assisted by Messrs. Sivori, Piatti, Bottesini, Pischek, Reichart, &c. &c.; Misses Dolby, Johannsen, and Fraser. Conductors—Sig. E. Biletta, Sig. G. Fossi, and Herr Schmidt. To commence at Eight o'clock. Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; Single Ticket, 7s. To be had at the principal Music Publishers, and of Miss Goddard, 14, Clarendon-villas, Notting Hill.

AMATI VIOLONCELLO

TO be Sold, the Property of an Amateur. It is a beautiful specimen of the Cremona maker, and will be sold for much below its value. To be seen at Messrs. Wessel and Co., 229, Regent-street, Corner of Hanover-street.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Stridley Villas, Studley Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Furkess, Dean Street S.W.; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, June 21, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription; per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra), payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 26.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, JUNE 28, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

CRUVELLI.

The eighth performance of Fidelio, on Thursday night, was interesting for more reasons than one. It was announced in the bills as the last, until the end of the season; and although an extra night, with none of the subscribers to make the house look full, the crowd was so great that a short time after the doors were open there was not a place to be had, in boxes or stalls, and not even standing room in the pit.

A few weeks past, when announcing the success of Sophie Cruvelli in Paris, and her expected arrival in London, we expressed our conviction of the favourable reception that would be accorded to Fidelio, and our admiration of the courage of the youthful artist who dared to make her debut, before a London public, in the most elaborate and difficult, the profoundest and most poetical of operas. Our anticipations have been more than realised. Not only has Fidelio been received with enthusiasm by the public, but it has proved of eminent service to the treasury. Mr. Lumley may congratulate himself on having been the first to present the one dramatic work of the giant of the orchestra, in an Italian costume. Beethoven himself would hardly have dreamed of hearing his opera on the Italian stage; but Beethoven did not dream of what the state of music would be, in England, in 1851; and Beethoven did not dream of Sophie Cruvelli—of one gifted to sing the part of Leonora, as well in Italian, and in French, as in German, her own tongue—aye, or in English, too, like Malibran, her predecessor and only equal.

Those who remember Sophie Cruvelli in 1848, when the Jenny Lind fever blinded the eyes of the public to a genius of a still higher order—when, amidst the enthusiasm for the "Nightingale," Cruvelli was lost, like a bright star behind a cloud, and the most passionate and impetuous Lucrezia that ever made Donizetti's opera as musical as Victor Hugo's tragedy is dramatic, was overwhelmed by the tears of Amina, and obscured by the intense faith which inspired Alice to her task of love and duty—those, we repeat, who remember Sophie Cruvelli in 1848, would do well to compare notes. What did they say, and what think of Cruvelli, then?—what do they say and think of her now? Then she was a young singer of promise, with a splendid voice and a vast deal of dramatic fire. Now she is a genius, for whom the highest triumphs of the lyric drama are destined. And yet, but three years have passed away. Cruvelli was nineteen in 1848, and in 1851 cannot be more than two and twenty. Her voice is simply what it was before—the most beautiful in the world.

She is neither handsomer nor plainer, taller nor shorter, than three years ago; her dramatic fire, and her vocal facility, though more entirely under the influence of art, more subject to control, (the natural result of experience) are not more remarkable than they were. How then are we to account for the difference in public appreciation?—how to explain why that which was once received with comparative coldness, should now be understood and applauded to the echo? How, but by again referring to that passion, that mania, for "the Lind," which made the public blind to everything—even to Alboni, even to Rachel, even to Cruvelli.

There is a striking difference to be noted in the respective effects produced upon the public mind by Jenny Lind, in 1848, and Sophie Cruvelli, in 1851. (Cruvelli, in 1848, was not Cruvelli—but a shadow of the future). Every artifice of reclame had been wasted on the advent of "the Lind." Fame had preceded her, as an ambassador, and never was there a more skilful and expeditious chargé d'affaires. A quarrel was raised, and maintained for the course of a twelvemonth, as to whether she would come or not. Some said yea, some nay; and the argument of either side was forcibly and obstinately held. Jenny Lind came, and destroyed, or at least neutralized, the formidable opposition at Covent Garden, which threatened the director of Her Majesty's Theatre with absolute ruin. Observe the distinction. A fortnight before the arrival of Cruvelli, nobody knew whether she was coming or not; and when her arrival was advertised, with the date of her début, few were aware, and still fewer were careful, whether it was the same Cruvelli, who, in 1848, had shone with a dim light beside the splendid planet whose presence then absorbed the whole atmosphere of public affection. She came (Cruvelli), and modestly made her first appearance as the tender and devoted Leonora. She incurred the risk of misappreciation with Beethoven's mighty work, and was willing to rise or fall with the fortunes of her great compatriot. She played Leonora, and succeeded. Fidelio succeeded, and Cruvelli too. The one was worthy of the other. Jenny Lind came out in a mangled version of an opera by Meyerbeer; Cruvelli in the unmutated masterpiece of Beethoven. Jenny Lind had all the chances to herself; her prestige, the uncertainty about her coming, which had raised the public mind to such a strange pitch of excitement, equally militated in her favour. Cruvelli had neither prestige to recommend her, nor doubt to engender curiosity [in her behalf. No one disputed her coming, since no one cared whether she came or not. She was announced, immediately after her Parisian triumph; and her Parisian triumph was looked upon (like so many other Parisian triumphs) as a puff—a reclame, to suit managerial purposes. Her entry on the stage, however, in the costume of the gentle and heroic Leonora, at once prepossessed every one in her favour; and the first few notes she uttered confirmed this good impression. After the air, the success of Sophie Cruvelli was decided. A new and a great dramatic genius had come upon the scene—had burst unexpectedly on public view—and raised the hope of a fresh impetus to the lyric stage, which had been for some time on the decline, for lack of novelty. She was the novelty required; and it is but just to say, that she was recognised at once, and adopted. The English public, like the French public, has adopted Sophie Cruvelli; and we, who represent the public, are ready to own that we have taken a lesson from our neighbours, who quickly understood, and rated at its proper value, the priceless jewel we English had failed to estimate. Another time this will scarcely happen. If we get another Cruvelli, we shall know her worth at once, and not leave it to the French to teach us. But Cruvellis do not come every day—any more than Malibrans—and we are likely to have to wait a long time before the occasion be offered us, of avenging our reputation as connoisseurs.

Sophie Cruvelli may now be considered as naturalised in England. She has played two parts—Fidelio and Norma—and triumphed in both. Find what faults you please with them, criticise them as you choose, no such Fidelio, no such Norma, has been seen in our time. We, who prophesied the success she would achieve—we, who were the first to announce to the musical public the apparition of a new genius, are, at the same time, more anxious than any of our contemporaries to place Sophie Cruvelli upon the critical question, to torture her into confession of her faults—the lovely errors of youth and enthusiasm—to force her to abandon them, wild flowers as they are, almost as sweet and bright, and fragrant and beautiful as the real flowers of art which have been tendered by the hand of experience, and watered by the showers of maturity. We should like to make a catalogue raisonnée, or deraisonnée, of Cruvelli's errors, and proclaim them to the eye of the world, in the hope that she might take counsel and amend them. But our task would be too difficult. We should first have the labour of finding them. And when found, and collected together, what would they amount to?—the mistakes of impulse, the overhates of genius, which sometimes despises elaboration, the short-comings of ardent youth, too eager and confiding to calculate. All these will doubtless be mended; and at thirty, Sophie Cruvelli may, possibly, be the most perfect dramatic singer in Europe, as she is already the greatest genius. But whether, then, she will be more admirable than she is at the present moment, we take leave to doubt. Something may be gained that is not now possessed—something that can only come with time. But what can replace the freshness of early aspiration, the magic of young unfettered impulse, the depth and beauty of tones that reach the heart from their very innocence and purity? At thirty, Sophie Cruvelli may be a greater, because a more practised artist, and one more entirely mistress of her resources; but we doubt if she can ever become a more attractive and delightful singer.

We have written thus at length, because it is probable we may not have occasion, for some time, to return to the subject. The interest we have felt is partly derived from a certain satisfaction springing from the complete fulfilment of a prophecy which appeared in these pages; but in a still greater measure from the conviction that the advent of a new star of genius, in the horizon of dramatic song, is to be hailed as a fact of the highest significance to art.

THE MUSICAL UNION.

The Directors' matinée, on Tuesday last, at which all the instrumental stars of the season gave their services, besides Herr Reichardt, the German tenor, attracted the most brilliant, aristocratic, fashionable, and crowded audience ever collected together in Willis's rooms. Mr. Ella, by this one meeting, has covered all the expenses arising from his spirited determination to give extra sittings, at which many excellent artists, who would not otherwise have appeared, have been able to display their talents in presence of the most refined audience in Europe. It is enough to annex the programme, which may give some notion of the attractive variety of the entertainment.

*Quartet—"God preserve the Emperor".... Haydn.

MM. Sivori, Deloffre, Hill and Piatti.

*Quartet—A minor. No. 1, Op. 13. (Intermezzo and Presto Finale) ... Mendelssohn.

MM. Sainton, &c.

*Trio—E flat. Op. 70 Beethoven.

MM. Ernst, Piatti, and Hallé.

Vocal. Herr Reichardt Schubert.

Adagio and Rondo—Violin Solo Vieuxtemps.

Herr Laub.

Duet à 4 Mains—A flat. (Allegro)..... Hummel.

MM. Hallé and Pauer.

*Sestet—E flat. (Allegro)..... Mayseder.

MM. Sivori, Piatti, Bottesini, &c.

Vocal. Herr Reichardt. (Spanish Song) Dessauer.

*Quartet—Four Violins Obligati Maurer.

MM. Sivori, Sainton, Laub, and Deloffre.

Duet Concertante—Violoncello and Contra-Basso . Bottesini.

Signori Piatti and Bottesini.

Accompanist.....Herr Eckert.

* Two movements only performed of each composition.

It would be invidious to criticise any of the "numbers" in detail. Suffice it, every executant (and they were all de la première force) did his very best in honour of the intelligent and energetic Director, who himself played a tenor part in Mayseder's sestet. It was a proud day for Mr. Ella.

FIDELIO.

(Continued from our last.)

Leonore has observed the governor in earnest speech with Rokko but not overheard the purport of their converse. Without any intervening spoken dialogue her grand scena "Abscheulicher wo eilst du hin?" begins immediately upon the close of the duet. The sight of the tyrant, to whom she ascribes all her sufferings, awakens in the heroine—the devoted Leonore—the liveliest sense of horror; she knows him a stranger to sympathy, to every humane emotion, she is conscious of the storm of wild and fearful passion that rages in his soul; but she sees, also, a rainbow resting on the dark clouds that beshadow his own destiny, which lights and encourages her to endure the arduous trials through which she has still to pass. Here is a charming piece of word-painting in illustration of this metaphor of the rainbow, which is musically conveyed in the unexpected and novel change of key, in the bright but still effect of the orchestration produced by the employment of the acute wind instruments, in the streamy phrase of symphony, in 9-8 time, and in the general calmness that, from this point, characterises the music. On the whole, however, this recitative has not that highly passionate colouring which, from so many beautiful examples, we so well know it was eminently in the power of Beethoven to impart, and which we might well have supposed his conception of the character and feelings of his heroine would have suggested to him to have given to this, her only individual solo in the opera, the only piece in which we have the portrayal of her own emotions uninfluenced by the immediate actions of those who surround her. The comparatively unimpassioned character of the music in this place we attribute mainly to the didactic rather than dramatic nature of the words, which, for the most part throughout the opera pre-eminently good for their purpose, in this instance are, we think, very different from what the situation requires. The chief effect of this recitative is to lead the attention by gradual progression from the violent excitement of the duet which preceded, to the greater beauty of the adagio which follows it, and in this we must acknowledge an artistry that puts to shame the short-sighted stricture we have been making, as evidencing a regard for the general effect superior to the miniature workmanship which makes the utmost of every particular detail in a large work to the very possible disparagement of the whole. It is probably due to the composer's design of producing an imperceptible gradation of feeling in his audience instead of continuing an equal though a different excitement, or of making a violent contrast, that we have in this place a recitative instead of a spoken monologue, and this consideration reduplicates the force of all we have advanced as to the gross impropriety and want of pertinence in the interpolation of recitatives in other parts of the opera, where the dialogue is of a purely conversational character, insusceptible of musical expression, and where there is no important transition from one state of feeling to another. We have now the aria with the three horns and bassoon obligato accompaniment. In the beautiful and expressive adagio, Leonore invokes Hope not to extinguish the last star of the weary pilgrim, to let it shine upon her zeal, and love will enable her to reach it. This movement embodies the most earnest feeling; it is ceaselessly melodious, though not a definitely continuous melody, and the peculiarity of the instrumentation helps not a little in the subdued tranquillity of its general effect. It has been, and it may be, urged that here would have been a fitting place for a clear, unbroken, rhythmical melody, and we feel that such, while it would have been certainly more generally appreciable, would not have been untrue to the reposeful, contemplative situation of the singer nor to the metaphorical form of the language she employs; but there is a perfect poetical propriety in the treatment Beethoven has given to the subject, that must be highly prized by all who can truly estimate it; in the general melodiousness of the whole effect to which the instruments, no less than the voice, contribute, we find a fit rendering of the vague feeling that hope, however earnest, if indefinite, must always be—a rendering more truthful than could have been given in a concise and tuneful cantilena. The allegro, "Ich folg dem innern Triebe," opens to us an entirely new phase of the heroine's character; she follows a deepfelt impulse,—she wavers not,—duty, and the love of a faithful wife strengthen her. Now, we first learn that Leonore is a wife; that she is not what to the rest of the characters she has seemed, or we have surmised from her entrance on the scene, and it is now only we discover the true relationship in which she is placed, the real difficulties and dangers of her situation, and from these comprehend the poetical greatness of her character. The opening symphony of this allegro indicates the steadfast firmness of the instinct that impels the most devoted of heroines to her many arduous efforts of endurance and forbearance, an expression that is forcibly developed in the continuance of the movement. We pause to consider these four bars because in them we trace the germ of the chief subject of the overture, in E, (known as the Overture to Fidelio), and thus find a second clue to the feeling intended to be expressed in that composition—to which we shall have occasion to refer more at length when we come to speak of the overture in particular. The strain of enthusiasm with which this movement opens grows in its intensity as the music proceeds. The exultant burst of rapture on the word "Gattin," (where the chord of G sharp major is introduced with such prodigious brilliancy), gives a powerful utterance to the sense of pride with which Leonore feels herself to be a "wife," and to be strengthened by this most sacred of all human relationships, the bond of will more reverend than the tie of nature, the force of love more noble than the power of instinct, strengthened by this to follow the deepfelt impulse that urges her to acts of the highest heroism. In this, and in the passage that grows out of it, we recognise another anticipation of a most beautiful point in Weber's Freischütz, (we refer to a place in the grand scena of Agatha), and here, as in the former instance to which we have alluded of the influence this opera must have had upon the thoughts of Weber, there is not only the coincidence of feeling and the similarity of phrase, but also the identity of key. We have an impassioned episode where she exclaims—"O thou for whom I have borne all! could I but penetrate to the place where treachery has cast thee in fetters, and bring to thee sweet consolation!" Commencing in the key of A we are brought by natural gradation to the dominant of C sharp minor, and then by a transition, beautiful as it is entirely novel and unexpected, we suddenly change to the key of G natural on the words "Und süßen Trost dir bringen," the powerful intensity and most heartfelt tenderness of which can only be conceived by those who are familiar with the passage. The technical means whereby this great and unusual effect is attained are quite simple if but carefully examined. The chord of G sharp is equivalent to that of A flat, and this is the minor second in the key of G natural, the root of the "Neapolitan sixth," of certain most indefinite and not a little whimsical technical nomenclature, and so the real tonal relationship (however rarely brought into question) between the keys of C sharp minor and G natural major. The ardent excitement is thus resumed, and by a natural transition to E minor, we are brought to a half close on the dominant of this key. Now the opening symphony (the over-turish subject) recurs, this time with additional force from the brightness of the change into the major key after the minor; now the recapitulation of the early portion of the movement with the "Freischütz" passage again, but with such trifling modulation as to make it still more than before like its archetype; now a short impassioned coda with a somewhat protracted full close, and so an end. In this allegro there is one important thing to remark, namely, the great brilliancy of the effect of the seemingly inadequate manner in which it is produced: we have only the four obligato wind instruments, besides the string quartet, in the score, and these wind instruments are surely of a sombre character both as regards quality of tone and positive pitch; moreover, they are precisely the same as are employed in the slow movement, the effect of which is so entirely different. This forcibly suggests that the character of music written for brilliancy or for tranquillity depends intrinsically upon the ideas themselves, not merely upon the orchestral colouring under which they may be displayed.

There is now another scene of the jealousy of Jacquino, and Marcelline's abnegation of all her former admissions towards him, in favor of his rival. Jacquino appeals to her father, who concisely gives him to understand that Fidelio is his accepted son-in-law. Leonore entreats the old jailor to fulfil his often repeated promise, and allow the prisoners in the upper cells to come for once out into the garden and enjoy the air of heaven—fondly deluding herself with the idea that she may possibly discover him whom she so anxiously seeks amongst them. With little difficulty on the part of Leonore and Marcelline, Rokko is persuaded—and here begins the first finale. Jacquino and Fidelio open the prison doors, and the unhappy captives, who, under the tyrannous administration of Pizarro, have been immured for years in the living tomb he governs, are allowed for once to inhale the breath of nature, to see the daylight, and to quicken their half-extinguished vital powers with the genial influence of the all-nourishing sunshine. The few bars of introductory symphony to the greatly admired and preeminently beautiful movement with which the finale opens (the prisoners' chorus) have an effect that is perfectly magical; we feel on hearing them all the sensation of a deep-drawn breath, the expansion of the chest, the inflation of the lungs, the stillness of wonder, and the abstraction of delight. To analyse this most powerful embodiment of a most poetical conception is the work of a few words only; but to comprehend how from such simple means so great an effect can be produced, and to admire sufficiently the consummate artistry with which these means are applied, is beyond the scope of thought, beyond the range of expression. Here is one of those rare instances in art of the peculiar power of genius to invest with a quality beyond their own the materials it employs, and to astonish the sense where the judgment can recognise nothing but what appears to be within the attainment of every one, yet no one succeeds in attaining. We have, as has been said, a natural progression of the most simple harmonies, and these are assigned to the quartet of string instruments only; but the peculiar manner in which these harmonies are dispersed gives to them a breadth of tone that seems to fill all space with sound, to define in appreciable vibrations the scarcely imagined throbbings of the pulse of nature.

Now we must remark upon the exquisite beauty of the melodic passage assigned to the bassoons and clarionets—now upon the obvious sense of sighing conveyed in the second bar of each of the two-bar phrases it comprises—now upon the gradually accumulated power of the voices (the entry of each part, successively, at the interval of a second above the preceding giving wonderful force and largeness to the effect of the harmony)—and now upon the magnificent burst on the chord of E flat, when all the voices for the first time move together "in the fresh air," which expresses all that can be expressed of rapturous but passionless ecstasy. The repetition of the phrase that follows this, with the diminuendo, is a great stroke of art, which portrays the gradual subduing of this glowing excitement, without allowing the feelings expressed or the attention of the hearers to sink too suddenly into repose. The modulation to F, "Only here is life," and the mysterious passage of unisons, "And in the dungeon a Grave," are highly picturesque. Then the transient modulation into E flat, with a section of the opening subject somewhat extended, a still more expansive and no less simple passage than before to express "only here is life," and another rendering of the mysterious, shudderful thought of the horrors of the prison—finally a most genial and irrepressible cry of exultation that we feel to be outpouring from the inmost recesses of the heart, and so we come to the first full close, and terminate what may be esteemed the first part of the movement. We have now an episode that, from the change of the rhythmical movement, and the very bright effect of the change of key, still more from the charming and simple beauty of the melody, gives a touching expression to the words. A solo voice encourages the rest to rely with confidence on the help of Providence; hope whispers him that they will be free, that they will find rest. These words kindle a new enthusiasm of the chorus; they cannot restrain the expression of the feelings that dilate their hearts; they interrupt their companion with broken ejaculations of "Heaven! Deliverance! what happiness!"—and then join in an invocation to Freedom to return, which is certainly the point of the whole composition, the utmost possible expression of all the most ardent emotions this chorus so truthfully embodies. An officer on guard upon the ramparts observes them; another solo voice warns the rest to "speak lightly, to restrain themselves, for they are watched with ear and glance." The unusual progression of harmony that accompanies the suppressed declamation of these words, and the eager anxiety conveyed in the stifled whispers in which they are repeated by the chorus, produce an excitement no less powerful than the preceding, but of a totally different character. This gradually dies away, and then the old feeling steals upon us again with the resumption of the opening subject, which now receives a new colouring from its contrast to what has immediately preceded. What we have named the first part of this movement is here considerably compressed, and we have then a coda, remarkable, first for the vagueness of apprehension which it so completely and poetically embodies, and next for the novel harmony employed, of which, in its present application, we can scarcely call to mind another example.

Were we disposed for a theoretical discussion on points of harmony (which we consider would be quite irrelevant to the purpose of this article), we should adduce the present unusual employment of the common chord of the minor second of the scale, as an illustration of an argument, which could not but gain force from the importance of such an example. The argument, however, will keep, and the example cannot be forgotten. The prisoners retire into the garden, anxiously fearing the observation of the sentinels, and Leonore, who has been vainly seeking for her husband among the children of misery that owe this, their temporary return to the world of life and light, to her gentle persuasion, runs eagerly to Rokko, as he returns from another interview with the Governor. In a short recitative which opens the second movement of the finale (and which is another example of the imprudence of the introduction of additional recitatives, in proving that where the musical or dramatic design required the employment of this mode of composition, Beethoven had readily recourse to it)—in a short recitative, the jailor answers to the earnest enquiry of his assistant, that Pizarro has consented to the marriage of Marcelline with Fidelio, that the latter shall assist him in his labours within the prison, and that to-day he shall descend with him. The music now becomes rhythmical. Leonore exclaims with uncontrollable delight, "To-day!"—a delight well rendered in the music. The hearty Rokko, pleased to see the joy he has occasioned, proposes at once to proceed to the fulfilment of their labour. "Whither?" eagerly demands the supposed Fidelio. The bluff simplicity of the kindly old man is lost in the air of mystery with which he says "To that man" (the allusion recalls all that has been said of the secret prisoner), "to whom I have since many weeks given daily less and less food." The same figure of accompaniment which distinguished the previous solo of Leonore is now resumed, and she exclaims with renewed rapture, "Ha! will he be enfranchised?" But Rokko checks at once her impatient hopes. "The prisoner will—but how?—be liberated, within an hour—the finger on the mouth—he must be in his grave." This short passage is most dramatically declaimed, the peculiar mystery given to the two parenthetical passages being admirably considered. The old figure of accompaniment is then again resumed. "Is he dead?" demands the anxious wife, whose courage gains strength from the severity of the trials to which it is subject. "Not yet." We have here a strange progression from the key of E to that of G minor, which gives special force to Leonore's ejaculation—"Is then to kill him thy duty?" The familiar figure is then resumed, and Rokko in his natural manner declares—and with considerable self-satisfaction in the declaration—that murder is no part of his office; and this he seeks to certify by a most emphatic and triumphant reiteration of the word—"No." The figure here breaks off, and the voice being accompanied note against note, gives still more force, and with all the air of self-superiority the notes so well convey, to the announcement that the governor will himself descend into the prison. Here is introduced, with admirable pertinence to the situation, the four notes that must have left such a vivid impression on every one who has heard the great duet of the two basses, the phrase in which Pizarro—whose terrible influence pervades the whole action of the opera, and the thoughts of its agents—in which Pizarro, after describing his purposed descent into the dungeon, tells, in one short phrase, the intended results of his murderous design—"and he is dumb!" To give a distinct colouring to the delivery of the following words, for the feeling of which we have been so powerfully prepared by the recurrence to the very impressive phrase of the duet, the two trombones are introduced, in this passage alone throughout the Finale—namely, when Rokko says "We two will only dig his grave"—wherein the purport of the governor's descent into the prison is more fearfully conveyed by implication than it could be by the most explicit description. Leonore's horror at the thought that she is probably to dig the grave of her own husband, and the consideration of Rokko, that the more and more enfeebled state of the wretched prisoner will have rendered him callous to the greater, but the last evil he will have to endure, are well rendered in the following passage, which brings this, the second movement of the Finale, to a close; a movement more remarkable as an excellent piece of declamation than for its abstract musical interest, though in this it is decidedly not at all wanting.

(To be continued.)

Reviews of Music.

- No. 1. "Amor"—Arietta da Camera,
- No. 2. "Inconsolabile"
- No. 3. "L'Auretta Messaggiera"—Arietta.
- No. 4. "L'Orfano"—Poetia del Signor G. Sacchero.
- No. 5. "La Violetta"—Arietta.
- No. 6. "Vola, vola"—Arietta da Camera, Musica di MEYER-BEER. T. Boosey & Co.

Among the number of uninteresting publications with which our fashionable and aristocratic drawing-rooms are deluged, to the interruption of the peace of families, and the small gratification of innocent and unexpectant guests, the appearance of six chamber songs, with the honourable name of Meyerbeer attached to them, must be welcomed as an oasis in the barren desert of accumulated nothings, which parch up the soul of the musical traveller with inharmoonious sicculence. The songs before us are not all new, some of them having appeared already with German words, and been introduced in public sufficiently often to render them at once recognisable to those who are in the habit of attending our benefit and other concerts. For instance, No. 3, "L'Auretta Messaggiera," will be welcomed by the readers of the Musical World as an old friend with a new face; or, to be technical, as an old air in a new key. None can have forgotten the charming and quaint romance which, under the title of the "Fisher-maiden," and in the key of G minor, was engraved and presented to the subscribers of the Musical World, some three years since. "L'Auretta Messaggiera" is that same romance, transposed to E minor, with new Italian words, expressing an entirely different tale, with a "gentle breeze" for the heroine.

No. 1, "Amor," is also an old air with a new key. It will be recognised as the "Chant de Mai," which first introduced Mademoiselle Jetty Treffz to an English audience at the Philharmonic Concerts, in 1849, and which she afterwards sung with so much success at Jullien's. In its present form, it is transposed from C to D, with Italian words embodying an apostrophe to the month of April. It is, however, as welcome as the others, being really a beautiful composition; and if sung, as insinuated on the title, by Signor Mario, can hardly fail to create a furor, as it already has done so frequently when coming from the pretty lips of the popular Jetty, "Jullien's thrush."

The enumeration of titles and keys on the title-page of these songs is so obscure—A sharp and E sharp (impossible keys) being indicated among others—that we cannot attempt to follow them in order. We shall, therefore, take them up at hazard.

No. 2, "Inconsolabile," in F, was sung with great success, and unanimously encored, by Madame Grisi, at the recent Matinées of Signor Brizzi. It is a very beautiful song, the melody being one of the most vocal we remember of Meyerbeer's, and the accompaniment developing a marked and original character, to which the general tone is given by a very novel figure in the bass, treated in a most skilful manner. The transition to A flat, page 3, and the reprise of the first key, form an interesting and natural episode. Being in two verses, without any change in the melody and accompaniments, we presume the "Inconsolabile" must be deemed a ballad, but it is, nevertheless, far superior to nine specimens out of ten of that form of vocal music.

No. 4, "L'Orfano," if we may be allowed a preference where all is unexceptionally good, would be our especial choice among the present set of songs. It is in the key of B flat, and the unusual measure of 12-8 gives great flow and largeness to the melody. The accompaniment is very recherché, yet at the same time extremely natural and easy. There is very little modulation, but what there is is introduced with exceeding taste. The episode, which arrives unexpectedly on the harmony of the 6-4, in the key of C, upon the words "Spera! Spera!" is graceful and charming; and the short transition to F minor, arriving by natural progressions to the 6-4 in A, in the key of D minor, has both a new and an agreeable effect. The reprise of the theme, however, which occurs here, is the only point to which we object in the song. The progression of which we have spoken, at the point where the 6-4 in D minor is attained, is there abandoned, and the common chord of F, in the next bar (page 4, bar 1), is introduced, while the voice holds on a long F, as the dominant harmony of B flat, by means of which the original key is resumed. It would have been better to have introduced a full close in the key of D minor, at the end of the progression before mentioned, previous to returning to the key of B flat. With this, criticism stops, the rest of "L'Orfano" being unexceptionably beautiful.

No. 5, "La Violetta," is a sparkling arietta in F, pleasing not only on account of its simplicity, but for the grace and freshness of its melody. The accompaniment is in keeping with the character of the song, a sort of tripping measure of dotted notes à la guitarra. The episode in A is naturally introduced, and gives an agreeable relief; but we do not exactly sympathise with the abrupt way in which the chord of the 6-4 on C is taken after the common chord of A, to lead back to the key of F. This, however, is a matter of taste.

No. 6, "Vola, Vola," is another arietta in the same key, of a character somewhat more tender and gracious, if we may be permitted the word. The accompaniment consists entirely of distributed chords effectively imitating the harp. The theme is the venerable one of a lover who wafts a sigh over mountains and seas, as a poetical sign of love and constancy for his mistress.

In conclusion, this recueil of songs is to be welcomed, as a valuable addition to the vocal music of the drawing-room. As a series of pleasant bagatelles, from the pen of a musician who rarely descends to trifles, their influence will probably serve as an antidote to the poison—we use the word thinkingly—which, in the shape of what are termed "sentimental ballads," does so much harm to the musical community.

"POOR ROSALIE," Ballad—MEYERBEER.—Hammond.

Here we have Meyerbeer in the very school we have been condemning. "Poor Rosalie" is a sentimental ballad; but the taste and musical feeling of the great dramatic composer has invested it with a grace for which we find no parallel among sentimental ballads in ordinary. The theme is a lament for "Poor Rosalie," who loses her husband by the cruel hand of death, on her absolute wedding day. Poor Rosalie! We are indebted to her, nevertheless, for the plaintive melody and unpretending accompaniment of Meyerbeer, who has painted her sorrows with true and unaffected expression.

"BRILLIANT GALOP"—For the Pianoforte.—J. R. LING.—Joseph Williams.

A lively well-marked galop, which, besides being a good dance tune, is a useful practice for octaves in the right hand, and skips of chords in the left.

"LA VIVANDIERE"—Polka—Jullien & Co.

Whoever wrote this anonymous polka, it opens with a short introduction, which reminds us strongly of the "Light of other days." Whoever wrote this polka, the first theme, in semiquavers, is exceedingly pretty and catching; but the trio, in quavers, is so like it in character, that a certain monotony is the consequence. Whoever wrote this polka has made the mistake of pitching his introduction, first subject, trio and coda all in one key—A flat. Four pages of A flat, without intermission, tonic and dominant, is enough to damage a nicer polka than "La Vivandiere"—and there are few nicer in their way, but for this one defect.

"THE CUCKOO GALOP"—GUNGEL—Henry Distin.

This is a galop in E, for piano and cornet-à-pistons, emulating the peculiar note of the bird of which it bears the name, with echos. For the kind of thing it affects to be, it is very good. It does not pretend to much originality, and, indeed, it would require the fancy of a Mendelssohn to get anything new out of such a theme. The cuckoo has been fairly exhausted, plucked of all his plumes—died, and was buried long ago, like Cock Robin. Who killed him? Signor Vivaldi, who wasted him to a shadow in his famous Cuckoo Concerto. His ghost hovered, with a sweet note, on the banks of a rivulet, in Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, since which even his manes have disappeared from the land of harmony—until now, Mr. Gungel, with the aid of a piano and cornet-à-pistons, has striven to invoke his spirit back, in a galop—with how much success we leave to the decision of our readers, to whom we recommend the present lively dance, as worthy of consideration, without reference to cuckoos, past, present, or to come, or to any other bird, beast, fish, insect, animalcule, or atomy. What's in a name?

"THE NONPAREIL QUADRILLES."—H. Tolhurst.—C. Jefferys.

"Nonpareil" is a bold title, since it insinuates no less than that Mr. Tolhurst's Quadrilles have no parallel on the face of the music shelf. Without according this absolute supremacy of merit, we accord that the quadrilles of Mr. Tolhurst are well arranged for four hands, and make a lively duet. The first figure, in A minor (we admire the composer who sets off with his "Pantalon" in the minor key), is bold and stirring. The second, in F, offers some difficulties to the performer on the left, who must supply ready fingers for the bass to the counter theme in C. No. 3, "La Poule," is flowing, after the manner of Poules. No. 4, in C, is a vigorous "Trenise," and would be the best figure of the lot, but for No. 5, in A, which is better. Here the player on the right must mind his P's and Q's; otherwise the triplet variation, in semiquavers, is likely to lead him into a brilliant fiasco. We repeat, the Nonpareil Quadrilles, without being nonpareil, constitute a very lively piece of dance music, à quatre mains.

"COME TO ME,"—Canzonet for voice and piano. John Barnett. Wessel and Co.

Mr. John Barnett cannot be dismissed with a line, although the crowded state of our columns reduces us to the necessity of confining our observations to as few words as are consistent with his pretensions and our own good-will. The theme of the words of this canzonet is grave, and treats of graves. Living sisters bewail the loss of a sister deceased. Such a theme is not uncongenial to the expressive qualities of Mr. Barnett's music, and, in setting it to harmonized melody, the popular composer of the Mountain Sylph has not descended beneath his ordinary level, which means that he has written something quite beyond the commonplace, if not remarkable for extraordinary depth, or frappante originality. The key of the song is A flat, the key of expression par excellence, and the key in which Mr. John Barnett has pight some of the most beautiful of his vocal pieces. The opening symphony is graceful, and in line 2 the transition into F flat—which, were the notation other (E, for example) would be enharmonic—and back again to A flat, by the 6-4, is one of those favourite points of Spohr which Mr. John Barnett has so often and so felicitously appropriated to himself. The melody of the first part of the canzonet is low and plaintive; low, because written for a contralto voice; plaintive, because the subject is plaintive. The harmonization of this is at once rich and pure—qualities not always found together. The second part, which modulates from A flat into B major, is less to our liking. At page 3, bars 2, 3, in the symphony, we thoroughly object to the chord of the 6-3, on B natural, passing to that of the 6-5-3, on B flat. The effect is neither natural nor pleasing. This is redeemed, however, in the same page, by a flowing symphony of gracefully distributed arpeggios, in the key of A flat minor, on a dominant pedal, finely harmonized, while the elaboration of the accompaniment in semiquavers, at the reprise of the theme in the major, is skilful and highly finished, and the development of the whole in the coda exceedingly beautiful.

We can recommend this canzonet as one of the best of Mr. John Barnett's vocal compositions for the chamber, and that is not saying a little. Miss Dolby's name is on the title-page, and we recommend the publisher not to take it off; Miss Dolby's name is a forerunner of popularity, and her voice the sure road to public appreciation. This canzonet forms No. 52 of the British Vocal Album, one of the richest collections of compositions for the voice, by English writers, ever published.

LIVERPOOL.—The boys in connexion with the Collegiate Institution gave their annual concert on Tuesday evening, in the presence of about 1,500 auditors.—Liverpool Mail, June 21.

FIDELIO AND CRUVELLI.

Honour to who the sceptre wields
That threads thy mystic score,
And bears us thro' its mazy fields
With such unerring lore.

Honour to her whose chaste'n'd strain,
So tender and so true,
Gives us that melody again
In its own pristine hue!

No frantic or convulsive strife,
But deeper, purer, tone,
Pours the sad heart-stricken wife,
In grandeur all her own.

Her accents patient and divine,
Now to Heav'n's footstool tower,
Now dive into the unsounded mine
Of passion's deepest power.

Oh, wondrous mind that couldst impart
Such sweet and lofty thought,
Inspired by feeling for thine art,
That never can be taught!

KATHARINE F. CARTWRIGHT.

CRUVELLI'S FIDELIO.

On Saturday night Fidelio was again performed to a fashionable and crowded audience. The demand for boxes and stalls had, we understood, been so great as to continue long after the last place at the disposal of the direction had been allotted. Mdlle. Cruvelli again triumphantly vindicated her reputation, and by her fire, vigour, and brilliancy aroused a series of plaudits, which descended in volleys, rather than in the milder form of showers, throughout the opera. She was called for at the end of each act, and renewed and enthusiastic cheering marked the audiences' sense of the genius she evinced in the difficult personation she achieves in so masterly a manner. The arrangements for the season will, it is announced, prevent her appearing more than once again in the part of Fidelio for a considerable time, and the night which for the present terminates the triumphant run of the opera is that of Thursday next. The assemblage of such an audience as that of Saturday night, to witness an opera the success of which depends so little upon outward adornments, or upon strong dramatic interest, and so essentially upon the attraction of first-class music adequately executed and illustrated by exquisite acting, is no unsatisfactory sign of the progress which musical taste has made in England; a taste which, it is just to remember, must have been fostered chiefly by the continuous presentment of works of the superior class at an establishment with the artistic resources of a grand house.

Morning Chronicle

The triumphant run of Fidelio continues, and not even during the height of the Lind fever was Her Majesty's Theatre more crowded than it was on Saturday evening. Every portion of the house was crammed, and many were compelled to leave the theatre before the commencement of the performances for want of space for their accommodation. Mdlle. Sofie Cruvelli was in superb voice, and the brilliancy of her singing, with the impassioned fire and exquisite pathos of her acting, excited her audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. At the conclusion of each act she was called on and greeted with the most rapturous cheering, while ever and anon during the course of the performance the delight of the audience would burst forth in a hurricane of plaudits, the genuine and irrepressible expression of a heartfelt admiration. We regret to learn that the arrangements of the theatre will only permit this opera to be repeated once more for some weeks, viz., Thursday next.

Sun

Dramatic Intelligence.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—FRENCH PLAYS.—The part of Hermione, in Racine's tragedy of Andromaque, was the first played by Mdlle. Rachel in England, and that which laid the foundation of the high reputation she has since attained. Although the character is not considered her best, there is no other in the whole range of her repertoire which exhibits a more striking evidence of her great power of discrimination and her faculty of individualizing her conceptions by a succession of delicate shadows of expression. In other parts the artiste may please the general public more, but in Hermione she satisfies the critic more particularly by the completeness of her delineation. The character requires to be studied and meditated. The intention is not self-evident from the commencement; we are in doubt as to the author's intentions; the motives of action are of a more complex nature and require the deepest knowledge of the human heart. Mdlle. Rachel's bursts of rage, her expressions of hatred, her sarcastic sallies perplex and puzzle us, and it is only in the last act that we are fully enlightened and arrive at a complete conception of the real nature of the personage, and thus fully appreciate the picture drawn by the actress; then we discover that her portraiture of the abandoned princess is one of the most ably conceived and consummately artistic performances the stage has seen. Mademoiselle Rachel is, perhaps, more finished in the part of Hermione than in any other of her impersonations. The all-forgiving, ever-hopeful love cherished, in spite of the malignant anger and wild projects of revenge in which her wounded pride and slighted affection find vent, was powerfully indicated by Mademoiselle Rachel. The uncertain smile which, from time to time, plays upon her lips, in the early scenes, in the midst of her furious railings and bitter invectives were admirably in keeping with the character. When reproaching Oreste for having obeyed her commands she exclaims:—

"Oh! fallait-il en croire une amante insensée!
Ne devais-tu pas lire au fond de ma pensée."

Hope having at last abandoned her, and the object of her love and hatred being lost to her for ever, despair was terribly depicted in her countenance. Every feature became distorted and quivered with strong emotion, and the expression of horror and disgust with which she left the stage, after overwhelming Oreste with a torrent of imprecations, was one of those portraitures of intense tragic power impossible to describe, but which leave an expression never to be forgotten.

On Monday last Mr. Soumet's play of Jeanne d'Arc was performed for the first time these five years. As we said, on the occasion of its first production, we now repeat, that the piece itself is utterly unworthy of the great tragédienne. Indeed, we have rarely seen a tragedy so utterly devoid of interest, from the sheer incompetence betrayed by the author in the most simple elements of his craft. The theory of the unities was certainly an enormous difficulty in his way; yet a better command of language, a more correct versification, a slight insight into the secrets of dramatic effect, a little energy,—would have done much to remove that difficulty, and to give an individuality to his personages in which at present they are destitute. The Maid of Orleans is little better than a sketch; and if the picture in our minds, after seeing Made-moiselle Rachel's impersonation, had aught of form or colour, we are indebted to the poetical genius of the actress, and in no wise to the author, who has done his best to degrade her to the vulgarest level. The character of Bedford is quite the reverse of what we have hitherto been accustomed to consider the valiant regent of England. That of the young Duke of Burgundy, Philippe le Bon, as he was called, is a simple bully. In the whole play there is but one scene which possesses the least dramatic interest—the interview between Jeanne d'Arc and Burgundy—when the heroine attempts to convert the Duke to the French cause. In many of these passages Made-moiselle Rachel rises to the level of her highest inspirations. The eagerness with which she pours forth her arguments, alternately rebuking and exhorting her antagonist; her anxious glance—her supplicating posture—her extended arms—her inspired accent, as if she would transfuse her own conviction into her adversary, and the burst of triumph with which she at last exclaims, "Ah! je lis dans ce cœur, qu'il redevient fidele," strongly captivated the attention of the audience, and were listened to with intense eagerness. In Rachel's performance of this part there is, as in all her characters, a well sustained individuality. The poet has had no hand in Rachel's Jeanne d'Arc. It is entirely her own creation. The characteristic points are broadly marked, the image of the maiden warrior admirably portrayed. There is a restless wildness in the expression of the eye, indicative of the inward working of the soul, as in her captivity she reverts to her childhood, to the days of her communion with her spiritual monitors, or to the more recent scenes of war. In the midst of all these emotions we have continually before our eyes her inflexible firmness of faith in her divine mission. It is impossible to conceive a more beautiful picture than that presented by Madlle. Rachel, when, in the last scene, she mounts the funeral pile, grasping her banner, her eyes uplifted in ecstatic devotion, her face radiant with divine inspiration. The effect produced was such as can never be erased from the memory. We were almost inclined to forgive the author his piece, and be grateful that he had afforded at least a pretence for this divine picture, thus adding a new character to the already numerous conceptions of Made-moiselle Rachel.

J. DE C—.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—Mr. Hacket, the American comedian, who made his debut a year or two ago at this theatre made his rentrée on Tuesday evening in the character of Falstaff in the Merry Wives of Windsor. Mr. Hacket has many qualifications for the part, his reading is correct, and his vis comica unexceptionable: he received many hearty bursts of applause in the course of the evening, and he made a decidedly favorable impression on the audience. Mrs. Fitzwilliam and Miss Reynolds were full of spirit and gaiety as the "merry wives." Mr. Davenport was excellent in Ford, and Buckstone made the audience "roar again," as Master Slender. The other characters were respectably filled. We are happy to say the houses have been excellent during the week.

OLYMPIC.—Those who love rustic grace and vivacity, combined with impassioned simplicity and feeling, should go and see Mrs. Stirling in Mark Leman's piece, Hearts are Trumps, which has been played here in the course of the week, and which, unquestionably in a great measure, owes its long career of success to the charming personation of the heroine by this lady, who, moreover, looks as young and handsome as ever she did. Of the new holiday piece, The Devil and Doctor Faustus, we have but little to say; the subject is rather threadbare. The story differs somewhat from the usual versions—the compact of Faustus with the Demons of Darkness is imaginary only, the whole having been contrived by a sort of titular Angel of the Doctor's who, after informing him that she has been "playing the devil" with him to point out the errors of his ways, dismisses him with a good-natured injunction to go and mend them. The scenery and appointments are appropriate and splendid, and the piece does not want recommendations to the holiday folks. Miss Fielding, who enacts the devil, is a clever actress of the Vestris school, and Mr. Henry Farren, who is a better melo-dramatic actor than we thought him, makes a good Faustus, but as the piece is unsupported either by the talents of Compton or Mrs. Stirling, or by the beauty of Louisa Howard, it dragged somewhat to our refined critical faculties (confound them, that we can no longer see on these occasions with a school-boy's vision). However, if the piece drags, it also draws, and so away with wire drawn objections and hypercritical analyses. The new farce of The Fast Coach has been written to introduce Mr. Compton as a mendicant trader, assuming the character of coach—i. e. tutor to a young Cantab. In both personations, he is, of course, supremely comical. The house was very well filled. G.

(Omitted last week.)

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

ON Saturday Fidelio (eighth time), attracted an immense house. Cruvelli was as great as ever in Leonora. The charming Marie Taglioni, also, who made her first appearance this season, added to the attractions. The old and popular ballet, La Sylphide, or rather a fragment of it, was revived for the occasion, and put upon the stage with excellent effect. We have seldom seen any thing of the kind, even at Her Majesty's Theatre, prettier or more effective than the grouping and dancing of the choregraphs in the different pas des Sylphides. Marie Taglioni was received with genuine warmth. That she is immensely improved is the general impression, and that she has acquired strength, ease, grace, and decision, since last season, none, we think, can deny. Some of her steps on Saturday night, were novel and curious, and excited the admiration of the dilettanti. Marie Taglioni was greatly successful, and was honoured with a recall and a bouquet at the fall of the curtain.

On Tuesday the immortal Barbiere was given, but demands no remark beyond the affirmation that the music of Rossini is much better when not interfered with by the singers, who usually take such unmerciful liberties with it. The "Ah! qual colpo" trio, as sung on Tuesday night, is a good instance of the injury done to Rossini's music by not adhering to the score. The opera in general was well performed. La Sylphide followed.

Il Prodigio was repeated on Wednesday—a Grand Extra Night—and Fidelio (ninth time) on Thursday, with a divertissement for Amalia Ferraris; Gnecco's comic operetta, La Prova d'un Opera Seria, for Madame Ugalde and Lablache; and La Sylphide. Cruvelli was absolutely grander and more magnificent than ever in Leonora on Thursday, and Beethoven's music was listened to with a keener relish than ever, and with more thorough appreciation. Madame Ugalde made a decided impression in the heroine of La Prova by the esprit of her acting, and the astonishing manner in which she executed the florid music. In the introduced French cavatina, especially, she created a furor, and was recalled after her exit. The rossignol of the Opera Comique has established her reputation with the English public beyond the shadow of a dispute.

Last night Il Prodigio was again given, and to-night Cruvelli is announced for Norma, being her last appearance in that character this season.

Thalberg's new opera, entitled, Florinda; or the Moors in Spain, will be produced on Thursday, being a Subscription night in lieu of Saturday, which is a command night, when the Queen and Court will visit the theatre in state. The most splendid preparations are being made for the reception of Her Majesty and suite. A number of boxes on the grand tier and on the tier above will be taken to form one grand State Box, which will be magnificently furnished and decorated.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA

The tide of prosperity is evidently setting in for the Italian operas. For the last three weeks the houses at this theatre have been invariably good, and on Saturday evening, as might have been expected—the occasion being the first performance of Meyerbeer's great work, the Prophète, and the first appearance this season of Madame Pauline Viardot Garcia, the original representative of the part of Fides, both in Paris and London—a short time after the doors were open there was no standing room, and hundreds were sent away disappointed. While the old repertoire continues to be so attractive Mr. Gye may well exclaim "What have I to do with novelty?"

The distribution of characters in the Prophète was, with one exception, the same as last year. That exception, however, was important, and it is only just to say that the assistance of the new tenor, Signor Stigelli, in the part of Jonas, gave a weight and decision to the music of the three Anabaptists which it has not previously enjoyed in London. Herr Formes, as Zacharia, fulfills every requisite, vocal and histrionic; and a more competent artist than Signor Polonini could not easily be found for the part of Mathisen. The trio in the tent of Jean of Leyden, for Jonas, Zacharia, and Oberthal (Signor Tagliafico), was executed, for the first time in our remembrance, with the proper spirit. Each of the three artists did his best, the music of the several parts was distinctly heard, and the dramatic interest admirably sustained throughout. Meyerbeer himself, the most difficult and exacting of composers, would, we think, have been satisfied with the manner in which this trio (considered by musicians the finest piece in the opera), was performed.

The event of the evening was, of course, the re-appearance of Madame Viardot, whose flattering reception proved the high esteem in which she is held by the English public. Fides, in the hands of this talented actress and experienced singer, is one of the most elaborate performances of the modern stage. Sympathising with the peculiarity of Meyerbeer's music, Madame Viardot gives importance to every phrase, every word she has to utter; and yet, amidst the extreme labour bestowed upon details, she contrives to create a general impression which stamps her idea of the character with unanswerable consistency. Her conception of Fides, indeed, presents no room for cavil; the picture she draws, though gloomy, is grand; though monotonous, is earnest and impressive. True, it is impossible not to be conscious that Madame Viardot is acting; since none can deny that deep study, rather than impulsive genius, is the secret of the effect she produces. Without genius, and without those endowments of voice and grace of movement and gesture which too often make up the sum of attractions in popular dramatic singers, Madame Viardot has effected wonders by the aid of art alone. She is, in fact, the most consummate of artists, and herein lies the difference between her and her great sister, Malibran, to compare her with whom would be absurd. The monotony complained of in Madame Viardot's impersonation of Fides—which not to own would argue a want of perception, or a desire to shirk criticism—is derived from her execution, not from her conception of the character. This was apparent on Saturday night, when the dramatic "points" were brought out in stronger relief than on former occasions; and as, on the other hand, the voice of the singer, never very remarkable for freshness and power, though preserving its compass, has somewhat deteriorated in those qualities since last season, an air of artifice and effort was evident which fatigued both the eye and the ear. It has been observed of Madame Viardot, and with truth, that her first performances of a new character are invariably the best. Her admirable judgment and intelligence always help her to a just conception; but what she does well at the outset, anxious to do better as she progresses, she too frequently overdoes, and thus lays herself open to the charge of exaggeration. Those who remember the Prophète in 1849, when it was originally produced at the Royal Italian Opera, if their memory served them, must have remarked several examples of what we adduce in Saturday evening's performance. To pass over minor matters, let us at once go to the grand situation of the opera, the scene in Munster Cathedral, where the coronation of Jean of Leyden, the prophet, is celebrated. Madame Viardot excels in the portraiture of deep and absorbing grief; and this has been the abiding charm of her acting in the scene we have named. But, by force of continual elaboration, of anxiety to improve that which was perfect at the beginning, she has run the risk of outstepping the limits of natural expression. Her anguish at beholding her son, in the person of the impostor she has hated and despised, was less inward and deep-seated than outward and vehement; she seemed to suffer from the influence of physical pain rather than bow under the weight of mental affliction. Her gestures were overstrained, and what she had to say or do she took so long, at times, in saying and doing that the interest was in danger of evaporating before the point had been gained. Be it observed that these exaggerations are not to be viewed as the exaggerations of a young artist, whose impulse occasionally overleaps her means of performance, but of one long practised to the stage, a thorough mistress of her resources, who has nothing to be taught in the mechanism of her calling. They must, therefore, be attributed to errors in taste, and are the more to be lamented.

As a vocalist, Madame Viardot must be cited among the most extraordinary the art has known. By dint of singular perseverance, aided by a strong musical organization, and an acquaintance with the theory and practice of music very unusual in singers, she has subdued nature to her will, and reduced an ungrateful voice, wanting alike in volume, power, and sweetness, to absolute submission. Madame Viardot can do anything with her voice, and is equally a mistress of the cantabile and bravura—of which the two pathetic airs, in F sharp and E minor ("O Figlio mio," and "Pietà, Pietà, Signori"), and the grand recitative air, and cabaletta, in A flat, of the last act ("O fero mio destino") may be cited as proofs. Her facility is prodigious, and the ease with which she mingles the higher and lower registers of the voice, in her cadenzas, although sometimes abused as a medium of effect, cannot be too much admired. A fault of her cantabile singing is that it is occasionally overdrawn, while her cadenzas (instance those introduced on Saturday night, in the airs—"O Figlio mio" and "Pietà, Pietà, Signori") are not always in good keeping. Her execution of bravura music has no drawback except want of power in the upper notes; but for this nature must be blamed, and not Madame Viardot, who has acquired all that art can disclose to conceal or palliate the deficiency. One fine quality in her declamatory singing is the clear and distinct manner in which she articulates the words, wherein alone she resembles Malibran. On Saturday night, the air, "Pietà, Pietà"—in which Fides asks alms for her son, whom she supposes dead, and wishes to propitiate Heaven, by masses, in his behalf—developed this quality to admiration. But for a cadenza, too quaint and elaborate for a theme so simple and essentially pathetic, it would, have been perfect. Her crowning effort, however, was the scene and air of the last act, in which Fides first curses and then offers up prayers for the Prophet. As a display of powerful execution this was quite masterly; and the effect it produced would have been redoubled could Madame Viardot have sung it with less of that restless and continual movement to and fro, and that superabundance of emphatic gesture, with which she accompanied almost every successive phrase.

Signor Mario has now almost entirely regained his powers, and his performance of the part of Jean of Leyden was as powerful and splendid as it has ever been. If we wished to establish the truth of our criticism upon Madame Viardot by an example in which the absence of the peculiarities we ascribe is remarkable, we need only point to Mario, who, in the coronation scene, attains the very height of dramatic expression by the easiest and most natural means. His demeanour when bending over Fides, with arms outstretched to perform the supposed miracle, was perfect. The face alone, with silent eloquence, told the story of the feelings that must have inwardly racked the heart of the Prophet. There were no convulsive starts, no superfluous gestures; a trembling of the whole frame was enough to convey the emotion of the actor. The sudden courage when, having asked the question of Fides—"Tuo figlio io son?" he approaches the Anabaptists, unshrinking from the contact of their threatening weapons, was assumed with a majesty of presence and a severity of regard that showed the Prophet fit to wear a crown. The tones of Mario's voice, in the alternate questions to his mother and appeals to the Anabaptists, had a sweetness and solemnity of which we can recollect no parallel. His singing throughout the opera was exceedingly fine; the narration of his dream to the Anabaptists, and the graceful air which follows, "Un impero più soave" (Act 1-2), were beautifully given. But it was not till the scene in the camp, where Jean of Leyden quells the discontent of his turbulent followers, by promising to lead them on to Munster, that Mario put forth all his full powers. Up to this point, perhaps doubtful of his thorough convalescence, he husbanded his resources. We have rarely heard a more magnificent example of declamatory singing than the prayer and chorus, ending with the powerful appeal of the Prophet—"Re del cielo e de beati,"—which brings down the curtain on the second act with such brilliant effect, and on Saturday first roused the public to an expression of enthusiasm, terminating in a unanimous recall for Mario. Of the coronation scene we have said enough. The last act, with the exception of Madame Viardot's air, was as prosy and tiresome as ever, until the final scene, where the Prophet, in despair at the death of Bertha, his affianced bride, dooms himself and his enemies to one common destruction at a banquet. Here occurs the famous bacchanal, "Beviam, e intorno giri," the first verse of which, though well sung and much applauded, was not entirely up to the mark; but the second surpassed in force and energy any previous effort of Mario in this favourite air. The volume of tone he produced was only equalled by its beauty, and the spirit with which the sparkling tune was delivered completely carried the audience by storm, and there was a loud demand for a repetition from all parts of the house, which, however, Mr. Costa had the good taste and decision to check by immediately proceeding with the subsequent music.

To the general execution of the opera we have little but praise to award. Madame Castellan exhibited her accustomed intelligence and energy in the part of Bertha, and sang the aria of the first scene (interpolated by Meyerbeer, expressly on her account, when Madame Castellan first undertook the part at Paris) with brilliant facility. The chorus was admirable, and the "All' armi!" assisted by the powerful bass of Formes, and the piercing tones of Stigelli, the tenor, was executed with great force and precision. The band played superbly, and Mr. Costa, whose appearance in the orchestra was hailed with genuine applause, was entirely in his element. In the skating scene some curtailment is advisable, which, as it arrests the progress of the drama considerably would do no harm. The opening chorus, where the Anabaptists are engaged in menacing the prisoners with threats that lead to nothing, is burdened with such a silly and unmeaning stage action that its loss would be unfelt; while the dancing, except in the case of the clever and active Mademoiselle Louise Taglioni, not being first-rate, might reasonably be abridged. The coronation in the cathedral presented the usual pomp and splendour, and although there appears to be a diminution in the ranks of the supernumeraries, the general effect cannot be said to suffer from their absence.—Times.

On Tuesday the Prophète was to be repeated, but owing to Sig. Mario having a sore throat Don Giovanni was substituted, and on Thursday the chef d'œuvre of Mozart was repeated, on both occasions the house being crowded. To-night Norma and the last act of Fidelio will be given.

The opera commanded by Her Majesty for the State attendance at this theatre is Mozart's Zauberflöte (Il Flauto Magico), which will include Grisi, Mario, Formes, Ronconi, Stigelli, Castellan, Bertrandi, and Mdlle. Anna Zerr (who is expressly engaged to perform the part of the Queen of Night) in the cast.

Original Correspondence.

THE LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY AND PRIZE ANTHEMS.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

20th June, 1851.

Sir,—I have waited anxiously, and carefully read your paper for some weeks past, to ascertain if any reply had been vouchsafed to my inquiries respecting the prizes proposed to be given by this Society for Orchestral Anthems.

The evasive reply of F. I. S., shown by your next week's correspondent (Honestas) to be untrue in spirit, if not in letter, coupled with the absence of any further explanation, leads me to the conclusion, that there is really no intention on the part of the Society to offer the prizes in question.

Your readers, and the profession generally, will properly appreciate the spirit actuating the directors of this institution in thus trifling with the feelings of English composers, for the sake of a little notoriety.

I merely add, that if want of funds should be put forward hereafter, as an excuse for such conduct, that the sums spent in trying to puff into ephemeral notice the Psalm Tunes so constantly advertised as "REHEARSED" at the Monday meetings, would have much more than sufficed to carry out the original expressed intention.

I am, Sir, Yours,

A CHURCH MUSICIAN.

WEIPPERT AND BOSISIO.
(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

21, Soho Square, June 23rd, 1851.

Sir,—In a paragraph of the Musical World, published last Saturday, the 21st instant, it is stated that M. Bosisio has arrived from Paris for the purpose of conducting Mr. Weippert's band. I have certainly effected an engagement with the above Artiste to "lead my band," but I still retain to myself the conductorship of my own band, which I think you will admit is natural enough. Apologising for the intrusion upon your space and time.

I have the honor to remain,

Your obedient servant,

21, Soho Square.

JOHN WEIPPERT.

Provincial.

DUBLIN.—Her Excellency the Countess of Clarendon, accompanied by her interesting children the Ladies Alice, Constance, and Emily Villiers (pupils of Miss Allen), honoured the academy of Mrs. Allen, Gardiner's-row, with a third visit on Thursday afternoon, the 12th instant. The Viceregal party arrived at a quarter-past three o'clock, and remained until six, during which time the following selection of music was admirably rendered by the young ladies under tuition at the academy:—

Elementary performance, comprising a selection of lessons from the "First Companion and its Sequel," played simultaneously, and interspersed with alternate solos	J. B. Logier.
Variations Elegantes (Eerin, No. 1)	Herz.
Military Duet in E flat—simultaneously, by twenty performers	J. B. Logier.
Duet, March from "The Prophet"	Meyerbeer.
Blue Bell of Scotland, with variations, simultaneously, and with alternate solos	J. B. Logier.
Valse Duet—"Les jolies filles de parmes"	Schubert.
Homage à Schubert (No. 14), "The Postman's horn is sounding near," simultaneously	Heller.
Fantasia on the national airs of "God save the Queen" and "Rule Britannia"	Thalberg.
Reminiscences de Beethoven, simultaneously	Rosellen.
Fantasia on the Prayer in "Moseé in Egitto"	Thalberg.
The Wedding March, from "The Midsummer Night's Dream," simultaneously	Mendelssohn.
Fantasia on subjects from Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor"	Prudent.
Triumphal March, simultaneously, by twenty performers	Reis.
Grand Concertante Quartet for four pianofortes (as performed in London by Czerny, Moscheles, Pixis, and Thalberg)	Czerny.

WESTON.—OPENING OF A NEW ORGAN.—Two full services took place on Wednesday, the 25th inst., at St. John's Church, Weston, on the occasion of the opening of the organ which has been erected in that edifice. The sermons were preached by the Rev. Edward Tottenham and the Rev. H. M. Searth. The organ has been built by Mr. Clark, of Monmouth-place in this city, and it possesses the purity of tone and excellence of mechanism which characterize the instruments of the builder.

Miscellaneous.

MISS BASSANO AND MR. KUHE.—These well-known and highly esteemed professors, respectively of the vocal and instrumental art, gave their annual concert in conjunction on Tuesday morning last, at the Hanover Square Rooms, to an audience crowded to inconvenience. Gallantry dictates that we should first speak of the lady. Miss Bassano has now for some years occupied a distinguished position among our native vocalists. Her style is varied, her voice mellow and flexible, partaking somewhat of the contralto quality (without its weight), though strictly speaking belonging to a mezzo-soprano category. On the present occasion Miss Bassano sang three times, Meyerbeer's aria, "Pieta, pieta," (Prophete) Rossini's cavatina, "Penso alla Patria," and a ballad by Angelina in all of which she evinced the best qualities of expression and facility, giving to each its appropriate colouring, adding nothing, subtracting nothing, and obtaining the hearty applause of her audience, to which well-directed efforts, agreeable manner, pure and telling voice, and practical experience in the art vocal fully entitled her. Herr Kuhe has steadily won himself a name and a reputation in this country. He came over originally with Herr Pischek, in 1846, on a joint speculation. The singer succeeded, and returned to his own country with money-bags. The pianist did little, or nothing, and returned to his own country unconsolate. It was not till later that the beneficent Jenny Lind, the nightingale of Swedeland, took Herr Kuhe under the shadow of her wings, gave a concert for him in fatherland, and changed the fortunes of the zealous and intelligent pianist. From that moment his star began to rise. He came to England, and accompanied Jenny Lind to Brighton, and there laid the foundation of a connection which has since been consolidated to one of most honourable and lucrative enjoyed by any professor in the provinces. Herr Kuhe makes an annual visit to London during the season. On the present occasion he wisely united his interest with that of the popular artist whose talents we have just been criticising. Since we first heard Herr Kuhe his progress as a pianist has been indeed remarkable. On Tuesday morning he performed, with Ernst, the andante and variations from Beethoven's sonata in A minor, and two well written fantasias of his own composition, one on airs from the Prophete, and another on airs from Flotow's Martha. Herr Kuhe played admirably, and exhibited a firm touch, round tone, and great brilliancy of execution. He was loudly applauded in all his pieces. The other performers were Ernst, Piatti, Madame Parish a vocal, Catherine Hayes, Miss Birch, Mdle. Johannsen, Herr Stigelli, Signor Marchesi, and Herr Stockhauser, all of vocal besides the andante from Beethoven's sonata with which he introduced his fantasia on Hungarian airs magnificently, and Piatti introduced a violoncello fantasia with extraordinary success. Catherine Hayes was in splendid voice, and sang Meyerbeer's "Ah! mon fils," with immense effect. She also gave a ballad by Biletta with irresistible expression. In brief—the concert was a first-rate one, and appeared to satisfy everybody.

ON SATURDAY last, June 21st, Miss E. Day and Mr. J. Day gave a matinée musicale at the New Beethoven Rooms, Queen-Anne-st., which was fashionably and fully attended. The concert commenced with a trio by Silas, well executed by the beneficiaries and Herr Hausmann; and, after a duet from the Italiana in Algeri, Mr. Richardson delighted his auditory with a solo on Siccam's Diatonic flute. The composition was remarkable for its simplicity, while the variations gave ample scope to the author and performer for the most brilliant execution, and we only regret that so pretty a composition has not yet been baptised or published. Mr. Adolph Gallmick's grand fantasia on the pianoforte was deservedly applauded, and Mr. John Day's solo on the violin was most ably executed, although the music, a sort of Turkish Dance, was not of the happiest selection. Great credit is due to both these gentlemen for the manner in which they conducted the concert, and for the selection given. Mr. Hausmann's violoncello solo was beautifully executed, evincing a delicacy of fingering, which even in these times of prodigies and wonders in the musical world, elicited the most hearty applause. The vocal performances were not equal to the instrumental, but Grisis, Cruvellis, Albonis and Sontags are not to be met with every day; but justice compels us to say that Miss Laura Baxter and Mdle. Graumann sang very nicely. Signor Marchesi gave Mozart's "Non piu Andrai" in a spirited manner. Miss Ellen Day performed several times on the pianoforte in her usually brilliant style.

HERR KAUFFMANN AND SON, from Dresden, gave the first of a series of three musical performances on Tuesday evening last, at St. Martin's Hall, when they introduced for the first time in this country their newly-invented instruments called the Harmonichord, the Orchestrion, the Symphonium, the Chordaulodion, and the Trumpet Automaton. Herr Kaufermann played on the harmonichord, which is the only one of the instruments that is not self-acting, and attracted in a remarkable degree the attention of his audience. The orchestration was then made to perform selections from Azor and Zemira, Judas Maccabeus, and Don Juan, during the course of which the different effects produced in an orchestra by means of the flute, flageolet, cornet, trumpet, bassoon, and kettle drums, were made apparent in an extraordinary manner, so much so, indeed, that it was difficult for the hearer to believe that the real instruments were not being played upon. The chordaulodion is an instrument combining the qualities of a piano with that of a wind instrument (the flute), and the symphonium that of a flute, piccolo, clarinet, and the cymbals and drums, are both of them remarkable and pleasing specimens of mechanical ingenuity. The trumpet automaton must also be noted for its singular purity of tone. Herr Kaufermann's second performance has been postponed to the 30th of June, as Her Majesty commanded him to perform last night at the palace. We recommend admirers of the ingenious of mechanism to pay a visit to Herr Kaufermann's exhibition.

MR. BENSON.—The evening concert of this clever vocalist took place at the Beethoven Rooms, on June 18th. A highly attractive programme was provided. Two of our most distinguished pianists, viz:—Sterndale Bennett and Lindsay Sloper, assisting in conjunction with Mr. Willy, violin; Mr. Lucas, violoncello; and Mr. Richardson, flute. Mr. Benson's singing was characterised by all the sweetness of tone that we have frequently remarked as being the attributes of his vocalization; and he met on this occasion with the full approbation of the audience, who testified their pleasure by the frequency and liberality of their applause. It is needless to remark now on the beauty of Sterndale Bennett's playing, and the neatness of Lindsay Sloper's execution. Suffice it, they played with their accustomed excellence, and received with their coadjutors, Mr. Willy and M. Rousselot, the frequent commendation of the company, which was as elegant and numerous as could be approached.

FR. LUDWIG STROFFREGEN, gave a concert on Friday evening last week, at the Beethoven Rooms, which was well attended. The beneficiaire sang two German songs and took part in a quartet by Hiller, and in the "Ribbon" trio of Mozart. Mdlle. Rummel sustained her reputation as an excellent vocalist; and Herr Oberthur received great applause for his execution of a charming little study for the harp, entitled "La Cascade." Herr J. Rummel conducted.

MISS KATE LODGE.—We omitted to state last week that the concert of this talented pianiste composer announced for the 14th inst., was postponed in consequence of the death of a near relation.

MESSRS. H. AND R. BLAGROVE'S second quartett and solo concert took place on Friday evening the 20th inst., at the concert rooms in Mortimer-street. It commenced with a MS. quartett by J. L. Ellerton, given in a spirited style by Messrs. H. Blagrove, Clementi, R. Blagrove, and J. Lucas, particularly the adagio and allegro agitato, which were very effective. Spohr's duett in E flat, for two violins, was played in a chaste and efficient manner by Messrs. H. Blagrove and Clementi, and Mr. R. Blagrove's solo on the concertina received much applause. Hummel's trio in E major for piano, violin, and violoncello, was a great treat. Herr Pauer's performance of the piano part was received with especial favour; he was ably supported by Messrs. H. Blagrove and Lucas. Miss Thornton sang Molique's charming little song, "Fair Annie," and Beethoven's "Beating Heart that stirs within Thee," in a pleasing and effective manner. The concert concluded with Beethoven's quartett, No. 11, in F minor, which was performed with force and decision, and gave the warmest satisfaction to the audience. The room was well attended.

MISS EMMA BUSBY'S MATINEE MUSICALE.—The matinee of this rising young artiste took place at the Beethoven Rooms on June 12th; want of space compelled us to postpone till now our record of the fact, for which apparent neglect, but real necessity, we offer our apologies to the fair beneficiaire. Miss Emma Busby's performance was such as to entitle her to high praise. Her improvement is very great since last year; and she promises to become eventually one of our best lady pianistes. The names in Miss Busby's programme were highly attractive—Herr Deichmann, who made so very favourable an impression at the National concerts, was the violinist. Signor Piatti, violoncellist, M. Tellefzen, a pianist of talent, Mdlle. Johannsen, a Danish, and Mdlle. Graumann, a German vocalist, both well known and admired by concert frequenters. The room was fashionably attended, and the concert gave entire satisfaction.

MR. FREDERICK CHATTERTON, who has the honour to be named Harpist to Her Majesty the Queen of the French (?), and to H.R.H. the Duchess of Gloucester, gave his seventeenth annual morning concert at Willis's Rooms, on June 17th. A crowded and fashionable audience assembled, and appeared highly delighted with the programme, a pleasure no doubt greatly enhanced by the announcement of the grand march, composed in honour of H.R.H. Prince Albert, to be played by twelve amateur ladies, pupils of Mr. Frederick Chatterton, on twelve of Erard's harps. The system of making pupils play in public, on an occasion like the present, we consider highly to be commended, as it gives them greater confidence, when performing before their friends at home, than otherwise they could possibly have, and thus tends to encrease the social enjoyment of the drawing-room, where music is now so indispensable an adjunct. The instrumentalists named in the programme, were, besides Mr. Frederick Chatterton, the Lockwood family (juvenile harpists, pupils of Mr. F. Chatterton), Mdlle. Coulon, the intelligent and clever pianiste, Miss Rosina Collins, M. Rousselot, Herr Goffrie, Signor Regondi, and Mr. Kialmark. The concert went off with considerable eclat, and Mr. Frederick Chatterton will have no cause to complain of want of support at the hands of his friends and patrons.

M. STANISLAS DAVID'S MATINEE.—M. David, well-known as an accomplished professor of the French language and literature, gave a Matinée on Wednesday, at Stafford-house, by permission of her Grace the Duchess of Sutherland. The entertainment consisted of recitals by M. David from some of the best poets, ancient and modern, of France, intermixed with performances on the pianoforte, by Mdlle. C. Meara, songs by Miss Catherine Hayes and M. Levassor, and a scene from Racine's Athalie, declaimed by Mdlle. Rachel. The audience was fashionable and numerous. M. David has a plain and sensible method of delivery, enunciates clearly, and gives due importance to points. One of the most successful of his efforts was the fable of the "Chat et le Cuisinier," by Viennet, which he gave with a simplicity of manner, and, so to speak, a bonhomie quite in keeping with its bucolic and primitive character. In the fable of the "Deux pigeons," by Lafontaine, he had to fight against the deep impression produced by Mdlle. Rachel, who recounts the same story in the play of Adrienne Lecouvreur. M. David, indeed, laboured under the effects of a very formidable opposition on Wednesday. Owing to the unexpected absence of Madame Viardot, who had been announced as the counter-attraction of the programme, M. David availed himself of the services of Mdlle. Rachel. This incomparable tragedian, by her dramatic and forcible declamation of the part of Athalie, in the scene where the heroine of Racine's tragedy encounters and questions Joas, her young and fated successor, made such a sensation that everything else in the shape of reading and recital appeared tame and insufficient. Nevertheless, in spite of the absorbing influence of the "Queen of Tragedy," M. David's attempts were received with great encouragement; while the clever performances of Mdlle. Meara, who played some of Chopin's studies on the piano, the irresistible drollery of M. Levassor, exhibited in two of his most popular comic scenes, and the exquisitely graceful ballad-singing of Miss Catherine Hayes (whose success was only second to that of Mdlle. Rachel), imparted an agreeable variety to the entertainment, which appeared to afford the utmost gratification to the audience. The hospitality of the noble owner of the mansion was munificently exercised in the course of the performance—refreshments being liberally administered, and every possible attention shown to the visitors.

IRISH ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—We are truly gratified to learn that Miss Rainforth, the celebrated English soprano, actuated by that true love of the art which she adorns, and feeling an interest in an institution which has done already so much to foster the native musical genius of our city, has signified her wish to assist in rendering the forthcoming examination as attractive as a musical treat, as we have no doubt it will prove interesting and satisfactory to the subscribers generally, by placing her most valuable services at the disposal of the committee.—Saunders.

REUNION DES ARTS.—The promoters of this novel institution had another meeting on Wednesday evening, at the Rooms, in Queen Ann-street.

These "Reunions" have been established for the purpose of encouraging amateurs to enter the lists with artists, not in a spirit of competition, but with the laudable object of inspiring the former with confidence, and dispelling those feelings of nervousness and alarm, which too frequently check their progress, and hinder the development of amateur talent. It was therefore with no small pleasure that we listened to a duet for two cornet-à-pistons, by Messrs. Tatham and Herrmann Lang, who have won the reputation of being two of the most accomplished amateur performers on that instrument in London. We detected, at the commencement of the duet, a few traces of timidity inseparable from a first essay in public; but apprehensions subsided quickly, and anxiety gave way to satisfaction at the able manner in which the two gentlemen performed their task. At the conclusion, they received the congratulations of their friends, and the approbation and applause of the entire audience. Madame Johannsen, the Danish vocalist, was warmly applauded in a song à la "Jenny Lind." A solo on the violin by M. Goffrie, was an able and interesting performance; and Madame Goffrie played with spirited and graceful execution a pianoforte fantasia which was most favourably received. The singing of Mdlles. Lemaire and Rimmell also made a sensible impression. Mr. Chatterton, in a harp solo, achieved a success which is not uncommon to him; and an amateur played the Carnival of Venice on the flute. We cannot conclude without offering our congratulations to Messrs. Goffrie and Gollmiche, to whom great credit is due for the spirited manner in which these Reunions are conducted.

MRS. ANDERSON'S CONCERT.—The annual morning concert of Mrs. Anderson is always one of the most attractive of the season, and on Friday week was more than usually distinguished by excellence and variety. It was held in the spacious theatre of the Royal Italian Opera, which was crowded by a fashionable and brilliant audience. Mrs. Anderson, who is pianist to Her Majesty and instructress to the Princess Royal, has long held an eminent position among our native performers. Her taste has been remarked for its classical bent, and her choice of Hummel's admirably written Rondo Brillante in F (generally known as the Retour à Londres) as a solo, and the interesting variations of Mendelssohn and Moscheles on the march in Weber's Preciosa, as a duet with her pupil, Miss Kirkham, sustained her reputation in this particular. Both these pieces were executed in a manner that delighted the audience, who were liberal and unanimous in their tokens of approval. Miss Kirkham, who appears very young, is a highly promising player, and already discloses a talent which is likely to do honour to her able and experienced professor. Mrs. Anderson also introduced, in conjunction with M. Sainton, some showy and effective variations for pianoforte and violin on the well-known air "Bel Raggio," (Rossini), which exhibited the talents of both executants to the highest advantage. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Costa, was that of the Royal Italian Opera, and played Mendelssohn's overture to Ruy Blas at the beginning, and Weber's Ruler of the Spirits at the end of the concert, in splendid style. The other instrumental feature was "Le Carnival de Cuba," a violin fantasia by Sig. Sivori, professing to be an imitation of an American bird, called sinsante. Not being acquainted with the peculiarities of the bird in question, we cannot answer for the resemblance, and must be content to state that although the fantasia served very well to display Sig. Sivori's wonderful executive powers, it presented no points to be admired in a purely musical point of view. All the company of the Royal Italian Opera assisted in the vocal department. Madame Viardot Garcia and Sig. Ronconi both made their first appearance on the occasion, and were welcomed with enthusiasm by the audience. Madame Viardot sang the rondo finale from Cenerentola, in which she introduced some equally original and marvellous traits de bravoure; Signor Ronconi, the "Largo al factotum," with all his accustomed spirit and vivacity; both performances created a furor; Grisi, with the grand aria from the Favorita, and Mario, with the "Ange si pur," from the same opera were not less warmly welcomed. Mario being encored, repeated the air half a tone higher, which was an evident improvement. The restoration of this admirable singer to the full vigour of his powers is almost entirely accomplished, to the unqualified gratification of all who admire the Italian Opera. One of the most striking features of the concert was Mademoiselle Anna Zerr's execution of the elaborate air of the "Queen of Night," from Zauberflote. We have already spoken of the extraordinary gifts of this vocalist, whose engagement, by Mr. Gye, to fill the part of the "Queen of Night," in the approaching representation of Mozart's great opera, can hardly fail to give satisfaction to the subscribers and the public. A duet, from Spohr's Faust by Herrn Pischek and Formes, another from the Prophète ("Della Mosa,") by Madame Viardot and Madame Castellan, and a third, Rossini's "I Marinari," (skilfully arranged for the orchestra by some one not named), by Signors Tamberlik and Tamburini, were each received with well deserved applause. One of the most attractive and one of the cleverest exhibitions of vocal talent, however, was a bolero, "La Chanteuse volée," by Madame Charton, the charming prima donna of the Opera Comique, who appears determined to sing the more provokingly well now that we have no chance of hearing her on the stage, her proper domain. Nothing could have been more hearty and genuine than the applause bestowed on Madame Charton. Signors Stigelli, Tagliafico, Bianchi, and Polonini, Herrn Reichardt and Stockhausen, and Mademoiselle Bertrandi, assisted in some concerted pieces; and Mademoiselle Angri gave the the "Una Voce" with her accustomed energy and point. The concert passed off with unabated spirit and appeared to give unqualified satisfaction.

GLEES AND MADRIGALS.—A series of four performances of English glees, madrigals, and catches is going on at Will's rooms, the third of which took place on Wednesday afternoon, in presence of a numerous audience. Those who are fond of this class of vocal music—one of the indigenous growths of our country—could hardly do better than attend these entertainments. The singers, Messrs. Locket, Hobbs, and Land (tenors), Mr. Francis (counter tenor), and Mr. H. Phillips (bass), are amongst the most able and experienced of our glee singers, and the ensemble they produce is admirable. The selection consisted of a madrigal, "Nymphs of the Forest," by Horsley; glees by Danby, Stevens, Webbe, Calcott, Elliot, and Bishop; and a catch, "Would you know my Celia's charms?" by Webbe. The favourites proved to be Elliott's glee, "At her fair hands," and Bishop's "Sleep, gentle lady," both of which were sung to perfection, and encored unanimously. The performance, which began at 3, terminated at 4 o'clock. The last meeting will come off on the 28th.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The eighth and last concert took place on Monday, to a crowded audience. We shall give the programme and a resumé of the season in our next.

MR. HULLAH'S MONTHLY CONCERTS.—The last of these, on Wednesday week, was made memorable by the production of Fridolin, a new dramatic carbata of remarkable ability, by Mr. Frank Mori, one of our most promising and talented musicians, of whom we shall speak at length next week, in our review of Mr. Hullah's season.

VAUXHALL.—BAL COSTUME.—On Friday evening week, those who had not the honour of an invitation to the Royal Palace, Buckingham-house, on the occasion of Her Majesty's bal costumé, had an opportunity of exhibiting themselves, and seeing others exhibited in somewhat similar costumes, at the "Royal property," Vauxhall Gardens, the proprietor of which place issued a general invitation to his friends and the public to honour him with a visit at the masquerade. The number of visitors was very considerable, and the appearance of the place gay and brilliant. Some of the mimic gallants of the age of the Merry Monarch were well habited, and, as far as external appearance went, did no dishonour to the Rochesters, Sedleys, Buckingham, Davenants, &c., of those piping times. The ladies, if they resembled their predecessors of the days of Charles II. in nothing else, were certainly not behind them in the freedom of their deportment. There were several Nell Gwynnes, if not as fascinating, at least as forward as the celebrated original. The dancing and the diversions of the bal were, however, sufficiently decorous, and good humour and mirth prevailed for several hours in all parts of the grounds. The illuminations were particularly good, and the arrangements reflect credit on Mr. Wardell and his assistant arbitrer elegantium Mr. B. Barnett. The band was an efficient one, and the whole was satisfactory to the British and foreign visitors of this very old and favourite place of pleasurable resort.

MISS GODDARD'S CONCERT.—The evening concert of Miss Goddard, already, though so young, one of our most admirable lady-pianists, came off on Wednesday last, at the Hanover-square Rooms, and attracted an overflowing audience. Ever since Miss Goddard performed at the Grand National Concerts, her talents have been made known and universally acknowledged, and few, even in advanced years, have won for themselves a more honourable and a better merited reputation. The young and charming artist's career is singularly hopeful, and if she only fulfil the promise of her youth, her future will be brilliant indeed. Miss Goddard performed on Wednesday night a Prelude and Fugue by Bach, in which she was encord; Beethoven's Sonata in C minor, with Sivori; and Thalberg's fantasia on Don Pasquale. Each of her performances was rapturously applauded, and the fair pianist honoured with a recall after each, independent of the encore awarded to the first. The following artists assisted:—Vocalists—Mdlle. Johannsen, Miss Dolby, Miss Octavia Fraser (her first appearance), Herr Fischke, Herr Reichart. Instrumentalists—(Violin) Signor Sivori, (violincello) Signor Piatti, (harp) Gerhard Taylor, (alto) Mr. R. Blagrove, (flute) Signor Briccialdi, (horn) Mr. Harper, (oboe) Mr. Nicholson, and (contra-basso) Signor Bottesini. Of this performance of the above host of talent we have not room to speak at length. Their names, however, will be a guarantee for their efforts, which, in almost every instance, were crowned with triumphant success. The programme was beyond the average merit, and, altogether, we may pronounce Miss Goddard's concert one of the most interesting of the season.

MUSICAL CRITICISM RUN MAD. The colerie of the anti-slavery Fourierite Tribune, or more likely the literary bureau connected with Napoleon Barnum's speculation, say this of Jenny Lind's last concert:—"Jenny Lind's singing is as unquestioned and supreme as the Parthenon and Corregio's pictures in art, and roses and lilies in nature. We owe to her constantly new and deeper delights. To hear her, as is our happy fortune, night after night, is to stand in the deepening summer, ever more lustrous and lovely, and perceive a redder red flush the petals of the rose, and purer pallor perfect the virginity of the lily. While we have her to sing, we need not regret too much that the Sistine Madonna is beyond the sea. For it is the hope and inspiration of all highest art to express precisely what Jenny Lind, as a woman and an artist, expresses." Jenny Lind has the credit of being charitable. If pity for individual misfortune ever agitated her bosom, she would confer lasting honour on herself, a benefit on society, and happiness upon the suffering journalist who wrote the above, by appropriating 10 drls. out of her half million, to buy him a straight jacket. Such a jacket would save a great deal of ruin, by preventing a terrible eruption, which may endanger the neighbourhood of the Tribune buildings. We know not which to fear most, an explosion, or a spontaneous combustion, which may increase the rates of insurance about the Park, and call out the entire fire department every night after a concert. We trust that the Nightingale will have charity on the author of such insanity, and control him in some way or other. There is positive danger from him at present.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. B. A. A.—We agree in a great measure with what our correspondent says, but cannot publish his letter for many reasons. Mendelssohn's operetta is in the hands of our reviewer, and will be noticed forthwith.

Advertisements.

AMATI VIOLONELLO.

TO be Sold, the Property of an Amateur. It is a beautiful specimen of the Cremona maker, and will be sold for much below its value. To be seen at Messrs. Wessel and Co., 229, Regent-street, Corner of Hanover-street.

CRAMER'S STUDIES.

THE First Volume of this Work is now Published in the upright form, newly revised and corrected by the Editor, and divided into four parts. Price, 6s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

NEW PIANOFORTE STUDIES

BY ALEXANDRE BILLET.

"Rosalie," in A flat	2s. 6d.
"Margaret," A	2s. 6d.
"Helene," E minor	2s. 6d.
"La Sylphide," F	2s. 6d.
"Romanza" (for the left hand), G flat	1s. 6d.
"Chant du Maria," in D flat	5s. 6d.
"L'Appassionata," C minor	8s. 6d.
"La Circassienne" (Octave Study), B major	2s. 6d.
"La Gondole," F sharp major	2s. 6d.

In the press, Six New Studies by Charles Mayer (of St. Petersburg), Op. 149. Wessel & Co., 229, Regent-street, London.

NEW MUSIC.

THE WORLD IS A FAIRY RING, Ballad written by Eliza Cook, composed by Joseph Philip Knight; composer of Beautiful Venice, Gather ye Rosebuds, Ocean Dreams, Song of Early Days, Come away, Cavatina, The Happy day, The Old and New Year, Her cheek was Pale.

London: Z. T. Purday, 45, High Holborn.

SACRED HARMONY.

UNDER the especial PATRONAGE of Her Most Excellent MAJESTY.—Just published, price 31s. 6d.,

H. J. HAYCRAFT'S VOLUME OF SACRED HARMONY.

Contributors:—Kate Loder, Sterndale Bennett, Henry Smart, G. A. Macfarren, Dr. Walmley, W. H. Holmes, Lovell Phillips, Brinley Richards, C. Lucas, Robert Barnett, &c.

"This is a judicious and interesting publication, containing works of high merit, and altogether possessing an interest not likely to pass hastily away."—Atlas.

London: Addison and Co.; and at the Editor's residence, 32, Queen's-road, Gloucester-gate, Regent's-park.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published,

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed, and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. BY RICHARD CARTE.

Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 210 Regent-street; Keith and Prowse, 48, Cheapside; and Cocks & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

CURES FOR THE UNCURED!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—Cure of a Bad Leg of more than sixty years' standing.—Mr. Barker, of No. 5, Graham's Place, Draypool, near Hull, had ulcers on his leg from the age of 18 until upwards of 80, and although for many years he had sought the first advice in the country, nothing was found to cure them. He often suffered excruciating pain for long periods together, which incapacitated him from attending to his business. He had given up all hopes of getting a cure, when at last he was persuaded to try Holloway's Pills and Ointment, which he did, and however wonderful it may appear, the leg was thoroughly healed by their means, and by continuing to use the Pills alone after his leg was well, he has become in health so hale and hearty as now to be more active than most men of fifty. N.B.—The truth of this extraordinary statement can be vouched for by Mr. J. C. Reinhardt, 22, Market Place, Hull. Feb 20th, 1850.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in the following cases:—
 Bad Legs Coco Bay Contracted and Lumbago Scurvy
 Bad Breasts Chiego-foot Stiff Joints Piles Sore-heads
 Burns Chilblains Elephantiasis Rheumatism Tumours
 Bunions Chapped hands Fistulas Scalds Ulcers
 Bite of Mosche- Corns (Soft) Gout Sore Nipples Wounds
 toes and Sand- Cancers Glandular Swell- Sore-throats Yaws
 Flies ings Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar,) London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

A SUPERIOR CABINET ORGAN

TO BE SOLD a bargain, in handsome Polished Case; has five stops and two barrels. Plays "God save the Queen," and about ten Songs, "Before Jehovah's Awful Throne," and other Sacred Tunes. May be seen at Mr. Sims's Office, 63, Upper Charlotte-street, Fitzroy Square.

THERE is a VACANCY in NORWICH CATHEDRAL for a Tenor voice, salary £18 per annum, with perquisites. Candidates must be between 25 and 30 years of age, and must be able to present certificates of good character and of having been communicants. Testimonials of musical ability will be required and candidates are expected to be good choirmen as well as possessed of good voices. Each will have to sing an anthem of his own choice, and one at sight, selected by the Precentor on the morning of trial. Papers must be sent addressed to the Revd. the Precentor, Close, Norwich, before the 10th of July, and the trial will take place on the 17th.

Price 2s. 6d.; or by post, 2s.

THE DUBLIN UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE for July contains: Chatterton; a story of the year 1770. Chaps. I. and II.—Weeds, Wild Flowers, and Waste Paper.—Leaves from the Portfolio of a Manager; No. VII. A peep behind the Scenes during the Rehearsal of a Pantomime; The Box-Office.—Five Months in an Ancient Irish City.—Our Portrait Gallery: No. LXIV.—MICHAEL W. BALFAS. With an Etching.—Wordsworth's Life.—Maurice Tierney, the Soldier of Fortune: Chap. XXXVIII. A Royalist "De la Vieille Roche." Chap. XXXIX. A Sorrowful Parting.—The day after the Storm.
Dublin: JAMES McGLASHAN, 50, Upper Sackville-street. WM. S. ORR & Co., 2, Amen-corner, London, and Liverpool. Sold by all Booksellers.

MUSICAL UNION.

VIEUXTEMPS.—Tuesday next, at half-past Three, this great Violinist will come expressly to fulfil his engagement at the MUSICAL UNION, and remain in London only a few days. Quartett, D minor, Mozart; Sonata, pianoforte, Op. 29, in E flat, Beethoven; Grand Quintett in C, Beethoven; Solo, Violin, Vieuxtemps. Executants—Vieuxtemps, Deloffre, Hill, Laanesberg, Piat, and Charles Hallé. Visitor's tickets, 10s. 6d. each, to be had at Cramer and Co.'s, 201, Regent-street, J. ELLA.

NEW BEETHOVEN ROOMS,

27, QUEEN ANNE STREET, CAVENDISH SQUARE.

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS

Has the honor to announce that he will give his Second Performance of CLASSICAL AND MODERN PIANOFORTE MUSIC,

ON WEDNESDAY MORNING, JULY 9th,

To commence at Three o'clock, and terminate at Five. On which occasion he will be assisted by MISS CATHERINE HAYES and MADAME MACFARREN.

Pianoforte—MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS.

Violin—Herr ERNST. Violoncello—Signor PIATTI.

Contra Basso—Signor BOTTESINI.

Conductor—MR. HOLMES.

Broadwood's Patent Grand Pianofortes will be used at these Concerts.

Subscription Tickets for Reserved Seats, One Guinea. Single Reserved Seats Twelve Shillings. Single Tickets, Eight Shillings. May be had at all the principal Music Warehouses, and of Mr. Brinley Richards, 6, Somerset-street, Portman-square.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR MR. COSTA.—On FRIDAY next, 4th July, Mendelssohn's ELIJAH. Vocalists—Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss E. Birch, Miss Dolby, Miss M. Williams; Mr. Sims Reeves and Herr Formes. The Orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets 2s.; reserved, 5s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter Hall, or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross. Early application is recommended to secure Tickets.

MISS KATE LODER

BEGS to announce that her MATINEE MUSICALE, will take place at the New Beethoven Rooms on Saturday July 5th, to commence at half-past two o'clock. Vocalists, Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Louisa Pyno, Miss Williams, Madame Macfarren, Madame Ferrari, Miss Pyne, Miss Messent, Miss Ley, and Miss Dolby, Herr Reichart, Signor Ferrari, Mr. T. Williams, and Mr. Frank Borda. Instrumentalists, violin, Herr Ernst and Mr. John Day; tenor, Mr. Dando; violoncello, Mr. Hanerch who will perform a MS. quartet by Miss Kate Loder; Solo, Mr. Richardson; pianoforte, Miss Kate Loder; conductor, Mr. W. C. Macfarren. Tickets, half a guinea each. Reserved seats, 15s. to be had of Miss Kate Loder, at her residence, 35, Manchester Street, Manchester Square, of Cramer, Beale & Co., Addison & Co., Regent Street, and of Robert Ollivier, 19, Old Bond Street.

QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS,

HANOVER SQUARE.

M. ALEXANDRE BILLET,

Has the honour to announce that his THIRD PERFORMANCE of CLASSICAL PIANOFORTE AND VOCAL MUSIC,

Will take place on MONDAY, JUNE 30.

To commence at Three o'clock precisely.

VOCALISTS:—

MADAME ANNA THILLON, MADAME MACFARREN.

HERR STIGELLI, HERR JULES STOCKHAUSEN.

M. BILLET will play on Kirkman's New Repetition Grand Pianoforte.

PART I.

- | | |
|--|--------------|
| 1. SONATA in F minor, Op. 20, Pianoforte, M. BILLET. | Hummel |
| 2. SONG, "Forget it not," (Sleeper Awakened) Mme. MACFARREN | Macfarren. |
| 3. "VOLKS-LIED." HERR STOCKHAUSEN. | Mendelssohn. |
| 4. "Auf Flugelndes Gesanges." CAPRICE in D minor, Pianoforte, M. BILLET. | S. Bennett. |
| Allegro Appassionato, | E. J. Loder. |

PART II.

- | | |
|---|--------------|
| 5. { CHARACTERISTIC STUCK; (the Temperaments) No. 4 }
Con motto, A major
Caprice in F sharp minor. Pianoforte M. BILLET | Mendelssohn. |
| 6. "HUNTSMAN REST" HERR STOCKHAUSEN | Schubert. |
| 7. LIED "Suleika," Mme. MACFARREN | Mendelssohn. |
| 8. SELECTION OF STUDIES. Pianoforte M. BILLET. | |
| D minor | F. Hiller |
| F major | A. Billet. |
| E minor | Mendelssohn. |
| G flat major | Chopin. |
| A minor (by DESIRE) | Thalberg. |

Tickets for a Single Concert, 5s.; Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; Subscription to the Reserved Seats for the Series, £1 ls. To be had of WASSER and Co., 299, Regent Street; at the principal Music Publishers; and at the Rooms on the morning of the Concert.

ALEXANDRE RANCHERAYE

HAS the honour to announce that he will give a SOIREE MUSICALE under the immediate Patronage of HER EXCELLENCY MADAME BUNSEN, at the NEW BEETHOVEN ROOMS, 27, Queen Anne Street, Cavendish Square, on THURSDAY, JULY 3rd, 1851, to commence at Eight o'clock precisely. Vocalists—Miss Dolby, Mdlle. Johannsen, Mrs. A. Newton, Signor Marchesi, and Mr. Bridge Prodham. Pianoforte—Signor Cittadini, Violin Alexandre Rancheraye, Violoncello, Mr. E. Withers. Conductors—Signor Cittadini, and Herr F. Schmidt. Tickets 7s. Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d., at the Musicellers, and of Alexandre Rancheraye, 99, Portland-street, Portland Place.

NEW BEETHOVEN ROOMS.

27, QUEEN ANNE STREET.

MADLE. ELISE KRINITZ'S
MATINEE MUSICALE

WILL TAKE PLACE ON

MONDAY, JULY 7th, 1851,

TO COMMENCE AT TWO O'CLOCK.

VOCALISTS.

MISS CATHERINE HAYES,
MADLE. ANNA ZERR, MADLE. GRAUMANN,
MISS BINKES.
MISS OCTAVIA FRASER,
HERR REICHAUT.
SIGNOR MARCHESI. SIGNOR CIABATTA,
MR. AUGUSTUS BRAHAM.

INSTRUMENTAL PERFORMERS.

Pianoforte, MADLE. ELISE KRINITZ.
Harp, MADAME PARISH ALVARS,
Violin, MR. LEON REYNIER, Violoncello, MR. ROUSSELOT.
CONDUCTORS, MR. LAVENU AND MR. FRELON.

TICKETS 10s. 6d. RESERVED SEATS, 15s.

To be had of CRAMER, BEALE, and Co., 201, Regent Street; at the principal Music Warehouses and Libraries; and of Madle. KRINITZ, 37, Great Marlborough Street.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. SOIREE'S EXTRAORDINAIRES.

THE Week's Performances will include the talents of Madame Sontag, Madlle. Caroline Duprez, Madame Fiorentini, Madame Giuliani, Madame Ugalde, and Madlle. Sophie Cruvelli. Signor Gardoni, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Pardini, and Signor Calzolari, Signori Lablache, Massol, F. Lablache, Casanova, Scapini, Lorenzo, Ferranti and Coletti. Mlle. Amalia Ferraris, Mlle. Marie Taglioni, and Mlle. Carolina Rosati. M.M. Charles, Errick, Gosselin, and Paul Taglioni.

Tuesday, July 1st, 1851, IL PRODIGO.

Wednesday, July 2, LA MUTA DI PORTICI, (Massanello,) and other entertainments.

Thursday, July 3, Thalberg's new Grand Opera FLORINDA, or the Moors in Spain. (Being included in the Subscription, in lieu of Saturday, July 5.)

In consequence of the Preparations requisite for Her Majesty's reception on the occasion of the

STATE VISIT,

There will be no Performance on Friday next.

THE last Grand Classical, Dramatic, Miscellaneous, Concerted MUSICAL ENTERTAINMENT of the season will take place on MONDAY MORNING, June 30th, 1851.

On this occasion will appear Mesdames SONTAG, CAROLINE DUPREZ, ALAIMO, GIULIANI, IDA BERTRAND, FIORENTINI, MARIE CRUVELLI, and SOPHIE CRUVELLI.—Madame UGALDE.

Signori GARDONI and CALZOLARI, Mr. SIMS REEVES and Signor PARDINI Signori COLETTI, FERRANTI, F. LABLACHE, and LABLACHE.

The whole under the Direction of Mr. BALFE.

Signor SIVORI (Engaged expressly for this occasion) will execute Two unpublished Pieces of Paganini.

The Concert will commence at Two o'clock precisely.

GRAND EXTRA NIGHT.

THALBERG'S NEW GRAND OPERA,

FLORINDA,

OR THE MOORS IN SPAIN.

IT is respectfully announced that a Grand Extra Night will take place on THURSDAY next, July 3, 1851, when will be produced an entirely New Grand Opera, composed expressly for Her Majesty's Theatre, by Sigismund Thalberg. The Poem by Scribe, the Italian Libretto by Giannoni, entitled

FLORINDA,

OR THE MOORS IN SPAIN.

With new Scenery by Mr. Charles Marshall. The Costumes executed by Miss Bradley and Mr. Coombes. Under the Superintendence of Madame Copere. The Misc en Scene by Mr. A. Harris.

Count Julian	Signor LABLACHE.
Florinda (his Daughter)	Mlle. SOPHIE CRUVELLI.
Teodomiro	Mlle. MARIE CRUVELLI.
			(Her First Appearance in this country.)

Rodrigo	Signor CALZOLARI.
Favila	Mr. SIMS REEVES.

AND

Munizza	Signor COLETTI.
---------	-----	-----	-----------------

With various entertainments in the Ballet Department, in which will appear Mlle. Amalia Ferraris, Mlle. Marie Taglioni, Mlle. Carolina Rosati, Mlles. Rosa, Esper, Julien, Lamoureux, Allegrini, Kohlenburg, Aussandon, Pascales, Dantonie, Soto, &c., &c. M.M. Charles, Gosselin, Ehrick, and Paul Taglioni. Applications for Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets, to be made at the Box Office of the Theatre. Doors open at Seven, and the Opera to commence at half-past Seven o'clock.

BEETHOVEN QUARTETT SOCIETY,

27, QUEEN ANNE STREET, CAVENDISH SQUARE.

THE LAST PERFORMANCE this Season (for MR. ROUSSELOT'S Benefit), on Wednesday, July 9th, at 8 o'clock. Messrs. Ernst, Sainton, Cooper and Sivori; Messrs. Hill, Rousselet, and Bottesini; Madlle. Coulon, and Miss Dolby.

PROGRAMME.—M. sarr, Quartet No. 4. Spohr, Duet for Violin and Tenor by Messrs. Sivori and Ernst. Classical Song, Miss Dolby. Rousselet, Quintett, No. 3, with contra basse by Bottesini, and led by Ernst. Mendelssohn, Trio No. 2. Song, Miss Dolby. Beethoven, Quartet, No. 9. Duo Brilliant, Violin and Contra Basse, Sivori and Bottesini.

Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; Unreserved Seats, 7s.; to be obtained of Messrs. Rousselet and Co., 66, Conduit Street, Regent Street, and at the principal music sellers.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

SECOND NIGHT OF LE PROPHETE.

SECOND APPEARANCE OF MADAME VIARDOT.

ON TUESDAY NEXT, JULY 1st, will be performed Meyerbeer's Grand Opera,

LE PROPHETE.

Fides,	Madame VIARDOT.
Bertha,	Madame CASTELLAN.
Jean of Leyden,	Signor MARIO.
Count Oberthal,	Signor TAGLIAFICO.
Serjeant,	Signor SOLDI.
Peasants,	Signor ROMMI and
Geona,	Signor RACHEL.
Mathisin,	Signor STIGELLI.
Zaccaria,	Signor POLONINI.
			Herr FORMES.

The Chorus in the grand Coronation Scene of the Third Act will combine the powers of the Full Orchestra, the Military Bands, the Chorus and Organ. The incidental Divertissement in the Skating Scene will be supported by Madlle. Louise Taglioni and M. Alexandre, and comprise the celebrated Quadrille des Patineurs.

GRAND EXTRA NIGHT, LES HUGUENOTS.

On Thursday next, July 3rd, will be performed (for the sixth time this season), Meyerbeer's Grand Opera,

LES HUGUENOTS,

Principal characters by Madame Gris, Madame Castellan, Mlle. Angr, Mlle. Cotti, Herr Formes, Signor Tagliafico, Signor Polonini, Signor Ferrari, Signor Rommi, Signor Mel, Signor Soldi, and Signor Mario.

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor,—MR. COSTA.

COMMENCE AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre.

MR. FRANK BODDA

RESPECTFULLY announces to his Friends and Pupils that his SECOND MATINEE MUSICALE will take place early in July. Tickets Half-a-Guinea each. To be had of Mr. Frank Bodda, 42, Hart-street, Bloomsbury Square.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

STREICH	Les Mignolles.
RICHARDS	Midsummer Day.
RICHARDS	Moonlight Serenade.
RICHARDS	Danish Air.
RICHARDS	Pastorale.
PRAEGER	Moment Joyeux.
PRAEGER	Nocturne Romantique.
KUHE	Styriens.
SILAS	Amaranth.
SILAS	La Primavera.
			(A quatre Meiss.)
THALBERG	Prophete.
SCHULTZ	Melodie.
WOLFF	Euryanthe.
WOLFF	Precoiosa.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

NEW DUETS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

THALBERG	Beatrice di Tenda
ROSELLEN	Deux Melodies de Donizetti, 1 and 2.
ROSELLEN	Fal D'andorre.
WOLFF	Valse Original.
WOLFF	Beatrice di Tenda.
SILAS	La Primavera, Ragatelle.
KALLIWODA	Invitation à la danse.
OSBORNE	Plume de Peile.
SCHULTZ	Duo L'espagnola.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent-street.

MR. CRIVELLI

BEGS to acquaint his friends and the public that a Third Edition of the "ART OF SINGING," enlarged and newly arranged in the form of a Grammatical System of Rules for the Cultivation of the Voice, may be had at his residence, 71, Upper Norton-street, and at all the principal Music-sellers.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3 Strudley Villas, Studley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Furkes, Dean Street 8 ho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, June 28, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra), payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 27.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, JULY 5, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

MENDELSSOHN'S POSTHUMOUS WORKS.

We have been favoured by Messrs. Ewer, of Newgate-street, with copies of Mendelssohn's symphony in A major, arranged for two performers on the pianoforte, and the same composer's operetta, Son and Stranger, in pianoforte score. They have been placed in the hands of Mr. Macfarren, who will review them immediately after the termination of the present series of articles on Fidelio.

FIDELIO.

(Continued from our last.)

The next movement is one of remarkable musical interest. It contains some of the most beautiful and the most touching phrases of melody in the whole opera. Of these we may especially cite the close in A flat on the words "Ich bin es nur noch nicht gewohnt," in answer to Rokko's doubt of Leonore's courage for the task upon which she is to enter; then the plaintively expressive rendering of the exclamation "O welch ein Schmerz," when the devoted heroine has the sense of her sorrows newly awakened by the jailor's allusion to their master's severity; then Leonore's impassioned appeal to Rokko, when, supposing that the timid Fidelio weeps from unwillingness to fulfil his new and painful duty, he proposes to descend into the prison alone, and she, clinging to him with eager entreaty, protests, "Ich muss ihn sehn;" lastly, the most beautiful of all, the lovely ensemble that closes the movement, "So säumen wir nun länger nicht," one of the happiest inspirations by which this great master and mighty genius has ever been enabled to prove his greatness. A powerful point of expression occurs near the commencement of the movement, when Rokko speaks of their dreadful duty in the ruined cistern, and observes that Leonore shudders. Here we have an anticipation, first of the entr'acte, the mysterious pathos of which so well prepares us for the discovery of the dungeon scene, with all its gloomy misery in the second act; afterwards of the melodramatic music, when Leonore and Rokko descend into the cell, and the former tries to make her companion believe that it is the chill and not the horror of the place that makes her tremble. We must especially notice in this movement the ceaseless change of harmony upon every quaver that characterises the principal subject, and the luxurious richness of the instrumentation, in which the tone of the clarionets and bassoons is particularly prominent. A curious characteristic of Beethoven is manifest in this andante—namely, the unscrupulous manner in which the harmony notes are taken at the same time as the accented passing-notes that resolve upon them (such as we find exemplified in the rivulet movement of the pastoral symphony,) and further, the very singular manner in which passing notes in several parts, forming, indeed, complete and distinct harmonies, are taken against the sustained notes of the voices. This andante makes a most grateful contrast to the two agitated movements that precede and follow it.

Upon this immediately follows a declamatory movement of a hurried, agitated character, the chief interest of which consists in the powerful rendering of the words, there being in the whole but few points such as abound in the preceding andante, that are remarkable for abstract musical beauty. Marzelline and Jacquino arrive hurriedly, to warn Rokko that the governor has been informed of the enlargement of the prisoners, and comes, full of anger, to punish the temerity of the jailor, who has, unallowed, given them this temporary liberty. An unexpected burst on E flat, when several instruments are employed for the first time, introduces Pizarro with an effect equally simple and startling. The tyrant's reprimand of Rokko throws the fine-hearted old man into the greatest perplexity to find excuses. First he makes some futile efforts to screen himself behind the fine weather and the warm sunshine, as a reason for his illegal indulgence of the prisoners under his care. Then, struck with a sudden thought, which he believes to be a happy one, he explains that it is the king's birth-day, which they always celebrate with the like rejoicing; the brilliant effect of the change into D major, and the hearty loyalty of the firm and forcible music that is set to this passage is highly characteristic and truly admirable. This too fails to justify Rokko to the implacable tyrant. The feeling of the music now suddenly changes, and Rokko whispers to Pizarro, that "He in the secret dungeon is to perish, so may not those others cheerfully roam for their short hour unrestrained." The same idea that is suggested by Rokko when he speaks of Pizarro's intended victim is further developed by the governor when he bids his menial hasten to prepare the grave; then ordering him to conduct the prisoners back to their cells, he warns him never again so hardly to presume upon the power of his office.

The last movement of this finale is to us the least dramatic, the least musically interesting, and the least effective portion of the opera. Here the writer must be allowed to lay aside for a moment the mystery of criticism, and to speak in his own person upon the strength of what small experience in the musical and dramatic art he may by careful study have acquired, unwilling to veil under the ambiguity of the anonymical form, which custom and convenience have induced him to employ throughout these papers, the heretical opinions he is about to demonstrate. Perhaps in this very word "opinion" I may be felt to presume upon the toleration of such of those who have thus far accompanied me, in my minute examination of this great and most impressive work, who may with reason say that one who is incompetent to judge is incapable to form an opinion. Waive then the word "opinions;" call them instinct, call them prejudices, (though I earnestly hope they merit, from their sincerity alone, a milder consideration than this last calling would imply), but let me give them expression, since in this I shall prove the hearty truth of my enthusiastic admiration of what my excitement on hearing it, no less than my observation on examining it, makes me feel to be the masterpiece of all dramatic music—which may thus be distinguished from that blind reverence for a work or for a writer that shows us incompetent to appreciate beauties, since incapable to discern defects. To find fault with the ideas of Beethoven would be alike unwelcome to my readers and myself; to deprecate his choice of a subject for the exercise of his gorgeous imagination, scarcely less ungracious. Let me then say how I should have wished the libretto to be modified at the conclusion of the first act, had this otherwise most excellently constructed and highly suggestive lyrical drama been offered to me for composition; and let it then be considered whether a more effective and a not less beautiful climax to the ever "lengthening chain" of interest and excitement, might not have been produced by the all but almighty power of Beethoven. Instead of the tranquil "farewell to sunlight" of the prisoners, and the similarly didactic lines of each of the five principal characters, I should have preferred that something of a more agitated character should have been substituted; such, for instance, as the violent forcing of the reluctant prisoners back to their night in day, their life in death—their vainly turning back for a last look upon the sun, which they may never see again, and perhaps, recurring to some phrase from the opening movement of the finale, which might have been always interrupted by turbulent music of the governor and his soldiery—then the fruitless appeals of the benevolent jailor and his associates to the relentless tyrant who commands them; and, lastly, the secret exultation of the devoted Leonore at her now certainty that she will see, and her confident hope that she may help, her husband.

This, or matter more or less in the style of this, might, I believe, have given scope for the exercise of the highest faculties of Beethoven's genius; whereas in the scene as it stands, I cannot but feel that the composer is contending with a difficulty, and that he is striving in vain to produce an effect from a nullity of means. Regarding the movement as it is—not as it might have been—it cannot but be felt that the opening four bars lead one to expect very much more than is fulfilled in the sequel; they are broad, and clear, and bold, whereas the greater part of what follows is remarkably wanting in these qualities. A passage that occurs at a somewhat advanced period of the movement, not a little like a prominent feature in the last movement of the symphony in D major of the same composer, when the solo voices successively enter, commencing with Rokko on the words, "Mir beben meine Glieder," while the chorus sustain the octave F, and which is subsequently repeated, is smooth, and conduces much to the generally tranquil and, in such a situation, tame character of the movement. Another recurrence to the very remarkable point in the duet for two basses, the four notes to which Pizarro sings, "Und er verstummt," previously introduced with so great effect, because with such perfect pertinence to the situation, appears here to have no meaning; at least, no meaning is superficially apparent, and thus it weakens the purpose of its former application. It is where the bass voices of the chorus sing with the bass instruments "Lebwohl, lebwohl"; previous to the introduction of the opening phrase of the movement in the key of D flat. Taken as a whole, this stretto of the first finale of Fidelio is not only a weak part of a great work, but, truly, one of the most effectless terminations to an act that exists upon the stage. The want of effect here alleged arises not merely from the weakness of the movement itself, but greatly also from the surpassing strength of all that has preceded it; the interest and the excitement have grown from the rising of the curtain until this place, and in this place, where more than all is expected, less than all is achieved. Far is it from the present purpose to require a vulgar bombastic flourish of senseless sound, or a bustling turmoil that would be meaningless; the action might surely have been so conducted as to have given the composer opportunity for a spirited and energetic climax to this first division of his work, which would in no way have interfered with the very different character that the music assumes at the commencement of the next act, and would greatly have enhanced the impression upon all hearers of the countless beauties with which the first act is so richly studded. As it is, although there has been much to charm, there has been nothing to rekindle the enthusiasm of an audience which the prisoners' chorus always excites.

G. A. M.

(To be continued.)

M. ALEXANDRE BILLET'S THIRD AND LAST CONCERT.

This performance took place at the Hanover Square Rooms on Monday, and was attended by a very numerous and musical audience, much more so, indeed, than either of the previous concerts, at both of which the very large preponderance of ladies present prevented that warm expression of admiration which M. Billet's playing so eminently merits, and which on this last occasion was most freely and cordially awarded. Our bold and vigorous pianist executed on Monday the elaborate sonata of Hummel in F minor; a caprice of Mr.

S. Bennett in D minor (one of the composer's very earliest productions); an Allegro Appassionato by Mr. E. J. Loder, a work of so very great interest as to make us long for more music of the same class from the same intelligent author; the movement in A from the characteristic pieces of Mendelssohn, which was first rendered familiar to our concert audiences by the perfect performance of the equally gifted and lamented Filtzsch, and the caprice in F sharp minor of the same composer; lastly, a selection of studies by Billet himself, Mendelssohn, Chopin, and Thalberg, in the second of which (a most effective composition) he was unanimously and deservedly encored.

The vocal music was of a very interesting character, and was supported by Madame Macfarren and Herr Stockhausen, admirably accompanied by Mr. Frank Mori. Madame Macfarren sang first the song from the Sleeper Awakened, "Forget it not," with so much purity of style and earnestness of expression as to be loudly called upon to repeat it, instead of which, however, she substituted Mendelssohn's simply beautiful folksied, "Es ist bestiment in Gottes Rath," her charming singing of which was not a little enhanced by the musicianly manner with which she accompanied herself on the pianoforte. Herr Stockhausen sang Mendelssohn's "Aug Flugel des Gesanges," which being re-demanded, he substituted "Dein ut mein Herz" of Schubert. He sang also two songs of this last composer from Sir Walter Scott's Lady of the Lake, hitherto unknown to us, which possesses that great musical interest for which the works of this voluminous Lieder writer are eminent. Madame Macfarren sang also the most impassioned of all Mendelssohn's most impassioned songs, the "Suleika," which he first set from Goethe's set of poems, Suleika and Hafiz, and was very loudly and continuously applauded. We cannot take leave of this series of concerts, so full of the highest interest to the real musical dilettanti, without according once more our heartiest praise to M. Billet for his introduction to the world of many classical works of first-rate excellence that were before nearly or wholly unknown, and some truly beautiful compositions of English musicians that are an honour to their authors, to the country in which they have been produced, and to the excellent judgment of the skilful executant, who has done thus much to give them their proper place in general appreciation.

THE MUSICAL UNION.

The seventh meeting, which took place on Tuesday in Willis's rooms, was remarkable for the first, and probably only appearance this season, of the justly renowned violinist, M. Vieuxtemps, who, as chief of a great school, has long exercised a preponderating influence on the art, not merely as an executant, but as a composer. It is a compliment to Mr. Ella that M. Vieuxtemps, whose position at the Court of the Czar calls him immediately back to St. Petersburg, should have come to England for the sole purpose of fulfilling an engagement, contracted some months past, to perform at one of the concerts of the Musical Union. The reception accorded to the great Belgian violinist, whose talent combines all the best qualities of Viotti, Baillot, and De Beriot, with a mechanism and command of the instrument far surpassing any of them, was of that flattering description never awarded but to artists of the highest eminence. He was literally overwhelmed with applause when he came forward to take the first violin part in Haydn's quartet in G, Op. 81, with which the programme commenced.

The first quality that strikes the hearer in the playing of M. Vieuxtemps is a breadth and volume of tone which none have exceeded, if, indeed, any have equalled. This tone is not merely distinguished for strength, but for excessive purity, and the ease with which the player endows it with variety and contrast, by the plainest mechanical devices. The execution of M. Vieuxtemps is wonderfully correct, and his manner of phrasing large, and full of sentiment. Of the two full pieces in which he took part—the quartet, already mentioned, of Haydn, and Beethoven's quintet in C major, Op. 29—the latter is most fitted to bring out the peculiar qualities of his playing. The quartet of Haydn demands a certain piquancy and lightness foreign to the Belgian school, which leans more gracefully to music wherein grandeur and energy constitute the elements of expression. Beethoven's quintet would seem to have been composed for M. Vieuxtemps, so thoroughly does he enter into the spirit of every movement, and so well are his ample means adapted to the phrases and passages allotted to the first violin. In the opening of the allegro moderato his fine and broad legato bowing is developed to the best advantage; while the adagio abounds in features of melody and rhythm, which in his hands attain what may be termed the eloquence of expression. But the masterpiece of M. Vieuxtemps, both in style and execution, that which more completely than anything else has identified the talent of the player with the beauty of the music, is the finale. This, although as a composition by no means comparable to the first movement, as a piece of display yields to nothing in the whole range of chamber music. Here M. Vieuxtemps—whether in the fury of the poetically imagined storm, or in the quietude of the simple pastoral theme, which twice arrests the impetuous course of the movement, and affords a contrast at once so agreeable and natural—is equally forcible and true. We never remember him to have played more perfectly—never to have created a more profound impression. His tone seemed larger and brighter than ever, while the accuracy of his bowing and fingering was only equalled by the vigour and solidity of his style. The applause was enthusiastic at the end of the quintet. We need only mention that, in addition to these classical pieces, M. Vieuxtemps performed a solo fantasia of his own, entitled Souvenir de Bosphore, hardly to be excelled, in its way, as an exercise for manual dexterity. In another light the Souvenir de Bosphore can only claim the consideration due to a bagatelle; but since those who can do great things well are for the most part successful in small, the bagatelles of M. Vieuxtemps, whose concertos are accepted as models of the present school of composition for the violin, must not be confounded with those of ordinary musicians. The Souvenir de Bosphore, like all the fantasias of its author, is scarcely more to be admired for the brilliancy of its effects than for the skilful manner in which it is conducted. The performance of this solo was received with vehement demonstrations of satisfaction from the audience, M. Vieuxtemps retiring amid loud and long continued plaudits. In the quartet he was ably supported by MM. Deloffre, Hill, and Piatti; and in the quintet by the same gentlemen, with the addition of Mr. Webb.

The concert was agreeably relieved by an expressive and highly finished performance of one of the most beautiful sonatas of Beethoven—that in E flat, Op. 33, for pianoforte solo—by M. Charles Hallé, who also accompanied M. Vieuxtemps in the fantasia with extreme ability. The room was crowded by a fashionable and aristocratic audience.

VIEUXTEMPS.

(From Ella's Musical Union.)

"Twined with the wreaths Parnassian laurels yield."

We cannot sufficiently admire the kind feeling which has prompted this great violinist to quit his family, at a moment of anxious solicitude, to enable us to keep good faith with our members. During his three months congé from the Imperial Court of Russia, Vieuxtemps has passed most of the time in Paris, where he has given three grand concerts, crowded to excess.

In Vieuxtemps the French have justly recognised the only disciple living in whose style are embodied the grand characteristics of violin playing, bequeathed to the French nation in a work by the greatest artist that ever played or understood the violin—Bailiot. L'Art du Violon, by this musical philosopher, contains better instruction on the general principles of taste and expression than any treatise we ever perused. There is no artist from whom we have experienced so many disinterested acts of kindness, and who is more universally admired for his talent and unaffected manners than Vieuxtemps; and the short visit which he honours us with we shall ever regard as an affectionate token of kindly brotherhood; and the members of the Musical Union will not fail to appreciate the motive.

MARBLE BUST OF BEETHOVEN.

MR. N. BURNARD, SCULPTOR.

(From Ella's Musical Union.)

A new bust of Beethoven by the above artist, with the motivo of the C minor Symphony engraved on its base, was inaugurated with musical ceremonies on the 21st of June, at the residence of the owner, Mr. Frederick Beale, the respected Treasurer of the Musical Union. As a work of art, this new bust is superior to any that we have seen, and on the authority of a pupil of Beethoven, Mr. Potter, the sculptor has succeeded in chiselling the true expression of the immortal composer. Mr. Burnard, we believe, is a self-taught artist, and has long been employed in the studios of better-known sculptors; but from the signal triumph of this his first attempt at an original work, we have little doubt that his talent will command patronage. At the fête given on the occasion by Mr. Beale, with his wonted hospitality towards men of genius and fame, upwards of one hundred musicians and their families were present.

It was indeed a pleasing sight to behold such an array of talent paying homage to the dead and living—the composer and sculptor. Surrounding the veiled bust, whilst an appropriate selection of Beethoven's works was played, we observed on our entrance, Berlioz, Fischhoff, Yansa, Sivori, Potter, Silas, Loder, Briccialdi, Blumenthal, Owen Jones, and a host of celebrities. Messrs. Ernst, Sivori, Eckert, Franks, Rousselot, Potter, Sloper and Silas took part in the Quartet in C minor, Trio, in E flat (Op. 70), Sonata in F, and Marras sang Adelaide. The bust being unveiled, M. S. David extemporized an oration, in glowing admiration of the genius of Beethoven, which terminated with acclamations. A more interesting ceremony we have seldom witnessed, and we could not but feel how gratifying such a scene, in an institute devoted to the muse, would be to amateurs, not less enthusiastic in their love of music, but who are denied the opportunity of associating with professors in thus paying their homage to art.

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS' MATINEES.

Mr. Brinley Richards, one of our most able pianists and musicians, summoned his friends on Monday, June 23rd, to the first of two performances of classical music for the pianoforte, in the New Beethoven Rooms, which were completely filled by an aristocratic and fashionable audience. We have rarely remarked a more strict and undeviating attention paid to a selection exclusively of serious music. Mr. Brinley Richards was assisted by Ernst (violin) and Piatti (violoncello), with whom he played Beethoven's first trio in C minor, and with Ernst Mozart's fine and elaborate sonata in A, for piano and violin. Both were admirably performed; the latter especially, one of the most difficult and trying of Mozart's chamber pieces. Mr. Richards also played solos, selections from Mendelssohn and Sterndale Bennett, besides some elegant pieces of his own composition, among which "The Vision," a romance, and a scherzo, called the "Rivulet and the Birds," attracted particular attention, and were loudly applauded. Not the least interesting of the performances was the Andante con Variazioni of Mendelssohn (Op. 83—Posthumous), for two performers on the pianoforte, in which Mr. Richards was assisted by Mr. Cipriani Potter. If all "variations" were like these, there would be no defence for the opponents of this particular form of fantasia. One of Signor Bottesini's wonderful exhibitions on the contrabasso, and a couple of airs by that popular favourite, Miss Catherine Hayes, agreeably varied the programme. Mr. Cipriani Potter presided, as accompanist, at the pianoforte.

The following is a list of the subscribers to Mr. Brinley Richards, Concert;—

The Right Hon. the Ladies Pelham Clinton, the Right Hon. the Countess of Beauchamp, the Right Hon. the Countess Duncannon, the Right Hon. the Lady Robert Grosvenor, the Baroness Braye, the Baroness de Rutzen, Lady Moreton, Lady Sidney Morgan, Lady Atkinson, Lady Talfourd, Lady Taunton, Lady Congreve Whiting, the Hon. Mrs. W. H. Yelverton, the Hon. Mrs. W. Chetwynd Talbot, the Hon. Mrs. H. Wilbraham, the Hon. Mrs. Wyatt Edghill, the Right Hon. the Earl of Beauchamp, the Hon. J. Fortescue, M. P., Sir Jasper Atkinson, Miss Grosvenor, Miss Congreve, Mrs. Newton Scott, Mrs. T. Page, Miss King, Miss Clara King, Miss H. King, Mrs. Fred. Salmon, Mrs. Robert Raikes, Miss Minnie, Mrs. Horace Twiss, Miss Peddie, Mrs. J. Pilcher, Miss Pilcher, Mrs. J. Somes, Miss Saxton, Miss Bentley, Mrs. Fred. Somes, the Misses Gadsden, the Misses Bullock, Miss Delman, Mrs. Rawlinson, Miss Rawlinson, Mrs. Ackers, Miss Pratt, Miss Dundas, Miss Clayton, Miss Stanfield, Miss Steele, Miss Partridge, Miss Cuff, Mrs. Fearenside, the Misses Macdonnell, Miss Major, Newton Scott, Esq., H. Broadwood, Esq., the Rev. Wyatt Edghill, W. King, Esq., Fred. Salmon, Esq., Robert Raikes, Esq., — Lutwidge, Esq., Fred. Genet, Esq., Pryce Major, Esq., Dr. H. Morris, Cockburn Hyde, Esq., W. Banting, Esq., Edward Gilbertson, Esq., T. Banting, Esq., John Masson, Esq., John Parker, Esq., Henry Leslie, Esq., St. Vincent Jarvis, Esq., F. Johnson, Esq., G. Bentley, Esq., Fred. Somes, Esq., — Somes, Esq., Edward Micklam, Esq., Richard Blake, Esq., Thomas Reed, Esq., George Reeve, Esq., Edward Reeve, Esq., George Wilson, Esq., Rev. F. Hamilton, Rev. W. Cazelet, H. F. Gadsden, Esq., Edward Bullock, Esq., — Cuff, Esq., John Fearenside, Esq., Eneas Macdonnell, Esq., the Rev. Dr. Major, H. Roberts, Esq.

Who, after reading the above catalogue of fashionable names, which we have quoted for a purpose that must be evident to our readers, will continue to assert that the aristocracy and fashion of this metropolis are indifferent to the best chamber music? Mr. Brinley Richards, by his numerous and splendid connection, has been able at the outset to prove the contrary.

THE COMMAND NIGHT AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The following letter has been addressed to the Times :—

To the Editor of the Times.

SIR,—Your paper of this day contains a notice from Mr. Lumley which is so unjust that I beg to direct your attention to it as the only source of redress that I am aware of.

I am a subscriber for all the Tuesdays and Saturdays at the Queen's Theatre during the subscription season. In the article of this day Mr. Lumley announces that the Saturday subscription of this week is to be changed to next Thursday, because the Queen commands the opera on Saturday. On Thursday I am engaged, as my arrangements are made for Tuesdays and Saturdays—the regular opera nights. I am an old subscriber to Lumley's theatre, and never go to Covent Garden; but if I be rejected on Saturday I will never put my foot in his theatre as long as he has the management.

Yours, Sir, with great respect,
A VERY OLD SUBSCRIBER.

June 30.

An explanation appeared in the same Journal the day after to the following effect :—

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—We have made inquiries into the circumstances referred to in a letter inserted in The Times of yesterday, involving a public question—the suspending the subscription on the occasion of the Queen's State visit on Saturday next. A state visit, we presume, is intended as an act of grace and a benefit to the director. The occasion is an extraordinary one—the visit in State of Her Majesty as Queen to her theatre; and as it seems no other day could be chosen, and that numerous boxes were indispensably required to form the State box, the State visit could scarcely have taken place if the claims of others were subject to no law and no necessity.

And here the matter ended.

THE COPYRIGHT QUESTION.

A very numerous meeting of British authors, publishers, stationers, printers, and others interested in the subject of copyright, was held on Tuesday afternoon at the Hanover-square Rooms, to take into consideration the present anomalous state of the laws relating thereto, as recently interpreted in the Court of Error. The circular convening the meeting stated, that by this interpretation, which reversed several recent decisions, the claim of a non-resident foreign author to copyright in this country was allowed, although the English author was strictly excluded from the benefit of copyright in foreign countries. The unreciprocated privilege thus conferred on foreigners, if finally established, would prove extremely prejudicial to the interests of British literature in all its departments, while it removed every inducement to the acceptance of their proposed International Copyright Act. The chair was taken by Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, who was supported by Mr. Henry Bohn as vice-chairman. Among those on the platform we observed Messrs. George Cruikshank, William Howitt, John Britton, Henry Colburn, R. H. Horne, and William Macfarlane, &c.

Sir E. BULWER LYTTON opened the proceedings by an able speech, in which he observed, that he had been requested to take the chair, to bring before the public a question which was exciting a great interest among all those who were connected with literary property. He would put before them briefly his opinion, although there might be gentlemen present who differed from him. He assured them, however, that when he took that chair he was determined that every one should enjoy a fair hearing. An act of Parliament, entitled the 8th of Anne, was cited as an act for the encouragement of learning by vesting the copies of printed books in the authors and purchasers of such copies during the time therein mentioned, and of which the preamble stated that it was for the encouragement of learned men to compose and write useful books, and to prevent the reprinting of books without the consent of the authors and proprietors. Besides this, the 12th George II., 15th George III., 41st George III., and other acts, were passed, which established a literary property by investing authors with a copyright of the works written by them. It was true that at first foreign works had very little interest here; they were naturally more sought after in the land where the language in which they were written was used. But more lately they began to publish works in countries other than their own, and in some cases political and theological works, which were contrary to the opinions of their own country, were published in other countries. This was the case both with French and Italian authors. He would only mention the celebrated instance of Voltaire, who published some of his works in Holland, but could not obtain a copyright. He afterwards came over to London and enjoyed the intimacy of many distinguished statesmen and other persons, and was especially the friend of Walpole, under whom the act of Anne had been passed, but he was never able to obtain a copyright, nor was he ever led to believe that he had any right of the sort. He raised £6000 by subscriptions to his works, and if purchase could have given him a copyright he was clearly entitled to it. He published two editions in London, and subsequently a third; but so far from possessing copyright, there was an edition published by Thompson without any of the corrections made by him in his own published editions. He then wrote a work in English under his master. It was translated into French and corrected by himself, and if ever there was a case when copyright might be given it would be on such an occasion. But this very essay was printed in 1739 without his corrections and with all the faults, which had almost driven him mad. Again, his complete works were published at Oxford, in which he was not styled Voltaire, but Arouet, the name of his father. Now, here was the case of a most celebrated man, acquainted with the most eminent persons, and personally known to those who passed the very act of Anne, and yet did not even think he could obtain or possess a copyright in England. He would not fatigue them with quoting cases of disputed copyright. He would pass at once to a case which occurred two years back, premising that the law was not disputed before 1822. In the case of "Boosey v. Purday," it was declared that the right was only intended for the benefit of English authors, and that foreigners could not obtain a copyright here. All this had been reversed by Lord Campbell, who had decided that the foreigner, by sending his work here for first or simultaneous publication, and the publisher in this country, have the same privileges as an English author. He should not for an instant attempt to set up a contrary opinion if he did not think that Lord Campbell had decided the question rather according to his views of literary property and political economy rather than as a judgment of law. He had said that it was an act for encouraging learning; but even supposing it was only to be applied to learning, he would ask, might it not be rather advisable that foreigners should publish first in this country? He quoted two acts of Edward IV. and Richard III. to show that the legislature encouraged foreign books, and enabled them to be brought over. This was also recited in the act of Anne, and they would, indeed, be barbarians if they opposed it. But it was a question whether one publisher should have the monopoly of the importation, or whether it should come through a variety of publishers. Granting that the act of Anne was for the protection of literature, was there not something in it of the utmost importance to foreigners? It was only since the peace that our literature had been published abroad. Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield was one of the first works that created any sensation in another country. What Pope and Richardson commenced, Scott and Byron followed up, and it was owing to them that light literature was encouraged abroad. Since the peace a large reading public was formed, who obtained the works of authors without their getting one shilling remuneration for it. He would appeal to any author or bookseller present, to say if there was not a considerable diminution in the demand for works. In lighter literature, it was true, the one in which he himself was engaged (applause) there was more demand; but, when they looked to the severe learning which the act of Anne was intended to protect, he would ask whether 200 or 300 copies would not make all the distinction between profit and loss? and, further, was not this difference in the demand created by the foreign reprints abroad used in Canada and the colonies? And this made so much difference that all habitual readers would observe that our Belles Lettres were daily becoming extinct. When he had the honour of being in Parliament, he had placed on the table a motion for an international copyright act. (Applause.) They had recently passed an act by which copyright was given to the authors of those countries who would reciprocate the same. Some of the German States had entered into this arrangement. France and America still held back, although in both many eminent men were in favour of it; but as long as this reading of the act of Anne was taken, the International Copyright Act would only be a sheet of parchment to make battledoors and shuttlecocks of. Foreigners would not give anything unless they obtained something in return. In light literature alone, in his own case, if this law had been established when he began to write, he should have been £60,000 richer. He had no doubt the same results would be observed in every other branch, and moreover that America would become a contributor to them instead of their chief despoiler. He had not much reliance on what they were told—that conscientious dealing was always the generator of reciprocity. They were told they must continue to do right, whatever other countries did; but he thought the first rule of a country was to protect its own. They had done what was right; they had offered reciprocity, but as it was not received, he thought any act that would sanction or protect any State that pirated on them was most erroneous. By not joining in international copyright, the Americans were not protecting their own authors. The publishers could tell any of their historians that he could get the best History of England (Macaulay's) for nothing, and therefore would not give him his price; or to the novelist, that he could obtain the last work of Dickens; and so, when all these works were selling for a few cents throughout the country, the effect on the composition of their own authors must be very bad, as it would make them merely copyists of these works, instead of producing a spontaneous and distinct literature, as inhabitants of a totally different country. Now, in Belgium, where they were as much advanced in all industrial arts as in America, there was positively no native literature. About a century back it gave promise of a healthy existence, now it was thoroughly extinguished, owing to the pirated editions of French works published there; and so it would be in America. Their Cooper and Irvine were children of a past generation, and none were rising in their stead with the honourable exception of Mr. Prescott. The hon. chairman continued at some length to show that the Americans would be the losers by continuing their present system. He most sincerely regretted that he should be opposed to the views of some present, and to find himself demurring against the judgment of Lord Campbell, whom he considered as one of the most illustrious of a long line of ornaments to British jurisprudence; but in taking that chair he could not avoid expressing his regret at the course taken. Further, whatever might be his opinions as to the reprints in America, they had no right to blame them so long as it was sanctioned by law. After some further remarks in praise of the great nationality of the Americans, the chairman called on Mr. Bohn to move the first resolution.

Mr. H. Bohn said, the views he advocated were expressed in a pamphlet, extracts from which he would read. He wished to lay briefly before them the principal facts connected with the subject of foreign copyright in Great Britain, and its bearings on the interests of literature. As his attention had been for some years directed to the subject, and he had considerable stake in what he considered their equitable interpretation in regard to foreign claims, he might bring before them circumstances which might not have previously occurred to them. He proposed to give an enumeration of the several conflicting judgments which had recently taken place in the courts of law, also to give a review of various acts and cases which were cited as authorities, on the one side or the other, and an answer to the several arguments which had lately been put forth in the courts of law, or by opponents elsewhere. He would first mention the case of "Boosey v. Jefferys," which, as the most recent decision, was more immediately before them. He considered the judgment in that case as directly opposed to the commercial spirit of the age, inasmuch as it promoted foreign monopoly in this country, imposed foreign restrictions on a large ingredient of their cheap literature, and, by removing all inducements towards international copyright, put a veto on the beneficial extension of their own literature abroad. It held out a premium to foreign countries to plunder them more extensively than ever, their hands being more securely tied from self-defence. After stating the case which Sir E. Bulwer Lytton alluded to, he proceeded to state that in "Ollendorff v. Black," Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce granted an injunction restraining the defendant from importing a Frankfort edition of the plaintiff's grammar, mainly on the plea of first publication in Great Britain, connected with the circumstance of the plaintiff being present himself at the time. For some time previous to these cases decisions had been the other way; that was adverse to foreign claims. In 1845; in "Chappell v. Purday," the Court of Exchequer delivered an emphatic opinion that a foreign author residing abroad, who composed a work there, could have no copyright in this country, neither could the English assignee. This was confirmed by the same court in "Boosey v. Purday." Between the periods of these judgments in the Court of Exchequer, that was in 1848, the Court of Common Pleas pronounced a judgment enacting the reverse of those in the other court in the case of "Cocks v. Purday," which judgment was followed in another case, "Boosey v. Davidson," in the Court of Queen's Bench. The first act which defined copyright in this country was that of Queen Anne, passed in 1709. Previously, for some years, there had been great uncertainty as to the existence of vested rights in literary composition, there being no express laws on the subject. Opinions ran in extremes. Some asserted that when thoughts were put to paper they became public property, and that only the manuscript was the exclusive property of the producer; others that there was a perpetual property in literary composition as much as in freeholds. The act mentioned gave copyright for twenty-one years to books already printed, and fourteen to those which should thereafter be printed, and was passed in consequence of a petition from the London booksellers, and was the result of the united deliberation and judgment of many of the principal authors of the day, none of whom were foreign, nor could have any foreign interests whatever. After enumerating and explaining the clauses of this and other acts on the subject, and quoting some other litigated cases—in one of which, when Clementi in 1822, had brought an action against Walker, to restrain him from selling what was called a piracy on Kalkbrenner, then resident in this country, the judges were clearly of opinion, that a foreign author had no British copyright, and Baron Bayley, in his opinion, said—"The statute of Anne not only gives protection to authors as to books thereafter to be published, but to books previously printed; but the British Legislature must be supposed to have legislated with a view to British interests and the advancement of British learning. By confining the privilege to British printing, British capital, workmen, and materials would be employed, and the work would be within the reach of the British public. By extending the privilege to foreign printing, the employment of British capital, workmen, and materials might be suspended, and the work never find its way to the British public. Without very clear words, therefore, to show an intention to extend the privilege to foreign publication, I should think it must be confined to books printed in this kingdom; and instead of there being any such clear words to show that intention, there are provisions which strongly imply the latter." He then considered at length the arguments of counsel in support of foreign claims, and showed that De Lolme and Kepin, who were said to have possessed copyrights here, in reality had nothing of the kind. In America a person could enjoy copyright by becoming an American citizen and surrendering all other allegiance. This could be effected by taking a written oath for that purpose. After mentioning the mischief that might be apprehended by the present interpretation of the law he said, that he had an almost vital stake in the question. His best property, however cheap it was produced, was taken from him by reprints, when he had counted on the most beneficial sale; his own investments were treated as invalid under former constructions of the acts; and when, to redress himself, he attempted reprisals he was met by a change of views in the courts of law. He concluded by moving the following resolution:—

"That this meeting views with apprehension the recent decisions of the Court of Error, reversing the previous decision of the court of Exchequer, and thereby declaring that foreign authors resident abroad are entitled to British copyright, although subjects of a State which declines to avail itself of the International Copyright Act: that such decision, if finally established, must prove extremely prejudicial to the interests of British literature in all its departments, while it removes a material inducement to the acceptance of foreign States of the International Copyright Act."

The Rev. Dr. Worthington seconded the resolution in a speech of some length, in which he introduced the following quotation from the great lexicographer, Dr. Johnson, to show his views on copyright law:—

"There seems to be in authors a stronger right of property than that by occupancy—a metaphysical right, a right as it were by creation, which should from its very nature be perpetual, but the consent of nations is against it; for were it to be perpetual, no book, however useful, could be universally diffused among mankind, should the proprietor take it into his head to restrain the circulation. For the good of the world, therefore, whatever individual work has once been created by an author and issued out by him, should be understood as no longer in his power, but as belonging to the public; at the same time, the author is entitled to an adequate reward. This he should have by an exclusive right to his work for a considerable number of years."

Ernest Jones (the Chartist), moved an amendment to the effect—that the meeting viewed with satisfaction the recent judgment of Lord Campbell as one of the preparatory steps, and as being most conducive to that which justice required, an international law of copyright—which was seconded by Mr. Wilkes, bookseller, of Craven-street.

Mr. Fozzle spoke in support of the resolution.

Mr. Colburn said, that until some law was passed to protect copyright the interests of authors were much endangered. They would not write unless they were protected. He had given 800*l.* or 1000*l.* for books which at the present time, owing to the state of the law he would not give 100*l.* for. There was a novel he had lately brought out which was taken over and reprinted in America, and not only this, but published in a newspaper there; and this newspaper would be sent all over the country free of expense by Government.

Mr. Jefferys spoke of the piracy used with respect to musical publications.

Mr. Novello supported the amendment.

Mr. Cocks mentioned that Balfe and Wallace, as also Mr. George Osborne, Steradale Bennett, Cipriani Potter, and J. B. Cramer, sold their works abroad. He brought this under their notice to show that foreign kindness to the English had not been so much lost sight of as had been spoken about.

Mr. Hyde Clarke spoke to the amendment; after which the chairman put the amendment, which was lost, and the original resolution was carried.

Mr. G. Cruikshank, in a humorous speech, proposed the second resolution, which was as follows:—

"That this meeting considers the subject of great national interest and importance, and that the expense of determining the meaning of the law thereon ought not to devolve on a private individual. That, therefore, a society be formed to consider and adopt the necessary steps to obtain a satisfactory adjustment of the law, as well as to provide, by public subscription, for the requisite expenditure."

which was seconded by Mr. M^rFarlane.

Mr. Henry Mayhew wished to move an amendment of a rather personal nature, but on a few words from the chairman withdrew it, and After some observations from Mr. H. Colburn, the meeting separated.

Dramatic Intelligence.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—FRENCH PLAYS.—On Saturday last was produced, for the first time this season, Schiller's play of Marie Stuart, adapted to the French stage by Mr. Lebrun. The original has been cut up in the most merciless manner; yet there still remains a sufficient amount of vitality to constitute a very palatable drama, abounding in interest, and calling on the pity and sympathy of the audience by positions and effects not usually found in the imitation of the so-called classical school. Mr. Lebrun has attempted to soften down the asperities of the German dramatist, to convert him as it were to his own standard of excellence—the school of Corneille and Racine. Hence arises a sort of duality in the individuality of the characters, as we frequently see on the French stage, when two, three, or more hands or heads set to work to produce a piece, the great desideratum of which should necessarily be unity of design, but which, in the course of sundry manipulations, turns out a mere piece of patchwork. We see combined in Marie Stuart the vigorous, daring genius of the German dramatist, and the timid, doubting caution of the French translator, with the ghost of Racine in the distance, horror-struck at the audacity of the culprit and the fear of the Academy hanging over him like a stifling, portentous thunder-cloud, threatening to burst on his devoted head. The consequence of this hesitation is a certain amount of vigour and effect combined with much feebleness and timidity. The piece possesses no grand absorbing interest such as we find in Phédre, Horace, Le Cid, in which the action is gradually developed until the great event which forms the climax of the tragedy is looked upon as a relief of the principal personage from all further suffering, and not as a calamity in itself. The principal interest is here derived from the grouping of the characters, from their historical celebrity, and from the sympathy with which we are accustomed to view the unhappy martyrdom of the principal personage. Departing from historical truth the author has produced one scene which constitutes the great point in the play; we allude to the interview between the two queens. This is taken almost verbatim from the German. Into this scene Mademoiselle Rachel threw all her energies, and displayed such virulent and withering hate towards her sister as amounted to absolute ferocity. The sudden transition from prayer and supplication to intense hatred—her humility—her subsequent exasperation, when taunted with the fate of her lovers, were admirably descriptive of the character. When Marie throws herself at the feet of Elizabeth, and exclaims—

"Reine, ne laissez pas votre sœur malheureuse,
Tremblante à vos genoux vous supplier en vain,
Et pour la relever, tendez-lui votre main—"

the posture of the actress was the very incarnation of profound humility, as she pronounced the words. She has laid aside every recollection of queenly dignity, her hereditary and divine rights are here prostrate at the feet of her rival. She is no longer the queen of the first act, who, in her interview with Burleigh, has indignantly rejected the competency of the tribunal before which she is called upon to appear. She is now the abandoned, feeble suppliant—her body is bent forward, her hands extended, her eyes upraised in mute prayer and deprecation. When Elizabeth replies—

"Le ciel, juste entre nous, vous met à votre place—" a sudden thrill pervades her whole frame—she starts convulsively to her feet—the spirit of revenge and retaliation begins to rise within her; she, however, has sufficient force to subdue this first impulse, and, in answer to the Queen's threat—

"Il menaçait ma tête, il va frapper la votre," she replies—

"Je suis soumise à Dieu; mais j'en garde l'espoir Vous n'abuserez pas d'un semblable pouvoir."

But even in this humility, Mademoiselle Rachel contrived to prepare us for the subsequent outburst of frenetic rage; her voice trembles, her lips quiver, the accent has lost much of its previous placidity and deprecative-ness; there is less of prayer than of menace in her intonation; it is the delivery of one who attempts to remain calm, being aware that therein dwells the only chance of safety, but who is unknowingly mastered by the workings of the inward soul. She bows her head to conceal her anger from Elizabeth; but Elizabeth again launches forth into vituperous recriminations against her captive; she wounds her in the most sensitive point of woman—both in her love and self-love. Then the unfortunate victim throws aside all restraint; she boldly faces her jailor, and after the ejaculation, "Oh, ma sœur!" which spoke volumes of contempt, indignation, and undisguised abhorrence, she pours forth a torrent of bitter irony and withering reproaches. She proudly asserts her claim to the throne of England, and crushes her rival with her own amours, birth, and her mother's adultery—

"—— Le fruit de l'adultère
Profane insolémment le trône de l'Angleterre.

Si le ciel était juste, indigne souveraine !
Vous seriez à ma place, car je suis votre reine."

This was given with startling ferocity. Mademoiselle Rachel, who excels in the expression of passages of this description, surpassed herself on this occasion; her every word was like the sharp blow of a dagger, sometimes struck in rapid succession, sometimes slowly descending into the wound, and seemingly searching into the most vital parts of the palpitating victim. The words, "car je suis votre reine" were given with supreme majesty. She drew herself up to her full height; an expression of quiet contempt and conscious superiority played upon her lips—her whole being seemed transformed. The effect produced was the greatest we ever witnessed on any stage; it was the triumph of the histrionic art. In her subsequent interview with Burleigh, she revels in the obloquy which she has heaped on her rival; she is revenged beyond her most sanguine hopes—

"Où, devant Leicester. Il doublait mon courage,
Je lisais mon triomphe écrit sur son visage.
Où, quand j'humiliais ses charmes orgueilleux,
Leicester était là : j'étais reine à ses yeux."

A few curtailments would perhaps be necessary in the fifth act, more especially when Mdle. Rachel is not on the stage; yet there is a good idea of stage effect in this last act, which from the contrast with the preceding, produces a strong impression on the feelings. Mdle. Rachel was totally transformed from what she had previously been. Indeed her whole conception of the character may be divided into three distinct parts during the three acts in which she appears. In the first she impersonates the queen by divine right; years of captivity have not made her forget her privileges, and there is a tone of condescension even in her prayers which bespeaks the sovereign though fallen from her high estate. In the second act she is the woman with all the feelings and passions of woman, preferring the gratifications of her vengeance to every sentiment of self-preservation. In the third act she is the lowly penitent, utterly unmindful of the things of this world; all her pride has vanished, her feelings of revenge have given way to softer impulses of pardon and oblivion; the queen and the woman have totally disappeared; she bows her head in lowly resignation, and offers up her life in atonement for her past errors. This last phase of the character was made peculiarly interesting by Mdle. Rachel's chaste rendering of the farewell scene with her domestics and friends, and, when she fell on her knees to implore Burleigh's blessing, a feeling of tenderness and profound sympathy was visible on every countenance. The whole conception of the part was inimitable; and we feel assured that Marie Stuart may rank among Mdle. Rachel's happiest inspirations. J. de C.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—A new farce, entitled Grimshaw, Bagshaw, and Bradshaw, was produced on Tuesday night with most decided success, and owes its good fortune partly to the drollery of the dialogue, partly to the broad comic humour of Mr. Buckstone. Mr. Grimshaw, whom he represents, is a druggist's assistant, who having to get up at an early hour in the morning greatly loves to retire to rest at an early hour in the evening. The fates stand in the way of his innocent predilection, and as his room is so situated as to afford a convenient shelter for other lodgers in the same house he is exposed to all sorts of annoyances. Now he is taken for Mr. Bradshaw, who has eloped with Emily, niece of a sheriff's officer named Towzer, now for Mr. Bagshaw, whom the same Towzer is pursuing with a writ. The inflictions to which he is subjected give rise to a host of odd details, which would fall flat in description, but which are exceedingly humorous when addressed to the eye. The fault of the piece is that it is somewhat too complicated, considering its slowness, and therefore lacks the decided clearness of Box and Cox, to which it is not altogether dissimilar. But the surprises of Buckstone, leading him at last to doubt his own identity altogether, are provocative of laughter throughout; and the dialogue abounds with those peculiarly English pleasantries which give a native appearance to a work, although (as is probably the case here) it is built on a French foundation.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.—Full houses have rewarded the exertions of the managers of this theatre. There has been no novelty during the week that requires notice. The benefit of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean is fixed for Monday, when we have no doubt that the friends of the accomplished twain will rally round them, and give them a bumper.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—The entertainments at this house have been revived by the production of a farce called the Fire-eater. The scene is laid in the time of the Parliamentary wars, but the origin is evidently French. The hero of the piece, having enlisted because his hand is refused by the father of a village beauty, is informed that his comrades are in the habit of playing off practical jokes upon novices. In consequence of this information he endures real dangers because he imagines them to be artificial; and even when he is about to be shot as a spy he laughs at his position. When at last he discovers that the perils he has passed are no jokes his natural timidity revives, and he faints at the thought of his desperate escapes. The idea of the piece is novel, though it is somewhat meagrely worked out, and it is rendered effective by the strongly seasoned acting of Mr. Compton.

The benefit of Mr. Farren, the lessee, took place on Wednesday, on which occasion Miss Helen Fawcett and Mr. J. William Wallack performed the principal characters in the Lady of Lyons. The house was crowded.

MARYLEBONE.—The performances at this theatre continue to prove attractive. Pauline has been produced under another name, with Mr. Hoskins of Sadler's Wells notoriety, for the principal character, which he personates with considerable effect. Mr. Doel is going through a series of characters of the Liston and Harley school. Mr. Wyld continues to excite the risible muscles of the audience by his broad practical humour, and Miss Williams to elicit their applause by her vivacity in the Soubrette line of impersonations. Finally, we have a melodrama in which a great Newfoundland dog is made to rescue virgins, and detect midnight assassins. Although we could wish the performances here to be of a more legitimate kind, yet, as managers have got to pay their employées, as well as to please the critics, who can blame them for uniting these objects in any way in their power?

CRUVELLI'S NORMA.

(From the Daily News.)

The repetition of Norma by Mademoiselle Cruvelli, on Saturday evening, was even more successful, and made a deeper impression on the audience, than any of her previous performances of the part. She appears to have gradually become more and more imbued with the spirit of the character. Her action is spontaneous and impulsive. We see before us the impassioned woman whom she personates, and lose sight of the actress with her artificial gestures and statuesque poses, very beautiful and striking indeed, but too obviously premeditated and calculated for effect. Her performance on Saturday evening, for power and beauty of voice, clear execution of every passage, energy and feeling, could scarcely be surpassed.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The second, and professedly the last, grand morning concert for the present season took place on Monday, when the principal artists of the establishment, with the exception of Mademoiselle Sofie Cruvelli, assisted in the programme, which, with few exceptions, was composed exclusively of music of a light and popular character. The chief part in Mr. Thalberg's opera of Florinda, which comes out on Thursday, being allotted to Mademoiselle Cruvelli, her non-appearance was readily accounted for. The report of her illness is entirely without foundation, but at the same time it was wrong on the part of the management to have announced her name in the concert bills; and those who were attracted by the programme, in which Mademoiselle Cruvelli, and her sister were advertised to sing in several pieces, had good cause to be dissatisfied with the loss of one of the great features of the selection.

The concert began with Beethoven's splendid overture to Egmont, remarkably well played by the band. Mademoiselle Caroline Duprez then sang the beautiful air from St. Paul, "O Jerusalem," with a purity of style that declared a thorough appreciation of the music. Two pieces, essentially French in character, followed—a cavatina from Donizetti's Les Martyrs, exceedingly well sung by Madame Giuliani, and the well-known bolero, "La chanteuse voilée," executed to perfection by Madame Ugalde, to whose peculiar style of vocalization it was admirably adapted. The duet, "Serbami ognor," from Semiramide, was a somewhat ambitious essay for Mademoiselle Duprez and Mademoiselle Ida Bertrand, who excel in music of a very opposite character. The duet from La Gazza Ladra, "Come frenar," was scarcely better suited to Mademoiselle Alaymo and Signor Coletti, who, among their many excellent qualities as vocalists, can certainly not lay claim to what is termed agilité. Madame Sontag sang, "On mighty pens," from Haydn's Creation, in a highly impressive manner; and the fine voice of Madame Fiorentini found ample scope for display in Mozart's aria, "Deh parlate" (announced in the bills as an air from Cimarosa's forgotten oratorio, Il Sacrificio d'Abramo). The most decided effect, however, produced in the first part of the concert, was by Mr.

Sims Reeves, who, by his energetic and spirited delivery of the air from Purcell's King Arthur, "Come if you dare" (with chorus), roused the audience out of an unusual state of torpor, and gained a well-merited encore.

The unpublished pieces of Paganini formed at this, as at the last, concert one of the special points of the programme, and Signor Siviore was again the executant. On the present occasion he repeated the "Witches' Dance," and played for the first time, a morceau entitled "Il Mouvemente Perpetuo." We must do Signor Siviore the justice to say, that as far as his own execution was concerned, nothing could have been more perfect and satisfactory, and that the last piece, a kind of étude, in which the bow arm runs the risk of getting the cramp, was a masterpiece of mechanical dexterity. On the other hand, however, we have to reiterate our opinion, now confirmed irrevocably, that the music attributed to the late Paganini is but sorry trash, and that its permanent continuance in the obscurity of MS. would be no loss whatever to the art. The audience did ample justice to Signor Siviore by recalling him after each performance, but the applause bestowed was solely due to the merits of the violinist.

In the second part of the concert the honours fell to Madame Sontag, who sang a bolero, by Besozzi (a composer unknown to fame), and the English (or, as some will have it, Spanish) ballad of "Home, sweet home," the latter of which, given with the sweetest expression, was unanimously re-demanded. The bolero of Besozzi, though lively enough, had no other claim to admiration than that which can never be withheld from skilful and effective orchestration; the melody is null, the passages are threadbare, and the form inartificial; but the arrangement of the orchestra covered a multitude of sins, and, together with the brilliant singing of Madame Sontag, obtained a success for the music of its obscure author entirely independent of its intrinsic merits. The air "Sonda al mesta," from Cenerentola, is one of those things which Signor Calzolari sings best. In the elegant florid style this vocalist is quite at home, which he fully established on Monday, by his almost faultless delivery of the air in question. The comic duet from Il Matrimonio, "Se fiato in corpo avete," thanks to the irresistible humour of Lablache, and the spirited co-operation of his son Frederic, produced its accustomed effect, and the last movement was enored with acclamations. One of the great hits of the second part was the air "Roberto toi que j'aime," which Mademoiselle Alaymo sang with so much passion and feeling that she was twice recalled at the conclusion, and deserved the more praise for resolutely declining the encore she might so reasonably have accepted. Neidmeyer's villanelle, "Pour les attrait de Noble Dame," from Marie Stuart, is one of the dullest pieces from a very dull opera, and the united talents of Madame Sontag, Madame Giuliani, Mademoiselle Ida Bertrand, Signors Gardoni and F. Lablache, with the introduction of the popular Scotch ditty, "Auld lang syne," to boot, failed to render it attractive. Besides the pieces we have enumerated the band played the overtures to the Ruler of the Spirits (Weber), and Prometheus (Beethoven). Mr. Balfe conducted the whole concert, except the compositions by Paganini, which were directed by M. Tolbecque, and went much better than on the last occasion. On the whole the selection was hardly worthy of an establishment possessing such great resources as Her Majesty's Theatre. The house was crowded in every part.

Il Prodigio was repeated on Friday. Norma on Saturday drew a large assembly, and passed off with immense eclat. Taken altogether it was certainly Cruvelli's grandest and most forcible impersonation of the Druidess. Several entirely new points were made by the great artist in the closing scene of the first act, where Norma discovers Pollio's perfidy; the most striking of which was the agony and despair made so evident in the rushing up the stage, and the wild waving of the hands as if she struggled with some thick cloud that strove to choke her in its dark embrace.

This was thrilling and sublime. We are not advocates for the entirely impulsive in acting, and fear that Cruvelli does not sufficiently depend upon art, or more properly, leaves too much to the instigation of the moment. However, when we see so great an effect proceeding from momentary impulse, we are not inclined to find fault with so much self-dependence as is indicated in Cruvelli. It must be remembered that if genius be the racehorse, art is the bridle which curbs, regulates, steers, and lands him safe at the goal.

La Prova d'un Opera Seria was repeated after Norma, and again received with shouts of laughter. The charming Ugalde obtained another triumph by her brilliant and most captivating singing.

Between the opera and La Prova, a divertissement was given, in which Amalia Ferraris and the principal chorographs danced so entirely to the satisfaction of the audience that they were honoured with a general recall. We were glad to perceive so distinguished a mark of favour paid to the undeniable abilities of the youthful and charming Mademoiselles Rosa, Allegrini, Jullien, Aussandon, Lamoureux, Feyer, Kohlenberg, Soto, Pascuales, Dantoine, &c., &c., whose efforts are hardly sufficiently prized by the visitors to Her Majesty's Theatre. La Sylphide concluded the evening's performance, Marie Taglioni reaping more than the customary harvest of honours.

Mr. Lumley is a lucky man. In one week he has a "special" performance by desire of Her Majesty, and a royal state night by command. This indeed is a regal compliment; which, we believe, is unprecedented. The performance by special desire on Tuesday was Il Prodigio. Her Majesty did not arrive until towards the end of the second act—but remained till the termination. She was accompanied by Prince Albert, the King of the Belgians and his two sons, and a numerous suite. The royal party appeared entirely gratified with the performance.

If any legend is better known than another, it is that which was popularly used to account for the fall of the Gothic monarchy in Spain. The ballads about the untimely fate of Don Roderic are among the most striking in the Spanish romances, and the story furnished Southey with a subject for one of his earlier epics. The Last of the Goths is now once more brought before the public as the hero of an opera, composed by Mr. Thalberg and written by M. Scribe. It is called Florinda, after the ill-fated maiden whose seduction by the Gothic King caused her father, Count Julian, to aid the Arabs in their subjugation of Spain.

According to the libretto of the new opera, Rodrigo visits the Arab camp disguised as a brother Arab of considerable renown, his chief object being to see a young lady, whose life he has saved, and with whom he has, of course, fallen in love. He discovers that she is the daughter of Count Julian, the veteran governor of Setta, while she, recognising her deliverer, is so horrified at the thought that she has become enamoured of an infidel, that she resolves to take the veil. Rodrigo, still disguised, visits the convent where she resides, and first raises her hopes by confessing that he is a Christian, then crushes them by declaring that he cannot marry her. She virtuously resists his equivocal courtship, but he carries her off by force, and her dishonour is the result of his audacity. In the meanwhile the Moorish Chief, Munussa, makes every attempt to shake the fidelity of the old Count, but all expedients fail till Julian finds that his family honour has been attacked. His child has returned to him in a state of mental aberration, and at a festival given to the King discovers that Rodrigo and the seducer are the same person. Julian, from vengeance, opens the gates of the city, Setta, to the Arabs, much to the disquietude of his son, Favila, who, though he regards family honour much, regards his country more. The situation is complicated by a visit from the guilty King, who offers to marry the wronged Florinda, and thus overwhelms the vindictive Count with remorse. The Arabs enter the town; Favila dies resisting them; Julian, taking no pleasure in the golden rewards of his treachery, flings himself upon the body of his son, and the fate of the seduced and the seducer is left uncertain, for they are seen escaping in the distance.

The old story, it will be seen at a glance, is much diluted by this treatment. The "offer of marriage" steps in with singular weakness. Nor is anything gained by the expansion. Nor the vindictive Count, nor the patriotic son, nor the wronged daughter, nor the naughty monarch, forms the centre of a strong interest considered as a dramatic personage; nor is there that presentation of historical tableaux which renders the books of Gustave, the Huguenots, and the Prophète so remarkable. There is the complication of the French school, without its concomitant variety; there is the routine character of the Italian school, without its definite neatness.

Mr. Thalberg has long enjoyed a European reputation as a composer for the pianoforte, an instrument upon which he is admitted to have excelled nearly all his contemporaries and predecessors. Whatever conflicting opinions may exist about the intrinsic value of his works, when weighed in the balance with those of the "classical" writers, the fact of their originality does not admit of a question. Mr. Thalberg—aided by wonderful mechanical aptitude, the joint attainment of unremitting labour and a happy organization—invented a wholly new form of music for the piano, the declining influence of which at the present time must not be attributed to its author, but to the mediocrity of his imitators. To find anything fresh enough to excite attention and interest now out of elements so completely "used up" would require an amount of ingenuity accorded to very few. What is threadbare cannot be mended. The limits of Mr. Thalberg's first idea have been transgressed; and the attempts of a host of bad copyists to create unceasing variety out of such slender materials have resulted in endless displays of incapacity. What the followers of Mendelssohn have done for the Lieder ohne Worte the followers of Mr. Thalberg have effected for that especial class of fantasia which he originated, and, like Mendelssohn, exhausted. We make no comparison between such opposite things, nor are we disposed to accord to a style of music essentially light and ephemeral the chance of immortality that awaits those genial and exquisite melodies with which Mendelssohn was wont at once to utilize the moments devoted to his less serious labours, and to enrich the storehouse of the art. It is more than probable, however, that we are indebted to the growing indifference of the public towards the later pianoforte compositions of Mr. Thalberg and his followers for Florinda—the forerunner, we trust, of still better dramatic essays.

The general impression produced on us by a single hearing of the music of Florinda has been one of mingled sentiments. We confess we did not anticipate from Mr. Thalberg either the dramatic expression or the familiar acquaintance with the quality and use of orchestral instruments which his first opera displays; nor did we look for the skilful combination of voices, the harmonic variety, and the able conduct of finales and concerted pieces, which it betrays in a degree scarcely less remarkable. Having conceived our estimate of Mr. Thalberg's powers from his pianoforte writings, and especially from his sonata in C minor, where his notions of form and development are most extensively set forth, we were led to expect something very different from what we heard last night. That Mr. Thalberg has been at Vienna during the recess, studying under the famous contrapuntist Sechter, is, we believe, generally known; but, though Sechter could communicate the rules and canons of composition, together with the secrets of their application, he could not furnish what nature alone has the power to give—a peculiar train of ideas, and a novel method in their arrangement. We shall not enter into an analysis of the music of Florinda, which is too elaborate to be judged without a closer intimacy than is to be obtained from a single hearing, but must content ourselves with a general statement of the impression it produced upon us, and a brief summary of those pieces which produced the greatest effect upon the audience and upon ourselves. The drama is tragic; and this may explain and defend the sombre tone preserved in the music, with rare intervals, from first to last. The extreme care and finish bestowed upon the orchestral accompaniments, in the smallest as in the largest pieces, also tends to the same result, and the constant use of minor keys deepens the prevailing gloom. Mr. Thalberg allows the ear no repose; and, while the obligato manner in which the various instruments are incessantly employed occasionally leads to new and beautiful combinations, there is an evidence of labour which fatigues the attention and derogates from the dramatic and vocal effect. Amid all this, however, the undeniable presence of thought, and the careful study of the proprieties of expression, cannot fail to command respect. Every piece in the opera has been composed with a direct purpose, and finished with elaborate completeness. Mr. Thalberg has endeavoured to emulate the great masters in giving to the music of each of his personages a separate and individual colouring. The music allotted to Florinda is of the most arduous and trying character; but it is earnest throughout, and frequently reaches a high standard of expression. It has, however, a great and insuperable drawback, which it shares in common with certain noted operas of the French school. It taxes the resources of the singer to the utmost verge of the possible, and demands a range of notes from treble to bass, which probably no other vocalist of the present day can boast but Mademoiselle Sofie Cruvelli—for whom nevertheless the part was not originally composed, Mr. Thalberg having no particular artist in view when he wrote. While, therefore, he must be considered fortunate in having found an executant like this young lady, endowed with extraordinary physical gifts, and a stamina which allows of a continued exhibition of dramatic force and energy through four long acts, without fatigue or failing strength, he would do well in his next opera to consult general applicability rather than exceptional means. The frequent recourse to the highest notes of the register, in passages of vehemence and excitement—notes that must not merely be delivered with emphasis, but dwelt on and sustained—is wearing to the singer, and at the end must inevitably damage a voice of even greater power and freshness, if that were possible, than that of Mademoiselle Cruvelli. The reason why so many voices are ruined at the Grand Opera in Paris, may be easily deduced from the obstinate mania, which possesses the composers most in vogue (Meyerbeer, Halévy, &c.), of thus misusing an instrument of such tenderness and uncertain stability. These gentlemen seem to think that the human voice has the same faculty of resistance which belongs to instruments of wood and brass. The error is grave, and in warning Mr. Thalberg against it at the outset of his career as a composer for the theatre, we think we are rendering him a service. Of the other characters in the opera, that of Count Julian is the most striking in its musical treatment. Of the two tenor parts, that of Rodrigo, the king, is the most genuine. Favila is nearly as uninteresting in the music as in the drama. In some of the concerted pieces, however, this personage is brought out with sufficient force, and is of considerable importance as an agent in the general effect. Manuzza, the Moorish chief, is a comparative failure, although a striking opportunity was offered in his person for music of an individual character, to contrast with and relieve the others. Mr. Thalberg might with advantage have reflected upon the fine art and graphic boldness with which Gluck, in his Iphigenia, has made Thoas, the Scythian king stand out from the canvass. The page Theodomiro, is a nonentity, and it was hardly giving a fair chance to Mademoiselle Marie Cruvelli, the new contralto, to bring her before the public, for the first time, in so insignificant a part.

The overture opens with a slow movement, the chief characteristic of which is vagueness. The allegro, however, in E minor, contains some brilliant passages, and the whole is most elaborately instrumented, although the coda, in the major, is too noisy. The opening chorus in G, in which the Moorish soldiers dilate on the glories of the coming tournament proclaimed by Munuzza, is founded, we are told, upon a veritable Moorish tune, which has the peculiarity attributed to the Arab music, of a strong accent on the second note of each measure. However this may be, the chorus itself is fresh and melodious. After some intermediate music, the burden of the chorus is resumed in the original key, and completes the introduction. The next piece worth noting is a cavatina, in which Rodrigo recounts to his page his love for Florinda, whose life he has been the means of saving. This has some good points, but it is deficient in melody, and does not express very forcibly the sentiment of the words. The finale, which opens with a chorus of Moors, à la marcia, contains a quintet, in A flat, for all the principal characters except Count Julian, which, besides the graceful turn of the melody, is enriched by varied and ingenious orchestral effects. An expressive romance, in F sharp minor, for Florinda, is also a remarkable piece in this finale, which winds up with great bustle and spirit. The faults of the first act are a want of melody, over-elaboration of the accompaniments, especially in the recitatives, and an entire absence of vocal phrases, which, from its great length (nearly an hour and a half), is felt to be tiresome. The second act is considerably shorter than the first, and more effective in proportion. It opens with a chorus of nuns, which, in addition to a flowing melody, is adroitly harmonized, and displays a good knowledge of the effects to be derived from the combination of female voices. The next piece, an air for Count Julian, is exceedingly heavy, and the introduction of the leading phrase in the allegro of the overture does not confer much charm upon the cabaletta. A scene, with chorus, for Florinda, who is about to take the veil, would be better if it were half as long. Both movements are in the minor key, which makes the whole monotonous. A duet for Rodrigo and Florinda, in which the Moor attempts to win over the daughter of Count Julian under the false pretext of his being a Christian, contains a charming phrase, announced by the oboe (again in the minor key), and an ensemble for the two voices ("Qual luce risplende") with an accompaniment for horns, which is exceedingly pleasing and well written. The cabaletta of this duet is almost the only lively subject in the opera; but it has the misfortune of being commonplace, and its simplicity is affected. The finale, describing the consternation of the nuns and friars at the sacrilege committed by Don Rodrigo in carrying off Florinda from the convent, is not remarkable. The trombones have their hands full, but the general effect is more overwhelming than impressive. The third act comprises some of the best music in the opera, and some of the feeblest. The duet in which Munuzza tries to tempt Count Julian from his allegiance is very long; and the air of Favila, who dilates on the valour and loyalty of the Spaniards, is vapid and noisy. There are, however, some fine declamatory passages in the scep in which Florinda is deranged, and the ballet music, especially the first dance, in which the saxophone, one of the happiest inventions of M. Sax, is agreeably employed, is light, sparkling, and instrumented with considerable fancy. The finale, where Julian demands justice at the hands of the King, for his dishonoured child, Florinda recognises her seducer in Rodrigo himself, and Favila challenges the King to mortal combat, is the most elaborate and the most effective piece in the opera. The agitato movement in F minor, describing the consternation arising from the discovery, is very stirring and dramatic; and were the repetition of the principal motivo (a serious mistake) omitted, the effect would be still greater. The fourth act is somewhat tedious. It begins, however, with a beautiful cantabile for Florinda—one of the few absolutely melodious phrases in the work. The duet between Favila and Count Julian is heavy, and the following morceau d'ensemble, when the King offers to make the amende honorable by espousing Florinda, wears out the resources of the soprano, whose voice throughout the whole of this act, indeed, is kept on a continual strain. Another long duet for Florinda and Favila contains several good passages, and especially a short preghiera a due voce. The chorus of Moorish soldiers, with which the last act commences, has a certain characteristic wildness about it, which is elsewhere wanting. This, too, we understand, is founded on a national Arab tune. The concluding chorus, "Vittoria, Vittoria," is bold and animated, and brings about the climax with éclat.

All the artists concerned in the execution of the opera worked with zeal and ability, and Mr. Balfe was indefatigable in his conduct of the orchestra. With the exception of a mistake at setting out, in the first dance of the ballet, where the chorus did not seem to understand the indications of M. Nadaud's baton, there was no "slip" worth mentioning during the entire evening. The weight of the music fell chiefly upon Mademoiselle Sofie Cruvelli, who, in the part of Florinda, had, in all probability, a more difficult and oppressive task to perform than was ever before imposed upon a dramatic singer. This was her first original character since her appearance in London, and we must own that Mr. Thalberg was more fortunate in having such an artist to represent his heroine than Mademoiselle Cruvelli in having such a part as Florinda to create. Although continually on the stage, and continually in positions of the most trying and arduous nature, Mademoiselle Cruvelli had not a single air or cavatina and very few continuous phrases to sing. Even where good vocalization might have made the music effective, the elaborations of the orchestra were enough to perplex any singer, had she lungs of brass. Nevertheless, in spite of all this, the genius and youthful energy of Mademoiselle Cruvelli triumphed over every obstacle, and her powerful and resonant voice was heard with unimpaired force and beauty. Where she could get a cantabile phrase to herself—for example, in the short theme in F sharp minor, "Di quel che a te deggio" (finale, act 1), and in the andante, "Dolce ristoro ai mali" (opening of act 4), she sang with faultless expression and produced a contrast the more welcome from the rarity of its appearance. In the two last acts, where the higher register of her voice was called upon to do almost impossible duty, the energy of Mademoiselle Cruvelli was indomitable; and, while we could not but feel for the unmerciful labour allotted to her, we could not but admire the apparent ease with which she accomplished it, overcoming each successive difficulty with unabated good will, and singing to the last note without a vestige of weakness or declining power. Whether the splendid physique of Mademoiselle Cruvelli could long resist such severe trials as those imposed by the music of Florinda we shall not pretend to guess. In her acting, as in her singing, Mademoiselle Cruvelli entered with enthusiasm into the sentiment of the part, and when she was on the stage the heaviness and monotony of which we have complained was sensibly diminished by her exertions. Where dramatic effect could be produced she produced it. In the first act she has little or nothing to do; but in the second, in the duet with Rodrigo, and in the agitato immediately preceding it, her acting was remarkably fine. Her mad scene in the third act was highly impressive, and in that which follows it, where she recognises the King as her seducer, she made several striking points. But perhaps the best and most touching stroke of all was in the scene with Rodrigo, Count Julian, and Favila, where the King offers to expiate his conduct by making Florinda his Queen. The look with which Mademoiselle Cruvelli regarded Rodrigo as he uttered the words, and the movement of deep-felt joy with which she threw herself on the shoulder of her father, Count Julian, as though anxious to shut out all doubt of the new-born and unexpected happiness, were eminently natural and beautiful. In short, Mademoiselle Cruvelli may be truly said to have been the good genius of Mr. Thalberg's opera, since, without her, it might have fared more ill than its deserts.

Of the other characters, that of Lablache was the most prominent. The great basso exerted himself to the utmost for the success of his son-in-law's opera, singing and acting in his most forcible manner. Signor Calzolari (Rodrigo) was in better voice than we have for some time heard him; and Mr. Sims Reeves (Favila) sang the music allotted to that part with remarkable energy and power. The costume of the popular English tenor, however, excited particular attention, the peculiar covering of the legs suggesting irresistible comparisons with Malvolio, who adorned himself "fantastically," in the hope of pleasing his mistress. Signor Coletti did his best for the very ungrateful part of Munuzza. All we can say of Mademoiselle Marie Cruvelli is that she looked both handsome and comely as the page; what she had to sing was so trifling that it did not give us any opportunity to judge of her pretensions. The reception of the opera by the public was very flattering, but we fear this cannot be accepted as a guarantee of its enduring success. There were several encores, among which those really unanimous were accorded to the ensemble for two voices, "Qual luce risplende" (Mademoiselle Cruvelli and Signor Calzolari), in the duet for Florinda and Rodrigo (act ii.), and the air of Mr. Sims Reeves (act iii.), "Si prodi ispani." The others were more forced than genuine, and had only the effect of augmenting the ennui of the audience. At the end of every act Mademoiselle Cruvelli and her coadjutors were forced to appear; and Mr. Thalberg was led on by Lablache after the finale of act 3, and twice after the conclusion of the opera, amid the most vociferous applause. But these displays of enthusiasm are, unfortunately, too frequent now-a-days to be relied upon, since genuine merit is not always their incentive.

As for the manner in which the piece is put upon the stage, the style in which the groups are arranged, and the taste shown in the selection of the dresses, nothing can be more creditable. Taking all things into consideration, indeed, great praise is due to Mr. Lumley for making his theatre a field for the production of original works, instead of following that old routine which constituted for so many years the whole science of operatic management. The house was crowded in every part, and among the audience was Her Majesty, who has commanded Florinda to be performed at the State visit to-night.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday Norma was repeated, with the last act of Fidelio. The combined performance attracted a crowded audience, but we very much question the policy of giving Beethoven's masterpiece in a mangled form. The Royal Italian Opera sets up for a model lyric theatre, but the reputation it has gained must be sadly endangered by this strange and unaccountable mode of procedure. For the first time since Fidelio was composed, it has been represented on the stage mutilated and disfigured. The performance of the one act was, nevertheless, splendid. Tamberlik and Formes were in admirable voice, and both sang with immense effect. Madame Castellani also threw her best energies into the part of the heroine, and altogether the opera passed off with great enthusiasm. But the better it was sung, the more we regretted that it should have been meddled with in any possible way.

On Tuesday the Prophete was given for the second time. The great feature of the night was Mario, who appeared to have entirely recovered from his late indisposition, and sang with all his wonted power, energy, and beauty. The house was crowded from floor to ceiling.

Another crowded audience attended the performance of the Huguenots on Thursday. The cast was powerfully strengthened by Tamburini resuming his original part (at the Royal Italian Opera), of St. Bris, which in the great barytone's hands, was as energetic, earnest, and striking as ever. The grand conspiracy scene went all the better for Tamburini's assistance.

The Queen has signified her intention to visit the theatre in state on Thursday next, and has commanded the Flauto Magico, of Mozart, the cast of which will include Grisi, Castellani, Mdle. Ana Zer (engaged purposely for the Queen of Night), Formes, Mario, Ronconi, and Tamburini. The State Box, we are informed, will be fitted up on the same style of elegance and splendour as on the former occasion of the Royal command night.

Miscellaneous.

ORGAN PERFORMANCE AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—The following is the programme of a performance by the distinguished organist, Mr. George Cooper, (organist of St. Sepulchre's) on the Grand Organ, in the eastern gallery of the Great Exhibition, built by the eminent manufacturers, Gray and Davison, 9, New Road, Fitzroy Square, London, on Saturday afternoon:—Part I.—Fantasia, Hartmann; Pedal Fugue, Seb. Bach; Slow Movement, "The Organist's Manual," Mozart; Chorus, "God of Light," (Seasons) Haydn; Slow Movement, Hauptman; Chorus, "Fixed in his everlasting seat," Handel. Part II.—Overture, Saul, (three movements) Handel; Aria, MSS. Mozart; Pedal Fugue, Seb. Bach; Aria, "Ave Maria," Schubert; Fugue, Schwenke; Chorus, "He rebuked the Red Sea," (Israel in Egypt) Handel.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—The grounds of this establishment were thrown open on Monday, to the supporters of the benevolent institution known as the Licensed Victuallers' Asylum. The attendance of company was more than usually numerous; there could not have been less than five thousand persons assembled by 9 o'clock, and a crowd was then at the doors of the gardens struggling for admission. The arrangements were, however, so good that accommodation was found for all, and everybody had an opportunity of seeing and enjoying all that took place. The usual entertainments of the evening attracted the attention of the visitors, and the extraordinary feats of Mademoiselle P. Cuzent and Madame Lejars in the equestrian circle, with the display of talent by other artistes, drew forth the loud and hearty applause of the spectators. The appearance of this very old and very favourite place of recreation is, under the present proprietary, better than it has been for many years. The whole has an appearance of freshness and good taste; little is left for the public to wish for or require.

MISS STEELE, the well known vocalist, gave a Matinée Musicale on the 17th of May, at the New Beethoven Rooms, which were crowded by the admirers of the fair artist. She was assisted by Miss Brienti, Mr. Frank Bodda, Miss Birch, and Mr. Manvers, in the vocal department. Bodda sang Ricci's barcarolle, "Sulla poppa," with so much humour as to be called for a second time. Miss Birch was heard to great advantage in "Quila voce." Mr. Manvers' style of singing improves every year; Duggan's song of "Madelina," was excellently interpreted by him. There were only two instrumental solos in the programme, viz., Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccio in E minor, beautifully played by Miss Kate Loder, and Oberthur's harp fantasias, "La Cascade," and his Nocturno, "Souvenir de Boulogne," executed in that finished style for which that gentleman's performance is already generally appreciated. "La Cascade" being but a short prelude was encored. Of the fair beneficiaire we have but to add that she sang all her songs in a very chaste and finished style, as we naturally might expect from so popular a singer as Miss Steele. We trust this lady will often afford us the pleasure of listening to her charming voice.

FISCHOF.—This celebrated critic, philosopher, composer, and pianist of Vienna, has arrived in town, being selected by the Viennese government as one of the jurors for the awardment of the prizes in the Austrian department of the Grand Exhibition.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Perhaps the institution to which the Great Exhibition of all Nations has been the most propitious is the Sacred Harmonic Society, which during the last two months has been crowded to suffocation at every performance. The reason is sufficiently obvious. The performances at Exeter-hall are not only to the taste of our provincial friends, to whose grand musical festivals they bear a close resemblance, but are something quite new to our continental visitors. At no other city in Europe, except at stated intervals—once in three years, for instance, as at the festivals of the Rhine towns—can such an assemblage of vocalists and instrumentalists be heard as in London. The twenty annual concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society must be ranked among the greatest art attractions of this vast metropolis, where so many things worth seeing and hearing are to be seen and heard. The Messiah, the Creation, and Elijah have been the oratorios most frequently played since the opening of the Crystal Palace. On Friday night, in last week, Elijah was performed for the last time but one. The principal singers were, Misses Catherine Hayes, Eliza Birch, Dolby, and Williams; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Novello, and Herr Formes. The execution, under the able direction of Mr. Costa, was one of the most effective and striking we remember. The hall was absolutely crammed, and among the audience was observed an immense number of foreigners, upon whom the grand ensemble of seven hundred singers and players, employed upon the sublime choruses of Mendelssohn's greatest masterpiece, appeared to make a profound impression. The principal singers were quite as excellent in their way as the chorus, which seemed to be moved to unusual exertion. We have rarely heard Miss Catherine Hayes and Herr Formes more effective, Misses Dolby and Williams more perfect, Miss Eliza Birch more intelligent and careful, or Mr. Sims Reeves (whose last air, "Then shall the righteous," was faultlessly executed) more entirely at home with the music. In short, the performance was worthy of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and of the music of Mendelssohn. Elijah was repeated last night with equal effect.

MR. G. A. OSBORNE'S MATINEE MUSICALE.—Mr. Osborne, one of the pianists and composers for the piano who have done most honour to the English school of music, gave his annual matinée on Tuesday in the Hanover-square Rooms, before a crowded and fashionable audience. As usual, Mr. Osborne's programme was chiefly formed of classical materials. He was assisted in the performance by Signor Sivi (violin), Signor Piatti (violinello), and Miss Catherine Hayes and Herr Stockhausen (vocalists). Mendelssohn's first pianoforte trio, by Mr. Osborne, Signors Sivi and Piatti, was a vigorous and animated performance; and not less effective in a different way was another trio, in A, by the same executants, a graceful and ably written concertante, the composition of Mr. Osborne himself. Besides these, Mr. Osborne introduced other works of his own—a brilliant and clever fantasia on themes from Don Giovanni, and an elegant caprice, entitled Inquietude et Bonheur, to which he united a nocturne study of Chopin, all of which were played in a highly finished manner, and elicited the warmest applause. Miss Catherine Hayes was unanimously encored in the air, "Ah mon fils," from the Prophete, and Herr Stockhausen exhibited his accustomed taste and intelligence in two of Schubert's prettiest lieder—"Who is Sylvia?" and "Hark the lark," both from Shakspeare. Herr Heinrich Bohrer accompanied the vocal music in a very satisfactory manner.

MR. SZEKELY'S SECOND EVENING CONCERT was given in the New Beethoven Rooms, on Friday, June 27th. Hummel's Quintett for pianoforte—M. Szekely; Violin—Reményi; Viola—Witt; Violoncello—Piatti; Contra Basso—Bottesini; was played very charmingly, the solos of Piatti and Bottesini eliciting the loudest applause. Herr Stoffreger sang Fesca's "Der Wanderer" in a praiseworthy manner. M. Reményi gave the 1st part of Vieuxtemp's concerto in E major. His style of playing is somewhat forced and his bowing not remarkable for elegance; nor is his intonation at all times perfect. Nevertheless, Herr Stoffreger was applauded liberally. Miss Steele sang Haydn's "Fidelity" and Molique's delightful song, "If o'er the boundless sky," with much expression and feeling, and, in consequence of Mlle. Lavina not making her appearance (for which an apology was made), "Where the bee sucks," in which she received a hearty encore. Mr. J. Thomas played a fantasia on the harp and displayed his usual good taste, expression, and clear execution. M. Szekely played a fantasia solo, also one with violoncello obligato accompaniment with Signor Piatti, both of which were much applauded. Miss Annie Pélzer's fantasia on the concertina pleased generally. The great lion of the evening was, of course, Bottesini, whose contrabasso solo, as usual, created a furor. Herr Stoffreger sang Cristell's "Mien Wunsh," and the concert concluded with the last movement of Hummel's quintett.

MESSRS. H. AND R. BLAGROVE'S THIRD QUARTETT AND SOLO CONCERT took place in the Concert-rooms, Mortimer-street, on Thursday morning, the 3rd instant. It commenced with Mozart's quartett in F major, which went off with great éclat. Schubert's ballade, "Le Berger sur la Montagne," sung by Mrs. Endersohn, with clarinet obligato by Mr. Lazarus, was charmingly executed; and Mendelssohn's trio in C minor, for pianoforte (W. S. Bennett), violin (H. Blagrove), and violoncello (Mr. Hancock), was an equally striking performance. The brilliancy of the Allegro, the expression of the andante, the playfulness of the scherzo, and the energetic and classical character of the finale was such as to elicit the warmest applause. Mr. R. Blagrove's fantasia on the concertina was received with much favour. The Romance, by S. W. Waley, and two melodies, by Molique, for violin, by Mr. H. Blagrove (accompanied on the pianoforte by W. S. Bennett), were performed in the most delightful style. Mrs. Endersohn gave much expression in Mr. W. S. Bennett's lovely song "To Chloe in sickness," and the fresh beauties of the "May dew," by the same composer, were well brought out. Time will not allow us to give a more lengthened account of this excellent concert, still we cannot omit to mention a great treat in a new Nonett, by Onslow, which, by its great excellence and the exquisite performance of the artistes, riveted the attention of the audience to the last moment, and was rewarded by the greatest applause.

NEW SYSTEM OF SINGING.—The first of a series of four Lectures on the art of cultivating the voice was delivered at the Hanover Square Rooms on Friday, by Signor Anelli, late singing master to the Princess Augusta. The Lecture was illustrated by Miss Livingstone and Miss Menville, who after performing a series of graceful exercises explanatory of the method, gave most satisfactory assurances of its excellence: the former by singing some ballads very sweetly, and the latter by her forcible delivery of "Nou fu Sogno" and the "Il Segretto" from Lucrezia. Although pupils of but eight or nine months, the young ladies exhibited great fluency of execution and a great appreciation of the music.

REUNION DES ARTS.—The usual weekly meeting of this society was held on Monday last, at the New Beethoven Rooms, at which the following artistes, amongst others, assisted: Mesdames Verdavainne, Goffie, Lemaire, and Rummell; and M. M. Goffie, Tourneaux, and Day. The concert went off with its accustomed éclat, and amongst the principal features may be mentioned a duet of Osborne and De Beriot, from "Guillaume Tell," in which Madame Verdavainne and her "partner" at the pianoforte displayed much ease and grace in the course of their performance. The rooms were well attended.

Advertisements.

MR. CRIVELLI

BEGS to acquaint his friends and the public that a Third Edition of the "ART OF SINGING," enlarged and newly arranged in the form of a Grammatical System of Rules for the Cultivation of the Voice, may be had at his residence, 71, Upper Norton-street, and at all the principal Music-sellers.

* Soon will be ready, the French and German Translation.

CHICHESTER CATHEDRAL.

THERE is a VACANCY for an Alto voice. Candidates must present certificates of good character, and of having been communicants. Testimonials of musical ability will be required, and candidates are expected to be good choirmen, and also possess good voices. Salary £50 per annum. Attendance daily. Apply to Mr. Bennett, Organist.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

STREICH	Le Hirondelles.
RICHARDS	Mid-summer Day.
RICHARDS	Moonlight Serenade.
RICHARDS	Danish Air.
RICHARDS	Pastorale.
PRAEGER	Moment Joyeux.
PRAEGER	Nocturne Romantique.
KUHE	Styriens.
SILAS	Amaranth.
SILAS	La Primavera.
		(4 quatre Mains.)
THALBERG	Prophete.
SCHULTZ	Mélopie.
WOLFF	Euryanthe.
WOLFF	Preciosa.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

NEW DUETS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

THALBERG	Beatrice di Tenda
ROSELEN	Deux Melodies de Donizetti, 1 and 2.
ROSELEN	Fal d'andorre.
WOLFF	Valse Original.
WOLFF	Beatrice di Tenda.
SILAS	La Primavera, Bagatelle.
KALLIWODA	Invitation à la danse.
OSBORNE	Plume de Perles.
SCHULTZ	Duo L'espagnola.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent-street.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published,

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed, and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTE. Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 210 Regent-street; Keith and Prowse, 46, Cheapside; and Cocks & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

CRAMER'S STUDIES.

THE First Volume of this Work is now Published in the upright form, newly revised and corrected by the Editor, and divided into four parts. Price, 6s. each.
Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

HELLER'S STUDIES.

OP. 16—"THE ART OF PHRASING." Twenty-four Studies, in all the major and minor keys; in Three Books, each 6s.
"They teach style and execution together, through the fascinating medium of music, at once simple, expressive, and beautiful."

HELLER'S SECOND SET OF STUDIES.

Op. 45—Twenty-five Studies, introductory to the "Art of Phrasing," and as a Preparative to the Studies and Works of the Modern Composers; in Two Books, each 6s.

HELLER'S THIRD SET OF STUDIES.

Op. 46—Thirty "Etudes Mélodiques et Progressives;" in Three Books, each 6s.

HELLER'S FOURTH SET OF STUDIES

Op. 47—Twenty-five "Etudes pour former au Rythme et à l'expression;" in Three Books, each 6s.
Catalogues of Stephen Heller's Works to be had of his Publishers, Wessel and Co., 229, Regent-street.

MEYERBEER'S SONGS,

ENGLISH Version, Edited by FRANK ROMER, are now published by Campbell, Ransford, and Co., British and Foreign Musical Presentation Library, 55, New Bond Street.

MESSRS. COCKS' NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

THE TONY-WALZER. By Labitzky.—Her Majesty's State Bells.—The following beautiful Compositions were performed by Mr. Boose's Band on the above occasion, and were evidently fully appreciated:—Labitzky's Morning Star and Tony Waltzes, also the Leipzig Galop—Strauss's Swallow Waltzes and Kathinka Polka—and Musard's Champagne Quadrilles. Price 2s and 3s each.—N.B. The above Dances were also performed by the Brothers Labitzky and their celebrated Band, at Cambridge House, on the 6th inst.

THE GREAT GLOBE QUADRILLES. By Stephen Glover. Piano, 3s. Duets, 4s. Also, by the same distinguished Author, Mamma's Quadrille, Papa's ditto, 8/6s, each, 3s; Duets, each, 4s.—Mamma's Galop, 2s; Papa's Polka, 2s.—Osborne's Quadrille, 3s; Duets, 4s.—The Six Palace Band March, each, 2s.—Royal Hyde Park March, 2s.—Home March, 3s.—Alpine March, 2s 6d.—Prince Arthur's March, 2s.—The Retreat March, 2s, and Fantasia on Airs of All Nations, 4s.

STEPHEN HELLER'S latest PIANOFORTE PIECES.—Students of the piano-forte will find in the following works of the above distinguished author an unusual degree of merit, suited alike for the saloon and the practice room, viz:—Chant du Chameau, 2s; L'Adieu du Soldat, 2s; Chant du Berceau, 2s; Arrangement of Mendelssohn's Chant d'Amour, 2s; ditto Parting Song, 2s; ditto Chant de Fête, 2s.

KÜCKEN'S POPULAR BALLADS, (Author of "Trab, Trab"), Words by Wm. Ball and R. Lincoln Cocks:—"The Guardian Angel," 2s; "Off, Off Away," 2s; "Sweet May," 2s; "Boatman's Song," 2s; "Come Sweet Maid," 2s; "Where'er a Cot," 2s; "In Vain I Court," 2s; "O! My Love's Like" (duet), 2s; "Two Birds Flew" (duet), 2s; "Why so timid?" 2s; "Slumber Song," 2s; Jetty Treff's much admired "Trab, Trab," with an illustrated title, 2s; "The Guardian Angel," 3s; "Off, and Away," 2s; and "The Tear," 2s.

NEW PIANO MUSIC, by Brinley Richards.—"The Vision," "The Angel's Song," each 2s; "The Sturm March Galop," "Poor Mary Anna," "The Ash Grove," and "The Rising of the Lark," each 3s.

COCKS'S MUSICAL MISCELLANY FOR JULY IS NOW READY, Price 2d; stamped, 3d.

MESSRS. COCKS'S VERY SUPERIOR PIANOFORTES, 22 GUINEAS and upwards. The "Musical World," referring to the inferior kind of pianos offered for sale, says—"Not that the instruments of Messrs. Cocks are dear—on the contrary, they are as cheap as the valueless instruments just mentioned, but they have the advantage of being firmly and compactly made, of the best (and the best seasoned) materials, and of keeping well in tune for any length of time."—N.B. May be had, gratis, and postage free, descriptive lists with drawings, and the best method of keeping pianos in tune.

An ERARD'S elegant double-action HARP, cost 120 guineas, nearly equal to new, price only 60 guineas, with packing-case and leather cover complete; a single-action Harp, by the same maker, price 15 guineas.

London: 6, New Burlington-Street. Publishers to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen.

N.B. Now ready, gratis, and postage free, part IX of Messrs. Robert Cocks and Co's Catalogue of their latest publications.

NEW MUSIC.

THE WORLD IS A FAIRY RING, Ballad written by Eliza Cook, composed by Joseph Philip Knight; composer of Beautiful Venice, Gether vs Rosebud, Ocean Dreams, Song of Early Days, Come away, Cavatina, The Happy day, The Old and New Year, Her cheek was Pale.

London: Z. T. Purday, 48, High Holborn.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR MR. COSTA.—On FRIDAY next, 11th July, Haydn's CREATION. Vocalists—Miss Catherine Hayes Miss Birch, Mr. Sims Reeves and Herr Formes. The Orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets 3s.; reserved, 5s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter Hall, or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross. A popular Oratorio will be performed on Friday 18th July.

MUSICAL UNION.

EIGHTH and LAST MATINEE, TUESDAY, July 8, at half-past 3 o'clock. Quartet, E flat, No. 10. Beethoven. Duet, in D, piano and violone llo, Mendelssohn. Quintet, A minor, No. 12—Onslow. Pianoforte solos—C. Hallé. Solo, contra basso—Bottesini. Executants—Laub, Deloffe, Hill, Webb, Piatti, and Bottesini. Pianoforte—Charles Hallé. Visitors' tickets, half a guinea each, to be had at Cramer and Co's., Regent-street. Members desirous of subscribing for a proof copy of M. Baugniet's picture, containing portraits of eighteen artists, are requested to give their names to Mr. Ollivier, at the rooms next Tuesday.

J. ELLA, Director.

BEETHOVEN QUARTETT SOCIETY,

27, QUEEN ANNE STREET, CAVENDISH SQUARE.

THE LAST PERFORMANCE this Season (for MR. ROUSSELOT'S Benefit), on Wednesday, July 9th, at 8 o'clock. Messrs. Ernst, Sainston, Cooper and Sivori; Messrs. Hill, Rousselet, and Bottesini; Madlle. Coulon, and Miss Dolby.

PROGRAMME.—Mozart. Quartet No. 4. Spohr, Duet for Violin and Tenor by Messrs. Sivori and Ernst. Classical Song, Miss Dolby. Rousselet, Quintet, No. 3, with contra basses by Bottesini, and led by Ernst. Mendelssohn, Trio No. 2. Song, Miss Dolby. Beethoven, Quartet, No. 9. Duo Brilliant, Violin and Contra Bass, Sivori and Bottesini.

Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; Unreserved Seats, 7s.; to be obtained of Messrs. Rousselet and Co., 66, Conduit Street, Regent Street, and at the principal music sellers.

Principal characters by Madame Gris, Madame Castellan, Madlle. Angri, Madlle. Cotti, Herr Formes, Signor Tagliacozzo, Signor Polonini, Signor Ferrari, Signor Rommi, Signor Mel, Signor Soldi, and Signor Mario.

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor,—MR. COSTA.

COMMENCE AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre.

MR. JOHN THOMAS

Of Pen-y-Bont, Principal Harpist at Her Majesty's Theatre, and Professor at the Royal Academy of Music, will give a

MATINEE MUSICALE,

By the kind permission of Lady Hall (of Hannover), at her residence, No. 9, Great St. George Street, May Fair, on Wednesday, July 9th, 1851, on which occasion he will be assisted by Mrs. Anderson, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Cipriani Potter, and several other eminent artists, whose names will be shortly announced. To commence at half past Three o'clock precisely, and terminate about half past Five. Single Tickets, one guinea; family Tickets: (to admit four) three guineas, may be had at all the principal music warehouses, and of Mr. Thomas, 27, Grafton Street, Fitzroy Square.

HEALTH WHERE 'TIS SOUGHT!

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Cure of a disordered Liver and Stomach, when in a most hopeless state.—Extract of a letter from Mr. Matthew Harvey, of Chapel Hall, Airdrie, Scotland, dated the 15th of January, 1850. To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir.—Your valuable Pills have been the means, with God's blessing, of restoring me to perfect health, at a time when I thought I was on the brink of the grave. I had consulted several eminent Doctors, who, after doing what they could for me, considered my case hopeless. I had been suffering from a Liver and Stomach complaint of long standing, which during the last two years got so much worse, that every one considered my condition as hopeless: I, as a last resource, got a Box of your Pills, which soon gave relief, and by persevering in their use for some weeks, together with rubbing night and morning your Ointment over my chest and stomach, and right side, I have by their means alone got completely cured, and to the astonishment of myself and everybody who knows me.

(Signed)

MATTHEW HARVEY.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—Ague Constipation of the Bowels kinds Lumbago Ulcers Bilious Com- Consumption Fits Piles Worms of all kinds Blotches on the Dropsy Head-ache Rheumatism Scrofula or King's Weakness, from whatever cause Skin Dysentery Indigestion Evil Bowel complaints Erysipelas Inflammation Sore Throats &c., &c. Colic Jaundice Tie-Douloureux

Sold at the Establishment of Professor Holloway, 244, Strand, (near Temple-bar, London, and most all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicines throughout the civilised World at the following prices:—1 s. 1d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 32s. each Box. There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients in every Disorder are affixed to each Box.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

BY COMMAND.

THE QUEEN having signified her gracious intention to Visit Her Majesty's Theatre in State, a

GRAND EXTRA NIGHT

Will take place this evening (Saturday), July 5th by Command of Her Majesty, when will be repeated the highly successful new grand opera, composed expressly for Her Majesty's Theatre by Sigismund Thalberg, the poem by Scribe, the Italian Libretto by Giannoni, entitled

FLORINDA,

OR THE MOORS IN SPAIN.

With new scenery by Mr. Charles Marshall.

Count Julian (Governor of Ccuta), ...	Signor LABLACHE.
Florinda (his daughter) ...	Mdlle. SOFIE CRUVELLI.
Rodrigo (King of the Goths) ...	Signor CALZOLARI.
Teodomiro (his page) ...	Mdlle. MARIE CRUVELLI.
Favilla ...	Mr. SIMS REEVES.
Munusza (the Moorish Chief) ...	Signor COLLETTI.

In the Third Act a Divertissement (Mauresque et Espagnol) arranged by M. Paul Taglioni, executed by Mlles. Rosa, Esper, Julien, Lamoreaux, Dantonie, Esther, Pascals, &c.

The Opera to commence at Eight o'clock.

Applications for boxes, stalls, and tickets to be made at the box-office of the theatre.

EXTRA NIGHT.

First appearance in England of the Twenty-eight SPANISH DANCERS,

ON MONDAY, JULY 7, when will be produced (for the first time) the favourite ballets of

LA FERIA DE SEVILLA, CURRA LA GADITANA, LA JITANA IN CHAMBERI,

In which will be introduced the following celebrated dances:—El Vito, La Manola, El Jaleo de Teres. La Fan ansia Espanola, La Seguidillas Jitanas, La Jere, sana, El Jaleo de la Pandenta, and the celebrated Pas La Danza Valenciana, supported by Ben rita Don Apetra Camara, Lenora Dona Adela Equerre, Lenerita Dona Dolores Ruiz, Lenerita Dona Concepcion Ruiz, Lenerita Dona Susana Aguader, Lenora Dona Francisca Bueone. The whole under the direction of Don Antonio Ruiz, Maître de Ballet of Il Teatro del Cico, Madrid. Leader of the Ballet—Don Hippelitte Erudis. To commence at 8 o'clock.

NEW BEETHOVEN ROOMS,

27, QUEEN ANNE STREET, CAVENDISH SQUARE.

PROGRAMME OF

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS'

Second and last performance this Season, of

CLASSICAL AND MODERN PIANOFORTE MUSIC,
ON WEDNESDAY MORNING JULY 9th.

To commence at Three, and terminate at Five.

PART I.

TRIO IN B FLAT MINOR.—Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello
—Messrs. BRINLEY RICHARDS, ERNST and PIATTI (Dedicated to Beethoven)..... Cipriani Potter.

Allegro con Brio.

Adagio.

Scherzo—Trio.

Rondo allegro moderato.

ARIA—"Ahl mon file"—Miss CATHERINE HAYES..... Meyerbeer.

SOLO, PIANOFORTE—Mr. BRINLEY RICHARDS.

Moonlight Serenade (by desire)..... } Richards.

Caprice in F Minor..... } Sternale Bennett.

Study in E Major..... } Heller.

SOLO—Contra-Basso—Signor BOTTESINI.

TEMA CON VARIAZIONI—Pianoforte and Violoncello—

Mr. BRINLEY RICHARDS and Signor PIATTI Mendelssohn.

PART II.

GRAND SONATA IN E MINOR—Pianoforte and Violin—Mr.

BRINLEY RICHARDS and Herr ERNST..... Steibelt.

Allegro Agitato.

Adagio.

Rondo.

ARIA—Miss CATHERINE HAYES..... F. Mori.

SOLO, PIANOFORTE—Mr. BRINLEY RICHARDS.

Souvenir de Bellini (MS)..... } Richards.

Study in F Sharp..... } Chopin.

Danish National Air (by desire)..... } Richards.

(Den tappe Landoldat)..... }

DUETT—Zweis innige Lieder Mendelssohn

"Grus"..... }

Magnöckchen..... }

MI'S CATHERINE HAYES and Madame MACFARREN

Duo CONCERTANTE—Violoncello and Contra-Basso—

Signor PIATTI and Signor BOTTESINI

Conductor—Mr. FRANK MORI.

Broadwood's Patent Grand Pianofortes will be used at these Concerts.

Reserved seats Twelve Shillings. Single Tickets, Eight Shillings.

To be had at all Music Sellers, and of Mr. Brinley Richards, 6, Somerset-street, Portman-square.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

BY COMMAND.

ON THURSDAY NEXT, JULY 10th, will be performed, by command of Her Majesty, Mozart's celebrated Opera,
IL FLAUTO MAGICO.

Her Majesty having signified her most gracious intention of visiting the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, in State on that occasion. The principal characters in the Opera will be performed by—

Madame GRISI,
Madlle. ANNA ZERR,
(Being her first appearance on the stage in England),
Madlle. MORRA,
Madlle. BERTRANDI,
Madlle. VINTALE,
(Her first appearance in England), And Madame VIALDOT.
Herr FORMES,
Signor STIGELLI,
Signor SOLDI,
Signor MEI,
Signor POLONINI,
Signor RONCONI, And
Signor MARIO.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

FIRST NIGHT OF I PURITANI.

GRISI, TAMBURINI, MARIO.

FIRST APPEARANCE OF SIGNOR RONCONI.

ON TUESDAY NEXT, JULY 8th, will be performed for the first time these three years, Bellini's favourite Opera,

I PURITANI.

Elvira	Madame GRISI.
Henrietta	Mdlle. COTTI.
Valton	Signor POLONINI.
Georgio	Signor TAMBURINI.
Arturo	Signor MARIO.
Riccardo	Signor RONCONI.

(His first appearance this season.)

Bruno ... Signor SOLDI.

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor, Mr. COSTA.
Commence at Eight. Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre.

NEW BEETHOVEN ROOMS.

27, QUEEN ANNE STREET.

MADLE. ELISE KRINITZ'S MATINEE MUSICALE

WILL TAKE PLACE ON

MONDAY, JULY 7TH, 1851,
TO COMMENCE AT TWO O'CLOCK.

VOCALISTS.

MISS CATHERINE HAYES,

MADLE. ANNA ZERR, MADLE. GRAUMANN,

MISS BINKES.

MISS OCTAVIA FRASER,

HERR REICHART.

SIGNOR MARCHESI. SIGNOR CIABATTA,

MR. AUGUSTUS BRAHAM.

INSTRUMENTAL PERFORMERS.

Pianoforte, MADLE. ELISE KRINITZ.

Harp, MADAME PARISH ALVARS,

Violin, MR. LEON REYNIER, Violoncello, MR. ROUSSELOT

CONDUCTORS, MR. LAVENU AND MR. FRELON.

TICKETS 10s. 6d. RESERVED SEATS, 15s.

To be had of CRAMER, BEALE, and Co, 201, Regent Street; at the principal Music Warehouses and Libraries; and of Mdlle. KRINITZ 7, Great Marlborough Street.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3 Stradley Villas, Stradley Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 23, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Parkes, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickens, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, July 5, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra), payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden

No. 28.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, JULY 12, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

ALBONI.

The great contralto soprano has arrived in London, and will commence her engagement for the season at Her Majesty's Theatre this night, with Cenerentola, one of her most striking and exquisite performances. The recent triumphs of Alboni at Madrid, and the French capital, will no doubt tend to increase her popularity with the London public, who, to a certain degree, are ever biassed in their estimation of artists by the opinions of continental audiences and critics; although, to do them justice, they were not slow in finding out the extraordinary merits of Alboni at the outset. If report be correct, Alboni has made wonderful advances as an actress since last season. Until she came to England she depended almost entirely on her singing for effect, and rarely essayed characters that require dramatic power and energy. This must be greatly attributed to her playing contralto parts, which generally demand the smallest amount of histrionic capability. Since she has undertaken the impersonation of characters pertaining to the soprano register, she has displayed a real talent for acting in the higher walks of the drama. This has recently been evinced in a very striking manner by her representation of Fides, in Meyerbeer's Prophète, which the French critics universally eulogised as a masterpiece of simple pathos and expression; and by her Leonora, in Donizetti's Favorita, which created the same furor in Madrid as in Paris, and elsewhere. Alboni was always charming in the lighter parts of the lyric drama—such as Zerlina in Don Giovanni, and Cherubino in the Nozze di Figaro. The effect which these produced cannot have escaped the recollection of the visitors to Her Majesty's Theatre during the last two years. Her performance of Maria, in the Figlia del Reggimento, at Madrid, has created an indescribable sensation; and more lately, in the Corbeille d' Oranges, written especially for her by Auber, and performed at the Academie Royale, she excited an enthusiasm unparalleled in the French Grand Opera since Duprez first astonished the habitués with his “ut de poitrine.”

Alboni has not improved in her singing. Perfection cannot progress.

The Corbeille d' Oranges is in rehearsal, and will be produced forthwith. Alboni's engagement cannot fail to prove one of the great points of the current season. She will sing in all her best parts, and renew all her old triumphs. She will be received, as usual, by the public, not as a spoiled child, but as a deserving favourite.

A BELGIAN CRITIC IN LONDON.

Even Belgium has sent us a Critic. M. Jules Lecomte de Camp, the Paris correspondent of L'Independance Belge, a paper which circulates freely among the ups and downs of the metropolis of Brussels, and is read at Tirelemont and Verviers, has been in London, to see and report upon the Great Exhibition of all Nations.

M. Jules Lecomte de Camp is a critic by nature, and homme d'esprit by profession. The severe taste which in the land of his birth, the ghost of old Flanders, he has imbibed with his mother's milk, has strongly influenced him in his views of England and the English—or, rather, of London and the cockneys, since M. Lecomte has not stirred out of the capital, except to eat white-bait at the “Trafalgar,” or stewed eels at the “Star and Garter.” It will be guessed at once that M. Lecomte, being a Belgian—as much as to say an excellent judge of beer—finds everything in London very bad, and everybody in London, except himself and his compatriots, very stupid. We are not disposed to quarrel with his verdict, but we put it to M. Lecomte, whether he has not been, on the whole, rather hard upon us. We have done our best to entertain him, and the other half dozen individuals who represent the vast plains and upendous hill of the boundless and magnificent country of Belgium; and if we have failed, it has not been for lack of good-will. Every one has not, like M. Lecomte, the luck to be a native of Flanders and speak Wallon. Satisfied with his good fortune, the critic of the Independance Belge should have been more charitable to those less blessed than himself. It is a sad thing to know that the inhabitants of Tirelemont must henceforth look upon us as barbarians. It is a sad thing to feel that, throughout the length and breadth of Belgium, we have no longer a name to be proud of. M. Jules Lecomte de Camp has utterly extirpated us, in the columns of the Independance Belge. The people of the plain, and the people of the hill (Belgium may be divided into a hill and a plain), must alike regard us with contempt, and laugh at our manners and institutions. In the enclosed acres of that favoured land, which may be intitled the pound of Europe, our fame as a nation has withered into a dried stick. M. Jules Lecomte has done it. Let any man now take up the country of Belgium between his finger and thumb, carefully distinguishing the hillocks from the vales, and, applying the strongest microscopic power, he will be unable to discover a single Fleming, or a single Wallon, whose judgment has not been soured, in our disfavour, by the sarcasms of M. Lecomte, Paris correspondent of that very Belgian and independent journal, the Indépendance Belge.

It is a terrible thing, for a nation as for an individual, to be "cut up" in the Indépendance Belge; and while we are suffering from the repeated blows of M. Lecomte's candour, and the keen incisions of his searching irony, let us look about us, and make concessions, or we shall have the Manx Herald, and the Hong-Kong Express, about our ears, ere we can get upon our feet again. We beseech these respected contemporaries of the Indépendance Belge to spare us, until the wounds inflicted by the sharp stylus of M. Lecomte be healed up and cicatrised. We count upon their mercy, not to hit us while we are down—not to insert fresh weapons into gashes that still bleed and fester.

To quit metaphor—we are really amused with the letters of M. Jules Lecomte, à propos of London in 1851, or rather à propos of M. Jules Lecomte at London in 1851, a far more promising head for a chapter. It was our misfortune, until the year of our Lord which is now half way on to its extinction, never to have heard of the Indépendance Belge, or of its Paris correspondent. Had we been previously informed that such a paper and such a critic were afloat, we should have taken precautions. We should have warned parliament that M. Jules Lecomte de Camp was coming to London, on purpose to write about us in the foot columns of the Indépendance Belge. Parliament would, doubtless, have passed a bill to lodge and nourish the critic according to his deserts. Lord John might have consulted with Her Majesty the Queen, about the expediency of offering him apartments at Buckingham Palace, with a suite of rooms at Windsor Castle, when M. Lecomte should feel disposed to snuff the country air. This, with the ample fare provided at the Royal table—the cates and wines—a pinch of snuff, with Lord Palmerston—a cigar, with the Prince—a ride in the park, with the Duke—a consultation, with the editor of the Times, as to what colour of politics, morals, and humanity it would be advisable to maintain in the leading articles of that respectable journal, in order that M. Lecomte might be enabled to speak of it encouragingly in the Indépendance Belge—these, and other not less prudent attentions, would have made the days of the critic pass more smoothly, and probably have kept his bile from exuding, in the shape of inky diatribes and animadversions too fierce to be endured. There was clearly an oversight. M. Jules Lecomte de Camp arrived in London, and the fact was not noticed at Court, or published in the press. The only excuse for such neglect must be pleaded in the unhappy ignorance of the English nation as to the important fact of M. Lecomte's existence. True, a copy of the Indépendance Belge is taken in by M. Delizy, at his reading-rooms in Regent-st.; but, however eager the desire to peruse, learn, and inwardly digest the articles of that animated journal, it was impossible for M. Delizy to accommodate in his salons the entire populace of London. Thus it happens that the articles of M.

Lecomte—brilliant, spiritual, sarcastic, playful, learned, veracious, comprehensive, and entertaining as they are—have neither been read by any one, nor quoted by any one. Had the redacteur en chef of the Indépendance Belge shown enough of Belgian independence to send over, by the Ostend packet, half a dozen copies of every paper containing a letter of M. Lecomte—a copy for each of the morning papers, one for the Musical World, and one for Punch—they would no doubt have been swallowed and commented upon according to their deserts. This, however, was not undertaken by the redacteur en chef, and the consequence was that the articles of M. Lecomte remained unread; while to the probable astonishment of the critic, the Great Exhibition of all Nations went on as regularly and as merrily, at the Crystal Palace in Hyde Park, as though M. Jules Lecomte were not. That this was humiliating we allow. M. Lecomte's fight was against a shadow—a sciomachy—and his critical blows fell upon the empty air; his good things went undevoured, and his pleasant strictures only served to enliven the pipes and beer of the netters of Malines and Tirlemont, the brewers of Louvain, the gunners of Liege, the blacksmiths and coal-heavers of Charleroi, the gamblers at Spa, the bathers at Chaudefontaine, and M. Fétis and Madame Pleyel at Brussels—where the Belgian "lions" live, and attempt to do as they do at Paris.

M. Jules Janin, another critic of note, came to London, as well as M. Jules Lecomte, to write about the Great Exhibition. He wrote, and described everything in glowing, kindly, and enthusiastic terms, like a hearty and well-natured critic as he is. Jules Janin came to see, and learn, and enjoy, and help in the great fraternization of the nations. He did all he came to do, and wrote letters about it in the Journal des Débats, which have been read by Europe with delight, and have been translated into every language. True, when J. J. arrived, all London—literary, artistic, noble, rich and poor—cried out, "There is J. J. ! he has come to talk about us in his own genial and inimitable way; welcome J. J. ! thrice welcome !" This was the feeling of the united community of Britain. Thus, J. J. had an advantage over his cotemporary of the Indépendance. The Journal des Débats is seen by every one in London, who desires to know what goes on in Europe, and what our neighbours say and think of it. The feuilletons of J. J. were universally read, and every one admired them, not more for their brilliant style than for their genuine feeling of benevolence. Every one spoke of them, and every one quoted them. The Times translated whole columns of them. Punch "pitched into" them, with kindly buffets—buffets that a playful uncle would bestow upon the cheek of his little nephew, or niece, of three summers—rather pats than buffets. Punch fenced with J. J., but, as he fenced, there was a large piece of leather on the point of his foil, so that it could not hurt. Who, indeed, could bear malice against J. J. Who does not love him as he reads him?

Under these circumstances, we are disposed to forgive M. Lecomte de Camp for his fierce attacks in the Indépendance

Belge. Had they been read they might have roused ill feeling against the pocket-country, which would have looked ridiculous—a lion roaring at a gnat. But as no one saw them, no one read them; no ill feeling was aroused, and the entire realm of Great Britain, with all its provinces and dependencies, on which the sun sets not, remained in serene ignorance of what M. Jules Lecomte de Camp thought, did, and wrote about, "London in 1851"

Our copy of the Independance Belge (the only one in England—therefore we set a price upon it) was due to the politeness of M. Jullien, whose life and adventures in Paris and London occupy at least one half of the last letter, à propos of the Great Exhibition of All Nations—the importance of which never to be forgotten festival can hardly be over-estimated, on reconsideration of the fact that even Belgium sent us a critic."

FIDELIO.

(Continued from Page 418.)

We enter upon the second act with feelings in every way prepared for the highly dramatic and most impassioned scenes that are to follow, by the gradually growing excitement of the first act, which is to be considered essentially and particularly as a preparation and an introduction to the grand action of the drama. This is confined to the one great scene of the prison, wherein the only real incident of the whole piece is transacted. Florestan, the hero of the opera, has not yet appeared; more than this, he has not yet been named; but still we have been so much interested in this character by the many various allusions to him of Leonore with her devoted and heroic love, of Rokko with his severe and unwelcome duty, of Marzelline with her natural curiosity, arising from her concern for Fidelio, and of Pizzaro with his fiendish hatred, and his fearful delight in the expectation of immediate vengeance, that we are ready to receive him with the most cordial sympathy. This is the long lost husband, so eagerly sought, so earnestly desired, and so steadfastly struggled for, by the noble woman whose character of patient constancy fulfils all that is most real in the highest poetry, all that is most poetical in the loftiest reality. This is the wretched captive whose sufferings have touched the tenderest sympathies of his warm-hearted though stern-dutied jailor, whose food has been from day to day diminished, who "hovers like a shadow" rather than lives as a man, and whose threatened murder is regarded as a kindly relief from his seemingly unmitigable misery. This is the mysterious prisoner for whom Fidelio evinces such ardent interest, and in whose destiny, therefore, at least in so far as regards her lover's, Marzelline, shows not much less concern. This is the once hated rival, now intended victim, against whom to wreak his irresistible and monstrous vengeance, the all-powerful tyrant looks forward with longing inhuman, as it seems superhuman. We have been no less familiarised with the horrors of the secret dungeon than with the sufferings of its protectless inmate, and we come thus upon the scene as upon the fulfilment of a foreboding that has grown upon our sense from the vagueness of indefinite supposition up to the distinctness of the too obvious reality.

From first to last this scene in the prison is most skillfully contrived by the dramatist, and its musical treatment is so near perfection as to leave it impossible for anything to be wished either of addition, or curtailment, or alteration. The Entr'Acte that introduces the great air of Florestan—the air itself—the accompanied dialogue of Leonore and Rokko, the extraordinary duet of the gravedigging, the trio of Leonore, Florestan, and Rokko, the tremendous quartet, and the most impassioned of all exciting music, the duet of the two recognised lovers, each a perfection in itself, gather all additional interest from their relationship as parts of a gradually developed whole, and complete a series of dramatic effects that have indeed no parallel.

What can surpass the gloomy solemnity of the opening bars of this Entr'Acte?—the poignancy of those two forced notes to which the expressive tone of the acute part of the bassoon gives such powerful colouring?—the exquisite pathos of the melodic phrase for the violin, oboe, and bassoon, supported by the figure for the second violin, the viola, and violoncello, that has been vaguely foreshadowed in the first finale, and is so effectively mixed up with the subsequent recitative? Let us now notice another coincidence with a most prominent feature in the opera of Der Freischütz, occurring in the opening movement of the overture, and subsequently whenever Samiel, either in person or by allusion is brought before the minds of the audience. The very chords, even the instrumentation is the same. There is the tremolo for the string instruments, and there are the mysterious notes for the drums, tuned Fidelio to the unusual interval of a diminished fifth—A natural E flat; everything shows the identity of the idea of the two composers. Much difference there is between the coincidence here, and in two previous situations pointed out as they have successively occurred, in which the expression, the phrase, the harmony, and even the key are the same; and such general resemblance of style as have, in some parts of this opera and in some of the earlier works of the same master, been traced to the general style of Mozart; these last appear to be what might have been the thoughts of Beethoven's great predecessor, had he, instead of his unconscious imitator, by accident expressed them; while those are such evident repetitions as even an author might not have made in his own works without laying himself open to considerable censure. An unexpected enharmonic change to E minor introduces a new beauty in the piercing cry of intense anguish that seems to express all that can be felt of the word "lonely" in its most desolate, most hapless meaning. The iteration of this point, with each time a change of harmony, and the response of the violins, that may be supposed an echo in the dungeon answering to the voice of despair in its own accents, which thus repeated assume a double intensity, and piercing to the inmost heart, make one know the extent of a feeling that else one had not dared to fathom; these are wondrous master-strokes and assist immensely in the powerful colouring of the whole scene. The almost imperceptible modulation into the key of D flat, depicts most poetically the gradual sinking of the overwrought feelings into a state of resignation if not of peace, and this the beautiful phrase of melody which here ensues fully embodies. Then we have again an outbreak of the wildest excitement, expressed in an impassioned passage of rapid notes, that conveys the idea of an uncontrollable impatience—The agony that will be, against all faith, all hope, all religion, all philosophy. This subsides again into that other and worst phase of a desperate soul, the awful condition of reckless indifference that comes upon us when all hope, and all regret are quite benumbed, and the heart is as though stunned by the ceaseless violence of its own throbbings. This remarkably graphic piece of instrumental music, is perhaps to be regarded as a general representation of the successive emotions that alternate each other in the heart, and in the mind of the captive, rather than as a portrayal of the particular train of thoughts and feelings that may be supposed immediately to suggest the opening words of Florestan, which burst not from a sudden impulse, but are the result of long and weary, and fruitless reflection. The Entr' Acte, if considered alone, that is, separately from the sequel, might have the appearance of incoherence, of containing an extravagant profusion of unconnected ideas, of being, in the original acceptance of the term, a wild fantasia; but it is not complete in itself, and, as a matter of musical construction, the recapitulation of some of the chief phrases in the subsequent recitative (which is indeed the continuation and the completion of the movement), gives coherence, purpose, consistency, regularity to the whole, while the words of the recitative throughout which these phrases are interspersed, afford an unmistakeable clue to the expression intended in the instrumental prelude that introduces it. Florestan exclaims in the anguish of his soul, "God! what a gloom is here." Then have we that most pathetic phrase of melody which touched us so keenly, near the commencement of the movement, and which was so appropriately anticipated when Rokko speaks of his reluctance to his painful duty in the first finale. "What awful stillness," and the sensible shudder which, transplanted into the Freischütz, contributes so greatly to our feeling of terror, in some of the most fearful situations. "An empty void is all about me, —nothing lives besides myself," —the same musical idea is prolonged. Now a calmer feeling steals upon us, for which we are imperceptibly prepared by a most charming enharmonic change, into the key of B natural. "O heavy trial!" is uttered with resignation, not with bitterness. Then in this key of B we have again that beautiful phrase which occurred before in D flat, giving so exquisitely the impression of the gentle purity of the character of Florestan, of the great susceptibility, the boundless capability of love that chiefly composes it. "Yet just is the will of heaven!" A phrase of most tender beauty, given now for the first time, introduces the words, "I murmur not;" then with more energy than has yet been called into play, and with firmness that indicates the sense of a high, a noble resolve, the recitative closes on the words, "The measure of my sorrows stands with thee!"

In the Adagio, Florestan, musing on his past fortune and his present, exclaims, "In the springtime of life is my happiness fled. Truth have I boldly dared to utter and fetters are my reward. With willing patience I endure each anguish, with resignation I shall fulfil my course. One sweet consolation lies in my heart—I have done my duty!" The calm and noble sentiment that this English rendering fails to convey is most beautifully embodied in the music. The melody is unimpassioned, but of so broad and clear, and earnest and dignified a character, so continuous in all respects, and so truly beautiful, as to enchain the attention of all hearers, and to excite their deepest feeling; added to this, it is so perfectly vocal, that no singer of intelligence can deliver it without pleasure to himself and without producing a certain effect upon his audience.

Abstract beauty is unsusceptible of critical analysis, for the ideal is ever so closely identical with the indefinite that it admits not of particular description, and degenerates into the contrived, the mechanical, and artificial from the impulsive, the spontaneously natural, whenever it can be dissected and explained. So it is with this exquisite Adagio, and we can therefore only speak in general terms of the continuous excellency of the whole, and of the softness and roundness of the colouring given to it by the employment of the most congenial combination of clarionets, bassoons, and horns, in the accompaniment. We can particularise only the fine effect as a musical relief, and the force as a point of expression of the modulation into C flat, on the words, "Und die Ketten sind mein Lohn." We have only one exception to take against this exquisite movement, and this is the somewhat abruptness of its termination; which, to a certain extent, annuls the impression that must surely be made by the one continuous beauty that precedes it. Had the penultimate bar of the voice part been extended to two bars, the effect of the whole would, we believe, be enhanced.

In the allegro we have an entire change of sentiment. The captive in a half-delirious trance imagines gentle murmurs in the air—imagines that a light shines over his grave—that an angel stands consolingly beside him—that the angel bears the form of his wife, his Leonore, who bade him to peace in the kingdom of heaven. The manner in which this rhapsody is musically rendered is one of the most remarkable examples of musical expression the art possesses; so powerful is its effect, and so extremely simple are the means employed to produce it. We have an accompaniment of most exciting character that scarcely varies throughout; there is a ceaseless cantabile part for the oboe, the streaming character of which and the bright clear tone of the instrument imparts an extraordinary effect of dreamy unreality to the highly impassioned music. The transition from A flat to F major that introduces this movement (the only modulation, excepting the natural and easy progression into the key of the dominant and back again, throughout the whole), has an effect of surprising brilliancy. The panting, restless agitation of the voice-part, and the powerful excitement with which it closes make a most impressive and touching rendering of the words, such as carries the sympathies of the hearer so entirely with it as to compensate the singer for the great exertion that its competent delivery must always demand by reason of the fatiguing strain upon high notes and the rapid enunciation it requires. Overexcited by the wild enthusiasm into which his thoughts have raised him, Florestan falls exhausted, and the concluding symphony of the song dies away gradually into a stilly repose, which conveys to us the more contented, if not the more hopeful visions that fill the place of the feverish unrest that made our hero seem at first so utterly a blank within a blank—the most barren spot in a vast desert.

(To be continued.)

MR. BRINLEY RICHARD'S MATINEES.

The second and last concert of the present series took place on Wednesday morning, at the New Beethoven Rooms. Successful as the first matinée proved, the second was more successful in every sense of the word. The Rooms were crowded with one of the most brilliant and fashionable audiences we remember to have witnessed. It must not be forgotten that the music selected by Mr. Richards was of a classical character, and although unquestionably of a more rigid class than the usual music of the aristocratic world, we have seldom witnessed such earnest and unabating attention. One of the principal features in the Programme was the grand Sonata in E minor, for the pianoforte and violin, of Steibelt. So rarely has this work been heard in public, that we may almost consider it new to the present generation, or at least unknown. Interpreted by such artists as Mr. Brinley Richards and Ernst, the effect was decided. Seldom have we listened with greater pleasure to any similar composition. The first movement abounds with melody, exquisitely contrasted by bold and artistic phrasing. The recitative for the violin in the first movement was splendidly given by Ernst, with all that breadth and depth of tone so peculiar to his style of playing. The second movement in E major contains some charming ideas, arranged with great simplicity. The pianoforte and violin seemed to converse together most "lovingly," and we regretted that this movement was not repeated. The finale in E minor is the weakest of the three movements, although it contains ample room for displaying the resources of each instrument. Mr. Richards repeated his "Moonlight Serenade" by desire. It is one of those compositions which gain upon the auditor; gracefully written, and melodious, it cannot fail to become popular. The caprice, by the same author, is one of his best works. Although published some years since, we have never before heard it in public. It is in F minor. Its execution demands no ordinary command of the instrument. The unexpected modulation to D flat, and the return to the original key are very effective, and the climax before the finale is characterised by great brilliancy.

Ernst's "Elegia" is too well known to require any comment from us. We can only add that his performance of this admirable composition was the universal theme of admiration. Bottesini's marvellous solo on the contra-basso, and his duet with Piatti created as usual an immense sensation. Mendelssohn's lovely duet—the andante in D, was a most acceptable introduction: we do not know any composition of a similar kind, so exquisitely written as this duet for pianoforte and violoncello; adding that the performance by Mr. Brinley Richards and Signor Piatti was worthy of such a composition, we think we cannot well say more. Miss Catherine Hayes sang with infinite expression the "Ah! mon fils," and an aria by Frank Mori. The latter is well worthy the reputation of the composer, who may be justly pleased in having such an interpreter as Miss Hayes. Mendelssohn's lovely duets afforded the most sincere pleasure. Seldom have we listened to such perfect vocalisation as that of Miss Catherine Hayes and Madame Macfarren. High as our esteem of the last named vocalist is, we were certainly still more gratified by the artistic way in which the voices were blended. The only thing for regret was the brevity of their duets. The second solo of Mr. Brinley Richards consisted of three compositions of his own; the first a romance called the "Angel's Song," is a very elegant addition to the list of those publications which have already obtained for the author a well-earned reputation: the second composition, or rather arrangement, was new to the public—the "Souvenir de Bellini," is a most effective illustration of the well known air, "A teo cara." It abounds in brilliant and well written phrases, the execution of which would test the capabilities of the most intense devotees of the Thalberg school. The "Danish National Air" created a sensation: it is a work of great energy and admirably adapted to develop the resources of performers. Each of these compositions was much admired, and in the hands of the composer obtained a well-deserved reception. Mr. Frank Mori accompanied the various morceaux, vocal, and instrumental with his usual good taste and judgment. The success of these matinées must be most gratifying to Mr. Brinley Richards, and we only regret that he does not afford us another opportunity of hearing his performances this season.

Among the distinguished visitors at the second matinée, were the Right Hon. the Ladies Pelham Clinton, the Right Hon. the Lady Augusta Seymour, the Right Hon. the Lady Sophia Windham, the Right Hon. the Lady Alfred Hervey, the Right Hon. the Countess of Beauchamp, the Right Hon. the Countess of Dungarvon, the Countess Reventlow, the Right Hon. the Lady Robert Grosvenor, the Baroness Bray, the Baroness de Rutzen, Lady Moreton, Lady Sidney Morgan, Lady Atkinson, Lady Talfourd, Lady Taunton, Lady Congreve Whiting, the Hon. Mrs. W. H. Yelverton, the Hon. Mrs. W. Chetwynd Talbot, the Hon. Mrs. H. Wilbraham, the Hon. Mrs. Wyatt Edghill, the Right Hon. the Earl of Westmoreland, the Right Hon. the Earl of Beauchamp, His Excellency the Count Reventlow, the Hon. J. Fortescue, M.P., Sir Arthur de Capell Broke, Sir Jasper Atkinson, Mrs. Milner Gibson, Miss Grosvenor, Miss Congreve, Mrs. Newton Scott, Mrs. W. King, Mrs. Lionel Welles, Mrs. T. Page, Miss King, Miss Clara King, Miss A. King, Mrs. Fred. Salmon, Mrs. Robert Raikes, the Misses Solley, the Misses Banting, Miss H. King, Mrs. Horace Twiss, Miss Peddie, Miss Bowling, Mrs. J. Pilcher, Miss Pilcher, Mrs. J. Somes, Miss Saxton, Mrs. Gilbertson, Miss Bentley, Mrs. Fred. Somes, the Misses Gadsden, the Misses Bullock, Miss Rawlinson, Mrs. Ackers, Miss Dundas, Miss Clayton, Miss Stanfield, Miss Partridge, Miss Cuff, the Misses Macdonnell, Miss Major, Mrs. Stocker, Mrs. T. Morris, Mrs. T. Raikes, Miss Raikes, Miss Healy, the Misses Talfourd, the Rev. Wyatt Edghill, W. King, Esq., Fred. Salmon, Esq., Newton Scott, Esq., Lionel Welles, Esq., Robert Raikes, Esq., — Lutwidge, Esq., Fred. Genet, Esq., Pryce Major, Esq., Dr. H. Morris, Cockburn Hyde, Esq., W. Banting, Esq., Edward Gilbertson, Esq., T. Banting, Esq., John Masson, Esq., John Parker, Esq., Henry Leslie, Esq., St. Vincent Jervis, Esq., F. Johnson, Esq., G. Bentley, Esq., Fred. Somes, Esq., — Somes, Esq., Edward Micklam, Esq., Thomas Reed, Esq., George Reeve, Esq., Edward Reeve, Esq., George Wilson, Esq., Rev. W. Cazelet, Henry F. Gadsden, Esq., Edward Bullock, Esq., — Cuff, Esq., Eneas Macdonnell, Esq., the Rev. Dr. Major, H. Roberts, Esq., H. Broadwood, Esq., Dr. Burslem, H. Loughnan, Esq., — Stocker, Esq., T. Morris, Esq., T. Raikes, Esq., Joseph Somes, Esq., Walter Broadwood, Esq.

CONCERT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

The Queen gave a concert on Monday morning in Buckingham Palace. About 400 invitations, comprising the Royal family, the Diplomatic Corps, and foreigners of distinction, and a large party of the nobility and gentry, were issued for this reception.

The general company, on their arrival were ushered to the Picture Gallery.

About 10 o'clock Her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness the Prince Albert, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Kent, the Duchess of Gloucester, and the Duke of Cambridge, and attended by the Ladies and Gentlemen in Waiting, were conducted by the Lord Chamberlain to the Saloon, which was fitted up as a music-room. The general circle of visitors followed the Royal party into the Saloon.

The concert, the singers in which were selected from the two Grand Operas, then commenced.

The following was the programme:—

PARTIE PRIMA.

Quartetto, "Di Pafo il Dio," Mesdames Castellan e Viardot, Signori Gardoni e Herr Formes (Eco e Narciso)	Gluck.
Air, "Della sua pace," Signor Gardoni (Don Giovanni)	Mozart.
Trio, "Dolce ne' guai ristoro," Mdlle. Cruvelli, Mdlle. Castellan, e Signor Mario (Faniska) ..	Cherubini.
Air, "Du frommes Bild," Herr Formes (Der Mönch)	Meyerbeer.
Duo, "D'unbell' uso di Turchia," Signori Lab-lache e Tamburini (Turco in Italia)	Rossini.

Air, "Prendi per me sei libero," Mdlle. Cruvelli (Elisir d'amore) De Beriot.
Quintetto, "O Dio di pietà," Mesdames Castellani e Viardot, Signori Gardoni, Tamburini, e Lablache (Il Diluvio) Donizetti.

PARTI SECONDA.

Quartetto, "O Nobile Signora," Signori Mario,
Gardoni, Tamburini, e Lablache (Comte Ory) Rossini.
Airs Espagnolles, Mde. Viardot.
Trio, "Giovinetto Cavalier," Mdlle. Cruvelli, Mesdames Castellani e Viardot (Il Crociato) Meyerbeer.
Duo, "Far caizette," Mde. Castellani e Signor
Lablache (La Sciocca per Astuzia) Mosca.
Air, "Connais-tu la chanson?" Signor Mario (Le chant de Mai) Meyerbeer.
Duo, "Ich wolt' meine lieb," Mdlle. Cruvelli e
Mde. Viardot Mendelssohn.
Finale 2de, "Pian pianin in questo seggio," Mesdames Viardot, Castellani, e Mdlle. Cruvelli, Signori Gardoni, Tamburini, Herr Formes, e Signor Lablache (Nozzo de Figaro) Mozart.

Her Majesty most graciously entered into conversation with Mademoiselle Cruvelli for nearly a quarter of an hour, and appeared in the highest spirits.

Mr. Costa presided at the pianoforte.

Dramatic Intelligence.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—The first appearance of Mdlle. Rachel in a new character—the first production in London of a tragedy which has obtained so considerable a name in Paris as Valeria, were events to rouse the curiosity of all the world of taste, and Mr. Mitchell's theatre was accordingly crowded on Wednesday night by a brilliant and anxious audience. This work, the joint production of Messrs. Maquet and Lacroix, is a strong instance of the audacity of invention reached by the modern French dramatists. No other class of authors would have thought of taking for a subject the ancient scandal of Messallina Valeria—would have dared to rip up that foul story, and to give it a flimsy new face of calumniated virtue and sentimental magnanimity.

It may be imagined that a picture of the age and court of Claudius does not, even when lightened by the most artful of devices for whitewashing the character of the Empress, afford a wholesome or an edifying spectacle.

The motives—the actions—the sentiments of the characters are low and base. The incidents, through which the foul intrigue runs heavily, are exaggerated and inconsistent, the dialogue flat and insipid. The following slight sketch contains as much of the story of the piece as we shall venture to bestow on our readers. The action turns on the rival ambition of Valeria and Agrippina, each seeking to establish her own sovereignty through her son—on the alternations between success and failure, through which the latter, under the direction of the freed-man, Pallas, conducts to her own triumph and the death of Valeria. The intrigue, whose invention gives its peculiar character to the play, affords Rachel the opportunity of displaying that wonderful power of contrasted impersonation, which, in spite of its faults, has won for it a signal success, and makes what the authors seem to have thought an honest woman of Messallina. The Empress has the misfortune of having a sister strikingly like herself, who, stolen in infancy, has become a courtesan of singular habits and great fame. This woman, Lycisca, is seized on as an instrument by Agrippina and her satellite, and exhibited to Claudius sharing a voluptuous orgie with a dancer. The Emperor, touched in his only vulnerable point, signs a decree for the divorce and death of Valeria. She summons Silius, a young Patrician, with whom she has at the commencement of the piece established a love affair, and having already secured the army, takes advantage of the divorce to proclaim him her husband and protector of her son, who is declared Emperor in lieu of the deposed Claudius. In the moment of success, the friend of Silius, deceived by the fatal likeness, denounces the empress as the infamous Lycisca. Roman virtue is shocked. All fall away from her. Alone she awaits death in the garden of Lucullus. But Narcissus, the freed-man on her side, pendant of Pallas, arrives in time to untie all the knots of error and calumny in which her reputation is involved, and with her lover and his friend, her character is set right; but for the world it is too late, for Agrippina and Pallas, as a desperate resort, destroy the last evidence of the truth by decapitating the courtesan. Brought to bay by her enemies, Valeria slays herself with the sword of Silius, prophesying to Agrippina that her son shall be Nero and shall kill his mother. This, it may be judged, is sorry stuff, and we turn willingly from its demerits of composition to speak only of her who can charm us even through this dense medium.

True genius hallows and elevates whatever it approaches, and from this strange mass of mangled history and false sentiment Rachel extracted images of beauty and of truth worthy of the noblest poetry. Her portraiture of Valeria and of Lycisca are her own. In her hands they assume a life, a vigour, and a consistency, with which the authors have failed to endow them. Any one who was so fortunate as to witness the career of the empress, as represented on Wednesday night on the stage, without previously toiling through the tedious lines which pursue their sluggish course over the pages of Messrs. Maquet and Lacroix, must have gone home with the impression, that an immortal addition had been made to the great tragic drama of France. He must have blamed himself that he had not already purchased the volume and placed it in his library between the works of Corneille and Racine. Such will find that the excellence which he admired, and knew not how worthily to applaud, was exclusively histrionic, and his estimate of the wondrous powers of Rachel will rise with the disappointment with which he reads the tragedy of Valeria. If any one wish to test the justice of this observation by an easy proof, let him (bearing in mind the singular grace and fervour of the great tragedian in the seventh scene of the second act, between Valeria and Silius) peruse that brief passage in the play. He will certainly fail to recognise in the dialogue anything of the ease, fluency, and indescribable eloquence with which it was spoken. The whole character of the empress, as delineated by Rachel, is subject to precisely the same remark. It lies on the surface of the piece a series of disjointed fragments, ill-proportioned and inconsistent each with itself, and with all the rest—at the touch of the enchantress, it is gathered into a shape of faultless beauty and perfection, glowing with varied passions, and harmonised by uniform individuality. Her dignity, her sarcasm, her tenderness—each how true to universal nature! yet how finely discriminated from similar traits in any other of her creations! They are the dignity, the sarcasm, the tenderness of a woman; but in no phase of them is the spectator permitted to forget that that woman is an empress, and that empress Valeria. The last scene of all is portrayed with exquisite truth. The mortal agony, how different from that of Adrienne! Not poison, but the dagger, is the fatal minister here, and instead of the usual stage death, with its studied attitude, we see the greedy instrument drink the life-blood, and then increasing feebleness spreading itself over the whole frame, the form changes into clay, and lies in piteous helplessness before us.

But the most remarkable feature in the performance, is the concurrent personation of Lycisca, a character so different from that of Valeria, that the assumption of both, even during the same evening, though not in the same piece, would be a miracle of histrionic art. We have heard of, and wondered, at the versatility of Garrick, who could play Hamlet and Abel Druggier on the same night. What would Garrick have said had he seen Rachel changing, in the same scene, from Valeria to Lycisca, and from Lycisca to Valeria? If the empress was a character definite and perfect in its kind, not less so was the courtesan. The gay, joyous, and even voluptuous carriage of the latter, was sustained with a spirit which afforded the most striking contrast to Valeria. And here it were most unjust to omit the wonderful skill by which all this was given, without the slightest taint of indelicacy. The Bacchanalian song was sung with a jovial recklessness which defies all description; and as we listened to the wondrous melody of that deep, rich, sympathetic voice, we felt inclined to say with the lover in Shakspeare—

"When you sing, I'd have you do So ever."

The whole play was a new triumph, such as Rachel only knows how to achieve. She was recalled at the end of every act, and again at the end of the tragedy. On every occasion the applause was enthusiastic, universal, and deafening.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—The opera produced on Monday night under the name of Son and Stranger, was composed by Mendelssohn, when in London, in the year 1829, about the same period at which the second symphony in A major was written for the Philharmonic Society. It was first executed at Berlin, on the 25th anniversary of the wedding of the father and mother of the great musician, for which occasion it was specially dedicated. The performance, which was private, took place in the family residence, before a select party of friends, relations, and acquaintances. The work was never published during the lifetime of Mendelssohn, and has only now been given to the world by the proprietors of the posthumous copyrights, Messrs. Ewer and Co.

The libretto of the Son and Stranger was written by Mr. Klingemann, an intimate friend of Mendelssohn's. The English adaptation is from the pen of Mr. Chorley. The story is very slight. The mayor of a certain village, with Ursula, his wife, have been deprived of their only son by conscription, and have not heard of him for years. When the piece opens, the inhabitants of the village celebrate a jubilee in honour of the fiftieth anniversary of the mayor's appointment. Two strangers arrive—a pedlar and a musician. The first, who exults in the name of Kauz, insinuates himself into the favour of the mayor. The latter, through some secret communication, appears to have engaged the interest of Lisbeth, the mayor's ward, and the belle of the village. This excites the jealousy of Kauz, who, disguised as a watchman, dogs the steps of his adversary, at night, and catches him serenading Lisbeth. The entrapped serenader makes his escape, but soon returns, dressed in the habiliments of Martin the real watchman, who, in a state of intoxication, had readily ceded his place and duties to Kauz. Finding Kauz employed in the very business in which he himself had been surprised, the unknown musician collars him, cries out "thieves," and awakes the mayor, who from his bed room window recognises Kauz, whom he imagines to be the watchman, and orders the other to liberate him. The following morning, the day of the jubilee, Kauz, who has been informed of the incident of the mayor's long-lost son, attempts to pass himself off as the individual so anxiously desired, but is unmasked by the stranger, who himself turns out to be the person in request, a fact which he had already disclosed to Lisbeth, to her entire satisfaction, since it leads to the revival of an old affection. Slight as the materials are, this little piece is by no means destitute of effect. True, the fun of Herr Kauz is not of the best, nor is there anything either striking or new in the magniloquence and affected pedantry of the mayor; but as a vehicle for music, it is sufficiently lively and stirring.

Even in his earliest opera, the Wedding of Camacho, (written at the age of fourteen), which was brought out at Berlin, and almost immediately suppressed by the wish of the composer himself, Mendelssohn betrayed evidences of decided talent for the theatre. Some five or six years later the Heimkehr (the opera now under consideration) developed that talent in a still more remarkable light, and there can hardly be a doubt that his early death deprived the world of a very great and original dramatic composer whose works would, in all probability, have constituted as remarkable an epoch in the history of the art as those of Mozart, Beethoven, and Rossini. Those who are intimately acquainted with the compositions of Mendelssohn, great and small, and who have recognised in them the dramatic element in such a large variety of forms, will be less astounded than others, only partially acquainted with his works, at the simplicity, freshness, well sustained gaiety, and genuine humour exhibited in the music of the Son and Stranger.

The opera of such a composer as Mendelssohn, however, must not be dismissed with generalities; and a short account of the several pieces of which it is constructed will not prove unacceptable. The overture opens with a quiet pastoral movement in A major, 6-8 measure, leading to a vigorous allegro in the same key, in which are foreshadowed some of the main points of a more recent and masterly effort—the concert-overture, entitled A Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage. The characteristics of the overture to the Son and Stranger, are transparent clearness and symmetry of outline. The score abounds in the most sparkling orchestral effects, among which we must especially signalize the introduction of a counter theme, on the violoncello, which interrupts the second subject of the allegro, and mixes with it so agreeably, and with such a fine feeling of contrast. The coda, as in all Mendelssohn's overtures, is brilliant and exciting. The opera commences with a romance, "There sate in the gray times of old," for the contralto voice, in E minor, an old legend, in which Ursula prefigures her sentiments of anxiety for the fate of her absent son. This is a plaintive melody of three couplets, in the ballad form, the last couplet being gratefully varied by a new figure of accompaniment for the orchestra. A duet (in G), "Now here, now there, with laugh and jest," for soprano and contralto (Lisbeth and Ursula) follows. The young girl endeavours to chase away the gloom that weighs down the spirits of the forlorn mother, and the opposite sentiments of the two are developed in the music with exquisite art. Without entering into technicalities, we may pronounce this duet beautiful, from the first bar to the last. The next piece, a song in G minor, "How oft the young have wandered," shows Lisbeth falling into the same train of melancholy as Ursula. The style is passionate and appropriately different from the sentiment of the old woman's lament. It finishes with a phrase for the voice, unaccompanied, on the third of the key, which has a peculiar and novel effect of quaintness. The song in D, of Kauz, "I am a roamer bold and free," in which the pedlar gives a glowing description of the pleasures of a vagabond existence, is as overflowing with animal spirits as any of the airs de caractère of Rossini and Auber, while at the same time the distinctive peculiarity of Mendelssohn is preserved by means of an instrumental colouring that cannot be mistaken for any other master. The melodic phrases, however, are so totally unlike Mendelssohn, and present so few traces of his ordinary train of thought, that, on a first hearing, it is difficult to believe he wrote the air, and only the most attentive examination can lead to that persuasion. One of the most striking passages is the maestoso, in 3-4 measure, near the end, in which the charlatan sets forth his own merits with a pomposity which the music paints to admiration. A song for Hermann, the stranger, in G and B, is remarkable for the very forcible manner in which two sentiments are contrasted. It is a description of the life of a soldier, who, when all the world goes to rest, is compelled to keep watch at the tent—who, when the hearth burns brightly at the home of his fathers,—and in the midst of an interview with the girl of his affections, is suddenly called to arms. Mendelssohn has expressed this most poetically in the music; the interruption of the tranquil melody, devoted to the scenes of peace and repose, by the rude sound of the trumpet, testifying the opposite phase of the soldier's existence, declares a fine dramatic conception. The end, in the major key, suggests the faith of the soldier—who cherishes the image of his beloved amid all the vicissitudes of his career—in the subtlest spirit of poetry. In the concerted morceau that follows, for Lisbeth, Hermann and Kauz—a masterly and elaborate piece—Mendelssohn again exhibits his facility of conveying, simultaneously, in music, the conflicting sentiments of opposing personages. The jealousy and rage of Kauz, at observing the intimacy between the two young lovers, stands out with striking effect, and contrasts admirably with the flowing melody, given alternately and in combination, to Lisbeth and Hermann. In length and structure, this piece which begins with a flowing terzetto in A, and ends with a bustling and vivacious movement in D, first in the minor and then in the major key, must rank as the most important composition in the work. The terzetto in F, for Ursula, Kauz, and the Mayor, besides being flowing, dramatic, and beautiful, has another notable characteristic. In the performance of the Son and Stranger, at the house of Mendelssohn's father, the part of the Mayor was allotted to a gentleman who could not sing. To overcome the difficulty, Mendelssohn, whose humour was as genial and true as his genius, confined the music of this individual to one note. All through the terzetto the Mayor's observations are set to the bass note F, the monotony of which is relieved, when the other voices are silent, by graceful phrases in the orchestra. The terzetto concludes with a series of reiterated F's, in which the Mayor, by the words—

"In vain you would with tales deceive me, Hermann is, sure, a general now," expresses his belief in the prosperity and advancement of his absent son. There is the true vis comica in this terzetto, of which the composer of the Barbière himself might have been conceited. Another thoroughly comic morceau succeeds. Hermann entertains Lisbeth with a quaint serenade in G minor, "'Tis now the hour when spirits rise," accompanied by a pizzicato of the violins, &c.; but before he arrives at the end of each couplet he is interrupted by Kauz, who proclaims the hour of the night upon certain notes entirely foreign to the key of the serenade, enforcing his information with a strange and unmusical sound on an instrument which stands substitute for a watchman's horn. After repeated interruptions Hermann goes away in disgust and leaves Kauz to sing a serenade of his own and in his own key (B flat), "Hear, ye neighbours, hear me singing"

—a thoroughly grotesque effusion. This in its turn is arrested by the reappearance of Hermann in the costume of the real and bona fide watchman. The duet in E between the two rivals is full of vigour and depicts the contending passions of the angry disputants with graphic earnestness. The introduction of the mayor, who in spoken dialogue commands the liberation of Kauz, has a very excellent effect, and the resumption of the duet, elaborated by florid passages for the violin and other orchestral devices, is accomplished with increasing spirit until the climax, when, the combatants separating, the whole dies gradually away into stillness. A charming orchestral interlude is now supposed to represent the tranquillity of night, when a fragment of the opening movement of the overture introduces Lisbeth, who has provided herself with flowers, for the jubilee on which the morning is about to break. The ballad in A, "The flowers are ringing their bells of gold," in which the young girl apostrophises her fragrant treasures, is one of the freshest and sweetest melodies in the opera, and the subsequent chorus in D, expressing the united congratulations of the inhabitants of the village on the happy and auspicious day, emulates it in tuneful and unaffected beauty. The delicate and masterly manner in which both these pieces are accompanied cannot fail to be appreciated by the attentive hearer. The finale in which the imposture of Kauz is exposed, and Hermann claims the recognition of his parents and the love of his faithful Lisbeth, is as unambitious as it is charming. It commences and concludes in A, the key of the overture. The introduction consists of a quartet for Hermann, Ursula, Lisbeth, and Kauz—a souvenir of whose first air is pleasantly introduced—and a chorus in four parts, voiced with consummate effect, richly accompanied by the orchestra, and bringing the whole to a close with a flow of genuine and happy melody.

Considering its character and pretensions, Mendelssohn has written few things more entirely beautiful and engaging. That it places beyond all doubt the fact of his genius as a dramatic composer, is quite enough to make it interesting to all lovers of music. For freedom, spontaneity, and fluency of counterpoint, it does not yield even to the operas of Mozart—with which, however, it must not be compared, since its brevity and unambitious proportions place it out of the pale of larger and more comprehensive dramatic essays. Nevertheless, a more complete and highly finished work of its length has, perhaps, never been written; and if Mendelssohn was able to do so well for the momentary amusement of a private circle, it is not unreasonable to suppose, that, had he lived to carry out his plans, he would have equalled the greatest composers for the lyric stage.

The execution did not do justice to Mendelssohn's music: considering the means of the establishment, it was however, respectable. The opera was produced at the suggestion of Mr. A. Mellon, the musical director. The overture was tolerably well played. The choruses went satisfactorily. Both chorus and band should be doubled in number and quadrupled in efficiency. Miss Pyne, Miss L. Pyne, Messrs. Donald King and Weiss used their best efforts. Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Weiss (Lisbeth and Kauz) were familiar with the music, and sang their airs and concerted pieces with correctness. Miss Louisa Pyne gave the music as it is in the score, and did not alter a single passage. Miss Pyne, who made her first appearance on the stage, and Mr. Donald King were unequal to the parts of Ursula and Hermann, which are of essential importance to the ensemble. Mr. Lambert was quite at home in the Mayor and in the terzetto in F managed to give the single notes accorded to him with undeviating aplomb. As far as acting was concerned the most legitimate performance was that of Mr. Brindal as the drunken Watchman. Nevertheless, we never remember a musical piece to have gone off with more eclat. The applause was incessant and hearty, and there was an evident desire to encore everything. The presence of real genius must always be felt, even through the mist of inefficient performance; and a much inferior company to that at the disposition of Mr. Webster would have been insufficient to hide the beauties with which the opera of the Son and Stranger is crowded. We hail its production at the Haymarket, and its genial and unanimous reception by the public, as events of the highest significance. With better means of execution its effects would of course be much greater; but, taken as it is, it will amply repay a visit to the theatre.

ADELPHI—"Paul Pry" is having a new run here in the absence of Mde. Celeste; Mr. Wright performing the immortal Paul with his usual pungent extravagance of humour. Miss Ellen Chaplin, who plays the heroine, has little to do but what Nature has done for her,—that is, to look extremely pretty and lady-like. The Phoebe of Miss Woolgar is unquestionably one of her most charming impersonations. She is the very quintessence of a sharp-witted, saucy, meddling abigail. We would once more caution her, however, against a tendency to over-acting in parts of this sort, by which she injures some of her best points. The burst of laughter which follows her claim to the anonymous letter addressed to "The loveliest of her sex," is elicited by the perfect coolness and nonchalance with which she puts forth her impudent pretensions. This highly popular artiste will take her benefit next Wednesday, when she will appear as Sophia in Holcroft's comedy of "The Road to Ruin," a part very happily chosen for the display of the mingled simplicity and humour in which she excels. As this is the only opportunity that this lady's engagement at the Adelphi will give her of appearing in legitimate comedy, for which her talents so well fit her, we trust that the public will respond to the call by giving the fair artiste a bumper.

OLYMPIC.—The popularity of the French drama in London not only supplies us with constant novelty, but has lately given occasion to some friendly competition between the French and English artistes. Mrs. Charles Kean has "tried a fall" with Rachel—and with some success too—in Dumas's translated play "The Duke's Wager," and we have had Mrs. Stirling in "Adrienne Lecouvreur," although here all comparison with the French actress would be impolitic, the part of Adrienne not coming within the range of characters in which we have been accustomed to look for first-rate excellence in Mrs. Stirling. As our readers are already familiar with this lady's performance, we will say merely that, as is usual with the English actresses, the colloquial and domestic touches were given with the most truth and effect, the closing scene evincing considerable power. Her appearance and demeanour in the first scene were the very epitome of social dignity and ease, and her dress the superlative of classical grace and appropriateness.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On Saturday her Majesty visited this theatre in state, and commanded Thalberg's new opera, Florida; or, the Moors in Spain, which was the second performance. The royal box presented a most magnificent and striking appearance. The two large boxes on either side that of her Majesty were taken to form one grand section, and were decorated with hangings of crimson and gold, and blue and silver, which were brilliantly and effectively contrasted. The Queen's box constituting the centre one of the three, was brought forward some feet into the pit, and made to form a curve. The interior was hung with white satin and gold, and decorated with wreaths of various flowers. The ceiling was curiously fashioned with fluted silk and cloth of gold, while wreaths of roses and camellias, suspended from the extremities, were joined in the centre by a golden Cupid. The anti-chamber was beautifully fitted up, and brilliantly lighted by transparent lamps. The sides of the grand private entrance were festooned with blue and scarlet hangings of cachmere cloth, and vases of flowers of the rarest kind were arranged on either side, and emitted a refreshing and delicious perfume. In front of the grand state box, two beef-eaters were stationed on a platform erected for the purpose, in full uniform, as customary on such occasions.

Her Majesty was superbly attired and jewelled. Indeed, she appeared one blaze of diamonds, and never looked handsomer, or seemed in better spirits. Prince Albert was dressed in Field Marshal's uniform.

Precisely at eight o'clock, her Majesty entered the box, and came forward without an instant's delay to the front. The whole house rose to receive her, and a heartier burst of applause than that which immediately followed we never heard inside a theatre. Her Majesty bowed most graciously to every part of the house. The curtain being drawn up, discovered the whole company on the stage, and the National Anthem was sung, Mr. Sims Reeves taking the first verse, and Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli the last, a quartet of voices accomplishing the intermediate verse. The last verse was encored with acclamations which we did not consider loyally polite, seeing it kept her Majesty standing so long. But loyalty, like love, is sometimes blind, and must be pardoned for acts of inconsiderateness.

The National Anthem was repeated at the end of the opera, with the same enthusiasm, and her Majesty retired amid the most uproarious demonstrations of loyalty and liking.

On Monday an extra night was given for the purpose of introducing the celebrated twenty-eight Spanish dancers, who lately created so great a sensation in Paris, at the Gymnase. The patrons of the choregraphic art all assembled; nevertheless, the entertainment, which gave nothing but dancing all night, was found in the end something too monotonous. The dancers themselves obtained an unequivocal success, creating a furor in almost every pas. With one or two exceptions, the principal merit of the Spanish dancers consists in their ensemble, which for precision, novelty, and picturesqueness of effect, we have never seen surpassed, if, indeed, equalled. The most surprising and complicated evolutions are performed with a certainty quite extraordinary, while each artist seems to possess an individual and isolated interest in the scene, which is never lost sight of. Then, again, how wonderful is their castanet playing—as perfect as if it were accomplished by machinery! To be sure there is too much of it, and after two or three hours, the incessant clatter of ivory, however admirably in time, is apt to become fatiguing.

The performance was divided into four scenes or acts, indicative, we imagine, of Spanish mountain life in festival season. Groups of peasants assemble, and go through sundry national dances, and this is enlivened by some dramatic action, the purport of which we could not make out. Programmes, explanatory of the various scenes, should have been distributed in the theatre, which would have helped greatly to advance the interest of the entertainment.

The premiere danseuse is La Senora Dona Petra Camara; she is exceedingly handsome, with a Moorish cast of features, and "Large, dark eyes that flash on you a volley," and a person altogether highly interesting. She is very young, her years, apparently, not numbering twenty. With regard to her dancing, it is somewhat difficult to describe, being entirely of a special kind. There are no tours de force, properly so called, no points a la Rosati, no Gazelle boundings a la Carlotta, no iron-footed poses a la Amalia Ferraris, no pirouettes a la Marie Taglioni—in short, there seems no art, no effort, no intention. Every pas appears as though it were spontaneous, every movement improvised. What the Senora can do we have no means of estimating, for what she accomplishes is evidently within her means, so natural, easy, and unforced is every thing she does. Nevertheless, some of her pas are quite enough to stamp her as a danseuse of the first class, as one who has immense command of physical resources, who possesses inimitable grace, and whose every effort is obviously regulated by a superior mind.

The Spanish dances are nearly all of the Bolero, Gitana, or Cachuca character. They are variously named in the bills, but, we believe, they will be found referrible to that class of danses caracteristiques. The performances are exceedingly well worth going to see, and, from their novelty, the perfection of their ensemble, and the beauty and special attainments of the prima donna—if we may so call the first dancer—to say nothing of the stellas minores, who are by no means devoid of personal allurements and attainments, cannot fail to prove attractive for a time. Mr. Lumley possesses the most perfect and attractive corps de ballet in the world, but, as the twenty-eight Spanish dancers cannot possibly interfere with them, seeing that their accomplishments are totally distinct and special, we do not consider he has been unwise in engaging them for a limited number of performances.

After each act, all the dancers were recalled and received with hearty applause, and Dona Petra Camara created a perfect furor in all her pas. Nothing could be more genuine and unequivocal than the success of the Spanish dancers.

On Tuesday, Florinda was repeated for the third time, and with La Sylphide attracted a numerous audience. Cruvelli distinguished herself more than on the two former occasions by her admirable singing and acting, and Sims Reeves, Calzolari, and Lablache did all in their power to sustain the reputation of the opera. The applause, however, was not extravagant.

Masaniello and the L'Isle des Amours constituted an extra night on Wednesday. In addition, Paul Jullien, the boy-violinist, whose name has already appeared in this journal, performed a fantasia and obtained a most rapturous success. We shall not term little Paul Jullien "a prodigy"—there is something suggestive of ephemeral success in the word—but we may pronounce him a most wonderful player for his years, and, irrespective of his years, an admirable violinist. Paul Jullien is only ten years of age, and he has already mastered many of the greatest difficulties of his instrument. His intonation is faultless, and would shame that of many players of high pretension. His tone possesses an extreme delicacy, and a roundness so finely adapted to cantabile playing. His touch is firm and crisp, and his manner that of a practised performer. His execution is remarkably true and finished, and altogether his playing is satisfactory to an astonishing degree. It may be too much to assert, that he has already enrolled himself among the first violinists, but most assuredly he is not far from the first rank, and gives forth plentiful promise of being one of the most accomplished violinists of his time. The applause was uproarious from beginning to end, and at the close he was received with a perfect furor of applause, the whole of the orchestra joining lustily in the demonstration.

The Nozze di Figaro was revived on Thursday for Signor Fuzzi's benefit. The cast was good—it was as follows:—

Countess—M^{de}. Fiorentini; Susanna—M^{de}. Sontag; Cherubino—M^{lle}. Cruvelli; Count—Coletti; Figaro—Ferranti; Basilio—Mercuriali; Bartolo—Lablache. In addition, Carlotta Grisi danced a favourite pas between the acts; and Les Trois Graces, the popular ballet divertissement, was resuscitated for Rosati, Ferraris, and Marie Taglioni. This was a "long Thursday" in reality, and a "good Thursday" to boot, since it attracted one of the most crowded audiences of the season.

The opera was on the whole well given, although we must confess we have been more impressed by the performance. Cruvelli's Cherubino was the great feature of the cast, and, as far as the acting went, we certainly never saw the Page before. The animation, life, buoyancy, and espièglerie infused into the part was inimitable, and not a scene passed without some novel and striking point being made, which showed the artist's dramatic intelligence in a most unmistakeable light, and went, beyond the possibility of contradiction, to prove that Cruvelli is as great a comic as she is a tragic singer. Cruvelli's singing was also admirable, and would have been as unexceptionable as her acting, if she refrained from certain alterations in the "Voi che sapete," to alter a note of which we cannot help deeming an act somewhat reprehensible, and moreover impolitic, as the song requires no addition whatsoever, so satisfactorily demonstrated by Alboni when she played Cherubino. Independent of this, Cruvelli sang the "Voi che Sapete" magnificently, and created a furor, which terminated in an encore. The first song of the page, "Non so piu Cosa," although sung as finely, and acted with indescribable tact and animal spirits, did not tell so well. Perhaps it was taken a little too fast.

The music of the Countess is extremely well suited to Madame Fiorentini. The plaintive "Porgi amor," and that tenderest and most affecting of laments for past happiness, "Dove sono," were charmingly given, and produced a marked sensation. The favorite duet "Sul'aria" was sung to perfection by Mesdames Sontag and Fiorentini.

Sontag was never more irreproachable. With the exception of a cadence out of place in the "Crudel perche" duet, we have not a fault to find with this accomplished vocalist who is never more at home than in German music.

Ferranti's voice has not weight or depth enough for Figaro. No one on the present stage can do rigid justice to Mozart's Ex-barber but Formes. Ferranti acted capitally, and sang meritoriously, but his voice did not tell, and Figaro's music should tell.

Lablache was as glorious as ever in Bartolo, and the "Vendetta" song as grandly given. Coletti was impressive as the Count, and sang with vigour. Count Almaviva, however, does not belong to the repertoire of this gentleman.

All the artists were recalled at the end and received with great favour.

Between the acts Carlotta Grisi, who was engaged expressly for the occasion, danced one of her most enchanting pas, and was received with acclamations, and applauded throughout with enthusiasm. The return of Carlotta to the scene of so many of her glories, was an event in the evening not to be overlooked.

Les Trois Graces is a very pretty divertissement, and served to exhibit Mr. Lumley's three Graces—Rosati, Amalia Ferraris, and Marie Taglioni—under the most amiable and fascinating phases. Nor should the fair and elegant Coryphées, who, like spirits of light, hover round the Graces, be omitted from our notice. They served in no small degree to add to the beauty and lustre of the scene. Talking of the Graces, we have a hint for M. Paul Taglioni. Let him compose a divertissement on the subject of "Venus attired by the Graces." The Graces are already at his hand. Who but Carlotta Grisi could realise the Venus.

Last night—a grand extra night—the performances consisted of the Spanish Dancers, Fidelio, two solos by Sivori, and Les Trois Graces. We have only to record our admiration of everything.

To-night the glorious Alboni appears in Cenerentola, and will once again take London by storm. The whole opera world will rush to hear Alboni.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Roberto il Diavolo attracted a crowded audience on Saturday, and the performance was thoroughly good, if we except the choruses occasionally, and the dances in the incantation scene, which might have been considerably better. The applause and recalls were liberal, and the principal artists sang and acted with more than usual zeal and effect. Although Roberto is not one of Tamberlik's greatest efforts, inasmuch as the part does not admit of any extraordinary display, vocal or histrionic, it exhibits the powerful voice and energetic style of the admirable tenor to singular advantage in several instances. Bertram, on the other hand, is one of Formes' very best parts, and brings out in the fullest light his capabilities as actor and singer. A better Rambaldo than Stigelli could hardly be desired.

The revival of the Puritani (first time for two years) on Tuesday, introduced Ronconi in Tamburini's part, Riccardo, Tamburini assuming Giorgio, Lablache's original part. The selection was not a happy one for the great little barytone, who requires a character with more metal in it than may be found in the compromising lover of Elvira, to set off his peculiar talents and powers to advantage.

Ronconi obtained a most flattering reception, and gave the popular romanza, "Ah! per sempre," with artistic feeling and skill, and made several points which were loudly applauded. But for various reasons, the impression he created in Riccardo was not particular. The music is too low, and the character too much wanting in dramatic points, to befit an artist who depends for most of his effects on displays of passion under its most salient and striking phases. Two years since, Ronconi was announced for the part of Giorgio, Tamburini reserving his original character, Riccardo; but, for some unexplained reason, Ronconi did not appear, and Tamburini undertook the part of Giorgio at a moment's notice, Tagliafico appearing as Riccardo, a part which he had previously sustained at the Italiens, in Paris. Had this distribution been observed on Tuesday—Tamburini for Riccardo, and Ronconi for Giorgio—we have reason to think there would have been a double gain. Tamburini, who always exhibits the accomplished artist, was excellent in the elder Puritan; but we missed him in Sir Richard, a part which, in every respect, he has made entirely his own.

Mario was not quite up to the mark in Arturo. Occasionally he sang with the utmost sweetness and power, always with inimitable taste and expression; but his voice has not yet freed itself from the fell grasp of the influenza. We were glad, however, to find Mario singing in an opera which cannot injure his organ, and would pray him, as he regards the preservation of one of the most divine voices that ever gratified human ear, to forego French operas until such time as he shall have been reinstated in his full powers.

Grisi was the queen of the opera. She sang now delightfully, now touchingly, and now magnificently, and created a profound sensation in the mad scene, in the second act, and the scena "Qui la voca," which she executed better than we have heard her for many years. The famous polacca, "Son vergine vezzosa," if it did not exhibit all the ease and fluency of the old time, was an admirable instance of brilliant and graceful singing. Grisi, in short, was all but Grisi in her best days, and in her own line she still remains the "incomparable."

Bellini's Puritani has seen its last days. The inimitable quartet, for whom it was especially written, and who sang and acted in it to absolute perfection, are no longer available in its representation—and if they were, they are not what they have been. One has retired from the stage for ever; the others have been sundered. Grisi alone retains her original character. The days of the Puritani have passed away with the separation of Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini, and Lablache. The opera on Tuesday produced little or no effect compared with that of former times. But one encore, and that by no means unqualified, was awarded. The favourite quartet, "A te O Cara," could hardly have escaped a repetition under any circumstances.

The Queen's state-visit took place on Thursday night, and presented a very splendid and animated scene. The preparations for Her Majesty's reception were magnificent. The royal box occupied a large space in the centre of the grand tier, and was surmounted by a richly ornamented canopy which reached to the height of the second circle. The Queen and Prince Albert, with a numerous suite, entered the box precisely at eight o'clock. "God save the Queen" was sung; and Her Majesty was received with demonstrations of enthusiastic loyalty, which she acknowledged with her usual grace of demeanour. Similar marks of enthusiasm attended Her Majesty's departure at the end of the performance.

The piece commanded was Il Flauto Magico, the Italian version of Mozart's Zauberflöte. This opera, in its Italian dress, had not been performed here for more than thirty years, and was but slightly known to the public by means of an English adaptation brought out some ten or a dozen years ago at Drury-lane, and a few very lame performances by one or two of the German companies who have visited London. Its present revival, therefore, excited no ordinary interest.

The Zauberflöte is remarkable for containing some of the most elaborate and some of the lightest music of Mozart. Of the former we may cite the overture, which as an example of free counterpoint cannot be surpassed, and the chorale for the two armed men, in C minor, with a skilfully-wrought fugal accompaniment in the orchestra; of the latter, we need only refer to the first song of the birdcatcher, to the duet between him and Pamina, and indeed to all the pieces in which Papageno is concerned. There is also not a little music which possesses neither the exquisite melodious beauty that characterises this latter class, nor the scientific gravity that distinguishes the former—such are the march with flute solo while Pamina and Tamino pass through the several ordeals of fire and water, and the flute solo near the commencement of the first finale; these may be called trifling, and give one the idea of the author's contempt for the absurdity of the dramatic situations he had to illustrate. The libretto affords but small scope for dramatic effect—where any opportunity for the exercise of his great dramatic power presented itself, Mozart availed himself in that masterly manner which has so often proved the unfathomable greatness of his resources. A powerful example of this is the introduction when Tamino is struggling with the serpent, and the monster is slain by the three attendants on the Queen of Night. In the style of impassioned declamatory music, Mozart, the greatest master of this branch of the art, has never surpassed the adagio of the first aria of the Queen of Night, the song of Pamina, and the opening of the second finale, namely the quartet of Pamina and the three boys of the Temple. Mozart's remarkable power of imparting difference of character to the music of his different personages is remarkably shown in this opera—nothing, for example, can be more distinct from each other than the solemn purity of the music of the priests, and the playful lightness of the music of Papageno. Notice again how differently has the composer treated Tamino and the Queen of Night, Pamina and the Moor. The many trios of the three attendants of the Queen are essentially different in character from those of the boys of the temple.

The overture needs no comment, yet one cannot let pass an opportunity of offering one word of homage to the greatness of its author, which it so powerfully manifests. There exists not (even in the last movement of the so called Jupiter symphony, that wonderful example of this style of writing) a more perfect example of florid fugue, and there is not in music a work in which the skill of the musician is so completely masked under the beauty of his ideas. So incessant is the melodious flow of this most elaborate allegro, that those are charmed with it who are indifferent to the profound contrapuntal contrivance which forms its chief characteristic. The only point that appears to illustrate the subject is the short adagio in the middle consisting of the three chords of B flat thrice repeated. The instrumentation is most masterly and most modern—in especial may be noticed the fine effects produced by trombones in the introductory movement. The sparing manner in which these instruments are employed throughout the opera is worthy of remark; as in Don Giovanni, Mozart has recourse to them not for noise, nor even for power, but for the sake of giving peculiar colouring to the music of peculiar characters. In this earlier opera, Mozart uses the trombones only for the music of the ghost, although with less good taste than bad effect, it is the custom for them to play in the overture and other parts of the opera; in the Zauberflöte they are employed for the music of the priests only (besides in the overture), which has in consequence a different effect to any of the other music in the opera.

Of the introduction we have already spoken as a fine piece of dramatic writing. The opening movement is a thrilling embodiment of the anguish of terror. The simple but startling modulation that introduces the three attendants of the Queen of Night has a noble effect. The charming distribution of the three ladies' voices in this and all the pieces for these characters, as the other choir of three ladies, is equally individual and beautiful.

The little song of Papageno, "Gente è qui l' uccellatore," is one of the most capital tunes ever written; it is and will always be a popular favourite all over the world. It has the peculiarity (at least Frederick Schneider, the theorist and composer, thinks it worth while to point it out as such) of modulating into the keys of the dominant and subdominant, though the voice-part has no note foreign to the original tonic.

The most beautiful air of Tamino, "O cara immagine" needs but to be named to call up recollections of pleasure in the mind of every frequenter of our best concerts. It is a most glowing expression of passionate transport full of strong relief but making one unbroken continuity. The most beautiful interrupted cadence near the close of the chief melody with the piercing effect of the acute notes of the bassoon can only be imitated to be repeated. On the other hand, the panting, anxious, rapturous feeling conveyed by a passage later in the song, where the wind instruments accompany a passage of the violins coming always on the unaccented notes of the measure, has suggested many a point in later composers, we may speak of Spohr in particular, where the same happy orchestral distribution has been differently applied.

The recitative and aria of the Queen, "Non paventar" are remarkable, first for the all-engrossing beauty of the adagio "Infelice, e Consolato" (already alluded to), and next for the extraordinary compass of the last allegro which makes the song a musical curiosity, and the few singers who can satisfactorily execute it are phenomena in natural history. This movement has, however, little musical interest.

The quintet in which Papageno begins with the padlock in his mouth, and afterwards the prince and his attendant are dismissed on their adventurous mission, is one unbroken chain of beauties. The passionate character of Tamino and the pleasantry of the birdcatcher are well distinguished all through. The last andante is another of those world-received natural melodies that must last so long as time endures.

The little trio "Colomba mei venite qua" is a pretty trifle, chiefly to be noticed for containing the anticipation of one of the most popular melodies Mozart (who has written melodies more popular than anybody) ever wrote, the melody known as "Away with melancholy" which is given entire late in the opera.

The duettino "La dove prende amor risetto" is as well known as the first of May, and no less fresh and springy and pretty and ever welcome.

The finale of the first act is for Mozart, who has in Figaro, Don Giovanni, and Così fan Tutte produced such masterpieces of this class of composition, certainly a weak effort. In the opening movement, where the trio for the three boys is accompanied by the muted trumpets, the effect is very ethereal. Later, when Papageno sets Minostatos and his attendant slaves dancing to the sound of his magic bells, we have entire the now household melody, "Away with melancholy" to the words "O cara Armonia" the effect of which is irresistible on the audience as on the enchanted negroes. The preponderance of recitative, the absence of passion, and the paucity of action in the rest of the finale renders it to a certain extent dull if not wholly uninteresting, and the echo duet between the panpipes of the birdcatcher and the magic flute of the prince borders very closely on the ridiculous.

The march of priests that opens the second act is very solemn and impressive—still and passionless as the lives of the conservators of the Egyptian mysteries were supposed to be, if, as the stage experience of Auber's grand opera indicates, they were not. The three times protracted cadence at the conclusion is very grand and simple. We have then the three repeated chords that make so prominent a feature in the overture, which are supposed to be played by the priests on their horns. (Strange things did the Egyptian priests.) This is said to be (we are not of the initiated) a masonic symbol, and this proves first, that freemasonry is supposed to have prevailed in the temple of Isis; second, that Mozart was a freemason, of which there is the further evidence of his having written an ode for a Masonic lodge immediately before he was seized with his last illness. We have now the grave and beautiful song with chorus of Sarastro "Possenti Numi" in which the very original treatment of the trombones has an effect of prodigious beauty.

The short duet of the two priests, in which they admonish their disciples against the fascinations of woman, is simple and cold, but not otherwise noticeable.

The quintet for the same characters as in the first act, where the three ladies of the Queen of Night tempt the two postulants to break the law of silence that has been imposed upon them, is natural and melodious, but not conspicuous for any of those beautiful points that are in the other quintet so abundant.

The song of Menostatos is full of character, and another of those all powerful melodies that seizes the ear at once never to quit it again. A particular effort is made throughout this by the omission from the score—or only sparing employment—of the double basses, and the incessant iteration of semiquavers throughout the accompaniment.

The grand aria of the Queen "Gli angui d'inferno" fully makes up for the weakness of the last allegro in the first song of this character. The Queen offers her daughter a dagger with which she requires her to assassinate the high priest, and calls upon the Gods to punish her in case of her failure. The awful grandeur of a mother's curse is magnificently conveyed in this fine conception, and we are in this instance more than reconciled to the almost unnatural effect of the excessively high notes of the voice-part,—we forget that it is unnatural, and, so applied, we feel it to be supernatural, that such a power, when only such a power could possibly express what this music purports, should be employed to this noble effect. The thrice repeated exclamation, "hort!" when she appeals to the gods of vengeance (which is very inefficiently and ineffectively rendered in the Italian version) is superbly conceived. This may be esteemed one of the most successful pieces in the whole work, and cannot fail to make a deep impression.

The air of Sarastro "Qui Sdegno" is another of the many movements in this opera, that are familiar to everybody. Beautiful as it is however in a concert-room, it loses half its effect by being deprived of all its purport, when separated from the situation in which it occurs, and here its calm and broad, and peaceful effect, is the nearest possible approach to sublimity. Such a representation of the greatness of peace creates the reverent awe that it is intended to describe, and proves for the time of its performance the meek magnanimity of the human soul in the consciousness of all who hear it.

A most lovely little gem is the terzetto for the three boys, when they for the second time meet Tamino and Papageno. It is all that can be conceived of exquisite prettiness and graceful simplicity.

"Ah! lo so, più non m'avanza," the passionate lament of Pamina to which we have already alluded, is worthy of Mozart's best moments, (and what have all these moments produced?) is worthy of the adagio of the Queen's air in the same key (G minor), is worthy of the symphony in G minor; of the string-quintet in G minor; the key in which especially this true musician of the passions seemed to revel, whenever he meant most of intense passionate expression.

The chorus of priests and the trio of Pamina, Tamino and Sarastro are smooth and placid, but not remarkable for any particularly striking beauty.

The charmingly pretty song of Papageno, with the accompaniment of his magic bells "Colomba or Tortorella," is another of the many regularly rhythmical tunes in this opera, that taught us to declare while cataloguing them, that it contains more melody than any work in existence. As in the song of Rokko in Fidelio, we feel not in this that the change from 2-4 to 6-8 measure breaks up the unity of the effect.

The last finale is full of beauties, and contains no single movement (notwithstanding its very extraordinary length), excepting only the flute solo already cited, that has not its particular attraction. The action is however so entirely without unity, it is so broken and divided, and the music accordingly so often comes to full closes, and recommences with such change of character as is an interruption rather than a relief to the general effect, that it is entirely wanting in the continuity and connection that so eminently characterises Mozart's great finales. Let us consider then the several portions as distinct from each other, not as a whole, to the making of which we cannot feel them to be in any respect combined, and we shall find in them endless matter for admiration, though we cannot place the entire finale among those great works in which Mozart himself is his own only rival. The beautiful trio for the three boys with which it opens, and the passionate music of Pamina when she comes into dialogue with them, forms one exquisite morceau. The elaborate movement with the chorale has nothing to do with the preceding, but has enough in itself to awaken and to satisfy the most powerful interest. The duet of Pamina and the Prince has little to touch us; then comes that foolish march, and then the chorus of triumph which is again of small importance, so that this scene of the finale loses its character after the first movement. The long scene of Papageno, his meeting with the three boys, his invocation of Papageno and their irresistibly comic duet, form another extensive section of the finale which is equal in its way to anything in the whole work. The next movement in C minor, with the Queen and her attendants and Menostatos, is another movement of marked character abounding in interesting features. Then comes Sarastro and the priests, and the gravity and the explanation, and the moral, and, finally, a cheerful brilliant tuneful movement that finishes the opera and sends everyone home with a happy recollection.

Grisi, Mario, Ronconi, Formes, Stigelli, were included in the cast; and the small part of Papageno had no less a representative than Madame Viardot. Madlle. Zerr, whose extraordinary performance of the great bravura air of the "Queen of Night" at several concerts during the season had attracted much notice, was engaged expressly for that part. The choruses and orchestral accompaniments were magnificently performed, and the spectacle was splendid and beautiful. The audience were frequently roused by the charms of the music to vehement expressions of delight, but it was evident that no sustained interest was excited by the performance, which, as it went on, moved more and more heavily. In short, the Flauto Magico is a proof that the finest music in existence is insufficient to support an insipid drama; and this music must continue, as it has done for half a century, to be enjoyed in the concert room and the chamber, not on the stage.

Reviews of Music.

"GRAND FANTASIA," FOR THE PIANOFORTE.—HENRICH WEBER. Charles Jefferys.

This fantasia is quite remarkable as a specimen of precocious talent. The facility, part-writing, and imitation it displays would seem to augur much more profound knowledge of the art than could possibly be attained at so early an age. The most striking part of the fantasia is the second movement of the introduction, andante quasi allegretto, in C minor, and the allegretto con moto, in B flat, which follows it, a really clever and elaborate piece of writing, a la fuga, against which no reproach can be made but that so frequently attaching to fugal compositions, a confusion of keys, and a certain prevalent dryness. The last part of the fantasia, an air varié, in E flat, the theme of which, à la marcia, has already been foreshadowed in the fugato alluded to, is principally to be noted for the ingenuity and brilliancy of the variations. Altogether, however, the piece is highly creditable to its young composer, who, if he keeps the promise here held out, cannot fail to become an ornament to his profession.

"THEY MURMUR A WORD OF FAREWELL." The Poetry by C. H. R. The Music by EDWARD HOWELLS. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

This ballad is sweet and tuneful. Not its least remarkable characteristic is its extreme simplicity. A child could sing it, and a child could play it. It is essentially a zimmer-lied. It is in E flat—an unadulterated ballad—and can be sung by a contralto, or a mezzo-soprano, with equal effect. We recommend it strongly to Miss Messent, Miss Bassano, Miss Eyles, and, in short, to any of our popular vocalists who are in want of something plaintive and touching, without being difficult, and addressing itself to that class of auditors who would pay unwilling attention to an aria of Mozart or Handel. The words are pretty and unaffected.

"THE CRYSTAL FOUNTAIN POLKA."—Composed by JULLIEN.—Jullien and Co.

This dance tune has already obtained a great popularity, and has been introduced at the Surrey Zoological Gardens, with eminent success, by the composer. The theme is quaint and melodious, and is carried out with unflinching spontaneity to the end. But what we most particularly admire is the imagination and ingenuity shown in the imitation of the tremulous sound of the falling waters, and the transparency, as it would seem, of the crystal sparkling in the light, and reflecting the prismatic colours in innumerable tints and hues. How Jullien has effected this is a mystery beyond our fathoming. But that he has effected it may be ascertained any night in the week, Saturday excepted—provided it be played on that night—by a visit to the Surrey Zoological Gardens, when the hearers, as it were, seem to fancy themselves within the precincts of the Crystal Fountain. Each night the Crystal Polka excites the audience to enthusiasm. A capital bit in the trio for the cornet-a-pistons, inimitably played by Koenig, helps to increase its popularity. To all lovers of dance music Jullien's last polka must prove welcome.

HANDEL'S "JOSHUA," AND HANDEL'S "SOLOMON," IN VOCAL SCORE—(Nos. 119 to 124 of Monthly Series).—Arranged by VINCENT NOVELLO.—J. A. Novello.

The success attending the hand-edition of the oratorios of Handel and others, in vocal score, has been well merited. The utility of the publication is unquestionable, and by the able manner in which the orchestral accompaniments have been compressed, for organ or piano, by Mr. Vincent Novello, one of our most competent musicians, we need not reiterate our opinion. Not the smallest advantage in this hand-edition of the great oratorios is its cheapness, which places it within reach of every one. No one should attend a concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society, or of the London Sacred Harmonic Society, without his copy of the work in progress of performance, which Mr. Novello has made so easy, and shown it to be so advisable, to possess.

Joshua and Solomon, now issuing, are among the most remarkable of Handel's works. This, however, is not the place to speak of them. It is enough to call attention to the fact, that Mr. Novello's publication goes on steadily and prosperously.

NO. 2 OF SIX PROGRESSIVE PIECES FOR THE PIANOFORTE.—Dedicated to his pupils by WILLIAM SPARK. R. Addison.

The first of this set of pieces—"A Romanza"—if we be not mistaken, we have already noticed in terms of eulogy. The present number contains a graceful, smooth, and cleverly written rondo in G, which Mr. Spark modestly entitles "Rondo Grazioso à la Dussek," although it is entirely and unconditionally Mr. Spark's own property. The theme is flowing and pretty, and the passages afford excellent practice for the pupils. We recommend it without hesitation to our readers.

Provincial.

MANCHESTER.—On Friday evening last, a new organ, built by J. and W. Holt, of Bradford, Yorkshire, for Christ Church, Heath Field, was opened by Dr. Gauntlett, who found assistance in other portions of a musical performance, from the choir of the Cathedral, with Miss Shaw as the leading soprano. Among the performances we noticed the "Andante" from the "Pastorale" of Beethoven; "Anthem No. 4," by Dr. Gauntlett, and the grand chorus, "Worthy is the Lamb." The singing of "I know that my Redeemer liveth," by Miss Shaw presented further proof of the vocal qualities of this young lady,—who wants nothing but earnest application, under judicious tuition, to give her a place. Mendelssohn's quartet from Elijah, "Cast thy burthen," gave so much satisfaction as to gain an encore. The admission was free, but a collection took place in the course of the evening.

Miscellaneous.

MISS KATE LODER'S MATINEE MUSICALE.—Miss Kate Loder, whose very great merit as a pianist has been for a long time generally acknowledged, gave a morning concert on Saturday, at the New Beethoven Rooms, at which she appeared most advantageously in the new character of a composer, in its most ambitious and pretentious light. The important work she submitted on this occasion to her audience was a violin quartet in E minor, which derived great advantage from the masterly performance of Ernst, with Mr. J. Day, Mr. Dando, and Mr. Hancock for coadjutors. This work evinces a judicious study of the best masters. We thought the first movement the most successful portion of the quartet. It is no mean merit to attempt a composition of this high character. It is no matter of wonder, however, that, in her lighter efforts, the fair musician should have been more entirely at home. To a recitative and air sung by Miss Hill, a charming little romance sung by Miss Dolby, and two melodies for the pianoforte executed by herself, we accord our unqualified praise, as being each excellent in its respective style. Miss Loder has been rarely heard so effectively upon her instrument as on this occasion. She played with Messrs. Day and Hancock Mendelssohn's trio in D minor, with all the feeling for the author that a player of such talent might be expected to display; in a fantasia of Schulloff she evinced equal command of a widely different style. We have only further space to mention Miss Catherine Hayes's exquisite singing of the pathetic ballad "The Lonely one," Miss Dolby's clever delivery of a highly interesting song of Mr. F. Mori, and Madame Macfarren's much admired rendering of a song from the Sleeper Awakened. Herr Reichart, Mr. Frank Bodda, Mr. Williams and his sister, Miss M. Williams, were among the other vocal performers. Mr. W. C. Macfarren officiated as conductor. The room was crowded by an elegant and fashionable audience.

MIDDLE E. GARCIA AND M. F. DEMUNCK'S CONCERT.—Middle E. Garcia called her patrons and friends together, conjointly with M. Demunck, to an entertainment at the Hanover Rooms, on the 26th ult. The vocalists who rendered their assistance were Madame Sainville, Herr Pischek, and Signor Montelli. The instrumentalists consisted of M. Lavigne (oboe), M. Magnus (pianoforte), and M. Deichmann (violin). Middle E. Garcia's execution of the "Nel cor piu," with variations by Vaccai, a favourite display of Madame Persiani, was rendered with skill and considerable effect. Madame Sainville, in a duet with Signor Montelli, and in an aria from Torquato Tasso, acquitted herself with much dexterity, and Signor Montelli was applauded in "Largo al factotum." Herr Pischek was encored in the popular song of Proch, "The Alpine Horn." We remember having heard this sung with Mr. Jarrett's horn accompaniment, a very desirable one too. The German vocalist returned the compliment by giving "The Standard Bearer," a song now too hackneyed to afford much gratification. M. Magnus played a piece of his own composition with no small effect. He also gave Schulhoff's adaptation of the everlasting "Carnaval." M. Lavigne narrowly escaped an encore for his masterly performance on the oboe, and M. Deichmann, a very rising player, was highly successful in a violin solo. M. Demunck performed a solo on the violoncello with much taste, and displayed a good round tone, which was heard to great advantage, not only in his solo, but in a trio by M. Schimon, a clever composition, in which the composer took the piano part. H. L.

REUNION DES ARTS.—On Sunday last, this Society gave its 10th soiree at the Beethoven Rooms, 27, Queen Ann-st. Haydn's quartet (opera 81), was ably executed by MM. Goffme, Steinberger, and the two brothers Herren Lutzen. Madame Verdavainne played Bertini's Norma on the piano and a fantasia on the guitar, with remarkable energy and taste, and was deservedly applauded. Madame Lemaire and Middle E. Johannsen were the vocalists, and acquitted themselves very creditably. Mr. Chatterton (harp) and Mr. Steinberger and a juvenile performer, Mons. Rancheray (violins), elicited well deserved plaudits. The rooms were crowded.

SIGNOR ANGELO BARTELLONI'S CONCERT.—This Concert possessed a feature more common than desirable, viz. a total absence of anything like order set down in the Programme, and consequently there was much confusion pervading the minds of the audience, more particularly as the singers were not all well known, and it was extremely difficult to know whether Miss such-a-one was ravishing our ears with soft melody, or Signora something else was the sweet songstress, and so on.—The most important feature for those who paid one guinea for a reserved seat was the appearance of Signor Tamberlik's name, which, however, was all that did appear, for the Signor remained away. Bottesini's, nevertheless, double bass sang as magically, and spoke as eloquently as usual; and Briccialdi's flute discoursed most satisfactory music; (by the way the Signor's slow movements upon that instrument are clever in the extreme); and Signor Bartelloni himself played well on the violin. He wants a little more variety with the bow, a little more certainty of intonation. One fine feature of the Signor's Programme was its reasonable length, for which he is entitled to commendation.

H. L.

BEETHOVEN QUARTET SOCIETY.—The eighth and last meeting of the present series took place on Wednesday night. It was for the benefit of M. Rousselot, the director, and the audience was the fullest of the season. Being an extra night the programme was miscellaneous, and only one of Beethoven's quartets was played—that in C major (No. 9), dedicated to Prince Razumowsky—executed by Messrs. Sainton, Cooper, Hill, and Rousselot. The other quartet was Mozart's, in E flat, performed by Messrs. Cooper, Ernst, Hill, and Rousselot. A quintet, the composition of M. Rousselot (No. 3, in D), with Ernst for the first violin, and Bottesini for the contrabasso, excited considerable attention. It is a very artistic work, and the perfect manner in which it was rendered brought out every point to advantage. M. Rousselot is thoroughly acquainted with the qualities and capabilities of instruments, and has displayed his knowledge to eminent purpose in this quintet, the obligato solos and the ensembles being equally well written and effective. The performance was unanimously applauded. A new duet for violin and contrabasso, composed and executed by Signors Sivioli and Bottesini, made a great sensation. It was rather a duo-solo than a duet, each instrument being provided with an alternate succession of bravura passages of the most brilliant character. Beethoven's pianoforte trio in C minor, exceedingly well given by Mdlle. Coulon, Sig. Sivioli, and M. Rousselot, completed the number of full pieces. Mdlle. Coulon, though one of the youngest, is one of the most promising of our resident pianists. The programme was varied by songs of Mendelssohn and Rousselot, charmingly sung by Miss Delby, and much applauded. M. Rousselot deserves credit for the spirited manner in which he has conducted the affairs of the Beethoven Quartet Society through the present (the 8th) season.

MR. DISTIN AND HIS SONS will leave town on the 2nd of August, for Jersey and Guernsey, Southampton, Isle of Wight, Weymouth, Limeridge, Sidmouth, Exeter, Teignmouth, Plymouth, down to Truro, Penzance, up by way of Bristol, and return to London about the middle of October.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Beethoven was not blind as well as deaf.

Advertisements.

DR. HENRY WYLDE.

THE following SELECTION OF MUSIC, by DR. HENRY WYLDE, will be performed at the Grand Concert, at Willis's Rooms, King Street, St. James's, on Monday evening, July 14th:—A Sacred Work, for full orchestra and chorus; Pianoforte Concerto in F minor; Overture in E major; Andante and Scherzo, from a symphony; Scenes and Duet, from an opera. The orchestra and chorus will consist of upwards of 100 performers. The chorus selected from the Sacred Harmonic Society. Vocalists, &c.—Mrs. Sims Reeve, Mr. and Mrs. Durrant, and Herr Stigelli; Pianoforte, M. Billet. Leader, Mr. Willy.

MEYERBEER'S SONGS,

ENGLISH Version, Edited by FRANK ROMER, are now published by Campbell, Ransford, and Co., British and Foreign Musical Presentation Library, 56, New Bond Street.

HELLER'S STUDIES.

OP. 16—"THE ART OF PHRASING." Twenty-four Studies, in all the major and minor keys; in Three Books, each 6s.
"They teach style and execution together, through the fascinating medium of music, at once simple, expressive, and beautiful."

HELLER'S SECOND SET OF STUDIES.

Op. 45—Twenty-five Studies, introductory to the "Art of Phrasing," and as a Preparative to the Studies and Works of the Modern Composers; in Two Books, each 6s.

HELLER'S THIRD SET OF STUDIES.

Op. 46—Thirty "Etudes Mélodiques et Progressives;" in Three Books, each 6s.

HELLER'S FOURTH SET OF STUDIES.

Op. 47—Twenty-five "Etudes pour former au Rythme et à l'expression;" in Three Books, each 5s.

Catalogues of Stephen Heller's Works to be had of his Publishers, Wessel and Co., 229, Regent-street.

MESSRS. COCKS' NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

THE TONY-WALZER. By Labitzky.—Her Majesty's State Balls.—The following beautiful Compositions were performed by Mr. Boose's Band on the above occasion, and were evidently fully appreciated:—Labitzky's Morning Star and Tony Walzes, also the Leipzig Galop—Strauss's Swallow Waltzes and Kathinka Polka—and Musard's Champagne Quadrilles. Price 2s and 3s each.—N.B. The above Dances were also performed by the Brothers Labitzky and their celebrated Band, at Cambridge House, on the 6th instant.

THE GREAT GLOBE QUADRILLES. By Stephen Glover, Piano, 3s, Duets, 4s. Also, by the same distinguished Author, Mamma's Quadrille, Papa's ditto, 8-los, each, 3s; Duets, each, 4s.—Mamma's Galop, 2s; Papa's Polka, 3s.—Osborne's Quadrille, 3s; Duet, 4s.—The Six Palace Band March, each, 2s.—Royal Hyde Park March, 3s.—Home March, 3s.—Alpine March, 2s 6d.—Prince Arthur's March, 3s.—The Retreat March, 2s, and Fantasia on Airs of All Nations, 4s.

STEPHEN HELLER'S latest PIANOFORTE PIECES.—Students of the pianoforte will find in the following works of the above distinguished author an unusual degree of merit, suited alike for the saloon and the practice room, viz.:—Chant du Chasseur, 2s; L'Adieu du Soldat, 2s; Chant du Berceau, 2s; Arrangement of Mendelssohn's Chant d'Amour, 2s; ditto Parting Song, 2s; ditto Chant de Fête, 2s.

KÜCKEN'S POPULAR BALLADS, (Author of "Trab, Trab") Words by Wm. Ball and R. Lincoln Cocks:—"The Guardian Angel," 2s; "Off, Off Away," 2s; "Sweet May," 2s; "Boatman's Song," 2s; "Come Sweet Maid," 2s; "Where'er a Cot," 2s; "In Vain I Court," 2s; "O! My Love's Like" (duet), 3s; "Two Birds Flew" (duet), 3s; "Why so Timid?" 2s; "Slumber Song," 2s; Jetty Treffs's much admired "Trab, Trab," with an illustrated title, 2s; "The Guardian Angel," 3s; "Off, and Away," 2s; and "The Tear," 2s.

NEW PIANO MUSIC, by Brinley Richards.—"The Vision," "The Angel's Song," each 2s; "The Sturm Marsh Galop," "Poor Mary Anne," "The Ash Grove," and "The Rising of the Lark," each 3s.

COCKS'S MUSICAL MISCELLANY FOR JULY IS NOW READY, Price 2d; stamped, 3d.

MESSRS. COCKS'S VERY SUPERIOR PIANOFORTES, 22 GUINEAS and upwards. The "Musical World," referring to the inferior kind of pianos offered for sale, says—"Not that the instruments of Messrs. Cocks are dear—on the contrary, they are as cheap as the valueless instruments just mentioned, but they have the advantage of being firmly and compactly made, of the best (and the best seasoned) materials, and of keeping well in tune for any length of time."—N.B. May be had, gratis, and postage free, descriptive lists with drawings, and the best method of keeping pianos in tune.

An ERARD's elegant double-action HARP, cost 120 guineas, nearly equal to new, price only 60 guineas, with packing-case and leather cover complete; a single-action Harp, by the same maker, price 15 guineas.

London: 6, New Burlington-Street. Publishers to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen.

N.B. Now ready, gratis, and postage free, part IX of Messrs. Robert Cocks and Co's Catalogue of their latest publications.

CURES FOR THE UNCURED!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—Cure of a Bed Leg of more than sixty years' standing.—Mr. Barker, of No. 5, Graham's Place, Drypool, near Hull, had ulcers on his leg from the age of 18 until upwards of 80, and although for many years he had sought the first advice in the country, nothing was found to cure them. He often suffered excruciating pain for long periods together, which incapacitated him from attending to his business. He had given up all hopes of getting a cure, when at last he was persuaded to try Holloway's Pills and Ointment, which he did, and however wonderful it may appear, the leg was thoroughly healed by their means, and by continuing to use the Pills alone after his leg was well, he has become in health so hale and hearty as now to be more active than most men of fifty. N.B.—The truth of this extraordinary statement can be vouched for by Mr. J. C. Reinhardt, 22, Market Place, Hull. Feb. 20th, 1850.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in the following cases:—
Bad Legs Coco Bay Contracted and Lumbago Scurvy
Bad Breasts Chicago-foot Stiff Joints Piles Sore-heads
Burns Chilblains Elephantiasis Rheumatism Tumours
Bunions Chapped hands Fistulas Scalds Ulcers
Bite of Mosquito Corns (Soft) Gout Sore Nipples Wounds toes and Sand-Cancers Glandular Swellings Sore-throats Yaws
Fleshy Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar,) London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World, in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6s., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are annexed to each Pot or Box.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

FIRST APPEARANCE OF MDLLE. ALBONI.

It is respectfully announced that this evening, SATURDAY, July 12, will be presented Rossini's celebrated Opera,

LA CENERENTOLA.

Angelina (under the name of Cinderella) ...	Mdlle. ALBONI.
Thibe ...	(Her first appearance.)
Clorinda ...	Mdlle. GRIMALDI.
Don Ramiro ...	Mdlle. FELLER.
Dindini ...	Mdlle. CALZOLARI.
Aledoro ...	Signor FERRANTI.
Don Magnifico ...	Signor F. LABLACHE.
AND
Don Magnifico ...	Signor LABLACHE.

Between the acts of the opera, a new Grand Pas (composed by M. Gosselin) by Mdlle. Carolina Rosati, Mdlle. Rosa, Esper, Julien, and Lamoureux. To conclude with the admired divertissement, entitled

LES GRACES.

Introducing the celebrated Pas de Trois. Euphrosyne, Mdlle. Carolina Rosati, Thalia, Mdlle. Marie Taglioni; Eglia, Mdlle. Amalia Ferraris. Assisted by Mdlles. Kohlenburg, Rosa, Esper, Julien, Lamoureux, Soto, Dantonie, Esther, Pascuales, Allegrini, Soldansky, Emma, Elizia, Lavinia, Beale, and the ladies of the corps de ballet. The opera to commence at 8 o'clock. Applications for boxes, stalls, and tickets, to be made at the box-office of the theatre.

On Tuesday, July 15, Thalberg's new grand opera, FLORINDA, the SPANISH DANCERS, and LES GRACES.

Wednesday, July 16, and Thursday, July 17, Two Grand Extra Nights, comprising the talents of Mde. Sontag, Mde. Fiorentini, Mde. Giuliani, Mdlle. Sofie Cruvelli, and Mdlle. Alboni; Signori Gardoni, Calzolari, Pardini, and Mr. Sims Reeves; Signori Lablache, Mascol, F. Lablache, Casanova, Scapini, Lorenzo, Ferranti, and Colletti; Mdlle. Carolina Rosati, Mdlle. Amalia Ferraris, and Mdlle. Marie Taglioni; M.M. Charles, Ehrick, Gosselin, and Paul Taglioni.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—On FRIDAY NEXT, JULY 18th Handel's MESSIAH. The Orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets 3s.; reserved, 5s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter Hall, or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross.

DISTIN'S TWELVE CONCERTS,

ROYAL MUSIC HALL, STRAND. Mr. Distin and his Sons will perform on their improved Sax Horns, in addition to their Operatic Selections, the celebrated Cuckoo Galop. The above Galop is arranged for the Piano and Cornet-a-Piston, price 3s. post-free; and may be had of the Publisher, H. Distin, Military Musical Instrument Maker, 31, Cranbourne street, Leicester-square, London.

CONVEYING TO THE SPECTATOR SEVERAL MILES OF EUROPEAN SCENERY.

MR. CHARLES MARSHALL will be happy to treat with Schools and Heads of Families, for the admission of their Pupils or Children at a moderate charge, to his

GREAT EDUCATIONAL & PICTORIAL EXHIBITION,

Geographical, Historical, and Statistical—accompanied by appropriate Music, presenting Extensive Panoramas of the most remarkable

CITIES OF EUROPE, MAGNIFICENT SCENERY OF THE DANUBE, THROUGH SWITZERLAND AND ITALY, ROME AND VENICE, DOWN THE RHINE, AND HOME, THE WHITE CLIFFS OF ENGLAND.

This Great Moving Diorama, presenting A GRAND TOUR THROUGH EUROPE, Tourists' Gallery, Leicester-square. Exhibition Daily at 12, 3, and 8. Doors open half-an-hour before the commencement. Admission, 1s.; Reserved Seats, 2s. Stalls, 3s.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Best, W. T., Op. 20,	PIANO SOLOS.
Heyer, Ferd., Op. 42,	Valse di Bravura.
" Op. 36,	Bouquet de Mélodies No. 26.	Die Zauberflöte.
" Op. 36,	(To be continued)
" Op. 36,	Repertoire des jeunes Pianistes No. 26,	Die Zauberflöte.
" Op. 36,	(To be continued)
Brisson, F., Op. 45,	Impromptu.	sur Bonsoir Mr. Pantalon.
Burgmüller, F., Op. 188,	Blanche.	Polka Mazurka.
Duvernoy, T. B., Op. 188,	Ronde des Porcherons.	Pantale.
Gottschalk, L. M., Op. 188,	La Mélancolie.	Etude.
Rosellen, H., Op. 188,	L'Orientale.	Redowa.

Sets of the very last Galops, Polkas, and Waltzes by Hamm, Kühner, Kliegl, Stasny, and Strauss, the most popular dance-music composers.

PIANO DUETS, TWO PERFORMERS.

Brunner, C. D., Op. 121, Fleurs teutoniques. 6 Rondinos on popular German Airs, in 6 books.

ENGLISH SONGS WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.

Lee, Alexander, Op. 69,	"When Thou'rt away."
Oberthur, Charles, Op. 69,	"The Antidote."
" Op. 70,	"A Passing Thought."

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's-street.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

THIRD NIGHT OF IL FLAUTO MAGICO.

ON TUESDAY NEXT, JULY 15th, will be performed Mozart's celebrated Opera,

IL FLAUTO MAGICO.

Pamina, ...	Mdlle. ALBONI.	Mdlle. GRIMALDI.
Astrifiamante (Queen of Night), ...	(Being her third appearance on the stage in England.)	Mdlle. ANNA ZERR.
Egle, ...	Mdlle. GIUSEPPINA MORRA.	Mdlle. HERTRAND.
Arethusa, ...	Mdlle. VINTALE.	Mdlle. VIARDOT.
Iperethusa, ...	Signor F. LABLACHE.
Papagena, ...	(Who has kindly undertaken the part.)
Scraströ, ...	Herr FORMES.	Signor STIGELLI.
Monostato, ...	Signor SOLDI.	Signor MEI, and
Oronte, ...	Signor ROMMI.	Signor POLONINI.
Two men in Armour, ...	Signor RONCONI.	Signor MARIO.
Deonofantes, ...
Papagena, ...
Tamino, ...

GRAND EXTRA NIGHT.

LE PROPHETE.

On THURSDAY NEXT, JULY 17th, will be performed, for the third time this season, Meyerbeer's Grand Opera, LE PROPHETE. Principal characters by Madame Viardot, Madame Castellan, Herr Formes, Signor Tagliafico, Signor Soldi, Signor Mei, Signor Stigelli, Signor Polonini, and Signor Mar o.

Composers, Director of the Music, and Conductor, Mr. COSTA. Commence at Eight. Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre.

NEW DUETS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

THALBERG ...	Beatrice di Tenda
ROSELLEN ...	Deux Méloies de Donizetti, 1 and 2.
ROSELLEN ...	Fal d'Andorre.
WOLFF ...	Valse Original.
WOLFF ...	Beatrice di Tenda.
SILAS ...	La Primavera, Ragtelle.
KALIWODA ...	Invitation à la danse.
OSBORNE ...	Plume de Perle.
SCHULTZ ...	Duo L'espagnole.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent-street.

CRAMER'S STUDIES.

THE First Volume of this Work is now Published in the upright form, newly revised and corrected by the Editor, and divided into four parts. Price, 6s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

STREICH ...	Les Hirondelles.
RICHARDS ...	Mid-summer Day.
RICHARDS ...	Moonlight Serenade.
RICHARDS ...	Danish Air.
RICHARDS ...	Pastorale.
PRÄNGER ...	Momen Joyeux.
PRÄNGER ...	Nocturne Romantique.
KOHE ...	Styriens.
SILAS ...	Amaranth.
SILAS ...	La Primavera.
THALBERG ...	(A quatre Mains.)
SCHULTZ ...	Prophete.
WOLFF ...	Melodie.
WOLFF ...	Euryanthe.
WOLFF ...	Preciosa.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

MR. CRIVELLI

BEGS to acquaint his friends and the public that a Third Edition of the "ART OF SINGING," enlarged and newly arranged in the form of a Grammatical System of Rules for the Cultivation of the Voice, may be had at his residence, 71, Upper Norton-street, and at all the principal Music-sellers.

* Soon will be ready, the French and German Translation.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published.

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed, and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTE. Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 310 Regent-street; Keith and Prowse, 48, Cheapside; and Cocks & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3 Stridley Villas, Studley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the Office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Furkess, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickars, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, July 12, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra), payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 29.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, JULY 19, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

THE SEASON, 1851.

Since we last alluded to this topic there has been a wonderful change. The Crystal Palace, in Hyde Park, still remains the cynosure of attraction, still swarms with visitors from all parts of the globe, still excites, surprises, and delights the multitude; but it is no longer exclusively patronized by the public, to the neglect of every other object of interest in the metropolis. The theatres, musical and dramatic, and indeed almost every place of entertainment, in and out of doors, have for some time been doing flourishing business. Our prophecy of a reaction has been fulfilled, like our prophecies in ordinary.

The two Italian Operas are reaping a large harvest of support. Mr. Lumley, at Her Majesty's Theatre, has added Alboni to his company, and has evinced unprecedented rapidity in the production of novelties. Mr. Gye, at the Royal Italian Opera, has satisfied himself with repeating the most attractive works from the stock repertoire, Mozart's Il Flauto Magico being the solitary exception. Both houses deserve more than a visit from our foreign, colonial, and provincial friends. No one should leave London without hearing the young and promising Cruvelli—the genius—in Fidelio and Norma; no one should depart without paying homage to the glorious Alboni; no one should go until he has listened to Rode's air varié by Mlle. Sontag, and seen the great Lablache dance the polka.

At Covent Garden, on the other hand, there are the big operas of Meyerbeer, Robert, the Huguenots, and the Prophète—the two greatest tenors of the world, Mario and Tamberlik—the barytone buffo-serio incomparabile, Ronconi—the deep German basso, Formes—the admirable and ever verdant Giulia Grisi—the studied and artistic Pauline Viardot. There is also Mozart's Il Flauto Magico, which, if only for Anna Zerr's "Gi angui inferno," Formes' "Qui sdegno," and Ronconi's glockenspiel, is well worth seeing.

At the Haymarket Theatre Mendelssohn's operetta, Son and Stranger, draws crowds every night. Mr. Webster is, we understand, so thoroughly pleased that his whole heart is now set upon an English opera. Tant mieux.

At the Adelphi there is still Mr. Wright, who makes everybody laugh whether they understand his vernacular or not; and charming Miss Woolgar, who gives everyone the heart-burn.

The Philharmonic Society, the Musical Union, and the Beethoven Quartet Society have all closed an unusually prosperous season. It is, therefore, useless recommending them to the attention of strangers. But there yet remains the Sacred Harmonic Society, with the oratorios of Handel and Mendelssohn—the greatest musical institution in the world, and the worthiest. To tell every one to go there is needless, since every one goes so often, that it is always a chance whether a seat can be obtained, or even a corner to stand upright in.

Meanwhile Albert Smith has set off for Mont Blanc, on the peak of which cool hillock he intends to add another chapter to his Overland Mail. We trust to see him back again before the multitudes have dispersed and vanished.

CRUVELLI'S CHERUBINO.

From Fidelio and Norma to Cherubino is a long journey. Sophie Cruvelli has, nevertheless, accomplished it without peril. Florinda was the bridge over which she was compelled to pass. She traversed it safely. It did not break down in the passage, although there was considerable risk. The ordeal of Florinda, for Cruvelli, was like the ordeal of fire and water, for Tamino and Pamina, in the Flauto Magico. Cruvelli was Tamino, and her art was the Pamina of her love. She went through the fire and the water, strong in faith, and her escape may be regarded as a new triumph of that genius which bears her, on the wings of resolution, to the goal of her aspirations. The public was her Sarastro, and awarded her the prize of constancy and fearlessness.

Without trials there is no real merit in success. A life of unchanging ease leaves no trace of its passage. A sky that is ever serene and blue becomes, in the end, oppressive and monotonous. Cruvelli had her trial in the first dramatic work of Thalberg. The task of supporting the opera of Florinda, during four representations, was the task of Atlas, who bore the globe on his shoulders. Cruvelli achieved it, however, aided by the mighty Lablache, and the indomitable Sims Reeves. Lablache, always kind and encouraging to artists of talent, would not allow his young protégée to sink under the burden, but put his overpowering weight into the balance. Sims Reeves, the best and most warm-natured of camarades, came also to the rescue. The most arduous and difficult of operas was saved from ruin, by the enthusiastic prima donna, the gigantic basso, the energetic English tenor, and Balfe, the chef d'orchestre who never sleeps. Though a work of labour, it was not the less a work of love; since every one likes Sigismond Thalberg, and every one admires his genius. The magnificent pianist, however, in composing his first dramatic effort, overlooked the fact that the human voice was not an instrument of brass, or wood, or catgut—but a thing to be fostered as tenderly as the drooping flowers by the lady in the Sensitive Plant. Another time Thalberg, with more experience, will do better. There is quite enough of dramatic feeling, quite enough of artistic ambition, in Florinda, to hold out a promise of something really good. Let Sigismond try his hand again, think less of the orchestra and more of the voice, less of combinations of harmony and more of melody. It is well to be original; but to be truly so depends rather upon first ideas than on the manner of their treatment.

Cruvelli has now played four parts—Leonora, Norma, Florinda, and Cherubino. The mere fact of having succeeded in them all establishes the question of her genius beyond further controversy. What can more differ from Leonora than Norma?—what can be more antagonistic to Norma than Florinda?—what more opposite to Florinda than Cherubino? Compare any one of the four parts with all or any of the others, and not the slightest resemblance will be found. Cruvelli is, therefore, not merely a genius, but her genius partakes of that universality which only belongs to the highest. We have said quite enough of Fidelio, Norma, and Florinda, to render further allusion to them superfluous; but about Cherubino we have a few remarks to offer.

Cherubino, as Cruvelli represents him, is a new character—the mischievous Page of Beaumarchais, idealised by the music of Mozart. Those who are intimately acquainted with the comedy of the French dramatist cannot fail to acknowledge that Mozart has elevated a set of commonplace individuals into the highest regions of poetry. What is the Countess?—a disappointed wife, who finds her Lindor anything but the perfection she once imagined him. What is Susanna?—a flippant, saucy, chambermaid. What the Page?—a naughty boy, with ideas beyond his years. The Count?—a vulgar seducer, jealous of his wife in the bargain, but jealous from vanity, and no higher feeling. Figaro and the rest?—except Antonio, the gardener, who is simply a toper, a parcel of unredeemable intriguers. All this leaven of worldliness and poverty of spirit—all this gachis of vice and heartlessness—has, by the force of Mozart's genius, been lifted into another and a purer sphere—idealised, as we have already said. Mozart touched this dross, and turned it into gold. The Susanna we love—the Countess, with whom we sympathise—the Cherubino, whom we pat on the head, and look upon as a poet in embryo—are Mozart's. Beaumarchais supplied nothing but the effigies and masks; Mozart blew on them with the breath of inspiration, and they became endowed with life, and soul, and heart. It is especially in her singing that Cruvelli discloses this view of the character of Cherubino. Her reading of the first song, in E flat, "Non so piu cosa," perhaps the most beautiful ever written, is perfect. She adheres to the tempo of Mozart—quick, restless, and full of animation. The only alteration she introduces—the high B flat at the end, which she takes with brilliant effect—is quite legitimate. We cannot think that Mozart himself would have objected to so evident an improvement on the original climax. A song so crowded with musical beauties—an aspiration to the unseen, but not unfelt, from first to last—a poem in which is foreshadowed a whole world of passion—a longing of the young heart after the infinite and unknown—such a song should not end tamely, which, with the low B flat of the score, it certainly would. We cannot defend, on the same grounds, the ornaments which Cruvelli introduced into the other, and far less pretensive air of the Page, at the first performance. The beauty of "Voi che sapete" lies in its simplicity. As the poet says, "when unadorned it is adorned the most." We cannot find a bar in this lovely flowing melody that is not injured by the slightest change or the slightest interpolation. Cruvelli sang it divinely; as far as mere vocalization went we could have wished for nothing better. But this was not all that we required. "Voi che sapete" is a tender flower that shrinks at the touch. Take away but one of its petals, and it withers. Place as much as a leaf upon it, and it sinks under the weight, and dies. As Cruvelli and the rest (all excepting Alboni) sing it, it is no longer itself, but the ghost of an Italian melody dressed out in gaudy colors of bravura. Mozart would not have tolerated this; and Cruvelli, who has the sentiment of music as profoundly as any singer who ever lived, appeared conscious of the error she had committed. At the second representation (on Thursday night), she sang it quite in another manner—preserving all its purity, and all its touching simplicity. This genuine reading, allied to the exquisite beauty of the singer's voice—the tones of which, high and low, must win their way to the most obdurate heart—made a deep impression. An encore followed, as usual. Mozart was not the less appreciated because he spoke in his own beautiful and unadulterated language. Here Sophie Cruvelli delighted musicians and connoisseurs as entirely as she pleased the general public; but what could have induced her, on the air being repeated, to resort once more to the ornaments and changes of which we have complained we have not the wit to find out. As this is the first time we have had to rate Cruvelli for want of taste—a quality which she eminently inherits—we trust it may be the last. We admire her too sincerely not to tell her when she is wrong; but we would fain have the earnest and impassioned representative of Fidelio as perfect as lies within the limits of humanity.

Cruvelli's acting in Cherubino is delicious. The first night there was a little too much of the gamin; and we objected to a pair of moustaches, pretty and impertinent as they looked. The second night the gamin was toned down, the moustaches were abandoned, and the whole was mellowed into something, if not so saucy, still more agreeable and fascinating, with a dash of reverie, which is essential to Mozart's Cherubino, if not to the good-for-nothing Page of Beaumarchais. In short the performance was pretty nearly faultless—as admirable in execution as in conception. We could scarcely believe that in the restless, fidgetty, adventure-some and amorous page, we were beholding the same young actress, who was but now the sublime Norma, the heroic Fidelio, the hard-worked, ill-used Florinda.

To conclude, Sophie Cruvelli has added another laurel to her wreath; and it depends upon herself to render this as bright and unfading as the rest. She has yet to sing "Voi che sapete," as Mozart composed it, and as real musicians love to hear it. Cruvelli, who did so much to satisfy musicians in Fidelio, who is cited by them in terms of such genuine and special admiration, must, in the midst of her brilliant successes with the uninitiated public, consent to please them in this matter. If the worst happened, and the general audience failed to appreciate a reading, wholly pure, of a melody which is in itself the essence of purity (Alboni has incurred the danger), Sophie Cruvelli could surely afford to dispense with an encore. Her name and reputation would not suffer one iota.

THE RENTREE OF ALBONI.

(From the Times.)

The return of Alboni, in her favourite part of Cenerentola on Saturday night, was equally a pleasure to the audience, and a triumph for the singer. The house was crowded to suffocation, and the enthusiasm of the public recalled the most memorable performances of Jenny Lind.

The career of Alboni, though short, has been remarkable. It is scarcely more than seven years ago that a young girl of seventeen attracted the attention of Rossini at Bologna. The celebrated maestro, struck with the singular beauty of her voice and its extraordinary compass, took an immediate interest in Alboni, and devoted considerable time and pains in giving her advice, which the result has shown to have been invaluable. The idle and apathetic nature of Rossini is well accredited. His attentions to his youthful protégées were, therefore, the more to be prized, and can only be accounted for by the probability of his foreseeing, in her person, a new and a great representative of many of his most admirable creations. The sequel justified his anticipations; not only has Alboni proved herself a perfect executant of some of the most striking parts in Rossini's operas, but, what is more, she is the last of a glorious race, the last legitimate singer of the real Italian style, now on the point of dissolution. The decay of the Italian school of singing is traceable to several causes, the chief of which, unhappily, is the dearth of composers, which has made the last quarter of a century the most barren in the history of Italian opera. The last great genius, the last great composer, of Italy was Rossini. Bellini was a plaintive echo of his saddest strains—Donizetti a vigorous imitator, in whom everything was found but the "divine fire." Rossini, disgusted at the growing apathy for his works in the land of his birth, went to Paris and composed French operas. He altered his style entirely, and gave the deathblow to the true Italian school. This was his revenge for the neglect of those who should have cherished him as their only hope. To Rossini, Bellini, and Donizetti succeeded Verdi. Verdi exhibits all the worst faults of his predecessors, exaggerated one-hundred-fold, with none of the genius of Rossini, little of the tenderness of Bellini, and less of the facility and savoir faire of Donizetti. Nevertheless, Verdi has his merits—viz., occasional facility of tune, considerable energy, and a dramatic fire that cannot be denied. But these are not enough to sustain a tottering edifice, rapidly crumbling into dust. The Italian school has seen its best days; its decline is near at hand; and it is doubtful whether anything can restore it. C'en est fini. There are no composers, no orchestras, no chorus, no librettists in Italy. The youngest and the last of Italian singers is Marietta Alboni, but even she has been compelled to succumb to the capricious changes of taste. Acknowledged the finest contralto singer of her day, the only competent representative of Arsace, Malcolm, Tancredi, and a host of other characters, she was nevertheless persuaded that she was not in her proper sphere. While the mere tones of her voice held the crowd in the spell of their enchantment, while the "Brindisi" was cheered, the "In questa semplice" apostrophised—and none denied her to be in her own peculiar way incomparable, Alboni was yet not in the first rank—not what she felt internally convinced Alboni ought to be. Silently, in secret, and without disclosing her intentions to any one, she began to study another kind of music—the modern dramatic, and when few expected what was going to happen, appeared suddenly before a Parisian audience on the stage of the Grand Opera, as Fides, in Meyerbeer's opera of the Prophète. The astonishment of the public when the announcement was first published may be easily imagined. "Alboni, the contralto—the calm Arsace, the lively Orsini, the imperturbable Malcolm—Alboni, the cantatrice par excellence, who had never given any indication of dramatic power, was going to attempt Fides, the most arduous part in the most difficult opera of the most exacting and restless of composers! Absurd!" This was the unanimous sentiment, which, however, was unconditionally reversed after the first performance, one of the most memorable events in the archives of the Grand Opera. Previously, however, Alboni, not trusting wholly to her estimate of her own powers, had been diligently practising in Belgium. Her Leonore in La Favorite, and other characters in the grand operas of the Académie, created a furor at Antwerp, Liege, Ghent, and Brussels; and by this means she acquired a command of the French language in singing which induced the severest of the French critics to pronounce her accent irreproachable. Whether in partially abandoning that particular school of which she was the greatest ornament, Alboni will add to her reputation in the end, has yet to be established. That she has quadrupled her professional emoluments, and materially shortened the road to competence and fortune, is unquestionable; but this can interest herself alone; the musical public of Europe has nothing whatever to do with it. One thing speaks in her favour. At the Grand Opera of Paris, where Alboni is engaged four months in the year to play French parts exclusively, she has sustained the falling fortunes of the theatre, and her name is the only sure means of attracting the public and ensuring good receipts.

Meanwhile it is gratifying to know that, while Alboni has succeeded in attaining the highest position as an exponent of French dramatic opera, while she has undergone the trying ordeal of Meyerbeer, Halevy, and Auber, she comes back again to the school in which she was tutored and brought up with a voice unimpaired in every respect. This must be traced to that unflinching method of training and employing the voice—the Italian method—of which she possesses the secret, and which she has known to employ to such good purpose. Alboni always sings—in French opera no less than Italian; she never forces her voice, never strains to reach what her natural register does not place at her disposal. Hence the unvarying freshness, strength, and mellow ripeness of an organ, in many respects unrivalled. No part better than Cenerentola serves to display the various gifts of Alboni to advantage. In the first scene, where, while her more favoured sisters are employed in discussing the artifices of costume, Cenerentola prepares her coffee at the fireside, the quaint romance, "Una volta c'era un Re," brings out low notes, as sweet and rich as the softest tones from the horn. Nothing can be more prepossessing than the simplicity with which Alboni says, rather than sings, this unpretending melody. In the cabaleta of the duet with Ramiro her flexibility is first denoted, while the infantine archness with which she addresses her unknown companion, in the words—

“Deh scusate, perdonato
Alla mia semplicità” —

has a charm that is irresistible. The last scene of the first act, where Cenerentola appears veiled, as an unknown guest at the Prince's ball, offers an example of the florid ornamented largo, in the pure Italian style, unexampled for breadth and dignity, combined with grace of style. In the delivery of such phrases, it must be admitted, Alboni stands without a competitor. The second act is chiefly distinguished for the celebrated adagio, “Nacqui all'affanno,” and the brilliant rondo, with variations, “Non piu mesta,” which terminates the opera. Alboni's execution of these movements realises the beau ideal of the vocal art. When we hear her pour forth, with a wealth of tone and a style of phrasing, which, lavish in graceful ornament, is the essence of artistic finish, the large and flowing melody of the adagio, we cannot but lament that such a simple and expressive style of writing should be hopelessly on the wane, and that a voice and method like Alboni's should be exhibited—to satisfy the eternal craving for novelty, to which the diverse transformations in the forms of art are attributable—in performances, perhaps, more vehemently exciting, but assuredly less natural and pure. The rondo, “Non piu mesta,” in the hands of Alboni, as a feat of mechanical execution, has never been surpassed, if indeed equalled. It is not merely the faultless correctness with which the scales, intervals, and divisions are taken, nor the roundness and satisfactory aplomb of each particular note, nor the fluent ease with which the rapid melody flows from the lips of the songstress, that calls for admiration; but more than all, a certain unconsciousness of the effect she is producing, a child-like innocence that plays upon her features while in the act of accomplishing the most extraordinary tours de force, and which, while it would plead successfully for a multitude of errors, exercises an indescribable influence when allied to such absolute perfection.

The reception of Alboni was such as is only accorded to the most favoured artists. The first tones of her voice in the romance, “Una volta c'era un Re,” fell upon the ear like some cherished melody of early days, and at once aroused the feelings of the audience. After the florid cabaleta of the duet she was unanimously recalled. The grand largo di bravura of the first finale, “Sprezzo quei don che versa,” was enched with acclamations. The enthusiasm created by the “Non piu mesta” and the preceding adagio we shall not attempt to paint. The encore and the double recall were but commonplace matters when compared with the breathless interest and the suppressed murmurs of delight which accompanied its execution from beginning to end. Suffice it, Alboni never more triumphantly sustained her reputation as one of the greatest singers of the age, and, in her own especial style, the greatest.

(From the Morning Herald.)

Alboni, after a two years' absence in Madrid and France, made her re-entrée at Her Majesty's Theatre, on Saturday night. What better character could be selected for this interesting occasion than the Cenerentola, in which this fascinating syren has been in former seasons so triumphantly successful? She was received with the applause commensurate with her reputation, and no one ever enjoyed the public favour more unequivocally than herself. It will gratify her admirers to be told that she has lost none of her personal characteristics; her figure being as comfortably round as it ever was, and her countenance as declaratory of simplicity and goodness. Best of all her voice retains all its original beauty; and it was a delight not easily to be measured to hear once again those pearly notes, which can scarcely be said to have their equal in ringing sympathetic loveliness. Every one remembers the exquisite way in which this gifted vocalist executes the pretty melodies of the Cenerentola. Indeed, how can such things be forgotten? Alboni never sang them more ravishingly than on Saturday night, and when we say this, we exhaust all ordinary terms of praise. In the highest graces of style and finish this accompanied artist may, with but an exception or two, be pronounced unrivalled. We have taste the most delicate, as well as that supreme condition of art when all apparent effort is thoroughly and completely subdued. Although she performs exploits which few besides herself would be capable of achieving, the hearer is less astonished than pleased, less impressed with the precision of the mechanism than with the voluptuous and playful lightness of the expression. Were we called upon to point to any public singer in whom vocal elegance was strongly and instructively visible, it would be to Alboni, who betrays the utmost excellence of practical cultivation, and who, without the slightest tincture of affectation “enchants the ear” simply by the purity and amiability of her method. The encores she obtained on Saturday night were extended to the “Sprezzo quei don” and the “Non piu mesta,” according to the prescriptive rule. The latter was a masterpiece of vocalization, and moved the audience far beyond the common bounds of enthusiasm.

FIDELIO.

(Continued from Page 436.)

The accompanied dialogue that follows straight upon conclusion of Florestan's song is an admirable thought for combining the intensity of musical expression with the rapidity and clearness of spoken enunciation. There is very much in this brief colloquy between Rokko and Leonora of feeling to express, but the words are ill-adapted to musical declamation, they are of too conversational and familiar a character, and they require for the sake of all dramatic propriety to be too quickly uttered to be in any respect suitable for singing; thus the employment of the present form of composition, a kind of spoken recitative, is most judicious in this situation, in saying which we make a commendation of the principle which the effect fully justifies. The idea of combining spoken dialogue with orchestral accompaniment was not new in this situation; it seems to have been the custom of a somewhat earlier period in Germany to employ such a form of musical illustration in the performance of certain of the spoken dramas,—so at least we learn from a biography of Mozart, where there is an account of the composer having been most successful in a work of this character. The effect of such treatment of an entire dramatic work is questionable to us, who have never heard it, but we may reasonably suppose that had it been good, some specimens of the form of composition would have remained for us to judge from. Its successful application to a single scene in a long work is amply proved in the instance under notice. There are some most beautiful examples of the partial introduction of musical accompaniment in the spoken drama in The Antigone of Mendelssohn, where the most impassioned portions of the dialogue are greatly idealised in purport, and equally intensified in effect by the addition of the third most powerful medium of expression, music, to the language of the declamation, which, by the excellence of the combination of the whole, are shown to have been, alone, inadequate to the rendering of the deep and poetical feelings that are thus all powerfully embodied. It has been long our wish to see a lyrical drama constructed in which this form of accompanied dialogue should take the place of recitative throughout,—not to speak of the propriety of alternating speaking and singing in the same work, which is matter for discussion irrelevant to the present papers, such a form of treatment would be, we imagine, a compromise between the composer, who is reluctant to forego the exercise of his powers in any portion of his opera that offers scope for their employment, and the public, who are from want of habit and from want of education, unable, in this country, to follow with attention and interest the ceaseless music of an entire performance on the stage, where different expectancies and different appreciative powers await the representation to those raised in the cathedral or in the concert-room.—Enough of digression—let us proceed with the scene in Fidelio.

The jailor and his assistant descend into the prison. The delicate Leonore shudders as she enters the living grave of him she believes to be her husband; the extreme darkness of the dungeon prevents her for some time from discovering him, then she doubts whether he be in death or in sleep. There is a deep intention in the few bars that accompany her passing the lantern before the eyes of the sleeper, all that is uncovered of his face, to certify her apprehension; first for the practical—the wavy, streamy effect of a light passing and re-passing before a closed eye, is fully realised; then for the ideal—the dream, the happy dream, the life in death of the exhausted victim is suggested by the recurrence of a passage in the song of Florestan, on the words, “An angel so like to my wife Leonore.” The assumed indifference with which Rokko enters upon the fearful task in the ruined cistern, the gloom of the dungeon, Leonore’s terror, have apt illustration in recurrence to passages in the finale of the first act, where the same train of thought prevailed with the same characters. All this is thoughtful, and conduces greatly to the general unity of the whole effect. This is a happy appropriation of previous ideas to a present purpose, the merit of which, however, lies much more in the conception than in the execution, as is proved by the many also happy examples of the same musical treatment in the works of dramatic composers of very various excellence, which are all, doubtless, more or less, to be ascribed to this scene in Fidelio as their original; such are the introduction of the same passage, whenever Samiel appears personally or by allusion in Freischütz, of the fragment of the laughing chorus, when Max hesitates to descend into the glen; of the drinking song, when Caspar prevails over him, in the same opera; the recapitulation of all the phrases belonging to the most important situations throughout the opera in the mad scene of Masaniello; the continual recurrence of the bridal chorus throughout the Mountain Sylph, and the similar examples of musical memories in madness in the Lucia and the Linda.

The last phrase of this melodramatic music leads into the very unique duet in A minor. This is one of those pieces of music in which the actual as well as the imaginary is thought to be imitated, in which not only the thoughts and feelings of the singers are meant to be expressed, but the positive sounds produced naturally, or by the action of the characters such as the singing of birds, the rushing of water, the howling of wind, the turning of a spinning wheel, and the like. It is a question for much discussion how far such matters are proper objects of musical imitation; still more, how far it is in accordance with dramatic propriety to embody such imitations in compositions the chief aim of which is to depict the passions of those who are surrounded and, possibly, have their thoughts if not their feelings coloured by such real sounds. Without a doubt, this practice in music belongs to the same class of art as the employment of imitative syllables in descriptive poetry. The “Hop, hop, hop” in Bürger’s marvellous description of the windswift ride of Leonore with her phantom lover; the “Trab, trab,” in the account of the horseman’s approach which a popular songstress has of late made most familiar; and many other like examples that are much more frequent in German than in English verses—but we willingly concede that in music we find a much more poetical application of the artifice. The discussion which this suggests is far too extensive for the present situation, but a future opportunity may enable us to enter upon it at some considerable length, till when we shall dismiss it, with the acknowledgment, that in defiance of the many beautiful specimens of the application of this kind of imitation to musical illustration, in spite of our unqualified love for many of the compositions in which they occur, notwithstanding our compelled reverence for many examples of the practice, we are by intuitive feeling, no less than by studied judgment, opposed to the principle.

Be the principle to which we have alluded, right or wrong, the application of it in the duet before us is one of those entirely successful efforts of a powerful imagination which so completely enslaves our passive admiration, as to supersede all exercise of judgment, and to annul the capacity for comment, excepting in the terms of commendation. There is imitated in the accompaniment of this duet the constant action of digging and the rolling of the earth under the implements of the labourers; in one place particularly we have the falling of a large stone, the removal of which has cost the greatest exertion. Superficially considered, we can suppose nothing less suggestive of musical beauty, or poetical expression, than such thoroughly material employment as the action of digging, though it be the digging of a grave, or the noises of falling stones and rolling earth; but we have here something deeper to consider than the mere sacrifice, something that qualifies not only the feelings of the anxious wife and the honest jailor, but endues the very stones upon which they work with a personal interest, if not with a supposed consciousness. This something, be it merely the naturally gloomy associations of the place with the employment that is being fulfilled, and the purport of this employment, or be it that feeling of presentiment which poets have so fondly loved to depict, and Campbell has so epigrammatically expressed, when he says—

“Coming events cast their shadows before.”

This something, however it may be defined, however understood, certainly justifies the poet musician in making it the material object of his illustration, and as certainly separates his illustration from that class of commonplace musical description or attempted imitation, which equally degrades the art, and burlesques the object it is intended to portray. We have to think that the mass of earth and stones which is being removed from the ruined cistern has been the gradual accumulation of many years, and has, therefore, been the silent witness of the many successive horrors that have been enacted in this the deepest cell of the state prison of a tyrant governor under a despot monarch: that the unheeded sufferings of each after other of the members of the dynasty of misery who have in turn succeeded to the sorrows of this cell, have filled not only the dank and poisonous air with the unwilling utterance of their sighs and groans, have invested not only the walls which enclose the captive, confine the sounds they utter, annul their aspirations for liberty, and limit everything but their thoughts, with so much of the living principle as to make each separate stone the emblem of a dead joy, the everduring presentation of a living sorrow; have magnetized this most desolate of destructions the debris of a dungeon, with the sadness that nought else could share, with which nought else could sympathise, that nothing else could know, and quickened it with a tardily developed sense of ill that nothing which is mortal could tolerate: but that this receptacle of remorse, this sanctuary of sorrow is now disturbed, and for what?—to be made the last hiding-place of the latest inmate, and, perhaps, the most forlorn of all those the influence of whose sorrows has been their only legacy to such as were to share with them this posthumous sympathy. We are to think of all this, and the supposition is then most natural that there is sentience in the stones, and that, though they be inert, they are not unconscious agents in the scene that passes. We are to think that Rokko has been for a lifetime habituated to the stern duties of his antipathetic office, in all which time, although his heart has not been hardened, his most sensitive susceptibilities have been blunted, and he has become careless, if not indifferent to the sorrows which, although he has not had the power to relieve, he has not had the will to inflict. That in all this time he has been the neutral instrument between the oppressor and the oppressed, uninquiring, if not unconscious, if the sentence of which he has been the agent have been just or tyrannous: that he has seen the arrival of many prisoners, and their departure perhaps through the gates of freedom, perhaps through the gates of death but always in the face of heaven: that he has often dug, perhaps, the graves of his own captives, but always as an officer of the law, never as the menial of a murderer: that his sympathies have been especially excited by the singular sufferings of this captive of two years, whose food has been from day to day diminished; who less lives than “hovers like a shadow;” whose murderer he has been vainly tempted to become, the indignity of which temptation still rankles in his heart, and whose death he has learned to regard less as an evil than as an entire release: from worse evils: that, although unconscious of the motives, he cannot have been uninfluenced by the earnestness of Leonore’s conduct, unmagnetized by the strength of will which equally supports herself through all her trials, and enables her to modify the minds of others to her purpose. We are to think of all this, and the supposition is then most natural that the jailor regards every object that surrounds him as a witness of his very thoughts, every sound that meets his ear as the echo of his own consciousness, the reward to all his dubious forebodings. We are to think that Leonore has been for two years deprived of her all of life, her only of happiness, her husband, who was torn from her in the springtime of their passion, before the rapture of a young love had been tempered down into that sobriety of affection which is the favourite theme of the moralist as the safeguard of the social system, but which comes not with enthusiastic temperaments until its vital principle be extinct, until the powers of passion has died out: that she has for eighteen dreary, weary months mourned in hopeless and inactive sorrow the loss that she could form no plan, make no effort to recover: that the obtaining some vague clue to the place of Florestan's incarceration aroused her from the numbness of her despair, aroused her from the trance into which her whole being had been thrown, and kindled in her the energetic, the heroic purpose to seek him, and to save him at all hazard and at any—we are to think that for six months she has foregone not only the honors and the comforts of her station, but the respect, the rights, the usance, the sympathies, and the semblance of her sex; that for six months she has foregone the dear consolation of a suffering heart, the indulgence of her sorrows; that in the most cruel incertitude as to the vicinity, the fate, even the existence of her husband, she had, as a part in her great purpose, gone through the mockery of the betrothal to Marzelline; that she has, from step to step and from stage to stage, learned more and more to confirm that vague, that undefining and indefinite feeling between hope and apprehension as to him, her son, who is the centre of all her motions, the motive of all her thoughts; that she is at length here, in the very presence of him whom all her preternaturally excited senses assure her must be the object of her long and anxious search, but whom the peculiarity of her own situation and the unfavourable position in which he lies prevents her from positively recognising, and so compels her reason to doubt that of which her instinct assures her; that she is engaged in a labour alike unnatural to her sex, to her educational refinement, and to her natural organisation, and repulsive to her feelings: that she is digging a grave—that she believes its intended occupier is the man she loves;—loves! O word enfeebled by its familiar usance, how thus made all inadequate to the expression of that all in all of a life, that utmost exaltation of every thing which is of best, and noblest, and most passionate and most sublime in our being, that more than any spoken language can utter, that everything the most enthusiastic kindred feeling can suppose, which is the feeling and which makes the life, and which impels the actions of this most devoted woman,—but that she knows, from the intuitive conviction induced by the sovereign power of her own will, this intended occupant of the grave, be he whom he may, must be and shall be saved. We are to think of all this, and the supposition is then most natural that the whole being of our heroine, physical and metaphysical, is so extraordinarily excited that there is not a breath that stirs but finds a vibrating echo in the pulsations of her heart. It is with the feelings that are here most imperfectly expressed that one must listen to this Duet, to be able to do ourselves justice with the deep intention of the composer, and then, indeed, with how very much of mighty and mysterious meaning do we find the work is fraught.

The plan of the music is very simple, but admits not of definite verbal analyses. The part of Rokko is always very different from that of Leonore as are the feelings expressed in the two; he uncertain, wilfully resolute to brave an involuntary want of resolution, sings always in broken irregular phrases. She determined, with a great purpose that shall, despite all obstacles, be carried through, and sings a clearly defined, rhythmical melody, that is always as clearly, as definitely, as rhythmically resumed, after each of Rokko's several interruptions. Thus is the Duet conducted so long as it consists only of Rokko's requiring Fidelio to participate in his labour, and Leonore's replying with double meaning as to her strength of purpose. There is a passage of great energy and brilliancy for Leonore, when she exclaims in the full confidence of her enthusiastic heart, and all unmindful of her companion, "Whoever thou be, I will save thee, I will loosen thy fetters, I will set thee free," which gains especial brightness from its being the only phrase of any long continuance in a major key throughout the whole composition. There is a point of much beauty in what we may regard as the coda of the Duet, where the voices respond to each other in phrases of contrary motion. Lastly, there is a prodigious mystery in the effect of the concluding phrase, which is given by the two voices in octaves with the pianissimo accompaniment of the whole orchestra, also all in unison. The orchestral arrangement of this duet is entirely unlike anything else in music, and beautiful as singular throughout. There is not a note in it but has its meaning; the exquisite refinement of these minute details must be left, however, to speak for themselves in their contribution to the general effect—we may only distinguish the whispering, hushy sound of the muted violins, with their constant iteration of triplets, and the strange, the unearthly, the preternatural effect of the two trombones that play almost throughout, and always pianissimo. There is an effect in the score which in this country cannot be realised, because we possess not the instrument by which it is intended to be produced, which is, namely, the contra fagotto, a wooden wind instrument, of pitch an octave lower than the bassoon, the character of which must of course bear the same relationship to the tone of this instrument as does that of the double bass to the tone of the violoncello. This is written to play always with the double bass in those rolling passages of six notes that form so prominent a feature throughout the whole of the composition, and it must, we are convinced, add greatly to the sound of depth, and to the roundness of tone, and to the power of the double basses, while it takes not from their softness of character, and gives nothing to their loudness. That we are unable here to realise the intentions of the composer is in so far excusable as it is not to be helped, but that we should wilfully pervert them (by the substitution of another instrument than that for which he wrote, the effect produced whereby must be, and we scruple not to say is, unlike that intended as it is possible for dissimilarity to reach) is in the highest degree offensive to all sense of propriety, to all veneration for the greatness of a conception which even this violation, how materially soever it may injure, cannot entirely destroy. The musical nuisance of which we here most feelingly complain, is to be found otherwheres in the perversion of the scores of Beethoven, and we cannot forbear a momentary digression to express our unqualified abhorrence of the substitution also for the contra fagotto of that most excellent instrument in its proper place, the ophicleide, in the last movement of the symphony in C minor, at the most important performances of this noble work that take place in this country. We may suggest that, as we cannot here have the instrument for which our great master wrote, the serpent would be a substitution that would certainly approach the effect intended, since this being also a wood instrument, cannot have a remotely different quality of tone, and we should from this obtain the volume, the roundness, the power, if not the positive depths that the composer desired to have.

(To be continued.)

HERR REICHART.

This popular German tenor, who has been one of the vocal stars of the present season, singing with invariable success at a large number of public and private concerts, is about to take his departure for the continent.

On Saturday, Herr Reichart gave a matinée musicale at the residence of Mrs. Shelley of Avington, (in Belgrave Square). The attendance was fashionable and brilliant. The estimation in which Herr Reichart is held by the fashionable world may be imagined from the following list of personages who were the Lady-patronesses of his matinée :—

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, the Duchess of Montrose, the Marchioness of Waterford, the Marchioness Dowager of Downshire, the Marchioness of Breadalbane, the Marchioness of Ely, the Marchioness of Ailesbury, the Lady Emily Foley, the Countess of Jersey, the Countess Powlett, the Countess of Beauchamp, the Baroness of Brunow, the Lady Alice Peel, the Viscountess Combermere, Lady Shelley, and Mrs. Shelley.

The programme was interesting and judiciously varied. Herr Reichart shewed the diversity of his powers in the aria, "Ah come mai," from Rossini's Otello, a lied by Schubert, the trio, "Zitti zitti," with Mdlle. Johannsen and Signor Marchesi, and two duets by Nicolai, with the charming and accomplished Mdlle. Anichini, for a history of whose last musical fete we are still in debt to our readers. The lied of Schubert was encored. Herr Reichart was further assisted by Madame Parish Alvars (harp), Herr Laub (violin), Signor Bottesini (contra-basso), Miss Dolby, Herr Formes, Herr Stockhausen, Signor Marchesi, and Mdlle. Graumann (vocalists).

The concert pleased the audience, and Herr Reichart retired covered with laurels. He leaves this country, regretted by his English friends, and will return next season, doubly welcome.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

ALBONI.

Alboni's rentrée on Saturday night, in her favourite part of Cenerentola, was one of the great events, if not the greatest, event of the season. The doors were besieged by vast crowds for more than an hour previous to their being opened, and the rush to gain admittance when they were at length opened, was such as brought to mind the most attractive performances of Jenny Lind. It is needless to add that the theatre was filled in every nook and corner, and that no standing room could be obtained in the pit and galleries a quarter of an hour after admission.

How may this prodigious success be accounted for? Does Alboni sing more exquisitely and more marvellously than ever? No. Is she handsomer or better formed? No. Is she younger? On the contrary she is some moons older. How then may the riddle be solved? It is certain Alboni was received with a fervour, and applauded with an enthusiasm on Saturday night, which she never obtained before in England, although the public were no niggards of their praises and their plaudits when she appeared before them. Alboni neither sings better—that were impossible; nor looks handsomer—that were hardly to be desired; nor has grown younger—of that there was no need; but Alboni has been at the Grand Opera at Paris, and has brought the entire public of the French capital captives to her feet: and Alboni has shaken the walls of Madrid with the echoes of her triumphs; and has thrown sundry French and Belgian states into commotion by the magic effects of her transcendent talents; and the English public read all this in the French and English journals, and they are impressed more than ever with Alboni's greatness, and recall the exquisite tones of her voice with rapture, and wonder why they were not more excited, why not more infuriated, when they heard her last. But if untaught they be slow to appreciate, once convinced the English public are staunch and enduring admirers, and cannot be easily turned away from their idols. Alboni now occupies the place in their esteem she should, by right of talent, have occupied when she first came to London. But "better late than never," is a good maxim, and we will not quarrel with their cautiousness, or, it may be, dullness, perhaps, obstinacy, seeing that their ears have been at length opened to some purpose. We claim to ourselves no small credit, that after hearing Alboni one night in Arsace, we proclaimed her "one of the most gifted and accomplished singers Italy ever produced." As usual, the opinions of the critics at first were divided, but we have lived to see the opposition benches deserted, and the non-contents come over to our side.

When the curtain rose on Saturday night, and Alboni was discovered seated at the fire-place, one general and deafening shout rung through the whole house, and was kept up for several minutes. Alboni at last rose and came forward, and this was another signal for a second demonstration, if possible, more enthusiastic and exciting than the first. Far more interesting and complimentary were the suppressed murmurs of delight and astonishment with which her first song, the quaint and melodious "Una volta c'era un Re," was received. The entire audience seemed to recognise an old delight in those delicious and melting tones which enchanted them so oft, and the echoes of which still lived in their recollection. If there were any fears entertained as to Alboni's voice being what it was, it arose from the fact that she had within the last twelve months been performing soprano parts; and this might have led to an apprehension as to the retention of its purity and freshness. But that Alboni's voice was as fresh, as pure, as limpid, and as enchanting as ever, was proved in the first scene, and dissipated the doubts of her admirers. Those who knew Alboni must have been aware that in her new repertoire she ran no risk of sacrificing her voice. Carefully eschewing the bell-cose school of Verdi, she confines herself to the pure Italian repertoire, and in that no music is too high for her. The soprano parts in the operas of Mozart and Rossini are entirely within the means and resources of Alboni, although, critically speaking, her voice is a pure contralto, but an exceptional one.

In the charming duet with Calzolari, "Un soave non so che," Alboni produced an immense effect, and was encored, but she chose instead to come on and make her acknowledgements. She made several admirable points, and all without the least effort. Among them let us note the exquisite tenderness and simplicity infused into the couplet,

"Deh scusate, perdonate
Alla mia semplicità."

The other features in this act were the "Una parola," made famous by Alboni, and the grand morceau di bravura in the last scene, "Sprezzo quei don che versa," which was encored so vehemently and persistently, that Alboni could not well refuse to comply with the demand. At the end of the first act Alboni was recalled, and received with immense enthusiasm.

Cenerentola's efforts in the second act are chiefly confined to the last scene, in which occur the fine expressive largo, "Nacqui all'affanno," and the celebrated rondo, "Non piu mesta." In both of these movements, the one, large, flowing, and measured, the other, brilliant and daring, Alboni was equally great, and excited the audience to a perfect furor. She was encored in both, but the effect produced in the "Non piu mesta" absolutely beggars description. She was not permitted to finish the rondo either times. Her hearers could not contain themselves until the end, but broke through all bounds, and became, as it were, maddened into ecstasy. We do not think we ever heard so extraordinary an effect produced by any singer, not excepting Malibran's rondo finale in the Sonnambula at Drury Lane. After this display, enough one would imagine, for any single occasion, Alboni was recalled twice, and overpowered with plaudits and expressions of delight.

We can hardly praise the general performance. There seemed to have been no rehearsal, and in one or two scenes all the performers appeared to go astray. Mademoiselle Feller, a most excellent artist if she would take pains, and Madame Grimaldi, played the two sisters, but not with perfect satisfaction. Signor Ferranti has some humour, but not sufficient for Dandini, and his voice is wanting in flexibility. On the other hand Lablache was inimitable in the Magnifico, one of his greatest parts, and Calzolari was excellent in the Prince. The chorus and band were tolerable.

On Tuesday Florinda was given for the fourth time, and the Spanish dancers made their third appearance. The Opera excited no furor, but the dancing of Dona Petra Camara, the ebon-eyed and the nimble, with her semi-bronzed coadjutors, created the utmost enthusiasm. The Dona was still more applauded and admired than at her two previous performances, and looked handsomer and more attractive, whereby she won more hearts. The Spanish dancing of the Dona is really inimitable, and, being novel as well as excellent, is well worth seeing. Nevertheless, we say as we said before, Mr. Lumley requires no addition to his choregraphic troupe. They are already the troupe par excellence, which even the assistance of the twenty-eight Spanish dancers would fail to improve.

On Wednesday,—a grand extra night,—the Nozze di Figaro was repeated, with the ballet of Les Trois Graces. Sofie Cruvelli's Cherubino was a decided advance on the first night. The "Non so piu cosa," was admirably sung, and the "voi che sapete," first time, given without a note being altered. In the encore, however,—the universality and enthusiasm of which ought to have satisfied the singer she had produced an impression, which it might have been politic not to attempt to improve,—she made the same, or something like the same, alterations we found fault with the first night. If Mademoiselle Sofie Cruvelli do not avail herself of the gentle and well-meant hints proffered her by the gentlemen of the press, so much the worse for her future career. She alone will be the sufferer.

Her Majesty and the Royal children visited the theatre on Thursday, when Il Prodigio was repeated by special desire. The Spanish dancers also appeared, as was announced, for the last time. We trust the fair dark Dona Petra Camara, and her brunette companions will not leave us thus abruptly.

Alboni's second appearance last night—an extra night—in Cenerentola, attracted an overflowing audience. If possible the applause and excitement were greater than on Saturday. The opera altogether went better, and was much more satisfactory. Still we should have liked something nearer perfection at the first lyric theatre in the world. Cenerentola was followed by Les Trois Graces.

To night Ernani will be produced for Cruvelli. It was in this opera, it may be remembered, that Cruvelli took Paris by storm some few months ago. Elvira is allowed to be one of the prima donna's most striking and finished performances. The opera is well cast, comprising the names of Sims Reeves, Coletti, Sofie Cruvelli, &c.

MR. GRAHAM, the tragedian, formerly of the Surrey and Marylebone Theatres, and who belonged to Macready's company at Drury Lane, died a short time since in America.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday the second performance of Il Flauto Magico was postponed, owing to the indisposition of Mdle. Anna Zerr. The Prophete was substituted, and the house was crowded.

On Tuesday, Mdle. Zerr being still indisposed, the part of the Queen of Night was assumed by Miss Louisa Pyne, and the opera was played a second time with increased effect. Miss Pyne experienced a very flattering reception. She is not equal to the dramatic exigencies of such a character as Astriffamente. When cursing her daughter in the grand air "Gli angui inferni," she displayed an amount of indifference which almost made a burlesque of the words and the music. Nevertheless, her vocalization, both in this and in the other air of the Queen of Night, was exceedingly neat and distinct, the voice never failing her except when she had to touch the F in alt, which unfortunately happens several times. The opera went off with immense eclat. The house was completely crammed. On Thursday the Prophete once more, and another bumper house.

To-night Il Flauto Magico, for the third time; and then, we trust, Sappho. M. Gounod, the composer of that remarkable production, is already in London.

Dramatic Intelligence.

FRENCH PLAYS, ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—On Wednesday Mr. Mitchell took his benefit, on which occasion an excellent selection was presented to his patrons, consisting of a new Comedie-Vaudeville entitled, "La Petite Cousine," the subject of which turns upon the endeavours made by a young lady to save her friend's husband from carrying elsewhere the affection which he owes to his wife. The idea was neatly carried out and the piece was cleverly played by Mademoiselles St. Marc and Bilhaut and M. Tetard, who was very amusing in the part of a lover, obliged to pay his court to another woman, being all the time in the dark as to the plot in which he is a principal personage. This piece was followed by a classical comedy, at least so it is called, in one act, written by M. Ponsard; but which is in reality nothing more than an elegant illustration of the amours of Horace and Lydia, consisting of a declaration of love in the first instance, a quarrel in the next, and lastly a reconciliation. In "Les Précieuses Ridicules," Mascarille boasts that he has turned into Madrigals the whole Roman history; if M. Ponsard goes on turning all the odes of Horace into comedies like the present—and there are some four books averaging about five and twenty odes per book, not to mention the Epodon—we shall have upwards of a hundred comedies of the same stamp; the women loved by the Roman poet form a goodly collection of themselves, and we may thus hope to see on the stage, Chloe, Neera, Phyrre, Lydia, Leuconoe, Tyndaris, Glycera, Barina, Lycea, Neobule, Chloris, Galatea, Phylis, Phryne, together with a few matrons and a decent supply of sorceresses, magicians, poison-distillers &c., &c. Seriously we cannot call this trifle a comedy, not even a classical comedy, it is a misnomer—a dramatic or colloquial ode or charade is the most we can do for it. Of progressive action it is absolutely devoid, and we are more disposed to look upon it as a literary curiosity than as a dramatic composition, illustrating to a certain extent the manners of the Roman Court—tezan as we find her depicted in the odes of the poet, in which by the bye she occupies a very prominent position. The language is choice, and M. Ponsard has done as much as his subject would permit him; he evidently has well studied his personages and they move about and talk much as we may fancy they did in the golden age of Roman literature. The effect produced is not of a very exciting nature; the expressions are more refined than suits our ideas of the tender passion, and compared with the sample given in Valeria by Mademoiselle Rachel of Lycisca, another lady of the same class, we must pronounce the present scene somewhat slow. Yet Mademoiselle Rachel declaimed in her very best style, and almost created a sensation when on reading the verses which she had supposed addressed to herself, she finds the name of Chloe inscribed on the tablet. M. Jouanni failed to give us any idea of our favourite Horace, of him who wrote to this same Lydia—

"Tunc nec meus mihi, nec color
Certa sede manet; humor et in genus
Furtum labitur, arguens
Quam lentis penitus macerer ignibus.
Uror, seu tibi candidos
Tarpârunt humeros immodicæ mero
Rixæ; sive puer furens
Impressit memorem dente labris notam."—

ODE 1. XIII.

Mademoiselle Rachel was recalled after the curtain went down and was warmly applauded. Corneille's play of Les Horaces followed, in which the great tragedian created her accustomed sensation, excelling even herself in the great scene of the fourth act, in which she calls down the vengeance of the immortal Gods on Rome. Alfred de Musset's petite comédie, Il faut qu'une porte soit ouverte ou fermée, was delightfully done by Mademoiselle St. Marc and Mons. Lafont; this is a style of writing which will always please from its very simplicity, but when elegance of diction and purity of language are combined we do not despair of rescuing the stage from the licentiousness of Messrs. Lacroix and Maquet, and others ejusdem farinae. The house was filled in every part. In justice to Mr. Mitchell we cannot allow the present opportunity to pass without tendering him our most sincere congratulations on the success which has attended his efforts this season, at the same time that we acknowledge our gratitude for the efficient manner in which he has managed the affairs of the theatre. Every promise made has been religiously kept; a rapid succession of new actors and new pieces has been furnished, and if some of the novelties produced are of a quality not to command our unqualified approbation, they at least serve to evince the zeal of the manager and his earnest desire to produce the best fare in the market for the gratification of his supporters. J. de C—.

ADELPHI.—On Wednesday evening this theatre was crowded to excess to witness the comedy of The Road to Ruin, for the benefit of Miss Woolgar. This play, although vapid in the perusal, ranks deservedly high among our acting comedies. The character of the elder Dornton is the only one that shows any ingenuity in the conception or drawing, nor does the dialogue, although occasionally pointed, and sometimes forcible, contain any superfluous quantity of wit, or strength, yet, from the perfect knowledge of the stage shown in the choice and development of the incidents, and in the discrimination and contrast of the characters, the comedy continues to stand the test of time, and never fails, when well acted, to justify its claims to attention.

Sophia, the heroine, who is little better than a simpleton in reading the play, becomes, when transferred to the stage, full of natural simplicity and graceful naïveté, nor have we often witnessed a more charming portrait of her than was given by Miss Woolgar, who, moreover, looked as young and as pretty, and exhibited as rounded, fair, and eloquent a pair of shoulders as any nymph of eighteen. In a performance where all was excellent we scarcely need particularize. The early scenes were full of vivacity and esprit, and her by-play excellent without being overwrought, a fault which study and experience are evidently amending. Miss Woolgar never loses sight of the serious side of her portraiture, and hence the scene of reproach to her lover in the fourth act, was admirable. Here the pathos and humour were charmingly blended, and the touch of self-pity with which she gathers up the fragments of her lover's letter, just before passionately torn in pieces, was worthy of any actress. At the fall of the curtain Miss Woolgar was called forward to receive a shower of bouquets which absolutely scented the whole house.

The other parts of the comedy were well sustained. Mr. Woolgar surprised us with his graphic picture of old Dornton. Mr. S. Emery's Silky deserves particular mention as an excellent and well studied sketch, Mr. Webster was the Goldfinch, and Mr. Leigh Murray the young Dornton for the occasion, and the rest of the characters were well filled, not omitting Miss Ellen Chaplin, who, in the little part of Jenny, looked quite as handsome and saucy as ever.

On Thursday evening, Madame Celeste made her first appearance since her return from the continent, in her favourite character of Miami, in the Green Bushes. During her absence the entertainments at the Adelphi have been more of a comic description than usual, and Paul Pry has been a standing dish. With her return the house resumes its old peculiarity as the region of drame. A crowded house signalized the return of this popular actress and manager.

Original Correspondence.

ALBONI.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

The Editor of the Musical World would greatly oblige several subscribers by stating what Alboni's compass is. There is an impression abroad that it, like a circle, has neither beginning nor end—one part running into the other—is this a fact?

[What Alboni's compass is we never can make out, the highest notes she sings being attacked with so much ease, and the lowest with so much power. Alboni's voice having a middle must have a beginning and end, argal Alboni's voice though round is not a circle. Ed.]

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

This institution held its adjourned general meeting, on the platform of the Large Hall, Exeter Hall, on Monday evening last.

The Rev. George Roberts, the president of the Society occupied the chair: in opening the business of the evening, he explained to the members assembled that the committee had to report the proceedings of the past fifteen months, it having been thought advisable to carry the accounts up to the 30th June last, the adjournment having also been suggested that they might be enabled to place before the meeting the real state of the Society's affairs.

In the absence of the Rev. Mr. Austin, the secretary and the Rev. F. J. Stainforth, who had assisted in discharging the duties of the office, the acting secretary, Mr. Williams, was called upon to read the report.

This document, after detailing the difficulties with which the Society had had to contend, expressed a hope that those difficulties would cease, and claimed credit for having given the oratorios of last season with unexampled breadth and grandeur. It set forth a letter from Dr. Elvey, thanking the orchestra for the performance of his anthem. It stated that the Society had, during the past fifteen months, given twelve concerts; and although it might have appeared desirable to some to have given a more extended series, yet, as the concerts were very expensive, if such course were pursued it would soon result in an empty exchequer.

The report then informed the members that a debt of £700 had been incurred in addition to another contingent claim of £480. An arrangement had been made with Mr. Surman, by which he was to take the whole of this responsibility upon himself for the present; the Society undertaking to repay him when it had any surplus funds, in addition to which contingency, they were to allow him (Mr. S.) 4½ per cent interest, until such time as it was repaid. Mr. Surman had also relieved the Society from any charge for the loan of music, which he would continue to supply gratuitously.

The closing paragraph stated that the Committee did not feel justified in appropriating any of the funds of the Society as prizes for Orchestral Anthems, but recommended a special subscription for the purpose.

The Treasurer's account having been read, explanations were given by the Secretary as to the mode of effecting the contingent loan, and Mr. Surman having been called for by the President, stated his views. The report was then adopted.

In accordance with the recommendation in the report, resolutions were then passed by which the two sums of £700 and £481 17s. 6d. were acknowledged as contingent loans by Mr. Surman to the Society, leaving interest at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum; the principal to be repaid from the future profits of the Society.

The ordinary complimentary votes of thanks were then duly recorded to the officers of the Society, &c.

The President in returning thanks for the honour conferred upon him, in alluding to the admixture of amateurs and professionals composing the Society's Orchestra, jocularly likened the conductor to a Welsh coachman who was told he must drive a team of four horses down a Welsh mountain. One of the four was blind, one a "jibber," one kicked over the traces, and one would not go at all. Yet this team he had to drive down hill, and he did it, although he (the President) would defy the Queen's Coachman to have done it.

After a few more general observations the President concluded by expressing his belief that next year more cheering results would be manifest, after which the meeting separated.

Reviews of Music.

"THE THEORY OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION."—By GOTTFRIED WEBER; translated, with notes, by J. F. Warner; edited, with additions from the original German, by John Bishop.—R. Cocks and Co.

The catalogue of Messrs. Cocks is rich in elementary, theoretical, and philosophical works on the musical art, and the spirit and disregard of expense which have enabled them to place the longest and most comprehensive treatises at the disposition of the public, are worthy the highest commendation. Gottfried Weber's Theory of Musical Composition is one of the most renowned of the German essays, and well merits its celebrity, since—as the title justly claims for it—it presents a "naturally consecutive arrangement of topics." Some will complain of its enormous length and diffuseness; but we think the American translator, Mr. J. F. Warner, has fully set forth in an elaborate preface, that to be concise is one thing, and to be explanatory another, and that in discussing the theory and practice of such an art as musical composition, which contains such a multitude of branches, and, to use Scriptural language, so many wheels within wheels, the brevity, which is "the soul of wit," would be altogether out of place. It is very well that a sonnet should be confined to fourteen lines, and equally advisable that an epigram or a bon mot should be as curt as possible. But a philosophical treatise is quite another matter. Every fact, rule, analogy, or comparison omitted for brevity's sake, is no better nor worse than a fact, rule, analogy, or comparison lost, which should have been made known, where it is requisite to acquire not merely a general view of a subject, but a familiar intimacy with its details. On this principle, Gottfried Weber has compiled his Theory of Musical Composition, in which he has set forth everything that he himself knew on the subject. His book is as good as a whole year's conversation with the author—a chapter per diem. At the same time, be it understood, the treatise is purely a philosophical treatise, and must be read, learned, and inwardly digested, before attempting to apply its principles to practice. We must know all of it, or the labour is lost. One link of the chain abandoned, and the whole falls to pieces. An attentive study of the work, however, if the intellect of the learner be sufficiently keen and capacious, will almost make a musician. The greatest possible care must be taken not to get confused in the multitude of rules and explications. Page by page—nay, we may almost say line by line, or at least paragraph by paragraph—the whole must be placed in the store-house of the brain, in as orderly and progressive a manner as it is found in the book itself. Thus only can the Theory of Musical Composition be made available; but thus studied, thus acquired, its utility will be unquestionable, its influence immense.

We shall not attempt an analysis of such a work as that of Gottfried Weber. Its wide and deserved celebrity, moreover, absolves us from the necessity. Long before the death of the author (in 1839), it was acknowledged in Germany as a standard treatise, and the greatest musicians have regarded it with respect and admiration. Our present purpose is simply to call attention to the fact, that the Messrs. Cocks have enriched their already wealthy catalogue with a splendid edition of this very admirable philosophical work; and that Mr. John Bishop (of Cheltenham), the English editor, has performed his task with the utmost care and ability. One thing, however, we should have greatly preferred. Instead of the lengthy, high-flown, and rambling preface of the American translator, which is printed without curtailment, the preface of Gottfried Weber, of which only extracts are presented, might have been given entire. This would have made the Theory of Musical Composition still more complete and acceptable.

"THE ORGANIST'S MANUAL"—CONSISTING OF SELECT MOVEMENTS FROM THE WORKS OF THE MOST EMINENT COMPOSERS.—Edited by GEORGE COOPER, Organist of St. Sepulchre and Christ's Hospital.—Addison & Co.

The utility of this publication must be seen at a glance, and the well-known ability of Mr. Cooper may be accepted as a guarantee that the selections are made with judgment. The first number contains a larghetto, in F, from Kalliwoda's second symphony, a somewhat feeble imitation of Spohr.

No. 2 comprises an andante, in the same key, from one of the pianoforte sonatas of Mozart; and a "Benedictus," also in F, from Schubert's Mass, in B flat, which might easily be mistaken for the same master, but for the somewhat forced manner in which the subject is resumed, and for a subsequent transition into the subdominant, which, though bold, is not Mozartian. This movement has also a peculiarity in which Mozart never indulged—it ends in the subdominant of the key.

No. 3 contains another weak imitation of Spohr, in the shape of an adagio, in C, from Kalliwoda's first symphony.

No. 4 is much more interesting, consisting of the andante, in F, with variations, from Mozart's fifth violin quartet, a masterly movement.

No. 5 is an arrangement of Hummel's beautiful and well-known "Quod in Orbe," in F, one of the best specimens of the master's Church Music.

No. 6 contains the andante scherzetto from Beethoven's fourth quartet, which requires great fluency of execution.

The first five numbers are arranged by Mr. Cooper himself; the last by Mr. W. T. Best, from Liverpool, one of the ablest organists in this country. Both gentlemen have performed their tasks in a highly skilful manner.

In proceeding with the Organist's Manual we strongly recommend Mr. Cooper to make fewer selections from the wishy-washy symphonies of Kalliwoda, and more from the really great masters, of some of whom that German composer is but a mere parody.

"THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST" (Book 1st.)—A collection of Preludes for the Organ or Harmonium—Composed and selected by EDWARD TRAVIS.—Leoni Lee and Coxhead.

This collection of fifty-three preludes will be found both useful and agreeable to the organist and harmoniumist. It consists of short pieces, like voluntaries, with the advantage of compact form and finish, which saves them from having the air of impromptus. They are completely in the ecclesiastic style, and most of them are nicely harmonised, and evince an agreeable flow of melody. We have, however, to make the same protest as against another work of Mr. Travis—which, if we mistake not, we reviewed about three months ago—namely, that the distinction is not shown, which are the preludes composed, and which selected, by Mr. Travis; until which oversight be rectified we cannot enter into a separate analysis of the individual pieces.

"ROUND AND ROUND THE CORAL BOWER"—Fairies' Song—Written by G. L. Banks, Esq.—Composed by MINIMA.—Cramer, Beale, and Co.

A very pretty song, somewhat original in form, and rather diffuse in modulation, but betraying decided talent and a good deal of fancy. The key is F minor, and there is an episode in E major. These keys have no relationship, and the introduction of the latter is somewhat forced. The accompaniment, however, is ably written, and there are some nice harmonies.

"THAT IS NOT HOME WHERE DAY BY DAY"—Song—Music by MINIMA.—Cramer, Beale, & Co.

A plaintive sentimental ballad in E flat, set to very well written verses by "Conder." The taste for harmony is again evident; but we advise "Minima" to reconsider the progression contained in page 2, bar 3 of line 3, and bar 1 of line 4. The chord of the 6-3 in E flat (the second position of the common chord of C minor) does not follow the chord of the 6-3 on D flat (the second position of the common chord of B flat minor). Nor does the chord on A flat and A natural (C E flat, F sharp), which succeeds and conducts to the 6-4 in E flat, improve the progression. The melody is broken, but expressive.

"WHERE'ER THOU TREATEST AN EDEN BLOOMS"—Sacred Song—Words from the "Messiah," by MONTGOMERY—Music by MINIMA.—Cramer, Beale & Co.

This song, is a great deal more gloomy than its fellows, and less to our liking on the whole. The opening largo, in F minor, &c. is mere rhodomontade, and the half close in C, the dominant of F major, the key of the song, very awkwardly managed. There are some nice points in the melody, but it is too much tormented, while the accompaniment is unnatural and deficient in neatness. Page 2, line 2, bar 3, there is a disagreeable feeling of consecutive octaves and fifths between the bass and the accompaniment, where the chord of the seventh on G follows the common chord of F.

"INTRODUCTION TO THE ORGAN."—GEORGE COOPER—Addison & Hollier.

If any one has a right to speak about the organ it is Mr. George Cooper, who, organist of St. Sepulchre's Church, and Christ's Hospital, assistant organist of St. Paul's Cathedral and her Majesty's Chapel Royal, illustrates the title of his work with a portrait of Westminster Abbey.

Mr. George Cooper is not only one of the greatest masters of the "king of instruments," but an excellent musician into the bargain. Both a knowledge of his subject, and a learned exposition were to be expected at his hands. Nor has expectation been disappointed. Although the "Introduction to the Organ" is but a brief compendium, as much as can possibly be comprised in a space so confined has been supplied by Mr. Cooper, in a lucid and orderly manner. In the introduction Mr. Cooper, for evident reasons declining going into a history of the construction of the organ, proceeds at once to the manipulation and pedipulation, commencing with a catalogue of the stops and their use, followed by the scales and intervals, exercises in two or three parts, &c., &c., until he arrives at the pedal exercises, which are comprehensively described and clearly elucidated. The remainder of the book is devoted to a number of movements from Gibbons, Rinck, Sechter, Dr. Miller, and last not least, Sebastian Bach. A psalm tune in E flat, entitled "St. Agnes," by Mr. Cooper himself, is by no means the least interesting piece in the selection. The driest piece of all is a five-part prelude in B major, by the celebrated contrapuntist, Sechter. There are some pretty smooth pages of Rinck, the Weigl of the organ, whose harmony is sweeter than strong. There is also an interesting example of Adolphe Hesse—a prelude in C minor—not very masterly, however, for a master of his reputation. The magnificent fugue, in E major, of Sebastian Bach, a fugue on a chorale in D minor, by the same master, and his celebrated exercise in F, with double pedal part, form the pieces de resistance of the selection, which is tastefully and judiciously made. We recommend without hesitation the "Introduction to the Organ" to all amateurs of that instrument. The name of Mr. Cooper is a guarantee of its value; and the contents are worthy of his reputation.

JENNY LIND.

(From the Boston Bee, June 21.)

BOSTON—Jenny Lind was honoured with another brilliant audience, at her second concert, last evening. Every seat was occupied. Mdlle. Lind was in excellent voice, and it was generally admitted that she has never sung so well in Boston. The pieces which were most admired were "Casta Diva," "The Bird Song," "The last Rose of Summer," and "The Echo Song." In each of these pieces Mdlle. Lind was enthusiastically applauded and encored. The trio from Il Barbiere, with Salvi and Belletti, was also encored. It was exquisitely given. Signor Salvi sung in a duet with Beletti, the trio, and the serenade from Don Pasquale, which was complimented with an encore. Signor Beletti executed the Cavatina from La Sonnambula in excellent style. Mr. Otto Goldsmith's performance on the piano was duly appreciated by the audience. On this occasion he played upon a grand piano which was presented to him by Mdlle. Lind, another token of her generosity. The orchestra is an attractive feature at these concerts. The Wedding March from A Midsummer Night's Dream was performed in a style never approached by any orchestra ever heard in Boston. Mr. Benedict should indeed be proud to be at the head of such an orchestra.

On Monday next, Mdlle. Lind gives her third concert in this city.

It is probably well known to our readers that Mdlle. Lind gave a concert in New York, the proceeds of which were appropriated to the benefit of the orchestra. Feeling a deep sense of gratitude for this act of generosity, the members have drawn up a Diploma for Mdlle. Lind, Signori Salvi, Belletti, and Benedict, who all volunteered their services on the occasion. These Diplomas were presented yesterday forenoon after the rehearsal at Tremont Temple. Mr. John A. Kyle, chairman of the committee of presentation, made an appropriate address to each, which was responded to with much warmth and sentiment. The Diploma of Mdlle. Lind contains the following.

"To Mdlle. Jenny Lind.—At a meeting of the members of the Jenny Lind Orchestra, in New York, convened on the 6th day of June, 1851, John A. Kyle in the chair, it was—

"Resolved, That the members of the Jenny Lind Orchestra in New York consider it their duty to return their sincere and heartfelt thanks to Mdlle. Jenny Lind for the unexpected offer of her services for a concert given for their benefit on Wednesday evening, June 4th, 1851.

"They would also give expression to their high appreciation of her talents as an artist, and of admiration of her noble disinterestedness in having so repeatedly deviated from the usual paths of artistes in devoting the gift which God has blessed her to the improvement of the great and glorious art of which they are but humble followers, while gladdening by her many acts of benevolence the hearts of the poor and friendless.

"This resolution being carried unanimously, was ordered to be engrossed, signed and presented to Mdle. Jenny Lind, by a committee appointed for such purpose.

"JOHN A. KYLE, Chairman.

"JOHN C. SCHERFF, Secretary.

"Signed by Joseph Burke and eighty-one others."

Mr. Benedict's diploma has the following:—

"Resolved, That our respectful and cordial thanks be tendered to Jules Benedict, Esq., for his kindness in volunteering to conduct a concert given by Mdle. Jenny Lind for the benefit of the orchestra, on Wednesday, June 4th, 1851.

"The members of the orchestra feel unable adequately to express how much they are indebted to Jules Benedict, Esq., not only for this act, but for his uniform kindness to them whilst under his direction. It has been a pleasure to them all to be under such an able conductor, who has done so much to improve the taste for classic music and to raise the profession to its proper position in the eyes of the people. They feel that the lovers of music throughout this vast continent owe him a debt of gratitude for his untiring zeal in giving them an opportunity of hearing Concerts hitherto unequalled, and which will be remembered for years to come by all true lovers of art.

"Signed, and so forth, as above."

The diplomas of Signori Salvi and Belletti contain the following expressions of regard:—

"The members of the Jenny Lind Orchestra in New York, desire to tender to you their sincere thanks for the handsome manner in which you volunteered your invaluable services at the Concert of Wednesday evening, June 4th, 1851, devoted to their benefit by Mdle. Jenny Lind.

"With the best wishes for a long continuation of your triumphant career, to which your splendid talents as well as your untiring efforts to please so justly entitle you.

"We beg leave to subscribe ourselves

"Your ob't servants,

"Signed, &c., as above."

Mr. Barnum is on his way to London to engage Grisi and Mario for America.

JENNY LIND'S LIBERALITY.—The Swedish Episcopal church in Chicago has great cause of gratitude to Jenny Lind. The rector, Rev. Mr. Unonius, has published a statement, from which it appears that, beside the 1,000 dollars given by her to the church last year, she has contributed 1,000 dollars partly to aid in building a parsonage, and partly for the poor of the parish. She has also promised a communion service of silver, and has given the rector 2,000 dollars to pay some debts, to furnish the parsonage, and to effect an insurance on his life.—American paper.

JENNY LIND IN BOSTON.—Jenny Lind's concert last evening was all that we anticipated. The house was full, completely full, and yet there were seats for all. Settees were placed in two of the aisles, but no cross seats were allowed, and the passage-ways were unobstructed. The slips were not excessively crowded, as at previous concerts under Mr. Barnum's régime; and though the house was full in every part—above, below, and all around—yet the audience was seated without the slightest trouble or confusion, and good humour seemed to reign all around, ladies being heard on all sides congratulating themselves on the excellence of their seats. The whole arrangement of matters last night must have satisfied the public that Miss Lind has those about her who are abundantly competent to manage her concerts in a way that will not only be profitable to her, but, what could never be said of Barnum's arrangements, agreeable to all who wish to attend them.—Boston Traveller, June 19.—Mr. Barnum acknowledges to a friend who is not given to exaggeration, that he has made 500,000 dollars by the Jenny Lind concerts, and says that Jenny has realised not less than 350,000 dollars in this country. The net proceeds of the ninety-four concerts do not lack above 25,000 of a million dollars.

BOSTON.—(JUNE 26th).—It was announced the morning previous to yesterday evening's concert, that Mademoiselle Jenny Lind was about to conclude her present series of musical entertainments in this city. Possibly, however, we may hope for one or two other concerts, when she returns from Canada. The concert last night comprised the two Overtures in "Le Jeune Henri" by Mehul, and Flotow's Stradella. Mr. Otto Goldschmidt played Les Arpeges on the pianoforte ably, yet we confess we would sooner have heard Benedict's fingers touching the keys of the instrument. Mr. Joseph Burke is a far better performer on the violin at present than when we heard him some three or four years since. We accordingly again remonstrate with Benedict. He may choose to fly from the public himself, and leave Mr. Goldschmidt to pluck the laurels which by right ought to be his—but let him not place Mr. Burke in a box, and screw down the cover. The public pay for these concerts, and their predilections, ought certainly to be consulted. Tyrolean Duets, sung by Jenny Lind and Signor Belletti was an exceedingly pleasant bit of music, and was ably rendered, giving us pleasant reminiscences of those fine airs of the same composer, which were sung by Jenny Lind during her former visit to Boston, under the management of Mr. Barnum. The most exquisite portion of the concert, was the Prayer from Weber's Der Freischütz—"Und ob die Wolke." This prayer but requires the lips and voice of such a soprano as Jenny is to make one almost inspired. "Come per me sereno," and the Trio for voice and two flutes from Meyerbeer's Camp of Silesia are as nothing when weighed in the balance with it.—After this Jenny Lind gave Bishop's "Home sweet Home" from the opera of Clara, and "Comin' thro' the Rye," of which we have already expressed an opinion sufficiently strongly to dispense with our doing any further justice to the admirable manner in which it is both acted and sung. Salvi gave us the duet from the Barbiere of Rossini with Belletti and the Recitative and Scena, from Lucia di Lammermoor. Belletti gave "Sulla Poppa del mia brik," from the Prigione d'Edimburgo with verve and force.

JENNY LIND IN SPRINGFIELD.—We are happy to learn that Miss Lind has made arrangements to give one or two concerts in Springfield, the first to take place on Tuesday or Wednesday of next week. The First Congregational Church has been engaged for these concerts. No building in Springfield, probably, will be sufficiently large to accommodate all who will wish to attend these concerts. Large parties from the towns in the vicinity are preparing to be present. Hartford takes 200 tickets, and other towns in proportion.

All the reports about Jenny Lind's marriage with Belletti and with Mr. Wood, &c., &c., are false.

Miscellaneous.

MADAME VERDAVAINNE.—Among the artistes who have taken an honorable position in the London season of 1851, we must notice Madame Verdavainne who, in a series of fashionable concerts has displayed the qualities of an able pianist and an excellent professor. Beethoven's trio in B flat; his favourite andante in F; Bach's prelude and fugue in C sharp; Cramer's Etude mélodique; "Homage à Mozart;" Mendelssohn's first grand concerto; Weber's concert, Stück; Thalberg's "Russian Airs;" Bertini's Grande polonaise; and Norma fantasias have been the principal pieces Madame Verdavainne has played this season; and it is but just to say that we have rarely found in the same artiste a larger amount of energy combined with grace, correct execution, and intelligent rendering of original ideas of the composers.

MR. JOHN THOMAS'S MATINEE MUSICALE.—Mr. John Thomas (of Pen-y-Bout), principal harpist at Her Majesty's Theatre, and professor at the Royal Academy of Music, gave, previous to his departure for Germany, a Matinée Musicale on Wednesday the 9th inst., to a fashionable audience, by permission of Lady Benjamin Hall (of Llanover), at her Ladyship's residence in Great Stanhope Street. The Programme was unusually varied and attractive, containing the names of the following eminent artistes:—Mrs. Anderson (Pianiste to Her Majesty), Mdle. Lavinia (Pupil of Sig. Garcia and a most rising young vocalist), Miss Bassano, Miss M. Williams, Miss H. Chipp, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Frank Bodda, Herr Laub (the celebrated violinist from her Majesty's Theatre), Mr. Cipriani Potter (principal of the Royal Academy of Music), and the students of the Academy (by the permission of the Committee). Among the principal features of the concert may be named, a duet from Semiramide for pianoforte and violin (Mrs. Anderson and Herr Laub); Blargini's Quartet for harp, pianoforte, violin, and voice (Mdle. Lavinia, Mr. Cipriani Potter, Herr Laub, and Mr. John Thomas); "Che farò," Miss M. Williams; "Sulla Poppa," Mr. Frank Bodda; "They murmur a word of farewell," Miss H. Chipp; "Dove Sono," Mdle. Lavinia, and some Welch melodies sung by the students of the Academy with great effect, accompanied on the harp by the Beneficiaire, who also performed several fantasias, in which he fully maintained his position as one of the most accomplished harpists of the day. We wish Mr. Thomas a most hearty reception in Germany, whither, we understand, he intends proceeding immediately after the termination of the season at Her Majesty's Theatre. The concert passed off altogether in a manner which must have been equally gratifying to Mr. Thomas and to the assemblage of beauty and fashion who were present.

MISS ELLEN DAY AND MR JOHN DAY gave their third Matinée Musicale on Wednesday. The list of performers comprised among the vocalists, Mdle. Lemaire, Mdle. Lavinia, and Miss Henderson; the instrumentalists, Miss Kate Loder and Miss Ellen Day (pianists), Mr. J. Day (violin), Mr. Williams (clarinet), Mr. H. Chipp (violoncello), and Mr. Gerhard Taylor (harp). The most noticeable points in the concert were a duet concertante, by Weber, for pianoforte and clarinet, performed by Miss Ellen Day and Mr. Williams; Madame Lewaire's "Nel dolce incanto"—well sung, though somewhat beyond the powers of the singer; the "Dove sono" by Mdle. Lavinia; Mr. Horatio Chipp's solo on the violoncello; Mr. John Day's "Tremolo;" pianoforte duet a quatre mains, by Kate Loder and Miss Ellen Day; and Mr. Gerhard Taylor's fantasia on the harp. The concert was fashionably attended. Herr Adolph Gollmick and Mr. John Day conducted.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The Messiah was performed last night to the usual crowded audience. Madame Clara Novello, who only arrived from Lisbon on Monday evening, made her first public appearance, of which full particulars in our next. Considerably over £1000 has already been realized to the Society by the extra performances given since the termination of the ordinary season. Upwards of 2300 persons attended the performance of the Creation last Friday.

MR. STOCKING'S CONCERT.—At a concert in Harley-street, given by Mr. Stocking to a fashionable audience on Friday the 11th, the principal features were several favourite airs by Miss Bassano. Mr. Regondi's performance on the concertina, and the re-introduction to the public of a young lady, Mrs. Saville Wallack, who, under another name, we remember to have met with a most favourable reception a few years since. Mrs. Wallack's voice is extensive in compass, and is effective in the lower register. The correct method and flexibility of her execution she owes to that excellent maestro, Crivelli—and to her own intelligence the feeling and expression which characterizes her singing. The songs she introduced on this occasion were, "In questo semplace," from Betty, and Balfe's "I'm a merry Zingara." In both she was much applauded. Miss B. Williams performed some pieces in an excellent manner on the pianoforte. Mr. Benithin and Mr. Stocking conducted the concert.

ENGLISH GLEES AND MADRIGALS.—The Right Honorable the Speaker entertained a distinguished assembly at his mansion in Eaton Square on Wednesday. In the course of the evening, a selection of English glees and madrigals was sung by Mrs. Endersohn, Mr. Francis, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Hobbs, Mr. Land, and Mr. H.

Phillips. This style of music, so peculiarly English, is now attracting great attention and patronage in the highest circles. The perfect manner in which the glees were performed on this occasion re-called to many present the peculiar charm imparted to them by Bartleman, Vaughan, Harrison, and Knyvett, in the palmy days of the Vocal Concerts.

ORGAN PERFORMANCE AT THE GREAT EXHIBITION.—On Saturday last, July 12, the organist, Mr. J. T. Cooper (of St. Paul's Church, Islington), performed the following selection of classical music on the large organ built by Henry Willis, in the western gallery:—Part I.—Praeludium et Fuga, in E flat, J. S. Bach; Andante (Symphony), Haydn; Overture (Athalie), Mendelssohn; "Oh had I Jubal's Lyre," Handel; "Awake the Trumpet's lofty sound," Handel; Quartett in G minor (1st movement), Spohr; March, J. T. Cooper. Part II.—Overture (L'Italiana in Algeri), Rossini; Air with variations, Mozart; Overture (Fra Diavolo), Auber; "The Harmonious Blacksmith," Handel; Overture (Il Barbiere di Siviglia), Rossini. After the performance, at the request of Lord Westmoreland, Mr. Cooper played Mendelssohn's March in "Athalie."

MADAME CHARTON, the popular prima donna of Mr. Mitchell's Opera Comique, left London for Paris on Tuesday morning. Madame Charton is engaged for the winter at Marseilles.

ROYAL MUSIC HALL, ADELAIDE STREET.—The first of twelve concerts to be given by the Distin Family, at the above-named Hall, took place on Monday evening, before a crowded audience. The programme was selected with good taste, and the concert seemed to give general satisfaction. Mr. Henry Distin's performance of "All is Lost," from the Sonnambula, on the Alto Sax Horn, was one of the chief features of the evening; and amongst the encores may be mentioned the glee, "Down in a Flowery Vale," well sung by the Brothers Distin and Miss O'Connor. The new Cuckoo Galop—which is likely to become a popular morceau—was included in the programme. On Wednesday evening the second concert took place, and last evening the third was performed with equal success, and the concerts will be continued every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday until the twelve have been completed; after which the Distin Family leave London on their provincial tour.

MADAME PARISH ALVARS.—The Matinée Musicale of this artist took place on Wednesday, at No. 11, York Place, Portman Square, the residence of Miss Howard. The vocalists were Mdle. Johannsen, Madame Macfarren, Herr Kruger, Herr Reichart, Herr Stigelli, Herr Stockhausen, and Herr Formes:—the instrumentalists, Mdle. Elise Krinitz (piano), Herr Laub (violin), Madame Parish Alvares (harp), Signor Bottesini (contra-basso). The entertainment was undeniably good. It opened with the "Dungeo son" duet, from Il Barbiere, capably given by Mdle. Johannsen and Herr Stockhausen. The lady's voice is clear and her execution good. The gentleman has a fine voice, but not exactly suited to basso singing. Herr Stigelli sang a barcarole of his own composing, which displayed a nice feeling for tune and for characteristic writing. Herr Stigelli has a smooth and pleasing tenor voice, which he exhibited to advantage in his own song. Madame Parish Alvares next performed a grand fantasia for the harp written by Parish Alvares. She was warmly applauded, and deservedly so, her playing giving evidence of many excellences. The favourite song from the Sleeper Awakened, "Forget it not" was delivered with true artistic skill, and fine expression, by Madame Macfarren, who was in a peculiarly happy vein, both as to voice and singing. Mdle. Krinitz performed on the piano, in a highly efficient manner, Chopin's Nocturne, in B flat, and Stephen Heller's "La Truite." The most striking performance in the whole concert—we always except Bottesini, in whatever entertainment he may be, when we speak of excellences—was Formes in the grand aria, "In diesen heil'gen Hallen"—the "Qui Sdegno" of the Italian version, from the Zauberflöte, a magnificent specimen of large and expressive singing, which was loudly applauded. After Madame Parish Alvares performed another piece on the harp, and Mdle. Johannsen sung a Swedish song, Herr Laub, the talented violinist from the band of Her Majesty's Theatre, and who has lately been heard at some of the principal concerts in London, executed a "fantasia caprice" of Vieuxtemps.

in a most admirable manner, and produced an unmistakeable effect. Herr Kruger commenced the second part with two songs, not given together, but one after the other. The first was Mario's song from the Favorita, "Ange si pure;" the second was entitled in the bills, "Caprice sur le Sturmmarsch." Herr Kruger is not Mario, no more than the "Caprice sur le Sturmmarsch" is the "Ange si pure." Nevertheless, Herr Kruger showed himself no despicable interpreter of tender strains and sturmmarsches, and obtained a favourable reception from the audience. Madame Macfarren and Herr Reichart introduced two duettos of Nicolai, "L'Addio," and "Un Mot," and sang them pleasingly and tastefully. The duettos are mere trifles, but received new graces at the hands of the clever artists. Madame Parish Alvars played a third solo on the harp, and a third time gratified her hearers, who, at the end, were not scant of their demonstrations in her favour. Signor Bottesini's miracles on the contra-basso renewed the same excitement which follows them whenever they are submitted to the public. To understand the prodigious power and effect of Bottesini's playing, he must be heard. No words can do his performance adequate justice. A song, called "The Norman," written by Alfred Tennyson, and composed expressly for Herr Stockhausen, brought the concert to an untimely end, seeing that a German song for Herr Reichart, and the chorus from Nabucco, "Va pensiero," were announced in the bills. Mdlle. Anna Zerr was also announced, but was prevented from attending by indisposition. Messrs. Frank Mori and Dugger conducted.

MRS. ALEXANDER NEWTON and Miss ELIZA WARD's third and last Chamber Concert was given, as before, at the residence of Mrs. Newton, 5, Percy Street, Bedford Square, on Monday evening, the 30th ult. The programme was longitudinal and multifarious, including no less than twenty-six pieces, with a serious apology for three more. The fair twain were determined that their visitors should have sufficient entertainment, and, as far as quantity was concerned, the concert must have satisfied the heliogaboli of musical feasts. But let it not be inferred from what we have said that the soiree of the amiable and accomplished twain was deficient in quality. This could hardly be advanced, seeing that the programme, among other pieces of choice music, contained Rossini's "Carita" chorus, Hummel's grand sonata, (Opera 104) for pianoforte and violoncello, and several songs of Donizetti, Bellini, Howard Glover, Desanges, &c., &c. The vocalists numbered Miss Mary Farrier, Miss Ward, Miss Laura Baxter, Mrs. Alexander Newton, Mr. Bridge Frodsham, Mr. Benson, and the Signori Marchesi and Salvatore Tamburini. Instrumentalists, Miss Eliza Ward (piano), Mr. W. F. Reed (violoncello), Mr. Horton (oboe), Master John Ward (concertina), Mr. Maycock (clarinet), and Master Alexander Rancheraye (violin). The points of excellence in the concert were Mrs. Alexander Newton's "Casta diva," and "Home of Love," by Kalliwoda, Miss Mary Farrier's song "Calm as a Child," by Schubert, Hummel's Sonata, played by Miss Eliza Ward and Mr. W. F. Reed, Mr. Maycock's clarinet solo and airs from Der Freischutz, &c. Mr. Bridge Frodsham, also, is entitled to honourable mention, for the manner in which he assisted Mrs. Alexander Newton in the duet from Linda di Chamouni, "Da quel di che," and the duet from Lucia di Lammermoor, "Sofriva nel pianto." Both duets went admirably, the more especially as Mrs. Newton was in first-rate voice, and sang with great power and effect. Mr. Bridge Frodsham must be also praised for his expressive rendering of a serenade by Howard Glover, "Love wakes and weeps," a composition of unusual merit and character, which promises to become popular. From the rest of the performance, we must single out the violin playing of Master Alexander Rancheraye, which possesses a great deal of merit, and met with loud applause. Madame Parish Alvars and Mademoiselle Johannsen were both announced, but were kept away by illness. Mr. Howard Glover and Mr. G. Lake officiated as conductors. The room was quite full.

JENNY LIND.—A correspondent of the Sun stated that it was generally understood on the other side of the Atlantic that the fair songstress was at last likely to be bound in the soft bonds of Hymen; that the gentleman whom rumour pointed out as her fortunate husband is Mr. Frederick George Wood, who has for several months had the arrangement of her business matters in America. The Sun has since stated that the correspondent has been misinformed.

ON POETICAL AND MUSICAL EAR.—Some years ago a controversy was carried on in a periodical publication upon this question: "Whether there was a necessity of a musical ear for an orator?" Both parties were obstinate in their respective opinions. Let us examine them. Those that hold a musical ear to be necessary for an orator, support their opinion in this manner:—Every voice has its proper key, from which, though the speaker may wander for sake of expression, yet he must return to it again. The different modulations of the voice must be either a little above, or a little below the key, in which it should always close. Any thing out of the key of the voice offends as much in speaking as in singing. Music, besides tune, having rhythms, so also is there a measure in oratory, which we cannot falsify without offending the ear. As there are rests in music, so are there pauses in speaking. From all these considerations it is evident that a good ear is equally necessary for an orator and for a musician. To this the other party replies:—As all persons speak, but have not all a musical ear, it is evident that if the latter were necessary for the well doing of the former, those who have no ear would speak in a manner peculiar and disagreeable. If the assessor says that it is not in common speaking, but in oratory that a musical ear is requisite, the other answers, That as oratory is but the perfection of speaking, there is nothing in oratory that has not its foundation in common speech.

EXTRACT OF A JUDGMENT OF CARPANI ABOUT ROSSINI.—The power and potency of music is not in the learned accords, it is in the mysterious charm of the melody. The accords remain in the orchestra, the melody crosses the world, naked and lovely, like Venus who arises out of the ocean and submits the earth to her resistless charms. Nature has for civilized people only one language, if this language is spoken, the natives of all countries comprehend it, and all adhere to its charms. If now this beautiful language of nature has only an idea of novelty, if it abstains from those renewed and turned up many a thousand times, then the charm of novelty is associated to the beauty of the melody, and the effect is grand, sublime, and wonderful! This is the history of Rossini's music!!

MENDELSSOHN'S OPERETTA continues to draw crowded audiences to the Haymarket. It is the most decisive hit that the lyrical drama at the English theatres—we regret that we cannot say "English Opera"—has made for some time. The gems of the work, destined to certain and lasting fame, are the opening romance, "There sate in the gray Times,"—the first terzetto, and the song "I am a Roamer." This last, a fine and graceful effusion of animal spirits, is destined—or we are much mistaken—to share in the concert-room, as well as in the theatre, an immense popularity. Among the performers, Mr. William Harrison will take the place of Mr. Donald King next week, and it is, we believe, in contemplation to find a more experienced contralto. While Miss Poole is at the Surrey, and Sarah Flower at the Antipodes, we can hardly recommend a more efficient vocalist to the choice of Mr. Mellon, than Madame Macfarren, or in case of not procuring her, Miss Bassano, who with a purely dramatic style, is an excellent musician and a good actress. In expressing our gratification at these changes, we willingly admit that Mr. Mellon—who, we well know, has had more than the usual number of obstacles to surmount in his arduous and self-imposed task—has availed himself to the utmost of the materials at his disposal.

Advertisements.

MR. CRIVELLI

BEGS to acquaint his friends and the public that a Third Edition of the "ART OF SINGING," enlarged and newly arranged in the form of a Grammatical System of Rules for the Cultivation of the Voice, may be had at his residence, 71, Upper Norton-street, and at all the principal Music-sellers.

*. Soon will be ready, the French and German Translation.

MESSRS. COCKS' NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

THE TONY-WALZER. By Labitzky.—Her Majesty's State Ball.—The following beautiful Compositions were performed by Mr. Boose's Band on the above occasion, and were evidently fully appreciated:—Labitzky's Morning Star and Tony Waltzes, also the Leipzig Galop—Strauss's Swallow Waltzes and Kathinka Polka—and Musard's Champagne Quadrilles. Price 2s and 3s each.—N.B. The above Dances were also performed by the Brothers Labitzky and their celebrated Band, at Cambridge House, on the 6th instant.

THE GREAT GLOBE QUADRILLES. By Stephen Glover, Piano. 3s. Duets, 4s. Also, by the same distinguished Author, Mamma's Quadrille, Papa's ditto, Solos, each, 3s; Duets, each, 4s.—Mamma's Galop, 2s; Papa's Polka, 2s.—Osborne's Quadrille, 3s; Duet, 4s.—The Six Palace Band Marches, each, 3s.—Royal Hyde Park March, 3s.—Home March, 3s.—Alpine March, 3s 6d.—Prince Arthur's March, 3s.—The Retreat March, 2s, and Fantasia on Airs of All Nations, 4s.

STEPHEN HELLER'S latest PIANOFORTE PIECES.—Students of the pianoforte will find in the following works of the above distinguished author an unusual degree of merit, suited alike for the saloon and the practice room, viz:—Chant du Chasseur, 2s; L'Adieu du Soldat, 2s; Chant du Berceau, 2s; Arrangement of Mendelssohn's Chant d'Amour, 2s; ditto Parting Song, 2s; ditto Chant de Fête, 2s.

KÜCKEN'S POPULAR BALLADS. (Author of "Trab, Trab") Words by Wm. Ball and R. Lincoln Cocks:—"The Guardian Angel," 2s; "Of, Off, Away," 2s; "Sweet Mary," 2s; "Bostman's Song," 2s; "Come Sweet Maid," 2s; "Where'er a Cot," 2s; "In Vain I Court," 2s; "O! My Love's Like" (duet), 3s; "Two Birds Flew" (duet), 3s; "Why so Timid?" 2s; "Slumber Song," 2s; Jetty Treffe's much admired "Trab, Trab" with an illustrated title, 2s; "The Guardian Angel," 3s; "Of, and Away," 2s; and "The Tear," 2s.

NEW PIANO MUSIC, by Brinley Richards.—"The Vision," "The Angel's Song," each 2s; "The Sturm March Galop," "Poor Mary Anne," "The Ash Grove," and "The Rising of the Lark," each 3s.

COCKS'S MUSICAL MISCELLANY FOR JULY IS NOW READY. Price 2s; stamped, 3d.

MESSRS. COCKS'S VERY SUPERIOR PIANOFORTES, 22 GUINEAS and upwards. The "Musical World," referring to the inferior kind of pianos offered for sale, says—"Not that the instruments of Messrs. Cocks are dear—on the contrary, they are as cheap as the valueless instruments just mentioned, but they have the advantage of being firmly and compactly made, of the best (and the best seasoned) materials, and of keeping well in tune for any length of time."—N.B. May be had, gratis, and postage free, descriptive lists with drawings, and the best method of keeping pianos in tune.

An ERARD'S elegant double-action HARP, cost 120 guineas, nearly equal to new for price only 60 guineas, with packing-case and leather cover complete; a single-action HARP, by the same maker, price 15 guineas.

London: 6, New Burlington-Street. Publishers to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen.

N.B. Now ready, gratis, and postage free, part IX of Messrs. Robert Cocks and Co's Catalogue of their latest publications.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

PIANO SOLOS.
Bosch, W. T., Op. 30, Valse di Bravura.
Bosch, W. T., Op. 42, Bouquet de Mélodies No. 26. Die Zauberrüste.
" Op. 36, Repertoire des Jeunes Pianistes No. 26, Die Zauberrüste.
Brisson, F., Op. 45, Impromptu, sur Bonsoir Mr. Pantalou.
Brynmiller, F., Op. 188, Ronde des Porcherons. Polka Masurka.
Dernoy, T. B., Op. 188, La Mélancolie. Fantaisie.
Gottschalk, L. M., Op. 188, L'Orientale. Etude.
Kosell, H., Op. 188, Redowa.

Sets of the very last Galops, Polkas, and Waltzes by Hampe, Kühner, Knehl, Stanny, and Strauss, the most popular dance-music composers.

PIANO DUETS, TWO PERFORMERS.
Brunner, C. D., Op. 121, Fleurs teutoniques. 6 Rondines on popular German Airs, in 6 books.

ENGLISH SONGS WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.
Lee, Alexander, "When Thou'rt away."
Overthorpe, Charles, Op. 69, "The Antidote."
" Op. 70, "A Passing Thought."
Schott and Co., 89, St. James's-street.

NEW DUETS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

THALBERG ... Beatrice di Tenda.
ROSELLEN ... Deux Mélodies de Donizetti, 1 and 2.
ROSELLEN ... Fal d'Andorre.
WOLFF ... Valse Original.
WOLFF ... Beatrice di Tenda.
SILAS ... La Primavera, Bagatelle.
KALLIWODA ... Invitation à la danse.
OSBORNE ... Plume de Perles.
SCHULTZ ... Duo L'espagnola.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent-street.

CRAMER'S STUDIES.

THE First Volume of this Work is now Published in the upright form, newly revised and corrected by the Editor, and divided into four parts. Price, 6s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published,

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed, and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTE.
Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 210 Regent-street; Keith and Prowse, 48, Cheap-side; and Cocks & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

Just Published.

CHARLES OLLIVIER'S

ROYAL MUSICAL REPOSITORY AND CIRCULATING
MUSICAL LIBRARY,

41, & 42, NEW BOND STREET.

VOCAL MUSIC.

The Fairest joys are fleetest.	E. J. Loder.	2s.
The Naiade's Call.	C. Pugni.	2s.
I dream of a Land.	C. Pugni.	2s.
The Fairies' meeting.	C. Pugni.	2s.
The Father's death.	Tomasehek.	2s.
Henry the Fourth of France.	To Gabrielle.	2s.
The Dying Wife's farewell.	Rungnaghen.	2s.
Fidelity.	Brinley Richards.	2s.

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.

Grande Valse.	J. Rummel.	Solo 3s.; Duet,	...	4s.
Duo Dramatique—Donna del Lago.	Renaud de Vilbas	6s.
Fantasia—Nuit de Noël.	D. Magnus.	2s.
German Illustrations—Six Lieder.	J. Rummel.	in three books, each,	...	3s.
Zephyr—Nocturne.	W. H. Palmer.	2s.
Six Pensées Musicales.	Kuhn.	4s.

NEW MUSIC.

NOW PERFORMING AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.

MENDELSSOHN'S Operetta, "Son and Stranger,"

Full score	...	45s. 0d.
Pianoforte score	...	15s. 0d.
The Overture for two Performers	...	4s. 0d.

All the vocal pieces to be had separately

Text books	...	1s. 0d.
Ditto, 4th Symphony in A, full score	...	21s. 0d.
Orchestra parts	...	20s. 6d.
Pianoforte, four hands	...	12s. 0d.
Andante from ditto arranged for the organ, by E. T. Chipp	...	2s. 0d.

Ditto, The 98th Psalm for double chorus and orchestra, Piano-forte score

...	...	6s. 0d.
-----	-----	---------

Ditto, "In deep distress," from 139th Psalm, for solo and chorus,

Organ score	...	5s. 0d.
-------------	-----	---------

Schimon A, Two Marches for Pianoforte, two performers

...	...	3s. 0d.
-----	-----	---------

Three Morceaux brillants, Pianoforte solo

...	...	3s. 6d.
-----	-----	---------

Five Morceaux ditto

...	...	2s. 0d.
-----	-----	---------

Schumann Rob. Seven Pieces for the Pianoforte

...	...	4s. 0d.
-----	-----	---------

Ewer and Co., Newgate Street.

HEALTH WHERE 'TIS SOUGHT!HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Cure of a disordered Liver and Stomach, when in a most hopeless state.—Extract of a letter from Mr. Matthew Harvey, of Chapel Hall, Airdrie, Scotland, dated the 15th of January, 1850.—To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your valuable Pills have been the means, with God's blessing, of restoring me to perfect health, at a time when I thought I was on the brink of the grave. I had consulted several eminent Doctors, who, after doing what they could for me, considered my case hopeless. I had been suffering from a Liver and Stomach complaint of long standing, which during the last two years got so much worse, that every one considered my condition as hopeless. I, as a last resource, got a Box of your Pills, which soon gave relief, and by persevering in their use for some weeks, together with rubbing night and morning your Ointment over my chest and stomach, and right side, I have by their means alone got completely cured, and to the astonishment of myself and everybody who knows me.

(Signed)

MATTHEW HARVEY.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—
Ague Constipation of Fevers of all Liver complaints Tumours
Asthma the Bowels kinds Lumbago Ulcers
Bilious Com- Consumption Fits Piles Worms of all plaints Debility Gout Rheumatism kinds
Blotches on the Dropsy Head-ache Scrofula or King's Weakness, from Skin Dysentery Indigestion Evil whatever cause
Bowel complaints Erysipelas Inflammation Sore Throats &c., &c.
Colic Jaundice Tic-Douloureux

Sold at the Establishment of Professor HOLLOWAY, 244, Strand, (near Temple-bar, London, and most all respectable Druggists, and Dealers in Medicines throughout the civilised World at the following prices—1s. 1jd., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 38s. each Box. There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.
N.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients in every Disorder are affixed to each Box.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

MDLLE. SOFIE CRUVELLI.—ERNANI.

IT is respectfully announced that this evening, SATURDAY, July 19, will be presented (for the first time this season) Verdi's Opera, ERNANI.

Elvira	MDlle. SOFIE CRUVELLI.
Carlo V.	Signor COLETTI.
Ruy Gomez	Signor SCAPINI.
Iago	Signor CASANOVA.

AND

Ernani	Mr. SIMS REEVES.
------------	-----	-----	-----	------------------

To conclude with the admired divertissement,

LES GRACES.

Introducing the celebrated Pas de Trois. Euphrosyne, MDlle. Carolina Rosati, Thalia, MDlle. Marie Taglion; Eglia, MDlle. Amalia Ferraris. Supported by MDlles. Rosa, Esper, Julien, Lamoureux, Allegrini, Kohlenburg, Ausandon, Pascals, Soto, Dantonie, &c. The opera to commence at 8 o'clock. Applications for boxes, stalls, and tickets, to be made at the box-office of the theatre.

On Tuesday next, July 23, will be produced Auber's last new opera, ZERLINA; LA CORBEILLE D'ORANGES.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—On FRIDAY NEXT, JULY 25th, Mendelssohn's Elijah. Vocalists—Madame Clara Novello, Miss E. Birch, Miss Dolby, Miss M. Williams, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Formes. The Orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets 3s.; reserved, 5s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter Hall, or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE Oratorio performances of this Society will be continued on the Friday evenings. Parties from the country desirous of attending these performances are recommended to forward Post Office orders to 6, Exeter Hall, payable to Robert Bowley.

DISTIN'S TWELVE CONCERTS.

ROYAL MUSIC HALL, STRAND. Mr. Distin and his Sons will perform on their improved Sax Horns, in addition to their Operatic Selections, the celebrated Cuckoo Galop. The above Galop is arranged for the Piano and Cornet-a-piston, price 3s. post-free; and may be had of the Publisher, H. Distin, Military Musical Instrument Maker, 31, Cranbourne-street, Leicester-square, London.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC BY THOMAS BAKER.

"GREAT MASTERS FOR LITTLE PUPILS," a selection from the works of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, &c., easily arranged and fingered, price 2s. each number (4 numbers now ready). "We cordially recommend this work to all Teachers of the Pianoforte." Vide Era.—"As an instructive and at the same time pleasing work, we know of no publication that can surpass it." Bristol Mercury.—"This work will be of great use to Teachers." Sunday Times. "Geraldine," Mazurka Brilliant, 2s. 6d. "Rose Leaver" (study in E minor), 2s. 6d. Jullien and Co., 214, Regent-street, where may be had all Thomas Baker's compositions.

THE CUCKOO GALOP.

MR. DISTIN and his Sons perform the Cuckoo Galop every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, at the Royal Music Hall, Adelaide Street, Strand. It is arranged for the Piano, and Cornet-a-piston, price 3s., post free, and may be had of the publisher, Henry Distin, Military Musical Instrument Maker, 31 Cranbourne Street, Leicester Square, London; also My Polka, price 2s. 6d., Our Polka, 2s. 6d., Your Polka, 2s. 6d., and the Hippodrome Galop.

HENRI CRAMER'S NEW PIANOFORTE WORKS.

PUBLISHED BY WESSEL & CO.

DEUX ETREUNES ITALIENNES.

No. 1, "La fille du Regiment"	3s. 6d.
" 2, "L'Elle d'Amore,"	3s. 6d.

SOUVENIRS A PISCHEK.

No. 1, "With sword at rest" (Standard Bearer),	2s. 0d.
" 2, "Loving I think of Thee" (an Adelheid),	2s. 6d.
Peter the Great (Bouquet de Melodies, sur l'Opera Cesar and Zim-merman)	4s. 0d.

The above works are admirably adapted for pupils; they are of moderate difficulty, and the melodies are excellently arranged.

Wessel and Co., 229, Regent-street, London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

LES HUGUENOTS. On Tuesday next, July 22nd, will be performed Meyerbeer's Grand Opera,

LES HUGUENOTS.

The principal characters by Madame Grisi, Madame Castellan, MDlle. Angri, MDlle. Cotti, Herr Formes, Signor Tagliacchi, Signor Polonini, Signor Ferrari, Signor Rommi, Signor Mel, Signor Soldi, and Signor Mario.

GRAND EXTRA NIGHT—IL FLAUTO MAGICO—NORMA.

On THURSDAY next, July 24th, a Grand combined Entertainment will take place, which will embrace a most extraordinary assemblage of artists. The performances will commence with the first act of Bellini's Opera,

NORMA.

Norma	Madame GRISI.
Adalgisa	MDlle. MORRA.
Pollio	Signor TAMBERLIK.
Orvoso	Herr FORMES.

To conclude with (for the 4th time), Mozart's Grand Opera, IL FLAUTO MAGICO (the complete Opera). The principal characters by Madame Viardot, Madame Castellan, MDlle. Anna Zerr, MDlle. Morra, MDlle. Bertrandi, MDlle. Vintak, Herr Formes, Signor Stigelli, Signor Soldi, Signor Rommi, Signor Mel, Signor Polonini, Signor Ronconi, and Signor Mario.

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor, Mr. COSTA. Commence at Eight. Boxes, Stalls and Tickets to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre.

The new grand Opera of RAPPHO, the music by M. Gounod, is in rehearsal, and will be speedily produced.

MEYERBEER'S SONGS,

ENGLISH Version, Edited by FRANK ROMER, are now published by Campbell, Ransford, and Co., British and Foreign Musical Presentation Library, 56, New Bond Street.

TO ORGANISTS.

Just Published,

THE ORGANIST'S MANUAL, consisting of select movements from the Works of the most eminent composers, edited by George Cooper. 9 Nos., 2s. each. To be continued.

Introduction to the Organ for the use of Students, by George Cooper. Price 7s. 6d. Church Psalmody. The third edition of Stogdall's Church Psalmody, adapted to the Rev. C. W. H. Hall's Selections of Psalms and Hymns, now almost universally used. The tunes are in score with an account for the Organ or Pianoforte, and amongst them will be found several compositions of Mendelssohn, Sterndale Bennett, and other eminent modern composers. Price 12s.

Select Anthems, edited by Chas. Edward Horsley, No. 1, "Lord for thy tender mercy sake," Farrant. Price 2s., to be continued. Nearly ready. Pratt's Anthems, vol. 2. In score from the works of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, &c. &c. Price, to Subscribers, one Guinea.

Addison and Hollier, 210, Regent-street.

EASY PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

CONCERTS DE FAMILLE. SIX AMUSEMENTS POUR LE PIANO, par F. Preagar.

No. 1. Io son ricco.
" 2. Trab, Trab.
" 3. Il segreto per esser felice.
" 4. Scenes that are brightest.
" 5. Stay fleeting time.
" 6. Quando il destino.
" 7. Chant des croates.
Price 1s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

TO THE MUSICAL WORLD.

TO BE DISPOSED OF, by Private Contract, the Stock in Trade, Fixtures, &c., of a Music Seller (in a fashionable and rapidly improving Town in one of the Midland Counties on the line of the Great Northern Railway). The Stock consists of Pianofortes, Violins, Guitars, and every article connected with the general Trade, and can be reduced to meet the views of a purchaser. To a Professor or a Tuner an opportunity presents itself seldom to be met with. The present owner leaving on account of health. Application to be made to Messrs. Addison and Co., 210, Regent-street, and D'Almaine and Co., 20, Soho-square.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3 Studley Villas, Studley Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Furkess, Dean Street 8.40; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, July 19, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra), payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 30.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, JULY 26, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

THE WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The programme of the One-Hundred-and-Twenty-Eighth Festival of the choirs of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester has been forwarded to us, which will take place at Worcester this year. The dates of the performances are Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, from the 26th to the 29th of August inclusive. The morning performances, as usual, will take place in the nave of the Cathedral, and the evening in the College Hall.

The Stewards on the present occasion are, The Right Hon. the Earl of Harrowby, Sir Charles Hastings, M.D., W. S. P. Hughes, Esq., Mayor of Worcester, Rev. E. H. Cradock, Canon of Worcester Cathedral, Rev. A. Wheeler, Precentor of Worcester Cathedral, Rev. C. Crewe, Vicar of Longdon, J. Benbow, Esq., M.P., J. P. Brown, Esq., M.P., George Rushout, Esq., M.P., Robert Clive, Esq., W. E. Essington, Esq., and W. Hancocks, Esq. The Bishop of Worcester is the President.

The programme is a strong one. The list of singers on the female side, contains the names of Madame Castellan, a universal favourite at the Triennial Festivals; Miss Dolby, a favorite every where; Miss Birch, whose soprano voice needs no commendation; Miss Williams, the contralto, whom to name, is to raise a smile of complacency on the face of every citizen of Worcester; and Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli, the young singer whose recent operatic successes have been the town-talk, and whose name alone would render the programme attractive. On the male side, the catalogue is equally strong. The great English tenor, Sims Reeves, leads the van, and the gigantic German basso, Formes, closes the rear. In the middle phalanx we find the judicious and admirable Lockey, and the pains-taking and correct Machin.

The band is powerful in names that promise efficient execution, selected from the flower of Her Majesty's Theatre, the Royal Italian Opera, and led by the English Blagrove. The choral department has been selected from the London, Liverpool, Birmingham, Worcester, and Gloucester Choral Societies. The entire orchestra, vocal and instrumental, will comprise a force of 300 performers.

The conduct of the musical performance, is vested, as heretofore, in the hands of the Organists of the respective cathedrals, Mr. Townsend Smith, of Hereford, officiating as pianist, Mr. Amott, of Gloucester, as organist, and Mr. Done, of Worcester, as conductor.

The morning performances in the Church will consist of, on Tuesday, a full Cathedral Service of Tallis's "Preces and Responses," Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum" and "Jubilate," and a selection of anthems; on Wednesday, Elijah; on Thursday, Handel's Samson and the second part of Spohr's Last Judgment; and on Friday, The Messiah.

At the evening performance in the College Hall, the chief attractions will be the Walpurgis Night of Mendelssohn, on Tuesday; a selection from Jessonda and a new cantata called Fridolin, by Mr. Frank Mori, on Wednesday; and on Thursday, a selection from Euryanthe.

Among the pieces likely to excite curiosity are the air, "Hear ye, Israel," from Elijah, and "Let the bright Seraphim," both to be sung in English by Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli.

The direction of the most laborious duties of the festival will, as usual, devolve on the Rev. Robert Sarjeant, Hon. Secretary, who will, doubtless, fulfill them as heretofore, to the satisfaction of every body present.

CRUVELLI'S ELVIRA.

WE mean the Elvira of Victor Hugo—Dona Sol—the heroine of Verdi's Ernani, in four acts.

Talk of bridges to get over—here was a bridge, with scarcely a stone safe, although built but a few years since by the architect and mason, "Young Verdi." If Sophie Cruvelli was to be congratulated for having passed safely over the "Pont de Florinda," how much more for having flitted across the "Pont d'Ernani," without leaving the vestige of a foot fall: Carlotta, herself "the ethereal," could not have tripped more lightly over a dangerous pass. The truth must be accepted. Sophie Cruvelli is protected by the stars; and even the envious archer, who, like the silly judge in "Lempriere," prefers the pipe to the lyre, Pan to Apollo, and who merits the same sort of appendages which the God of Music caused to grow from the head of Midas, in vain directed his arrows against her. The bow, unwilling to its duty, refused to bend; the shaft, robbed of the impetus which should have urged its course, fell to the ground point foremost; the soil, loathing its unexpected burthen, would fain have jerked the arrow upwards, but the air, respected the law of gravitation, and snapped off the lighter part, restoring the headless wood to the hands of the deluded bowman. The steel was left to rankle in the earth, which, vexed at its pestilential presence, struggled convulsively. The Sun took pity on his suffering satellite, and caressed it with his hottest beams: a vapour, floating near, robed in the colours of the prism, sucked up the waters of the hills, and big with rain, dropped a compassionate shower upon the burning spot. Conception came, and the earth was consoled by the rejection of a weed; a rainbow, circling half the sky, looked on, the while, serenely. The weed was a figure of the bowman's envy, the rainbow of the singer's genius, which rides high and holy in the heavens, while the weed sheds poison on the ground worms. When the rainbow has vanished into the bright home of its eternity, the weed will be a dry and prostrate stalk; the venom, which was its life, extracted by the husbandman—to kill the flies and beetles, mice and rats—enduring as an emblem of its office when it grew apace.

Ernani was indeed a bridge to pass; but Cruvelli has passed it, as she passed Florinda. The critic in the Post—a poet no less than a critic—has described, in glowing prose, the perilous descent from Fidelio to Ernani, from Beethoven to Verdi. Per Hercole!—the opposite poles are not wide enough apart to symbolize the distance between two such creations, two such men. Between Fidelio and Norma, Beethoven and Bellini, the disparity is of another kind. Poor Bellini had real sentiment—even genius; a feeble tendril, which the mighty German oak, spreading his frowning branches over the face of the land, would gladly have allowed to fold its fragile arms around his impenetrable trunk—a wild flower, shadowed by the generous tree from the burning beams of the sun, which would smite and utterly destroy it, scorching up the sap of its existence, and consigning its odour to the wind, its colours to the night. We can well imagine Beethoven, the giant, taking Bellini, the weakly child, under the shadow of his love—a lion that caresses, not devours, a tender doe. But Beethoven could not have tolerated Verdi. The stern republican (who allowed himself to be crowned King of the Realms of Harmony) would scarcely have condescended, like the sarcastic Rossini, to pierce the composer of Nabucco and Macbeth with epigrams; a growl, a scowl, and a shrug of the shoulders, would have sufficed to express the magnificence of his disdain, the infinity of his contempt. We shall not, however, attempt to describe the difference between Leonora and Elvira; the Post has done it better than we could hope to do it; and to the Post, which we have quoted in another column, we direct the attention of our readers. Our task is confined to a commentary on the new success of Sophie Cruvelli, who, after entering the innermost recesses of the temple, has now been satisfied to wave her handkerchief on the steps of the portico. For, no more than the steps of the portico may have power to enter the church, can "Young Verdi" hope to approach that altar, where the lamp of genius burns eternally. But Sophie Cruvelli is an eloquent advocate, and her appearance at the vestibule is likely to tempt many to come out of the temple, and watch what passes. Let us, then, for a moment, emulate the half-faithful, and, quitting the shrine of Beethoven, listen to the syren outside, who,

"In profuse strains of unpremeditated art" fills the air with a ringing sound—which must be called melody, since her voice is all melody—and draws the unwilling echoes from the hills. She is not to be resisted. Close the doors of the temple, ye who would remain steady to the cause; shut up your ears; be lashed to a pillar, as Ulysses to the mast, or this Circe will be your undoing. If you listen to her in the cavatina "Ernani involami," you are lost; you will begin to relish Verdi; and later, in your moments of repentance, you must hate Cruvelli—like the envious archer, whose arrow-point was turned into a weed. If you hear that marvellous cadenza—embracing nearly three octaves of compass, from E flat in alt, to F below the lines—you are bewildered; your judgment fails; your zeal for the true and the beautiful evaporates in smoke; and even the very learned and impartial critic of the Athenæum, triply armed, with power, independance, and resolution, will be unable to convince you (as he has been unable to convince his readers) that Sophie Cruvelli is no singer. Take heed, then, speedily, lest it be too late; go not to the theatre when Ernani is performed; secure your places at once for M. Gounod's new opera; and, revelling in the strains of the "new Beethoven," bless your stars that you have escaped undefiled, and that when you cannot have Fidelio, you may comfort yourselves with Sappho.

On reflection, we shall follow our own counsel—which is good and honest. We will not attempt a comment upon Cruvelli's new success in Verdi's opera—preferring to retain our simple creed, unshaken. Cruvelli made her first appearance in Venice, in Ernani (1847), her first appearance in London, in Ernani, (1848), and her first appearance in Paris, in Ernani, (1851)—triumphing over the convulsive menaces of Signor Verdi's ill-conditioned muse, on each and every occasion, as completely as on Saturday night. Against such an advocate we cannot wage a war of words. Like Gandelyn of the Golden Tongue, Sophie Cruvelli, with her voice alone, would make any human creature believe that black was white. We shall not stand the test.

"Waiter, bring the Athenæum."

(WAITER—in reply:—"We don't take it in, Sir.")

VERDI AND THE MORNING CHRONICLE.

OUR columnar cotemporary, the Chronicle, has lately taken to be unusually critical on musical matters. To this there can be no objection, since, if the critic be competent, his strictures not only instruct the public, but benefit the artist stricken. No aspirant to public favour should despise honest and straightforward remonstrance on the part of those whose duty it is to "tell the truth and shame the devil." But alas! this telling the truth and shaming the devil is a maxim oftener outraged than practised; and the poor artist, wishing to profit by good counsel, finds himself lost in a dense mist of words.

The Chronicle, whose title is "Columnal," has recently taken up a pair of cudgels. With the right hand he smites Verdi, with the left hand he smites his detractors. We have nothing to do with the opinions of the writer, which, in truth have nothing to do with the matter; but we have to do with the style in which they are delivered.

He who walks in the dark may hold his head erect, and proceed boldly; but the chair he overturns is the worse damaged, and the knock on the elbow from the door-edge the harder. We make so bold as to say, with deference, that the Chronicle is not exactly the authority to be relied on in any musical question; and that the article on Verdi, which appeared in its Monday columns, leaves Verdi precisely where it found him—id est, where Aristotle leaves the soul of the universe—UBI. Verdi's exact position, in the intelligence of the musical Chronicle, is UBI: and the exact position of the musical intelligence of the Chronicle is UBI; the one may stand for the other, since either stands for nothing.

We admit everybody's right to lay down his opinion, as much as we admit everybody's right to lay down his pen. It would be well sometimes, however, if the last could be first. It would have been well if the Chronicle had laid down his pen before laying down his opinion, that "it would be absurd to deny that Verdi possesses a dashing audacity of style, which he turns to excellent account." It is not "absurd to deny" anything except eternal truths and self-evident axioms. We deny, then, that Verdi turns a style "to excellent account;" and we are not absurd in denying it—since Verdi has no style, and there is no excellence in his music to account for. We also deny, and in denying are not absurd, that "no modern composer deals more boldly with dramatic points;" and we deny that "he is thoroughly master of the orchestra," since his instrumentation is meagre, commonplace, and boisterous, without the slightest pretensions to artistic finish; and we equally deny that "he has an undercurrent of real musical feeling"—simply because he has no such thing; and our denial is at least as good as the assertion of the Chronicle.

But all these assertions, and all these denials—which may be made on either side, without exposing either side to the charge of absurdity—amount to little more than the "tu quoque" of the ancients. What we object to is the sentence where the Chronicle, in a grave and magniloquent tone, ex cathedra, says—"With the CLIQUE that would ostracize, as with the CLACQUE that would deify Verdi, we have no community of judgment." The style of this sentence is by far too magniloquent for the tribunal whence it issues. The voice of an Oracle could hardly have spoken with more entire self-satisfaction. Why those, who are not prepared to agree with the Chronicle about the merits of Verdi, should be snubbed as a CLIQUE; and why those who, on the other hand, are equally unprepared to consent with the Chronicle, on the point of his deficiencies, should be dismissed as a CLACQUE—we leave the Chronicle to explain. We are satisfied with protesting.

With much of what the Chronicle says about Mdlle. Cruvelli we wholly agree. The following sentence should be written in letters of gold—framed and glazed, and hung up in the study of the young artist, for her daily admonition—"We have often recorded our unfeigned admiration of Mdlle. Cruvelli's high talents, and feel that those who counselled her not to make her debut this season in her opening part of 1848, counselled well. Had she reappeared as Elvira, instead of Fidelio, she would scarcely have occupied that eminent position she has honourably won, and which she will, we are assured, permanently retain." This is as true as a book, and we trust may make due impression in the quarter to which it is addressed. It is genuine and wise counsel, and inclines us to shake hands with the Chronicle on the other points at issue—the "Clique," the "Clacque," and the "absurdity."

VIVIER.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

M. Vivier, who had not until yesterday been heard in public this season, fairly took the auditory by storm by one of those extraordinary successions of feats upon the French horn for which he seems to have alone the patent. Every now and then a prodigy turns up in the musical world, who has tamed and made perfectly submissive some hitherto untractable instrument, pronounced by all its professors to be only capable of doing the little which they do with it. M. Vivier is one of those instrument tamers who some years ago astonished all the French horn players of Europe; while this season a German gentleman has given a similar shock to the nerves of the good old school of contre bassists. M. Vivier was applauded to the echo.

[This performance took place at Mdlle. Rachel's Matinée Dramatique, in Willis's Rooms.—ED.]

CRUVELLI IN ERNANI.

(From the Times.)

The appearance of Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli, on Saturday night, as Elvira, in the opera of Ernani, the part in which she first appealed to an English audience (in 1848) imparted unusual interest to the performance of Verdi's chef d'œuvre, as it is entitled by his admirers. The immense progress which this young singer has made within this last three years could not have been more satisfactorily tested. The well known cavatina, "Ernani involami," was given with a power and brilliancy of execution that reached the highest standard of bravura singing. The largo, which, lavishly ornamented, displayed the whole compass of a voice rarely matched for extent and quality of tone, was brought to a close by an elaborate cadenza, as much to be admired for its originality as its elegance, and the extreme neatness with which it was accomplished. The Cabaletta "Tutto Sprezzo," was remarkable for the spirit and animation of its delivery; it was vocalised to perfection, one of the most striking points being a long and powerfully sustained shake, followed by a graceful fioritura, which anticipated each reprise of the theme in a novel and effective manner. Mademoiselle Cruvelli was enthusiastically applauded in both movements of the cavatina, and was recalled unanimously after her exit. With that good taste for which she has more than once been praised, however, she modestly declined the encore. It is unnecessary to enter into details about the rest of the opera, of which the "Ernani involami" is the chief vocal feature. Suffice it that Mademoiselle Cruvelli's performance throughout was remarkable for the finest dramatic sentiment. Her acting and singing in the trio of the last act were equally good. Her rush upon the stage, and her exclamation of the words, "Ferma crudele," when Ernani, in fulfilment of his pledge with Don Silva, is about to plunge the dagger in his breast, made a forcible impression; and few could have remained unmoved by the passionate energy with which she poured forth the denunciation against her aged and unrelenting persecutor ("Quale d'Averno demone"). The sudden impulse which arrests her hand at the instant when she is about to strike Don Silva threw her into one of those natural and imposing attitudes for which her acting has been so justly admired. Within the late short period Mademoiselle Cruvelli appears to have acquired additional mastery over her resources. In her impersonation of Elvira we observed none of those exaggerations of posture and gesticulation, the offspring of enthusiasm and inexperience, which occasionally perilled some of the grandest passages in her Norma. The only fault we could find was a tendency in her declamation to abuse the employment of the lower notes of the voice, which, beautiful as they are, lose much of their effect by being too frequently forced into notice. Mademoiselle Cruvelli must endeavour to conquer this defect, which is purely one of impulse. She is very young, and severe and unrelenting study can alone enable her to attain a thorough command over her rich natural endowments. Genius is a great bequest, but it is not all; without art to tutor and restrain, it is but a wild horse that spurns the curb and bridle. We have little apprehension, however, about the future career of Mdlle. Cruvelli, who is already beyond comparison the most gifted and promising young dramatic singer at present upon the stage. She has every thing in her favour—intelligence, physical aptitude, and genius—and it depends upon herself alone to reach the highest position in her art.

The opinion we have more than once expressed of the merits of Ernani (and of Verdi's music in general) remains unchanged, and the favour with which it was received on Saturday night must be mainly attributed to the talent, zeal, and well-earned popularity of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli.

(From the Morning Post.)

From Beethoven to Verdi is a gigantic stride in a downward direction, and the admirers of Mdlle. Cruvelli could not but deeply regret that she should so soon desert the banner of the classic muse, fighting in whose sinking cause she nobly earned the greater portion, if not the whole of her fame, and waste her fine genius upon such common-place stuff as that of which the part of Elvira in Ernani is made. Our young singer's performance of Fidelio proved her to possess a subtle appreciation of the most profound beauties of her art.

With the power of an inspired pythoness Mdlle. Cruvelli interpreted to admiring multitudes those signs and symbols of lofty thought which since the days of Malibran had remained mere lifeless hieroglyphics. Invoked by a sympathetic soul, the spirit of the mighty Beethoven descended upon her, and she became at once not only the best but the only exponent of the great ideas embodied in the heroine of his wondrous opera.

After such a glorious and two-fold triumph—for in this instance Mdlle. Cruvelli vanquished not only the difficulties of a most arduous part, but also the rooted prejudices of our operatic public—we did think that it would be unnecessary for her to "stoop to conquer" in any character belonging to the modern Italian reper- toire, and least of all in such a one as the Elvira of Verdi's Ernani.

The honours of Saturday evening's performance were wholly due to the leading artists, who by the alchemy of genius, succeeded in converting basest metal into purest gold.

(From the Morning Herald.)

Mdlle. Cruvelli made her first appearance before a London audience in the character of Elvira, in Verdi's Ernani, three years ago. Although then very young, she created an impression which even now is not forgotten. Her re-appearance in this part on Saturday night naturally excited curiosity, and her performance demonstrated in a striking manner the vast improvement she has made. Mdlle. Cruvelli's general conception of Elvira evidences, in a strong light, the dramatic genius which has been unanimously allowed her; while her execution of the music proves her to be a perfect mistress of the modern Italian style. As an example of declamatory bravura singing we have heard few things more impressive than her rendering of the well-known cavatina "Ernani involami," in which the singular extent of her register, the great power of her voice, its evenness of tone throughout, and the fine contrast and equal command of the soprano and contralto notes, were displayed in a manner that elicited the enthusiasm of the audience, and, at the end of the quick movement, a unanimous recal for the singer, whose steady refusal to accept the encore betrayed as much good sense as her vocalisation evinced accomplishment and natural facility. In the subsequent scenes—the duet with Ernani, the quintet in the finale to the third act, which was encored, and the popular trio in the fourth, involving the catastrophe of Ernani's death—she was equally successful. Her acting in these was wonderfully passionate and real, and her delivery of the phrase in which she reproaches Silva was instinct with energy, force, and meaning. Her gesture when she lifts the dagger to stab Silva, and the quick revulsion of feeling which induces her to refrain from giving the blow, was finely assumed. But still more striking was the point she made at Ernani's death. Raising her arm in a menacing posture, she is about to plunge the dagger in his breast, but, as though suddenly deprived of all physical power, her action is instantaneously checked, and she falls prostrate at the feet of her lover. By the performance of Elvira, Mdlle. Cruvelli has sustained, if not exalted, her reputation. In her vocalisation we recommend her, however, to be less lavish in the display of peculiarities which render her voice almost an exceptional one. She uses the contralto register too often in the climaxes of her cadences, and thereby incurs the risk of endowing her performances with a certain effect of monotony. But this error is very easy of rectification, and it can hardly be expected that Mdlle. Cruvelli, with all her genius and natural gifts, should, at the age of twenty-two, be faultless. Were she so, she would be greater than Malibran. The audience summoned Mdlle. Cruvelli and her associates before the curtain, after the first and fourth acts.

FIDELIO.

(Continued from our last.)

Florestan awakens. Leonore recognises first his voice, and, later, when he turns towards Rokko to enforce his complaints with all that looks can add to speech, she sees and knows his face. Overcome by this thrilling conviction, the fulfilment of her long forebodings, which have supported her from step to step in her most anxious and perilous career, she sinks senseless on the edge of the grave where still she has been obliged to continue her labour. The helpless, but even yet, not hopeless captive, demands who is the governor of the prison in which he is confined. Rokko, knowing that the deed this tyrant purports to enact in the dungeon will release him from the bonds of secrecy which have hitherto restrained him, hesitates no longer to acknowledge to the victim of his stern master that the governor of the prison is Don Pizarro. The sound of this name, now too much hated to be dreaded, revives at once all the energies of Leonore. With what impassioned interest does she overhear the entreaties of her husband lover that Rokko will send to Seville for Leonore Florestan. What a reward to such a heroine to find that the ardent feeling, the innere

Trieb, which here stimulated her exertions and supported her through them, has had the magnetic sympathy of him she loves, who, with the truly kindred feeling to her own, has shared with her love for love, hope for hope, thought for thought; to find that his confidence in her support is the first idea to which he gives expression, when he first knows the real imminence of his danger! Florestan begs for a drop of water. The tenderest sympathies of the kindly jailor are touched. He has no water, but the remains of some wine in his flask. With the wildest eagerness Leonore springs from the grave and rushes with the flask to Rokko. This attracts the prisoner's attention, and he enquires who is the new visitor to his dungeon—to which the hearty old jailor replies with self-satisfaction, that his assistant will in two days be his son-in-law. The wine is handed to Florestan, and Rokko and Leonore are each conscious of the other's emotion in watching the effect of this timely assistance.

Thus is introduced the trio, "Euch werde lohn," the most continuously melodious piece in the opera. Here we have from first to last no cessation of rhythmical tune, the unbroken flow of which proves no less the luxuriant invention of the composer than does its great variety and the simple, clear, yet still ingenious plan through which it is conducted, evidence his complete mastery of the subtlest resources of his art and of his imagination. Florestan thanks his friends for the welcome relief they have afforded him. How lovely is the melody in which this free outpouring of a trustful heart is expressed, the pleasurable memory of all who have with feeling heard it cannot fail to testify. Immediately on the close of this we have a new phrase, given first by the violoncellos, that from hence forms a very principal feature throughout the movement; this, for distinction's sake, we call a counterphrase. A short solo for Rokko brings us to the key of E, the dominant of the original; then we have again the counterphrase, and then beginning like that of Rokko, there is a more extended solo for Leonore. A short ensemble grows out of this, in which Florestan's anxious observation of the stranger youth is delicately and feelingly embodied; and we have also the growing anxiety of Leonore and the irrepressible good will of Rokko unmistakably expressed. This brings us to a full close in the fifth of the original key. A short symphony brings us back to the key of A, and introduces an entirely new feeling—to at least our experience in hearing it, and believe we exaggerate not the composer's intentions in supposing that he would here convey the fluttering hesitation that delays one who wills what he dares not, and is withheld by a power within, yet not of himself, from seizing that which he desires when it appears to invite his very grasp—a feeling most rarely acknowledged, but, surely, at some or other time familiar to the experience of us all. Then, in broken phrases and with a reluctance that grows out of the ardour of her purpose, Leonore tells Rokko how she has for two days carried a piece of bread concealed, hoping for such an opportunity as this to give it to the prisoner. Her ardour kindles the sympathy of her companion—what she so strongly wills, yet scarcely dares to ask, he as strongly wills, but no more dares to do. Thus we have the same fluttering, hesitating symphony (leading us now into the key of D), that makes us feel as when the blood rushes to our cheeks, while the words will not part from our tongue; the same broken phrases for Rokko, till, summoning his sense of duty to the conquest of his tenderer inclinations, he declares "Das hiesse zu viel wagen," with the bold bluntness that makes perhaps this character of the jailor more particularly individual than any other of the dramatis personæ. A phrase of insinuating tenderness brings us back from the half close on F sharp, on which Rokko concluded, to what we have named the counterphrase in the key of D. An alternation of attempted persuasion on the part of Leonore, and unwilling refusal on the part of the jailor, leads us through a somewhat extraneous, but highly graphic series of modulations, the change of key being made more striking and the accompaniment becoming more and more excited at each repetition of her seemingly irresistible entreaty, and of his evidently difficult-to-enforce denial. At length she prevails, and with a modulation still more startling than any of the preceding (from C sharp minor, namely, into C natural major), Rokko of the rough duty, but of the tender heart, exclaims "So be it—thou canst venture it." Most loving tender is the charming passage in which Leonore offers the treasured morsel to the captive. We feel that her whole heart is in the gift, which must be so intensely magnetised with the Almighty influence of her deep love, that it cannot but possess a quickening power beyond all that the most skilfully prepared physical nourishment could impart. Our old counterphrase now in the key of E, expresses the thanks of Florestan, the words of indifferent conventionality upon his tongue, but how deep, how true a feeling at his heart—the feeling thus fully appreciates all that is ostensibly done for him, but forbodes, if not definitely, what, surely that there is something felt for him, more than the simple act, however gently acted, fulfils. A passage for wind instruments that seems to convey the heaving of a joyously dilated heart, brings us to a reprise of the opening melody in the original key, when Florestan resumes his expression of gratitude. This same melody is then given in ensemble, Leonore and Rokko variously expressing their sympathy with the prisoner, she obscurely warning him that deliverance is at hand, he owning his self-satisfaction at being able to ameliorate the present sufferings of the victim, while Florestan calls down the blessings of heaven on them both. This time the music assumes a different and more excited character from the increased motion in the accompaniment. Now once more our counterphrase, with Florestan's irresistible interest in the jailor's young companion, and the continually growing compassion of the other two. This leads to a dominant cadence and thence begins a stretto in an accelerated tempo, which introduces an entirely new musical idea that is concisely, but completely developed—and this brings the trio to a close. Leonore scarcely capable of enduring the anxious interest in her husband and his fate that momentarily grows upon her, Florestan vainly trying to give words to his gratitude for the first sign of sympathy he has known since his imprisonment, and Rokko reflecting with half regret and half compassion that the captive's sufferings will soon be ended. The phrase that commences this stretto has a somewhat singular passage for Florestan, which becomes still more so when on its repetition by Leonore a C natural is substituted for a C sharp. A singular passage that follows upon this derives great interest from its happy prolongation upon its repetition; and here we have an example of the successive employment of the minor ninths upon the supertonic, the dominant, and the tonic that is worthy the examination of those concerned in musical theory. The conclusion of the trio is worthy of the whole, and the never absent predominance of an evident and interesting melody continues with a wondrous charm until the very end.

A mysterious figure wrapped in a large dark cloak descends into the dungeon. Rokko explains that everything is prepared, "The boy must leave us." Leonore, compelled to retire, remains so concealed that she can observe the gloomy stranger who has just entered, which she does with the most intense attention. Rokko proposes to strike off the fetters of the prisoner. An abrupt negative is his answer. Drawing a dagger, the mantled figure approaches Florestan, who is thus, reduced by long privation of sustenance, and exercise, and air, to a state of weakness, that renders him incapable of resistance,—who is thus, further enfeebled by the weight and by the hindrance of his chains, an easy victim to the ignoble vengeance of the dastardly tyrant who has mastered rather than conquered him.

We are thus prepared for the great quartet, which, as an illustration of most powerful dramatic action, has perhaps no parallel in the whole scope of the lyric drama. The opening unisonous passage, for all the string instruments may be called the subject of the movement, as it gives the character to the whole, and recurs frequently with eminent effect. The mantle thrown aside discovers to the dauntless Florestan his implacable enemy, Pizarro. Exulting in the ascendancy over his purposed victim, which their relative position gives him, the tyrant pauses before his feast of bloodshed to exaggerate its horrors by the utterance of a grace of execrations. Here have we a vague passage after the manner of the solos of Pizarro in the duet for the two basses, where the key is undefined, and a certain figure in the accompaniment is carried through a series of harmonic progressions, that keeps the ear in a state of continual expectation and disappointment as to what will be the ultimate resolution of the long protracted uncertainty. This preserves well the personality of Pizarro's music, and is, therefore, dramatic.

Finally, we come to a very decided full close in D, the original key of the piece, and then a passage for horns and trumpets and drums introduces, with an open brightness of colouring and clearness of purpose that is an admirably appropriate opposition to the gloomy mysteries of what has preceded, the few words of manly disdain in which the prisoner replies to his persecutor. The opening subject now recurs in the key of A, and is repeated in sequence. Pizarro continues his merciless tauntings, until, when raising the dagger against his powerless victim, he is interrupted by Leonore, who springing before her husband, so as to shield him with her body, bids the murderer retire with a startling tone of defiance. The sudden change of key at this place, and the particular manner in which the voice is introduced, realises the intense interest of the scene. A few bars, the last of which is remarkable for the singular treatment of a tonic pedal, introduce what, in order to be able to distinguish it when we have occasion to refer to it hereafter, we will call the second subject in F sharp minor. Leonore continuing her tone of defiance, declares to Pizarro that he must penetrate her breast to reach his victim, that death is sworn to him as the price of his murderous lust. Through all this we have the astonished exclamations of Florestan and the earnest efforts of Rokko to restrain his assistant, who, he believes, but throws himself into the danger of him whom he rashly endeavours to protect, without lessening that of the captive. With a contemptuous exclamation of Pizarro, we have a brief recurrence to the opening subject, and this brings us to the key of G, where we have a repetition with considerable extension of the second subject. Pizarro attempts to move with violence, that could only be repelled by the superhuman efforts to which it excites her, the devoted Leonore from his path, and this leads to the chief point of the whole quartet, indeed of the whole opera. Abruptly we come upon the first inversion of a chord of E flat, and, the voice left wholly without accompaniment, Leonore exclaims, in firm and measured tones, that fully embody the greatness of soul that empowers her to make the declaration, the greatness of purpose thus requires her to make it, "Kill first his wife!" We must leave off here from the attempt to analyse, and stand still to wonder at the prodigious effect which these four notes produce. The situation is perhaps the most powerful that exists upon the stage, and the musical rendering which Beethoven has given to it does not only everything to realise the all-exciting interest of the scene, but heightens its thrilling intensity. Here is the glorious privilege of love, incapable of sacrifice to know no danger, no shame, in the defence of the all and only that fills up our consciousness, that incites our feelings, regulates our thoughts, necessitates our actions, and is our being. The composer has felt all that the most ideal, the most impassioned, the most devoted heart could feel in circumstances to stimulate the most exalted, the most ardent of feelings; and he makes us feel the full power of his great conception whenever we witness the representation of this wondrous scene. The recognition of the lovers, the astonishment of all, even of the murderous tyrant, at the wondrous courage of the devoted heroine, and her continued defiance of Pizarro, who stands disrobed of all his power before her steadfast energy, are expressed in a long agitated passage, which paints not only the general excitement of the situation, but conveys well the various feelings of the several characters by the excellent declamation of the words they have respectively to utter. We come back now to the original key, when the original subject is resumed with an accelerated tempo, which adds not a little to its excitement. After this, we return to the second subject, first in the key of G, and then repeated through a series of modulations. During this, Leonore continues still her defiance of Pizarro, who, shamed at the mastery of a woman, resolves that she as well as her husband shall be a victim to his fury, "Shared hast thou with him life, now share thou also death with him!" He advances upon Leonore with his sword, when she, still shielding her husband from the approach of his enemy, draws a pistol from her bosom and points it at the head of Pizarro, crying at once, with a firmness that shows the full force of her resolution, "One sound—and thou art dead!" At this time the action is interrupted by the distant sound of a trumpet from the watch tower of the castle, announcing, according to the order of the governor, the arrival of the minister. The resolution of a dominant seventh in A upon a chord of B flat introduces this distant trumpet with startling effect. Then, in the key of B flat, we have a phrase of melody of such exquisitely heavenly beauty as to compensate to those who find no other charm in music but its tune, for the absence of cantabile phraseology (which would elsewhere have been so wholly out of place) in the rest of the movements. This illustrates the impulse of thanksgiving for their unlooked for deliverance that stimulates the enraptured lovers, which is shared by the honest Rokko while Pizarro, in a more broken measure, makes his apostrophe to the infernal agents that have thwarted his design. We could have wished that this beautiful passage had been differently disposed in the orchestra,—as it stands in the score, with the lovely melody, to which we have endeavoured to do justice in our praise, assigned to the two flutes and the violoncello in triple octaves against the sustained harmony of the voices, the melody, which should rarely be the chief feature, is not, we think, sufficiently prominent. The trumpet sounds again, now nearer than before, and in the pause of breathless anxiety, which this occasions, Jacquinno descends to an opening of the dungeon and in a few hurried words summons Rokko, whom alone he supposes to have entered this secret cell, to return and give suitable reception to the minister. The truly appalling effect of this short spoken sentence, occurring as it does in the most exciting part of the most exciting piece of music in this at least, if not in any work, exceeds the reach of any verbal description. The speaking here forms a most important feature in the musical design; and, so introduced as it is here introduced, aids in bringing out the thrilling excitement of the dramatic situation more than any music, even of Beethoven, could possibly have done. In counting the resources of this great composer we must, from the present example, esteem as one of the very greatest, the happy knowledge of when to let his music cease, and by this momentary interruption to invest the whole with a new feeling that no notes could possibly convey. The first inversion of a minor ninth on E (a natural though unexpected course of transition) brings us back to the key of D. Here, after some preliminary bars on a dominant harmony that introduce it, we have an entirely new subject that portrays well the violent feelings that convulse the character. We have to remark in this, first, the strange and to us disagreeable effect of an extra fifth bar in the rhythm of the first phrase, which has nothing to correspond with it in the counterphrase which follows it, nor even in the repetition of the whole passage that subsequently occurs. We are much disposed to regard this as one of those accidents such as the superfluous three bars in the slow movement of the G minor symphony of Mozart which the composer could not have intended, and which it is the duty of a conscientious and careful editor to correct. Experience in composition has made us familiar with the kind of inconsideration that may have led the composer to write a bar which is several times repeated, once more than he designed, and we feel that he is no more to be judged by the evidence of his manuscript in such a matter than should a literary author, who had by a similar accident twice written an unimportant word. Next, we may remark upon this passage as a striking instance of our composer's habit of great, and, as some may not unreasonably consider, useless elaboration in his scores. We have the repetition of some ten bars of musical matter, which, for all the idea that it contains, is nothing more nor less than a repetition, but the orchestral distribution is changed for the second time, and this is, as far as we can observe, more for the sake of making a difference than of producing variety, for the change of effect is scarcely appreciable, except to one who would listen to the performance as a student, in order to understand how diversely might be applied the same orchestral resources. We can understand how a young practitioner in the art of instrumentation, who might have few opportunities of making experience of his orchestral effects, would take advantage of the repetition of a passage to experiment upon which of two forms of orchestral arrangement might better realise his idea; but such we cannot suppose to have been the case with Beethoven at the time he wrote this opera, and indeed the present is by no means a singular instance of the same kind of thing in the course of his work (we may adduce a prominent passage in the scherzo of the Pastoral Symphony as another, and more are within recollection if it were desirable to name them), and we wonder more at the needless pains such needless re-arrangements must have cost him, than admire at the misapplication of powers which we cannot but think might have been better employed. This is the exercise of ingenuity that wantons away the time of genius. Immediately upon this follows a passage of four bars, which is repeated notation; and then another four bars, repeated in like manner. The first of these phrases shows us how very much care Beethoven bestowed upon his instrumentation, husbanding the resources of his orchestra with an almost miserly economy, but making such important use of them when he brings them all to bear, as to draw at least double the effect from them that they yield to an ordinary writer. We have for two bars of the repeated four a first inversion of the chord of the minor ninth on F sharp; and for this single chord occurring twice, for this point only in the whole movement has the composer introduced two trombones, which appear nowhere else throughout the entire score. A somewhat unusual application of the time pedal brings to a close the vocal part of the movement; and then we have a symphony, with another recurrence to the opening subject, in a still more accelerated tempo; and this is remarkable for the introduction of two extra horns, expressly to obtain a particular distribution of one chord, the first inversion of a minor ninth on E, that stands out prominently immediately before the end. This is very different from the method of writing for the orchestra in the present day, but it produces an effect that is well worthy the attention of the dilettanti, and the examination of the student.

G. A. M.

(To be continued.)

CRUVELLI'S FIDELIO AND NORMA.

A fluent writer in the New Monthly Magazine has apostrophised in befitting terms of praise these very remarkable performances of the youngest and most promising dramatic singer of the day. The extract is from a paper entitled "Notes of the Opera."

"Night after night we hear chef d'œuvres of the greatest masters, and we feel that true music, from a source 'pure and undiluted,' is now appreciated—that it is not mere light and airy strains, captivating and catching, which are required to fix the attention of a refined audience. Beethoven's sublime conceptions are no longer listened to with apathy. Their grandeur is understood and felt; and like those who once know their strength, the instructed auditors will never fall back into weakness. They know what is best; they have felt it; and they will, in future, have it. And is it not provided? The beautiful young Cruvelli, priestess at the shrine, was waiting for the propitious moment, and, as the divine flame awoke, took advantage of it. In Italy and in Germany she had already found the reward of her enthusiasm and the due acknowledgment of her genius; but the world pays us cold English the compliment of allowing our decision to prevail; and it was reserved to us to confirm her fame.

Cruvelli's Leonora is without a rival, for her power as an actress is scarcely surpassed by her magnificence as a singer. The unapproachable Rachel appears to enjoy her performances. The dark expressive eye of the Queen of Tragedy may often be seen and felt, glancing approval from the recesses of her box, as she follows the movements of her fair contemporary. Cruvelli's Norma, in spite of the inevitable comparison with more experienced artists who have achieved triumphs in that glorious part, stands the test, dangerous though it be; and if Cruvelli's youth and softness render it more than usually difficult for her to produce the Pasta thrill, expected from those who personify the majestic priestess, yet nature, having gifted her with a person of singularly commanding grace and dignity as well as loveliness, has helped her more than most of those who aspire to fill the place left vacant by genius passed away. Cruvelli need not strive overmuch—need not study her poses, or elaborate her action; she may leave to nature what the "nursing mother" has provided, and she will gain, not lose, by allowing art to interfere with her native feeling. The drapery must fall well on such a form as hers; let her give herself no care about it. She could not be ungraceful if she would; let her not think twice about her attitudes or gestures.

We will but repeat what has been the general theme of the month—that her "Casta Diva" is the perfection of tenderness, freshness, and brilliancy. We will not dwell on the power of her scorn, on the agony of her remorse; we will only say one word of the beauty of the duet with Adalgisa, charmingly supported by Madame Giuliani.

These are strong words, but not too strong. We cite them with pleasure, since, though written with enthusiasm, their aim is truth, and the homage they convey is addressed to a worthy object.

Reviews of Music.

"TROIS MAZURKAS"—Pour le Piano.

"LES DEUX ANGES"—(Op. 8.) Morceau Caractéristique, Pour le Piano.

"NOCTURNE"—Pour le Piano.

"LA SOURCE"—(Op. 1.) Caprice, Pour le Piano.

"MARCHE MILITAIRE"—(Op. 17.) Pour le Piano.

"CONSOLATION"—(Op. 14.) Fantaisie, Pour le Piano.

"NOCTURNE IMPROMPTU"—(Op. 19.) Pour le Piano.

"DEUX CAPRICES"—No. 1, Le Reve—No. 2, La Brillante—(Op. 2.) Pour le Piano.

"LA PLAINTÉ"—Ballade, Pour le Piano. (Op. 14.)

"JEAN DORMANT"—Reverie Nocturne. (Op. 15.) Dedicé au the Earl of Belfast.

"MARCHE FUNÈBRE"—Pour le Piano. (Op. 17, No. 2.)

"SCÈNE DE BALLET"—Fantaisie, Pour le Piano. (Op. 18.)

"TROIS MAZURKAS"—Pour le Piano.

JACQUES BLUMENTHAL. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

The author of these pieces possesses one desirable quality—viz., that of fertility, if not of invention, at least of production. His works have obtained a degree of popularity more than commensurate with their intrinsic value, their chief characteristic being a certain ad captandum prettiness, which recommends them strongly to the beudoir. They are equally favourites with young ladies who can play a very little on the pianoforte, and old professors who cannot play at all. They give no trouble to either, and require but a small amount of attention from the hearer. They are, nevertheless, as we have hinted, decidedly pretty, and their author evinces a considerable degree of musical experience and taste in the arrangement of his passages, which, though rarely new, are frequently graceful, well selected, and effective.

M. Jacques Blumenthal's style is a sort of melange of Thalberg and Rosellen, the two most popular composers for the piano of the present day. He steers entirely clear, however, of the childish triviality of the one, and the awkward elaboration of the other. Though occasionally on the extreme verge of simplicity, he rarely falls into absolute commonplace; and, though often brilliant and showy, he never runs into outrageous difficulties. In adopting the mannerisms of the two composers above mentioned he has carefully avoided appropriating to himself any of the real beauties of Thalberg; while, in respect to Rosellen, his abstinence must have cost him no trouble, no violent exercise of modesty, no rigid application of the law of meum and thum, since, in the music of that gentleman, there are no beauties to steal, and, had M. Blumenthal searched never so diligently, he would have been at a discount for his trouble—like Diogenes with his lantern, he would have sought in vain, since, among the innumerable specimens which M. Rosellen has submitted to the world, there is not one honest idea to be found. The best description that can be given of Rosellen's music is that it is the sweepings from the dust hole of Henri Herz. M. Blumenthal is certainly better than this; and in his Mazurkas, of which two cahiers are before us—Nos. 3 and 11—he has shown himself capable of imitating Chopin without caricaturing the eccentricities of the great Polish pianist, out of whose ashes Franz Liszt, with the powerful aid of M. Escudier of the France Musicale, is convulsively endeavouring to raise a Phoenix. We wish him joy of the task. If Franz Liszt fail in persuading the world that Chopin was a Phoenix, he may perhaps succeed in convincing posterity that he himself was a Goose.

In his imitations of Chopin (Mazurkas, books 3 and 11—which we can recommend as really pretty and sparkling pieces) M. Jacques Blumenthal has successfully avoided the forced originality, the harmonic oddities, the intervallic crudities, and the moony melancholy of his model.

In his imitations of Thalberg (from among which we can cite "La Source," a very sweet compound of tune and arpeggio, which has already attained a wide popularity), M. Jacques Blumenthal has strongly rejected the peculiar manual difficulties, harmonic perplexities, abrupt modulations, and other ingenious devices by which the music of the redoubtable Sigismund is invariably distinguished. In his imitations of Rosellen (take the Nocturne in A flat, Op. 10, No. 2, as a favourable example—which we can also recommend as an excellent teaching piece, calculated to form the hand if not the taste of the pupil), M. Jacques Blumenthal has soared to a greater height than the weak wings of his puny prototype are enabled to carry him; while preserving in a great degree the infantine simplicity he has walked wide of the insipidity of Master Rosellen, of whose numerous compositions we would gladly assist in making a general bonfire—unlike the licentiate and the barber in the conflagration of Don Quixote's library, making no exceptions whatever.

In his imitations of other authors, such as Gorja, Gottschalk (the new deity of La France Musicale), &c. &c., M. Jacques Blumenthal has been equally discreet. The "Marche Militaire," Op. 17, which resembles everybody and everything, while actually suggesting nothing, may be recommended as a good, dashing, showy, selling, music-publishing, boarding-school piece, of which we lay a wager that Messrs. Cramer and Beale will sell some hundreds of copies, if only on the strength of this favourable notice. M. Jacques Blumenthal's longer pieces we do not pretend to admire. "La Consolation"—dedicated to Miss Flora Macdonald—is chiefly remarkable for being fifteen pages in length, and for beginning in D minor and ending in F major.

Without going further into the evident merits of M. Jacques Blumenthal's compositions, we must render him the justice to add, as a corollary to this flattering estimate of his powers, that he has made his way more rapidly, and won the notice and the patronage of the aristocracy, wealth, and fashion of this country, more extensively and in a briefer period of time than any pianist who has visited England since Henri Herz in his palmy days, and John Cramer when he drank brandy and water with Dussek; and it is not merely probable but true, that while an English musician of genius, learning and accomplishments might present, in vain, at the door of every musical publisher in alternation, the manuscript of a new composition, and be successively contumelied, M. Jacques Blumenthal will grow fat and prosperous upon the weeds that he has plucked from the gardens of other musical nursery-men. This is a sad conclusion to arrive at; and we beg M. Jacques Blumenthal's pardon for recording it to his advantage. Our journal is a small looking-glass of the times which we are paid for holding up, that the musical world may see its face in it, and know whether it should blush, or look healthy and confident. In plain words, we are obliged—and not against our will, be it understood—to tell the truth, for the exercise of which office our subscribers disburse to us, each, per week, four pence. Content with this remuneration, and fierce in the exercise of the authority conferred upon us, we candidly declare that a faithful, close, and assiduous examination of M. Jacques Blumenthal's compositions does in no wise enable us to answer logically for the reputation and position he has acquired in this country. We, therefore, honestly and strongly, recommend him to throw aside all selfish considerations, and despising the pelf and eminence too often awarded without accompaniment of desert, set sail for Paris, where such music as he writes is held in greater esteem than in London, and where he may divide the chair of honor, at present wholly and solely occupied by his rival and cotemporary, Rosellen. With the perfect conviction that M. Jacques Blumenthal will not adopt our advice, we take our leave of him for the present with the profoundest good will.

"THE WORLD IS A FAIRY RING"—Ballad.—The poetry written by ELIZA COOK—Music composed by J. P. KNIGHT. Z. T. Purday.

Mr. Knight has long ranked deservedly among our most popular ballad writers, and the present ballad is one of the happiest that has for some time proceeded from his pen. The words by Miss Eliza Cook, a poetess whose name alone recommends her effusions, are sentimental and well written, and the melody of Mr. Knight, at once vocal and simple, fully express their meaning. The accompaniment, though entirely unpretending, is written with care and ability, and sets off the melody in the best colors. The song is suited to the register of ordinary voices, and under the protection of a concert singer of any repute, can scarcely fail of obtaining the popularity to which it is justly entitled.

"THE IGNIS POLKA"—J. J. JOHNS. C. Jefferys.

A very lively specimen of the polka class, easy to play and easy to hear. The first theme bears a kind of mixed resemblance to the march in the overture to Guillaume Tell and Jullien's "Row" Polka. This, however, will be forgiven, if not overlooked, in the enthusiasm of polka performers, at once roused by the jollity of the strains, and the facility of the passages. Mr. J. J. J. (J. J. and a half—Jules Janin must mind his P's and Q's, or rather his J's) may wend his way blithely; his "Ignis" is not likely to be quenched until polkas are repudiated.

"NEVER MORE"—British Vocal Album, No. 29—Written by H. W. BELLAMY, Esq.—Composed by JOHN BARNETT. Wessel and Co.

Messrs. Wessel & Co. have enriched their British Vocal Album (the most complete and interesting series extant of original songs, by modern English, Irish, Scotch, and Welsh composers) by another contribution from the celebrated pen of Mr. John Barnett. The present song was first set to Uhland's pretty poem, "Lebe wohl," which Mr. Bellamy has translated in a very able, free, and poetical style. With the music, a kind of canzonet in two verses, the accompaniment of the second verse elaborated into triplets, we have not a fault to find. It is one of Mr. Barnett's most expressive and perfect songs. It is in the key of A flat, and may be sung by lady or gentleman, although the poem speaks in the masculine gender. The melody is flowing and vocal, and the accompaniment musician-like in the extreme, rich in harmony, and written with unusual care.

"THE FALSE HEARTED"—Ballad—Sung by Mdle. Jenny Lind—Written by HENRY HOWARD PANE, Esq.—Music composed by T. EHRLICH. T. E. Purday.

As we have never heard the present ballad sung by the "Swedish Nightingale," we cannot answer for the "triumphant success" which the title-page assures us attended it throughout the length and breadth of the United States. A more bucolic ballad, if bucolic imply simplicity and innocence, we never saw. Melody and accompaniment are equally unassuming. The words, however, are extremely pretty, and the ballad itself, sung by a competent vocalist, would, in all probability, be found attractive.

Original Correspondence.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Some few weeks back you honoured me by the insertion of a brief series of letters, upon the above subject, in the course of which I ventured to hope that three or four individuals might come forward with their personal assistance in a matter which so nearly concerns the profession at large. Such, Mr. Editor, has been the case in a certain measure, yet, for reasons rather difficult to be understood, the response has been made privately rather than pub-lily, one single voice having been all that answered my appeal through its proper channel, all else having chosen the medium of personal application through having recognised my style of address. Be this as it may, great progress has been made, public opinion has been roused, and the matter has been discussed in quarters never dreamt of by myself when this agitation was commenced. Notwithstanding all which, the cause itself, if not in danger of premature decay, is yet in want of proper stimulus, owing to the utter absence of all "esprit de corps" whereby ALONE something might and MAY be effected.

In my former letters the desire of not trespassing too much on your indulgence led me to be brief, so much indeed as to fall short of what was necessary for the proper explication of the desired object; my intention having been with a view to arouse some abler spirit than my own to the task, rather than from any expectation of working it out myself: since, however, none has come forward, and since also considerations of much import have arisen to urge me on, I feel compelled, despite all seeming vanity, to assume the vacant championship, and accordingly, once more crave your assistance in giving publicity to the means whereby it is probable a National Opera may be established.

The plan (or means) to be adopted must form the subject of a distinct letter, previously to which it should be understood that it is not in contemplation to effect the desired object by a "coup de main," persuasive steps being the sole available method whereby any important aim can be effected. Let but one step be made in advance, and all the rest will follow easily, so the true route be taken.

The first step to be made is one of considerable difficulty, viz. to secure the perfect co-operation of so many artistes, both vocal and instrumental, as should form a body at once RESPECTABLE and UNANIMOUS. This done, there would be a reasonable probability of effecting an arrangement with the shareholders of Drury Lane Theatre, for the purpose of making a probationary (or trial) season, which, if successful, would invest the musical body with a "locum standi" whereupon it might be recognised and respected, whereas now, if seen at all, it is only to be sneered at, or what is worse, to be pitied. The means are open. The time auspicious, and very many of the "craft" are ready with their unselfish aid, if but a few others will combine to equalize the labor.

My next epistle shall contain a brief but concise abstract of the "PLAN OF MANAGEMENT," which I believe it necessary to adopt, in order to secure the real object in view, namely FAIR PLAY TOWARDS ALL PARTIES. A plan, the main features of which have suggested themselves out of the experience of time past, and, although somewhat unsophisticated in appearance, the result truly of practical knowledge. If in it there shall prove to be ought objectionable, it may hereafter be amended, if ought fatal, it may be expunged. But as a PLAN, I believe it to be worthy of consideration, such as could well be given at a sitting of some half dozen business men, previously to becoming a document whereon to act.

I will now, Mr. Editor, conclude, by stating to my brethren of the profession, that it behoves them to succumb to the necessities of the times, to throw aside old prejudices, to adopt broader views, to think less of themselves individually, and more collectively, above all, to accept that which may be within their reach, and not grasp at that which is impracticable of attainment, lest, like the dog in the fable, they let go the substance in pursuit of the shadow. The meaning of this hint will be seen hereafter.

I have the honor to subscribe myself, Mr. Editor,
Your obedient servant, PHILO MUSICA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR.—I am the leader of a party of amateurs, who wish to get up a scene or act from an opera. Will you favour me with the name of some piece which would suit the following company:—two tenors, baritone, bass, contralto, soprano, and chorus.

Your obliged Subscriber,
AMATEUR TENOR.

P.S.—The other tenor and the soprano can act very well.

[Try "La Donna del Lago."—Ed.]

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The revival of Ernani for Cruvelli on Saturday attracted an overflowing audience. The cast was strong, but might have been much stronger.

The part of Silva—one of the most powerfully dramatic, and magnificently conceived characters in the whole range of the lyric drama, thanks to Victor Hugo, and not to Verdi and his librettist—was but indifferently represented by Signor Scapini, who wants voice and energy of style. This gentleman is a great falling off from Signor Belletti, the last representative of Silva, whom we hope to welcome back next season to his proper place in the corps of Her Majesty's Theatre. Massol was intended to have played the King, but, from some cause or other, the part was assigned to Signor Coletti, who, nevertheless, did it ample justice. Indeed, Coletti always appears to advantage in Verdi's music, for which the power of his voice, and his forcible and emphatic style admirably suit him. Nothing of its kind could be more effective than his rendering of the music of the King. It was bold, telling, and peculiarly loud, the latter quality being especially necessary to enhance the effects of Verdi's bellicose strains. Signor Coletti's singing helped in no small degree to procure the encore awarded to the finale of the third act.

The Ernani of Sims Reeves is so full of excellence that we deem it worth our while to point out the only serious defect which struck us in his conception of the character. Perhaps no human being was ever placed in a more terrible position than that in which the circumvented unfortunate Ernani, or more properly Don Juan, finds himself, when, on the very day of his marriage, when his whole soul is given to love and wrapt up in the fullness of contentment which admits of no fear, he suddenly finds himself called upon to sacrifice himself on the altar of his honour, and bid farewell at once to life and love. When the dread blast of the inexorable Silva sounds, which calls him to death, does Mr. Sims Reeves appear overwhelmed with the sudden and unexpected blow? Are his looks, actions, and words such as we might expect from one in his situation? No! We witnessed neither surprise, nor horror, nor despair; we discovered no frightful pause which under such circumstances would speak more than phrases and bars; we saw a very excellent tenor and good actor endeavouring his best to make his notes tell, and to fix himself in admirable attitudes.

Mr. Sims Reeves, we have no doubt, has his precedents for his acting in this tremendous scene, but he has talent enough to act on his own views and impressions, and we should prefer seeing him create the part, which has yet to be done, to adhering to feeble traditions, and following in the wake of doubtful authorities. Disregarding this scene, Ernani is decidedly the best part in which we have yet seen Mr. Sims Reeves. His singing on Saturday night was entitled to the highest praise, and his acting not less commendable.

Of Cruvelli's Elvira it is hardly possible to speak in terms of over-praise. That it was faultless we do not aver, but that it was distinguished by beauties of the highest order, and marked by strokes of the finest genius, we think few—and that few of no consequence—will venture to dispute. The scene, "Ernani involami," was one of the most splendid instances of bravura singing we ever heard. Some of the cadences introduced were such as few singers since Malibran have had the power to effect or the courage to attempt. Among them we may notice a chromatic descending passage from E flat in alt to F below the lines, rendered with the utmost precision. A shake, too, from fortissimo to pianissimo, and an ascending cadence, given with amazing rapidity, preceding the reprise of the cabaletta, must be noticed for their exceeding brilliancy, and the effect produced. We may state, in short, that the power of Cruvelli's voice, and her brilliant style of vocalization were more amply demonstrated in Elvira than in any character she has yet appeared in since her return. Her acting, also, went far to advance her in public estimation. The part taxes the strength of the artist to the uttermost, but Cruvelli retained her power and energy to the last scene. In the well known trio in the last act, Cruvelli created a furor. Here her acting and singing were magnificent, and she was recalled twice, after most pertinaciously refusing the encore awarded to her efforts. This tampering with the enthusiasm of an audience will not always escape so easily.

We have only to add in this brief summary of Cruvelli's Elvira, that, in our estimation, Verdi was never so honoured before by a singer who could so wonderfully and forcibly interpret his overpowering strains; and that Verdi himself never appeared to us under so favourable a guise.

On Tuesday, the long-talked-of Corbeille d'Oranges was produced for Alboni. The rumours respecting the success of this new work of Auber's at the Grand Opera of Paris, were various and discrepant; some affirming that the opera was a chef-d'œuvre, and the success triumphant; others insisting that the music was unworthy of Auber, and the success nil. Neither of these reports, however, were correct. The real truth is, that the opera obtained little or no success at the Académie, whilst Alboni's singing created a furor. Alboni alone saved the Corbeille d'Oranges from utter condemnation; and perhaps the greatest achievement of her glorious career is that she has done so. Never did two huge mountains—Scribe and Auber—bring forth so very little a mouse as the Zerlina; ou, La Corbeille d'Oranges. The story is entirely devoid of interest, and absolutely deficient in skill and ingenuity. There are not incidents enough contained in it to make a decent vaudeville; there is no action, excepting what is feeble and forced; no character, excepting what is trite and common. The personages and the movements of the plot are equally insignificant. To afford the reader an opportunity of judging for himself of the merits of the libretto, we shall print the argument entire from the "Opera-Box"—that useful and neat little brochure which is presented nightly to the visitors of Her Majesty's Theatre. Thus runs the argument:—

ACT I.—The scene is in the market-place at Palermo. A vessel has just arrived bearing Zerlina, a seller of oranges, who was once carried off by Corsairs, and who has been no sooner set at liberty than she has returned to her original trade. The appearance of a new competitor in the market excites the jealousy of the Sicilian fruit-women, and she would be forced to fly in consequence of the tumult that arises, did not Rodolfo, a young officer, come to her rescue, and repel the persecuting Lazzaroni. The hour of promenade arriving, the princess leaves her palace, and receives from the hands of a page a note, in which the writer asks for a flower or a fruit, as a sign that an interview is granted. She accordingly buys an orange of Zerlina, who is now quietly stationed at her stall, and giving it to the page, tears the note to pieces. Zerlina collects the fragments, and sings an old song, by which she has hoped to recover her long-lost daughter, Jemma. Before she was carried off by the pirates, she was the mistress of a young man named Roccanera, but during her twenty years' absence, the lover of her youth has greatly risen in the world—has become prime minister, and has married the king's sister. Therefore, when Zerlina finds Jemma as a young lady of rank, she dares not reveal herself as her mother, but merely asks the favour of carrying oranges daily to the palace.

ACT II.—Jemma, though destined by her father Roccanera for the Marquis Buttara, really loves the young officer, Rodolfo, and meets him in a saloon in her father's palace. Zerlina, who has come with her oranges, hears the lamentations of the lovers, and promises her protection. Then going to Roccanera, she reveals herself, and threatens to claim her daughter, if the hated marriage is not broken off. Roccanera, to appease her, promises to intercede with his wife, the princess.

ACT III.—A bal masqué takes place in the gardens of the palace, and every one seems joyous, with the exception of Rodolfo and Jemma, for all the efforts of Roccanera to prevent the marriage have been in vain. Fortunately Zerlina recognises in the Princess the mysterious lady who gave the orange to the page. She accordingly persuades Jemma to attire herself as an orange-girl, and to present an orange to the princess, with the words "I know all." The device has its effect. The terrified princess consents to the union of Jemma and Rodolfo, and Zerlina preserves her secret.

By such materials it was not likely that Auber should feel himself inspired, and accordingly we find throughout the opera the absence of that prodigality of invention, that melodic flow, and, to coin a word, that extemporaneity of thought, which so remarkably develop themselves in most of his works, and which have won for him the high name of the greatest master of the French school. Auber's apology is, that the Corbeille d'Oranges is a mere pièce de circonstance, written in an unprecedented short space of time even for him, one of the most rapid and facile of composers, to exhibit Alboni in a new character on the French stage. Scribe has the same excuse for dashing off his book, which we dare say he did at a sitting; but like Dr. Johnson with the brother of the Baronet, we "could wait" for something better, and not hurry the gentlemen. Had it not been for the Prodiço, written so lately, which betrays in an unmistakeable manner the genius of the composer, we should feel inclined to say that Auber's inspiration had passed away never to return. But although devoid of new ideas, there is no mistaking the music of the Corbeille d'Oranges for that of any other writer besides Auber. It bears undoubted evidence of his hand in its peculiarly felicitous orchestral treatment, and in several of the subjects which have acknowledged Auber for their author in other operas. The duet for Zerlina and Jemma in the first act, "Nell'alma or qual risveglio," is but a second version of the barcarole duet in The Crown Diamonds. The most pleasing tune in the opera is the aria of Jemma in the second act, which forms the leading subject in the overture.

It appears to us that Auber was too bent on writing displays for Alboni's voice to give his inspiration full scope. But even in writing for Alboni, Auber has not exhibited any unusual amount of skill and tact. Overlooking the fact that Alboni's voice is perfect and available throughout and equally delicious in every part, his endeavour seems to have been to render conspicuous only the upper and lower registers. A strange mistake or oversight in so great a master of the voice! Surely Auber must have heard Alboni's "Nacqui all'affanno," the "Una Voce," and indeed nearly all the music, as sung by her, in the Cenerentola and the Barbiere, and having heard it, how could he have fallen into so grave an error, and by so doing circumscribed his own inspirations. In fact Auber was in a hurry and did not weigh considerations, and this is the only way we can attempt to account for what's unaccountable. Having thus disposed of Auber,—with whom for the first time in our lives we have found cause to quarrel—we will proceed to the more agreeable task of noticing the glorious Alboni, whose singing in the Corbeille d'Oranges has been—vide all the morning papers—universally pronounced a masterpiece of pure and brilliant vocalisation.

But the task is brief and easy when there is nothing to do but praise. Alboni's singing was never more perfect, her voice never more delicious, her phrasing never more charming, her cadences never more astonishing—perhaps never so astonishing—and yet did Alboni sing throughout the whole opera without an encore, and that opera written expressly to suit her style and voice. Auber is certainly not a Rossini in writing for the voices, and Auber was never less himself than when he measured Alboni's voice for a new suit of his own notes. In tailor phrase, we never knew a looser mis-fit. The rondo finale comprises some amazing stretches, which proved that Alboni's throat was made of India rubber; and some tours de force, which proved that Alboni had the most wonderful voice in the world; and some pleasing bits of cantabile, which proved that Alboni had the most delicious voice that ever was heard—but—and mark the exception—Alboni did not obtain an encore, which proved—that the Parisian critics adore Alboni and reverence Auber, with which mythic inference we close our notice of the Basket of Oranges, and are only sorry that the fruit is not more palatable.

On Wednesday Ernani was repeated, and received with even more favour than on Saturday, and Cruvelli created an immense impression.

On Thursday, the Corbeille d'Oranges a second time, with the second act of Prodiço.

Last night Florinda.

The ballets of the week have been Les Trois Graces, La Sylphide, Le Diable à Quatre, &c., &c.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday Il Flauto Magico, was repeated, and Mdlle. Anna Zerr, having entirely recovered from her indisposition, resumed the part of Astriffiamente. Her singing of both airs was magnificent—especially of “Gli angui inferni”—and her reception was quite enthusiastic.

On Tuesday the Huguenots was given, and on Thursday the first act of Norma, and Il Flauto Magico entire.

The houses have been on each occasion overflowing. Such prosperous business, and so continual, was never before known at the Royal Italian Opera. Mr. Gye will make a fortune by the Crystal Palace which has injured so many others.

The engagement of Mdlle. Anna Zerr having terminated, she leaves London this morning to resume her professional duties at Vienna. Her success has been as great as it was well deserved.

On Monday an extra night will be given, as a subscription night, in lieu of the last on September 18, which would have interfered with the shooting season. The opera announced is the Prophete.

Meanwhile where is Sappho?

Dramatic Intelligence.

FRENCH PLAYS, ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—The production of a drama by Victor Hugo would of itself be a sufficient attraction to command a large audience, but when the heroine of the piece was to be interpreted by the greatest tragédienne of modern times, it may be supposed that the interest was considerably heightened, and was equally divided between the author and the actress, who has succeeded so admirably in expressing his sentiments and elaborating his ideas. The drama of Angelo is far from being the poet's best production; it cannot bear comparison with Ernani, Ruy Blas, Le Roi S'amuse, or Marie Tudor; but it still possesses considerable dramatic interest and bears the peculiar stamp of the romantic school of which Victor Hugo was the founder, and of which he is the most illustrious exponent. In eschewing the traditions of his classical predecessors we fully coincide with the objection raised by the modern dramatist, we fully agree with him that all such imitations must perforce be bad from the fact that our manners, our customs, our religion, are essentially different from those of the ancients, and, if we take away the supernatural agency which prevades Greek drama we shall have nothing left but a body without a soul, to which the galvanic battery may communicate the semblance but cannot infuse the reality of vitality. Uninfluenced by the grosser elements which composed the religious pantheism of the Greeks and Romans, our own faith discards any attempt to introduce as performers in our dramas the objects of our worship or veneration, and any effort to effect such an object would be regarded as bordering on impiety; were it not, as is the case with some of our epic poets, considered little short of ridiculous. But in endeavouring to establish a new order of things, to found a school in France which should be eminently French, taking Shakspeare as his model as far as possible, the author seems to us to have outstepped the bounds of his own mission, and, in his attempt to escape from the hero-worship of the school of Corneille and Racine, he has established the idolatry of an inferior order of beings, exceptional as regards their relations to society—robbers, assassins, courtizans—all false idols, with whom we should refuse to hold communion at all hazards. Ruined spend-thrifts, princely poisoners, bandits, and filles de joie are not exactly the personages we would place on the pedestal from which M. Victor Hugo has precipitated Andromaque, Phédre, Camille, Chimene, Pauline, Roxelane, &c., &c.; we therefore submit that Mr. Victor Hugo has attempted too much, or rather that he has been guilty of an error of judgment, still more open to exception than that which he wishes to supplant. It is true that we have little sympathy with the rant of the classical imitator, but we have a most invincible disgust for the canonization of Marion de Lorme and Thisbe. We smile at the high-flown sentiments of the Cid and the ferocious virtue of the Horatii, yet we may learn a lesson of honour and self-abnegation from them, while the feeling evoked by that worthy couple—Don Cesar de Bazan and Ruy Blas, Homedei, Ernani, and others of the same stamp—is degrading to humanity and provokes no better feeling than a compound of horror and morbid discontent at society in general. And yet, with all these drawbacks upon the productions of M. Victor Hugo, we must not be supposed to be indifferent to his great merits either as a poet or a dramatist. We are firmly convinced that he possesses, to an eminent degree, the mysteries of his craft, and that a better application of them would have ensured him the high position to which he aspires, but which he has not yet attained, nor ever will attain as long as he continues to view history and society through the distorted medium of a feverish imagination and mistaken sympathy. We pity Thisbe and Marion de Lorme, and we compassionate Don Cesar and Ruy Blas, yet we would advise the ladies to retire to a convent, and the gentleman to list as soldiers, for we have no tear to spare, there is too much real suffering and struggling virtue in this world, far more deserving of our sympathy than the two virgins above-named, or the titled beggars and vagabonds of the Spanish drama.

The drama of Angelo, now under consideration, although as we have said, not one of the best specimens of this new school, calling themselves imitators of Shakspeare—(save the mark!—the great English poet would certainly not be flattered by the affiliation; he whose creations are types of purity and loveliness, whilst on the other hand theirs are chosen from the veriest dregs of society, reeking with vice, lewdness, debauchery—and this is called human nature—doubtless it is human nature, such characters unfortunately do exist, but we have no more pleasure in dragging them forth to the light of day than we should have in bringing forth a leper or one possessed of catalepsy)—we say then that this drama of Angelo is a fair specimen of the school, but beneath the other productions of Victor Hugo. What the author might have produced we may infer from what he has produced, had his notions of dramatic art not been distorted by a false appreciation of its great aim and end. The moment of the raising of the curtain the interest of the story commences, and is steadily carried out to the very last scene. There is no flagging, not even for a moment, scene follows scene in such rapid succession, a master-hand is evidently at work moving the invisible threads; the characters are but sketched in, yet they have a distinct individuality; the two women are well contrasted; the podesta Angelo stands forth as the centre around whom all the others move. Homodei is the hand of destiny urging them on to their fate; it is true we scarcely know why he hates all these people, but he does his work conscientiously, and he faithfully represents the author's great world, which pervades all his writings and which he invented for Notre Dame de Paris, Ανταχ, fate. It is worthy of remark in this play there is not one decent character, all are tainted with vice or gross immorality. Angelo is a tyrant, and eventually an assassin; Homodei, the Venetian spy, is a villain of the blackest dye, who thinks no more of cutting throats than a butcher does of dispatching a sheep or a lamb; Rodolfo is in love with Catarina, and yet he is the lover of Thisbe the courtesan; Catarina is married to Angelo, and yet she swears eternal love to Rodolfo, and meets him regularly—to save appearances she is supposed to be pure, pure as an angel, says the text—our ideas of purity are essentially at variance with M. Victor Hugo's; and last, not least, we have Thisbe, the great card of the piece, who has run the gauntlet of debauchery from her youth upwards, who is represented as enamoured of Rodolfo, whom she however sacrifices to a reminiscence of filial piety. When we add that the denouement of the play consists in the death of Thisbe by the hand of Rodolfo, we shall have a worthy climax to all this association of horrors and crimes of every description. In justice to the author, we must admit that the piece was very successful; that it has some excellent situations; that our attention was captivated to the last; and that the language was at times powerful, and the sentiments choice and worthy of a better cause, and certainly of better company. The piece was well acted. Mdlle. Rachel, in the part of Thisbe, originally played by Mdlle. Mars in 1835, displayed extraordinary versatility of talent; her first interview with Angelo was a master-piece of bye-play; her indifference to his love was admirably conveyed by the nonchalance of her manner, arranging her dress while he is pleading his passion, and forming a strong contrast with the succeeding scene, in which she pours forth her love for Rodolfo with all the violence and tenderness of unlimited devotion. Nothing could surpass the rage and vindictiveness of her jealousy in the second act; there was a ferocity in her looks, her words, her gestures, which no words can express. In the remainder of the piece the situations are not so strongly marked; but we may mention the dying scene of the last act as a fine illustration of all-absorbing grief and despair. The part of Catarina was well filled by Mdlle. Rebecca Felix. This lady evinces great talent, and although evidently brought up in the school of Mdlle. Rachel, she does not servilely imitate her, and gives hopes that with time and study she may occupy a high position on the stage of the French drama. The parts of Rodolfo and Homodei were well done by Messrs. Raphael Felix, and Jouanni; the latter more particularly pleased us much by his excellent make up and conception of the character. Mdlle. Rachel was enthusiastically applauded, more than we have ever seen her before, was recalled after each act, and on each occasion greeted with a shower of bouquets. J. de C.

MADLLE. RACHEL'S MORNING PERFORMANCE.—On Tuesday morning, at Willis's Rooms, Mdlle. Rachel recited portions of four of her most celebrated parts—Athalie, Celimene in Le Misanthrope, Pauline in Polyeucte, and Phedre. In each instance an entire act of the play selected was recited, the remaining characters being taken by members of the company now engaged at the St. James's. Unsatisfactory as these fragmentary specimens of an artist's powers necessarily must be to those who have had an opportunity of admiring an entire performance, they cannot but be regarded as an immense boon to such as, from one cause or another, are debarred from appreciating, to their full extent, the genius and the skill of one who has attained a mastery in the highest aims of her profession of which there are but few examples in any department of art. Even to those who have seen these detached scenes occupying their due place in a great conception, and rendered more significant and more transparent in their beauty by what preceded and followed, there is yet in these recitations an occasion for fresh wonder and admiration. Without scenery and dresses, without any of the adjuncts and accustomed circumstances which constitute the natural sphere of the actress, it might be expected that there would be a certain coldness and constraint in her delineations, marking the absence of the wonted stimulus. If anything, the contrary was the case, and the power displayed of suddenly calling together and embodying in herself all the attributes of each character, and their relative degree of permanence, at the exact stage in the action where she commences, afford a measure of Mdlle. Rachel's extraordinary command of her art, of which, but for this peculiar example, no adequate conception could be formed.

The intervals between each recitation were filled up by instrumental performances, one of the most effective of which was a solo on the horn by M. Vivier. The subject was a favourite romance from Benedict's opera of the Gipsy's Warning. The tone which M. Vivier produces from his very difficult instrument has often been compared to the human voice; but we believe the comparison rather holds in consequence of the peculiar manner of phrasing, and that exquisite finish and expression which elevate the performance of M. Vivier to the level of the most perfect achievements of the vocal art. The simple melody of Benedict was delivered with a sentiment so profound that words were unnecessary to convey its meaning; while the tone was the purest, and at same time the richest, that could possibly be produced from the horn. Nothing could have been more perfect in its way, and so much were the audience delighted that they unanimously recalled M. Vivier, who reappeared upon the platform, but with his accustomed bashfulness declined to accept the encore. A pianoforte solo by Herr Blumenthal, and one of the marvellous executive displays, by Signor Sivori on the violin, which created a marked sensation, completed the musical part of the entertainment. M. Alexandre Billet accompanied the solos in a musicianlike manner.

The room was crowded to inconvenience, and the successful result of the experiment has induced Mr. Mitchell to announce a second performance of the same nature for next Tuesday, the last day of Mdlle. Rachel's sojourn in England.

Miscellaneous.

HERR FISCHOFF, having finished duties as one of the jurors at the Great Exhibition, has returned to Vienna.

EMER will shortly leave London for Paris, en route for Switzerland.

MDLLE. GEIGER.—Among recent arrivals is that of Mdlle. Geiger, a young pianist who enjoys a high reputation at Vienna. She is accompanied by her father, Herr Geiger, one of the composers and music directors at the Austrian Court.

ORGANIST OF ALL SAINTS, ISLINGTON.—A trial of skill took place a few days since for the situation of organist of All Saints Islington, which terminated in favor of Mr. Edward Deane. Dr. Bexfield sat as umpire.

VIUXTEMPS has left London to fulfil some further engagements in the provinces of France previous to his return to St. Petersburg.

NEW LITERARY PENSION.—It is with pleasure we record that Mrs. Jameson's name has been added to the pension-list—we believe for £100 a year. As one who, by her very careful works in the cause of the beautiful and poetical arts, has done much to adorn female authorship, this recognition of Mrs. Jameson is especially welcome, as occurring in the reign of a female Sovereign.—Athenæum.

FINE ARTS.—A number of portraits of artistes connected with the musical and theatrical profession have recently been published by Mr. C. S. Hervé, of 392, Strand, which, for their truthfulness of expression, in many instances, and the general ease with which the half-length figures are drawn, render them worthy of being placed in the collections of professional men. Amongst the most prominent for correct likeness may be mentioned Mr. E. L. Davenport, in the character of William in "Black-eyed Susan." The face is very animated, and the artist has invested the figure with just such a smartly cut sailor's jacket as to convey, through his pictorial taste, a good idea of the open-hearted and nimble British Tar. We notice, also, some very good copies from the originals in the likenesses of Signor Lanza, Signor Montelli, Herr Anschuetz, and Henri Drayton, and if these be specimens of the general artistic capabilities of Mr. Hervé, it may not be too much to infer that his gallery of professional portraits will receive such numerous acquisitions as will prove as remunerative to himself as they would be satisfactory to his patrons.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO WILLIS'S GREAT ORGAN AT THE EXHIBITION.—Her Majesty Queen Victoria, H. R. H. the Prince Albert, and party, visited the Crystal Palace on Friday July 18th and examined this large Organ. Mr. J. T. Cooper, Organist of St. Paul's Church, Islington, was in attendance, and performed part of the overture to "La Gazza Ladra," Rossini. "Schlaf, Schlaf, mein Kindelein," a composition by H. R. H. Prince Albert. Also an air from "Il Barbiere," and by express command of Her Majesty the March in Mozart's "Die Zauberflöte."

THE DEATH OF MR. PIO CIANCHETTINI, the celebrated composer and pianist, took place on Sunday last, after a prolonged illness, at his residence Northwick Terrace, in the 52nd year of his age. He had resided a great many years in Cheltenham, and was well and extensively known throughout its musical circles, from which, however, his declining health, and pecuniary embarrassments, had caused him of late very much to withdraw himself. He was generally respected by all his professional brethren, to whom he was ever ready to extend a friendly and an open hand. Many of the most accomplished musicians in the private circles of Cheltenham, have been Mr. Cianchettini's pupils, and owe their proficiency and skill to his careful teaching. Of the many public professors who have been his pupils, we believe Miss Le Grice is the only one now resident in Cheltenham. Mr. Cianchettini has left behind him an only child, now an orphan, aged eight years, wholly destitute. For the education and maintenance of this child, a few old friends of the father are anxious to provide—and appeal to those who respect his memory to aid them in doing so. A subscription for this purpose has been opened. Mr. Cianchettini was a nephew of the celebrated Dussek.—Cheltenham Looker-On.

M. GOUNOD AND M. EMILE AUGIER, composer and librettist of the forthcoming opera of Sappho, have both arrived in London.

VAUXHALL.—BAL MASQUE.—It would seem, from the number of persons collected together at this place whenever the entertainment of a masquerade is announced, that that sort of amusement had more attraction than any other for the inhabitants and visitants of the metropolis. On Thursday evening, notwithstanding the dampness, both moral and physical, that six and thirty hours' incessant rain must have thrown on nocturnal open-air pastimes, a host of people was congregated in the gardens, and the sports were as lively and as rife as if the weather had been as propitious as possible for the enjoyment of al fresco relaxation. The arrangements for the masquerade were as good as could be conceived, and, in addition to the great platform in front of the saloon, the circus and the large room beyond it were set apart for dancers. One great appliance to dancing was provided on a more than usually liberal scale by Mr. Wardell, viz., good music and plenty of it, the bands being numerous and the quality of the performance good. The grounds were well lit up, and the refreshment department on a scale commensurate with the almost incessant requisitions of hunger and thirst. There was the usual number of maskers, some of whom fulfilled their assumed characters tolerably well. The mirth was somewhat noisy, but decorum suffered no very palpable outrages, and all went off with sufficient good-humour, until daylight and the avocations of day warned the company to retire.

A MATINEE MUSICALE was held at Grosvenor House on Monday, July 21st, at which the following artistes assisted:—Messrs. Distin (sax horns), Miss Thornton (treble), Mr. Young (alto), Mr. Benson (tenor), Mr. Shoubridge (tenor), Mr. Whitehouse (bass), Mr. Benson (pianoforte). Several glees, quartets, trios, duets, and solos were performed in first-rate style, and the concert passed off with great eclat.

Advertisements.

THE CUCKOO GALOP.

MR. DISTIN and his Sons perform the Cuckoo Galop every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, at the Royal Music Hall, Adelaide Street, Strand. It is arranged for the Piano, and Cornet-a-piston, price 3s., post free, and may be had of the publisher, Henry Distin, Military Musical Instrument Maker, 31 Cranbourn Street, Leicester Square, London; also My Polka, price 2s. 6d., Our Polka, 2s. 6d., Your Polka, 2s. 6d., and the Hippodrome Galop.

HENRI CRAMER'S NEW PIANOFORTE WORKS.

PUBLISHED BY WESSEL & CO.

DEUX ETRENNES ITALIENNES.

No. 1, "La fille du Regiment"	2s. 6d.
" 2, "L'Elisire d'Amore,"	3s. 6d.

SOUVENIRS A FISCHER.

No. 1, "With sword at rest" (Standard Bearer),	2s. 6d.
" 2, "Loving I think of Thee" (an Adelheid),	2s. 6d.
Peter the Great (Bouquet de Melodies, sur l'Opera Csar and Zim-merman)	4s. 6d.

The above works are admirably adapted for pupils; they are of moderate difficulty, and the melodies are excellently arranged.

Wessel and Co., 239, Regent-street, London.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

PIANO SOLOS.

- Beyer, Ferdinand.* Valerianallieder. National Airs. No. 18, 19, 20, 21, 22
(To be continued.)
Op. 110. 6 Morceaux gracieux sur des Airs allemands favoris. In six books.
- Brisson, Fred.* Op. 35. Le Chant du Rossignol. Danse Arabe.
Op. 42. Makouba.
- Brunner, C. T.* Op. 130. 12 Morceaux faciles sur des Airs populaires. In 3 books.
Mozart, W. A. Sonates, No. 1-12, a new Edition, in 12 books.

PIANO DUETS, TWO PERFORMERS.

- Beyer, Ferdinand.* Op. 112. Revue mélodique, No. 1, Don Giovanni; No. 2, Die Zauberflöte; No. 3, Norma.
(To be continued.)
- Cramer, Henri.* Potpourri, No. 31, La noce de Figaro; No. 32, Die Zauberflöte.
(To be continued.)

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's-street.

TO ORGANISTS,

Just Published,

THE ORGANIST'S MANUAL, consisting of select movements from the Works of the most eminent composers, edited by George Cooper. 9 Nos., 3s. each. To be continued.

INTRODUCTION TO THE ORGAN for the use of Students, by George Cooper. Price 7s. 6d.

CHURCH PSALMODY. The third edition of Steggall's Church Psalmody, adapted to the Rev. C. W. H. Hall's Selections of Psalms and Hymns, now almost universally used. The tunes are in score with an accompaniment for the Organ or Pianoforte, and amongst them will be found several compositions of Mendelssohn, Sterndale Bennett, and other eminent modern composers. Price 12s.

SELECT ANTHEMS, edited by Chas. Edward Horsley, No. 1, "Lord for thy tender mercy sake," Farrant. Price 2s., to be continued.

Nearly ready.

PRATT'S ANTHEMS, vol. 2. In score, from the works of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, &c. &c. Price, to Subscribers, one Guinea.
Addison and Hollier, 210, Regent-street.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC BY THOMAS BAKER.

"GREAT MASTERS FOR LITTLE PUPILS," a selection from the works of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, &c., easily arranged and fingered, price 2s. each number (4 numbers now ready). "We cordially recommend this work to all Teachers of the Pianoforte." Vide Era.—"As an instructive and at the same time pleasing work, we know of no publication that can surpass it." Bristol Mercury.—"This work will be of great use to Teachers." Sunday Times. "Geraldine," Mazurka Brilliant, 2s. 6d. "Rose Leaves" (study in E minor), 2s. Jullien and Co., 214, Regent-street, where may be had all Thomas Baker's compositions.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published,

A SKETCH OF THE SUCCESSIVE IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed, and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTE.
Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 210 Regent-street; Keith and Frowse, 48, Chesapeake; and Cocks & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

MEYERBEER'S SONGS,

ENGLISH Version, Edited by FRANK ROMER, are now published by Campbell, Ransford, and Co., British and Foreign Musical Presentation Library, 56, New Bond Street.

DIATONIC FLUTE.

BY ROYAL LETTERS PATENT.

THIS Instrument retains the old system of fingering. It is exclusively used by Mr. Richardson; Mr. Pratten (first flute at the Royal Italian Opera); Mr. Schmidt; &c.; in the Provinces by Mr. Nicholson, Leicester; Mr. Percival, Liverpool; Mr. Creed Royal, Manchester; Mr. Sykes, Leeds; Mr. Jackson, Hull; Messrs. Coram and Sparks, Bristol; Mr. Kyle, New York; &c.

Description of this Flute forwarded free. Manufactory, 135, Fleet-street. A. SICCAMA, Patente.

PUBLISHED AT THE ABOVE ADDRESS. Price 5s. each.

- | | | |
|--|-----|----------------|
| Grand Variations on the "Russian Hymn," with Pianoforte accompaniment | ... | J. Richardson. |
| Grand Variations on "Coming thro' the Rye," and "Jock o' Haseledean," with ditto | ... | R. S. Pratten. |
| New Grand Capriccio, with ditto | ... | S. Percival. |
| Fantasia on an Air of "Gustave," with ditto | ... | Creed Royal. |
| Theory of the Patent Diatonic Flute | ... | A. Siccama. |

MESSRS. COCKS' NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

CHURCH MUSIC.

Just Published.

A COLLECTION OF NINETY-THREE CHANTS, for the use of the United Church of England and Ireland, compiled by John Bishop, of Cheltenham, with copious Introductory Remarks. Vocal score, with organ accompaniment, price 1s. 4d.

EXETER-HALL CONCERTS.—HANDEL'S ORATORIOS,

as performed at these concerts, large folio size, to admit of four or five persons reading from one copy, collated with the author's own manuscripts in her Majesty's library, full Vocal Score, with Pianoforte or Organ Accompaniment. These unrivalled editions, by John Bishop, of Cheltenham, are on sale as follows:—"The Messiah," cloth boards, 15s.; "Israel in Egypt," 15s.; "Samson," 15s.; "Judas Maccabeus," 15s.; "Dettingen Te Deum," 12s.; the four "Coronation Anthems," 12s.; "Utrecht Te Deum," 12s.; "Utrecht Jubilate," 10s. 6d. Also, Haydn's "Seasons," 21s., and his "Creation," 15s.; Handel's "Serenata," "Acis and Galatea," 12s. Also Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," 12s.; and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," 12s. Large folio Editions of the above, for the Pianoforte, without words, by Czerny. Also Boyce's collection of Cathedral Music, edited by J. Warren, three vols., large folio, 26 6s.

HAMILTON'S MODERN INSTRUCTIONS for the PIANO-

FORTE, fingered by CHARLES CZERNY, twenty-second edition, large music folio, Four Shillings. This is the twenty-second edition, and a cheaper or more useful work was never published. Valuable as it has hitherto been to preceptors and students, the present issue is an improvement even upon the former ones, and such is the demand for it that the sale, we understand, now reaches the large number of five hundred copies monthly. It is complete in every point, and so simple and well arranged that a child might become proficient by attending to its directions. The exercises commence with standard melodies, and gradually go on increasing in brilliancy until the most sparkling music of modern composers is accomplished without difficulty. We are not at all surprised that the work should have become so popular, considering its merits and cheapness.—Vide North Wales Chronicle, April 12.

NEW MUSIC.—Just published, a CATALOGUE of NEW

VOCAL and INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC, being Part IX. of the General Catalogue of Musical works published by Messrs ROBERT COCKS and CO. To be had gratis, and postage free, upon application to the publisher, 6, New Burlington Street, London.—Messrs. Cocks and Co. are now selling their elegant pianos at 21 guineas and upwards—list of prices gratis, and postage free.—N.B. Glover's Great Globe Quadrilles, 3s. and 4s. each. Cocks' Musical Miscellany is published monthly, 2 pence each. Stamped 3 pence.

Just Published,

PORTRAIT OF HERR ERNST PAUER,

Price 5s.

Schott & Co., 89, St. James's-street.

THE LATE PIO CIANCHETTINI.

THIS distinguished Musician having left an only Child quite unprovided for, Eight Years of Age, a few friends of his late father are desirous of placing him in an institution, where his future maintenance and education will be provided for, they therefore respectfully solicit Subscriptions for this purpose, which will be received at Cheltenham by Mr. Hector Caffery, Montpellier-st.; Messrs. Hale and Son, Promenade House; Mr. Finlayson, Colonnade; Mr. Woodward, Promenade Villas; and at the Libraries of G. Williams and H. Davies; and in London by Messrs. Broadwood and Sons; Messrs. Addison and Hollier; Messrs. D'Almaine and Co.; Messrs. Boosey and Co.; Messrs. Cramer and Co.; Messrs. Collard and Collard; Messrs. Cocks and Co.; Messrs. Jullien and Co.; Messrs. Chappell and Co.; Messrs. Wessel and Co.; Messrs. Duff and Hodgson; Messrs. Kirkman and Son; and Messrs. Willis.

CURES FOR THE UNCURED!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—Cure of a Bad Leg of more than sixty years' standing.—Mr. Barker, of No. 5, Graham's Place, Drypool, near Hull, had ulcers on his leg from the age of 16 until upwards of 80, and although for many years he had sought the first advice in the country, nothing was found to cure them. He often suffered excruciating pain for long periods together, which incapacitated him from attending to his business. He had given up all hopes of getting a cure, when at last he was persuaded to try Holloway's Pills and Ointment, which he did, and however wonderful it may appear, the leg was thoroughly healed by their means, and by continuing to use the Pills alone after his leg was well, he has become in health so hale and hearty as now to be more active than most men of fifty. N.B.—The truth of this extraordinary statement can be vouched for by Mr. J. C. Reinhardt, 22, Market Place, Hull. Feb. 20th, 1850.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in the following cases:—

Bad Legs	Coco Bay	Contracted and Stiff Joints	Lumbago	Scurvy
Bad Breasts	Chiego-foot	Elephantiasis	Rheumatism	Sore-heads
Burns	Chilblains	Fistulas	Scalds	Tumours
Bunions	Chapped hands	Gout	Sore Nipples	Ulcers
Bite of Mosquitoes	Corns (Soft)	Glandular Swellings	Sore-throats	Wounds toes and Sand.	Cancers	Skin-diseases	Yaws

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar), London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World. In Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1/4, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1851.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF
HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY THE QUEEN,
AND HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE ALBERT.

THE ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-EIGHTH FESTIVAL
OF WORCESTER, HEREFORD, AND GLOUCESTER,
FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF CLERGYMEN IN THE THREE DIOCESES,

WILL BE HELD

ON TUESDAY, WEDNESDAY, THURSDAY, AND FRIDAY,

THE 26TH, 27TH, 28TH, AND 29TH OF AUGUST,

IN THE NAVE OF THE CATHEDRAL AND IN THE COLLEGE HALL, WORCESTER.

President.

THE RIGHT REVEREND THE LORD BISHOP OF WORCESTER.

Principal Vocal Performers.

MADAME CASTELLAN,

MISS BIRCH,

MISS DOLBY,

MISS WILLIAMS,

AND

MADLE. SOPHIE CRUVELLI.

MR. SIMS REEVES,

MR. LOCKEY,

MR. MACHIN,

AND

HERR FORMES.

Principal Instrumental Performers.

LEADER—MR. H. BLAGROVE.

MESSRS. WATKINS, HILL, LUCAS, HOWELL, HATTON, SEVERN, CARD, NICHOLSON, WILLIAMS, BAUMANN,
C. HARPER, T. HARPER, HEALY, SMITHIES, ANDRE, CHIPP, &c. &c.

ORGAN—MR. AMOTT.

PIANO FORTE—MR. G. TOWNSHEND SMITH.

CONDUCTOR—MR. DONE.

The BAND has been selected with the greatest care from the Orchestras of Her Majesty's Theatre, the Royal Italian Opera, and the Ancient and Philharmonic Concerts.

The Choral Department has been selected from the London, Liverpool, Birmingham, Worcester, and Gloucester Choral Societies.

And the entire Orchestra will comprise Three Hundred Performers.

ON TUESDAY MORNING, AUGUST 26th, AT THE CATHEDRAL,
A SERMON WILL BE PREACHED BY THE REV. E. H. CRADOCK, M.A., CANON OF THE CATHEDRAL.

PRECES AND RESPONSES ... Tallis. VENITE.—GRAND CHANT. PSALMS—CHANT ... Rev. W. H. Havergal.

GRAND DETTINGEN TE DEUM.—Handel. Principal Singers—Miss Dolby, Miss Williams, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Machin.

JUBILATE.—Handel. Principal Singers—Miss Williams, Miss Dolby, and Mr. Machin.

AFTER THIRD COLLECT.—ANTHEM, "In that day."—Dr. Elvey. The Soli parts by the CATHEDRAL CHOIR.

BEFORE SERMON—Ps. xviii., (o.v.) AFTER SERMON—ANTHEM, "When Israel out of Egypt came." (cxiv. Ps.—Mendelssohn.)

ON WEDNESDAY MORNING AUGUST 27th,

ELIJAH.—Mendelssohn.

ON THURSDAY MORNING, AUGUST 28th,

SAMSON,—Handel. With selections from the CREATION.

PART II.

THE LAST JUDGMENT.—Spohr.

ON FRIDAY MORNING, AUGUST 29th,

THE MESSIAH.

FIRST CONCERT TUESDAY EVENING, AUGUST 26th,

THE FIRST WALPURGIS NIGHT. With a Miscellaneous Selection.

SECOND CONCERT, WEDNESDAY EVENING, AUGUST 27th.

Selections from JESSONDA. FRIDOLIN, a Cantata, &c.

THIRD CONCERT, THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 28th.

Selection from EURYANTHE—Weber, &c.

PRICES OF ADMISSION.—ON TUESDAY MORNING: Nave 5s.; Western Gallery 2s. 6d.; Aisles, 1s. ON WEDNESDAY, THURSDAY, and FRIDAY MORNINGS, Nave, 15s.; Western Gallery, 7s. 6d.; Aisles 5s. CONCERT TICKETS: Floor of the Hall, 10s. 6d. Gallery, 5s.

TICKETS FOR ALL THE PERFORMANCES, £3 EACH,—NOT TRANSFERABLE.

* To prevent confusion, all Persons are required to provide themselves with Tickets. No money will be taken at the Doors.

Tickets and Books of the Performances will be sold at DEIGHTON'S Library, 53, HIGH-ST.; STRATFORD'S Library, Cross, and Music Saloon
High-street; and at Messrs. EATON and SONS, College-street; and at the principal Stations on the Bristol and Birmingham Railway.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

MDLLE. SOFIE CRUVELLI.—NORMA.

IT is respectfully announced that this evening, SATURDAY July 26, will be presented Bellini's celebrated opera,

NORMA.

Norma	MDlle. SOFIE CRUVELLI.
Adalgisa	Mdme. GIULIANI.
Pollione	Signor PARDINI.
Flavio	Signor MERCURIALI.

AND

Oroveso	Signor LABLACHE.
---------	-----	-----	-----	-----	------------------

To conclude with the admired divertissement,

LES GRACES.

Introducing the celebrated Pas de Trois. Euphrosyne, Mdlle. Carolina Rosati; Thalia, Mdlle. Marie Taglioni; Eglia, Mdlle. Amalia Ferraris; assisted by Mdles. Kohlenberg, Rosa, Esper, Julien, Lamoureux, Soto, Dantonis, Esther, Pascuales, Allegrini, Soldanaky, Emma, Eliza, Levinia, Beale, and the ladies of the corps de ballet. The opera to commence at 8 o'clock. Applications for boxes, stalls, and tickets to be made at the box-office of the theatre.

On Tuesday next, (for the first time this season) Donizetti's opera,

LINDA DI CHAMOUNI.

Linda, MDLLE. SOFIE CRUVELLI

(Her first appearance in that character.)

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—FRIDAY NEXT, AUGUST

1st, Haydn's Creation. Vocalists—Madame Clara Novello, Mr. Sims Reeves and Herr Formes. The Orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets 3s.; reserved, 5s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter Hall, or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross.

EASY PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

CONCERTS DE FAMILLE. SIX AMUSEMENTS POUR

LE PIANO, par F. Prayger.

- No. 1. Io son ricco.
- " 2. Trab, Trab.
- " 3. Il segreto per esser felice.
- " 4. Scenes that are brightest.
- " 5. Stay fleeting time.
- " 6. Quando il destino.
- " 7. Chant des croates.

Price 1s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

NEW DUETS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

THALBERG	...	Beatrice di Tenda
ROSELLEN	...	Deux Melodies de Donizetti, 1 and 2.
ROSELLEN	...	Val D'andorre.
WOLFF	...	Valse Original.
WOLFF	...	Beatrice di Tenda.
SILAS	...	La Primavera, Bagatelle.
KALLIWODA	...	Invitation à la danse.
OSBORNE	...	Pluie de Perles
SCHULTZ	...	Duo L'espagnola.
BEYER	...	Krieger's Lust March.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent-street.

BLUMENTHAL'S LAST WORKS.

Violette	3s. 6d.
Rose	3s. 6d.
Primavera	4s. 6d.
March Militaire	3s. 6d.
Nocturne Impromptu	3s. 6d.
Consolation	4s. 6d.
Trois Mazurkas, Set 3	4s. 6d.
Scène de Ballet	4s. 6d.

Cramer, Beale, and Co. 201, Regent-street.

TO THE MUSICAL PROFESSION.A FIRST RATE MUSICAL PROFESSIONAL BUSINESS

to be Disposed of, in a delightful and fashionable Watering place. Any Gentleman who may be desirous of stepping into a comfortable and profitable business as a Teacher of the Pianoforte and Singing can do so for the sum of £150, bringing in an income of £400 to £500 per annum. He must be a good performer on the Pianoforte. Address, X. Y. Z., care of Myers and Co., Printers, 22, Tavistock-street, Covent Garden. The reason the advertiser wishes to dispose of his practice is because he wishes to go on the Continent.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

SUBSCRIPTION NIGHT—MONDAY, JULY 28.

IN compliance with the general wish of the Subscribers, a SUBSCRIPTION NIGHT will be given on MONDAY, July 28, in lieu of the last Saturday of the Subscription (viz., Saturday, September 13). All Ivories and Tickets, therefore, for Saturday, September 13, will be available for Monday.

On MONDAY, July 28, will be performed Meyerbeer's Grand Opera,

LE PROPHETE.

The principal characters by Madame Viardot, Madame Castellan, Herr Formes, Signor Tagliafico, Signor Mei, Signor Soldi, Signor Stigelli, Signor Polonini, and Signor Mario.

Composer, Director of the Music and Conductor, Mr. COSTA.

Applications for Boxes, Tickets, and Stalls to be made at the Box Office of the Theatre; and at Messrs. Cramer, Beale, and Co.; Messrs. Bailey and Moon, and Messrs. Julien & Co.'s, Regent-street; Mr. James, St. James's-street; Mr. Mitchell's, Mr. Hookham, Messrs. Ebers and Co., and Mr. R. W. Olivier, Old Bond-street; Mr. Allcroft's, Messrs. Andrews and Co., Messrs. Leader and Cocks, Mr. Hammond, Mr. Chappell, Mr. Case, Messrs. Campbell, Ransford and Co., Mr. C. Olivier, New Bond-street; Mr. Dyte, Strand; Mrs. Ryan, Orchard-street; and at Messrs. Keith, Prowse, and Co., Cheapside.

FIRST NIGHT OF LA GAZZA LADRA.

On TUESDAY NEXT, JULY 29th, will be performed (for the first time this season) ROSSINI'S favourite Opera,

LA GAZZA LADRA.

Ninetta	Madame GRISI.
Lucia	Mdlle. COTTI.
Pippo	Mdlle. ANGRI.
Fernando	Signor TAMBURINI.
Giannetto	Signor CIAFFELI.
					(His first appearance in that character.)
Fabrizio	Signor TAGLIAFICO.
Isacco	Signor STIGELLI.
Giorgia	Signor POLONINI.
Podesta	Signor BONCONI.

GRAND EXTRA NIGHT.—LUCREZIA BORGIA,
SCENE FROM LA PROVA D'UN OPERA SERIA,—GRAND
ACT OF ROBERTO IL DIAVOLO.

Grisi, Angri, Castellan and Viardot, Mario, Tamberlik, Tamburini, Formes, and Ronconi.

On THURSDAY NEXT, JULY 31st, a Grand Combined Entertainment will be given; commencing with DONIZETTI'S Opera,

LUCREZIA BORGIA.

Lucrezia	Madame GRISI.
Maffio Orsini	Mdlle. ANGRI.
Alfonso	Signor RONCONI.
					(His first appearance in that character in England.)
Don Gasella	Signor ROMMI.
Rustighello	Signor SOLDI.
Gubetta	Signor TAGLIAFICO.
Astolfo	Signor POLONINI.
Vitelozzo	Signor MEI.
Gennaro	Signor MARIO.

The Grand Chorus of Masks in the Prologue will be accompanied by a Military Band in addition to the Orchestra, the principal Vocal Parts being sung by Signori Rommi, Mei, Soldi, Polonini, Tagliafico, and Mdlle. Angri.

After which the celebrated comic scene from

LA PROVA D'UN OPERA SERIA,

By Madame Viardot and Signor Tamburini.

To conclude with the grand act of Meyerbeer's opera,

ROBERTO IL DIAVOLO.

Including the duet by Signor Stigelli and Herr Formes, the duet by Herr Formes and Madame Castellan, the duet by Signor Tamberlik and Herr Formes, the grand trio by Madame Castellan, Herr Formes, and Signor Tamberlik, and the celebrated scene of the Nuns, by Mdlle. Louise Taglioni and the Corps de Ballet in the grand Cloister Scene.

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor, Mr. COSTA.

Stalls, Boxes, and Tickets for Monday, Tuesday, and Thursday, may be secured at the Theatre, and of the principal librarians and music-sellers.

Now ready, 8vo., 2s. 6d.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY;

A SKETCH of his Life and Works. By JULES BENEDICT.
John Murray, Albemarle Street.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Strand Villas, Strand, Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Furkes, Dean Street, 8th; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, July 26, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra), payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 31.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 2, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

FORMES.

(From the Athenæum.)

"Herr Formes is alike unfinished and undevout in sacred music. After having shown promises of progress, we trust that he is not going to stop short."

(It is rumoured that Herr Formes has declined to play the principal bass part in M. Gounod's Sappho.—ED. M. W.)

A NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

This untiring question—now resumed at the eleventh hour by our correspondent "Philo-Musica"—merits the attention of all who interest themselves in the welfare of our native musicians. We need scarcely say that the columns of the Musical World are open to all who may desire (at reasonable length) to communicate their ideas on the subject. In a few weeks we shall be less crowded with Operatic and other notices, indispensable at this busy time of the year; and we trust that the autumn recess will be employed in such a manner as to lay the basis of some practicable scheme for the winter. That we are entirely favourable to the plan of a national lyric establishment, must be well known to all who pay us the compliment of reading the Musical World. What little influence we possess is placed at the disposal of those who have more time, if not more zeal, to devote to the cause than ourselves. For the present we can do no more than recommend our subscribers to peruse and give due consideration to the letters of "Philo-Musica."

ALBONI'S MARIA.

During Alboni's recent engagement at Madrid, no character which she sustained made so great a sensation as that of Maria in the Figlia del Reggimento. We can well believe that the fair Marietta, with her plump cheeks and saucy face, would look the devoted vivandiere to perfection. We can well also believe that she would act the part with the appropriate combination of jollity and sprightliness. About her singing we can believe anything—except that she should not sing well; that we could never believe.

Be it as it may, the Daughter of the Regiment at Madrid, became the Daughter of the Spanish Public, the charming Marietta was adopted by the Hidalgos, and the Donas, as a child of their own; and the enthusiasm of their love rivalled the ardour of their chivalrous ages. That in London the result would be similar, the triumph as complete, the affection for the buxom vivandiere as genuine, spontaneous, and unanimous, we cannot doubt for one instant. Whatever Alboni proffers is accepted by her English admirers, without looking for the stamp. They are aware that her promises are as good as the Bank's, and her notes more precious than gold. The bruit of her performance of Maria has already gone abroad, and we have reason to presume that she is pledged, to the director of Her Majesty's Theatre, to make it one of her series of impersonations, during her present short engagement.

May the pledge be fulfilled, and the subscribers and the public have a fresh occasion to appreciate and applaud the exquisite talent of the Koh-i-noor of song. The operas are just now in want of a "furore," as the term is, notwithstanding the heat of the weather; and this very remarkable season of 1851 should not be allowed to pass into a remembrance, without one more great stroke of novelty to impress it on the memory for ever. We have had Fidelio; and tears have been shed—tears of pity and sympathy. Why not Maria, for tears again—tears of laughter and delight? Melpomene and Thalia would both be propitiated, and the memory have two phases to dwell upon—matter for contemplation in its saddest and its merriest moods.

BALFE'S BENEFIT.

After the extreme labour of the present heavy season, which Balfé has undertaken zealously, and without a murmur, the subscribers to the opera, and the public in general, will not be surprised to find the name of the popular composer announced for a benefit. If not surprised, however, they will be pleased; and we have little doubt that the house will be a bumper, and the benefit a real benefit to the beneficiaire.

Of course the programme is a good one. The feature, however, which deserves particular mention, is the opera of Les Quatre Fils Aymon, originally composed for the Opera Comique, in Paris, and since performed, with success, in most of the principal towns of Germany, France, and Belgium—not to speak of London, where its execution, at the Princess's Theatre, under the direction of the composer, cannot have been forgotten. An Italian version of this opera, under the title of I Quattro Fratelli, will be the chief point at Mr. Balfé's benefit; and the numerous admirers of his music will not be sorry to have occasion to welcome him, for the second time, in the arena of the Italian Opera.

Some are of opinion that Falstaff, having being composed for Her Majesty's Theatre, under the reign of Mr. Laporte should have been presented on this occasion. We are not of that opinion; since, allowing Falstaff all its undoubted merits, we are anxious to hear Les Quatre Fils Aymon once again. Most of the principal artists of the establishment are announced in the cast; and they will best demonstrate the respect they entertain for their chef d'orchestre by bestowing all possible pains towards the realisation of a perfect ensemble. The date of the benefit is Monday, August 11.

CRUVELLI'S LINDA.

Linda di Chamouni is unworthy of Sophie Cruvelli. The sentiment is of the thinnest and most artificial French; the passion flummery. The characters that surround Linda are miserable commonplaces, or senseless abstractions. A more tawdry set of nonentities were never sent out from the workshop of the Minerva Press. Moreover, they are all positive bores—from the Marquis to the Prefect. Nobody cares a straw for any of them. The music of Donizetti does not help to elevate the drama, although the opera was composed for the Germans. To show his contempt for the Teutonic judgment, Donizetti has not introduced a single concerted piece of length and importance into the score. Yet the Germans are apt to boast of Linda, as a compliment to their nation, on the part of the popular author of Lucia. They pretend to find a greater amount of depth in it than in his other operas; and this, they presume, was the result of a nervous apprehension in the mind of Donizetti, that what might do for the Italians, and the French, and the English, and the Spanish, and the Americans, would not do for the Germans. Poor souls! They knew very little of Donizetti, who did not value their opinion at a pinch of snuff—as a proof of which, he prepared Linda di Chamouni, his weakest opera, and served it up for their especial edification. Donizetti judged the Viennese better than the Viennese judged Donizetti. The Viennese felt assured that Donizetti would come before their tribunal with fear and trembling. Donizetti felt assured that the Viennese were more conceited than profound. The Viennese reckoned without the host. Donizetti wrote a feeble opera, pocketed the money, and added a cubit to his Germanic stature.

All the prima donnas of Europe have played Linda, except a few of the wise ones. It is the easiest part to get applause, and the hardest to escape vulgarity. Persiani is one model, Tadolini the other, from whom the general tribe of Lindas have derived their inspirations. Sophie Cruvelli, however, with her accustomed independence and originality, has not taken a hint from either of them. She has equally avoided Madame Sontag—a mixture of the two—creating a Linda of her own, interesting enough to make the opera not only endurable but pleasant, and sufficiently artistic to be studied by some who already imagine themselves perfect. In the first scenes, before clouds have begun to lower over the fortunes of Linda, Cruvelli imparts to the character of the young village maiden all its joyousness and bounding life, without that obtrusive boldness which rendered Tadolini's impersonation disagreeable. In the second act—where Antonio's curse and Linda's despair are the great incidents—we will not do Cruvelli the injustice to compare her performance with that of any other artist whom we have seen in the character. The truth is, this dramatic situation has never been filled out before. The last scene—in which the derangement and gradual restoration to sense of the heroine are the points—was equally unique, and superior to any previous attempt in the character.

Of Cruvelli's singing we have written so much, and so often, that to say her reading and execution of the music of Linda, on the present occasion, was in all respects worthy of her, is enough to convey the admiration to which we consider it entitled. Her "Luce di quest' anima," is not Persiani's, nor Tadolini's, nor Sontag's, nor Frezzolini's, but her own—Sophie Cruvelli's—as good as any, and in some respects better than most.

Nevertheless, in spite of this unqualified opinion of the merits of Cruvelli's Linda, we repeat that the part is unworthy of her. Her talent is of too poetical a nature to be thrown away upon such vapid stuff. To elevate Linda up to Sophie Cruvelli is beyond the power even of Sophie Cruvelli. We concur most heartily with the following observations, extracted from the notice of the Morning Chronicle:—

"Linda is no part for Mademoiselle Cruvelli. She is far too much in earnest to make triumphs out of trifles. She took the butterfly character in hand with a vigorous determination: applied herself conscientiously to the music, as if such music was meant to be treated conscientiously; and sought to develop passion where the composer had provided nothing but sentiment. Her energy was most praiseworthy, her acting most intellectual; but what could be done with such material?—the impassioned utterances of Cruvelli were simply felt to be lavished upon an unworthy theme. It is not in such parts that the young artist will sustain and extend her enviable reputation. We were delighted with her fervour, with her brilliant vocalisation, with her ardent and energetic acting; but we could not help feeling that in Bellini's real tragedy, or Mozart's real comedy, she would have been far better placed than in the hybrid sentimentalities—neither a laugh nor a cry—of Linda di Chamouni. The audience obviously shared this feeling, and the reiterated applause and repeated 'calls' were homage, and deserved homage, not to Linda di Chamouni, but to Sophie Cruvelli."

We might say more, but it would be to little purpose. Suffice it, every new part Cruvelli plays makes her hold on the affections of the English public the stronger. The more Fidelios and Normas, and the less Elviras and Lindas, however, the better.

As appendix to the above, we may insert some extracts from the articles of our contemporaries.

(From the Morning Post.)

"Madlle. Sofie Cruvelli achieved a new and brilliant success as the heroine of Donizetti's Linda di Chamouni. Every phase of the character of Linda was evolved by the gifted artist with perfect truthfulness and beauty. In the opening scene, where the light-hearted village maiden trips stealthily across the grove to meet her lover, and gives vent to her feelings in the pretty air, 'O luce di quest' anima;' in the interview with the Marquis, where, with the dignified power of insulted virtue, the betrayed Linda humbles her insipid and insolent admirer to the dust; in the unexpected meeting with Antonio, the subsequent madness and ultimate return to reason through the influence of the beloved one's voice. Mdlle. Cruvelli was equally faithful to nature. There were, however, moments when the greatness of the occasion caused the divine fire within her to glow with extraordinary intensity; and in no part of the opera were they so frequent as in the great scene with the Marquis to which we have already alluded. Here the impetuous energy which specially characterises her idiosyncrasy, and which, ennobled by her genius, produces the loftiest manifestations of tragic passion, found full scope; and it would be difficult to conceive anything grander, or more exciting, than her delivery of the lines commencing—

"E un tale
Che se mai giunge a scoprire,
Vostre infami, indegne mire
Ne dovrete ben tremar."

or the succeeding passage—

"Troppo omai mi cimentaste,
Ed in tutto voi mancaste."

"The highest praise we can bestow upon Mdlle. Cruvelli's singing throughout the opera is that it was worthy of her acting. She was enthusiastically applauded from first to last, called for after each important piece, and at the conclusion of the second and third acts. Mdlle. Marie Cruvelli, who personated for the first time, Pierotto, made a considerable advance in public favour on this occasion. She sang and acted with much taste and judgment, and was extremely well received."

(From the Times.)

"By her performance of Linda Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli adds one character more to her list of successes. The pretty air, 'O luce di quest' anima,' with which she enters upon the stage, was sung with all that playfulness which is required to denote the lightness of heart in the village maiden not yet involved in the troubles of the world. Her brilliant roulades are thrown off with ease, and she sports gaily with her subject. The intensity with which she represented her despair in the second act, where Linda has to encounter the wrath of her father, was so great, and was so much aided by her expressive countenance, that the audience called for her with enthusiasm as soon as the act-drop had descended. Carlo was played by Mr. Sims Reeves, whose impassioned and eloquent style is well suited to the beautiful duet, 'A consolarmi,' which is, as it were, the pivot of the whole opera, and which depends for its effect on the most violent contrasts of piano and forte. Mademoiselle Marie Cruvelli played Pierotto, and sang the foreboding ballad with much unpretending pathos. The acting of this young lady was remarkably pleasing and unaffected, and her singing declared the artist throughout."

(From the Morning Herald.)

"Cruvelli, who seems anxious to vindicate her claim to versatility, appeared in another new character last night—that of Linda, in Donizetti's opera of that name. There was obviously nothing here in common with Fidelio, Norma, or Elvira, but this clever and original artiste invested the character with a colouring peculiar to herself, and achieved her usual success. Her representation of the unhappy heroine would naturally be the most striking in the parts more immediately dramatic. Thus her interview with her father in the second act, when the latter witnesses her in a position calculated to awaken doubts of her purity and innocence, was delineated with a more significant force than that to which we have been accustomed; while her exemplification of the surprise, affliction, and insanity, consequent upon his sudden malediction, was vividly and picturesquely effective. The return of the poor wanderer to her native village, heartbroken and travelstained, was also depicted with natural feeling, strongly expressed, but without extravagance. The vocalism of Mdlle. Cruvelli wore its customary features. The music of Linda di Chamouni is of a much lighter and less responsible class than any she has yet attempted, and hence the extraordinary powers of execution which belong to her were hardly so apparent as upon former occasions: nevertheless her delivery of the well-known 'O luce di quest' anima' was a brilliant triumph of art. The pretty melody which forms the substance of this popular cavatina was never more broadly rendered; while the florid ornaments of the cabaletta, affording at all times a favourable opportunity for the displays of an ambitious executant, were conceived with unique variety, and executed with boldness and precision. The duet with her lover, 'Da quel ni che incontrai,' and that with the marquis in the second act, may likewise be recorded as efforts of ability. Clear and definite intelligence and uncompromising physical accomplishment were, in short, the characteristics of this assumption, as they have been in other cases; and though the part has but little real pretension in itself, Mademoiselle Cruvelli embodied it with a spirit and elaboration, the precise merit of which the audience seemed fully to appreciate. Marie Cruvelli was the Pierotto, which she sustained for the first time—we may add with considerable credit. Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli was called before the curtain after the second and third acts with great enthusiasm!!"

The next part of Cruvelli, after Balfe's benefit, will be, we understand, Semiramide.

VERDI AND HIS EXPONENTS.

The Morning Post, in its second notice of the performance of Ernani, at Her Majesty's Theatre, persists in attributing the success of the opera and the applause of the audience to the fine acting and singing of Sophie Cruvelli, Sims Reeves, and Coletti:—

"Is not the effect created by the performance of Ernani attributable to the executants? Are not the splendid voice and impassioned style of Mr. Reeves, the beautiful singing of Coletti, and the magnificent performance of Sophie Cruvelli, the real causes of this effect? Certes. The audience are applauding the performers, although they conceive the composer to be the principal object of their enthusiasm. In such applause, then, we could, and did, heartily join, for it was richly merited. The opening air, 'Come rugiada al cespite,' was delivered by Reeves with all that breadth, fervid expression, and physical power, by which his singing is ever honourably distinguished; and the well known 'Ernani involami,' was rendered by Cruvelli in the first style of excellence. Another exquisite performance was that of the duet, 'Tergi il pianto,' by Reeves and Cruvelli. Nothing could be more delightful than the blending of their voices, or more delicately sweet than the expression given to the whole. Signor Coletti's execution of the solo, 'Vieni Meco,' in the second, and 'Oh! Sommo Carlo,' in the finale to the third act, of which we have already spoken, left nothing to be desired; and the applause it elicited was a fitting tribute to the artist, who could make so much out of so little. In the last act the singing and acting of Mr. Reeves and Mdlle. Cruvelli are entitled to the highest eulogy, and to their executive genius alone must be ascribed the vociferous applause which followed the fall of the curtain; although we doubt not that the majority of the audience imagined that Signor Verdi's music was the principal cause of it."

Not being prepared to dispute the point with the critic of the Post, we have allowed him to state his own case.

Even our Sunday cotemporary, the Weekly Dispatch, has caught the prevalent enthusiasm for Sophie Cruvelli. He writes well, too, and reasonably:—

"On Wednesday last, Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli repeated the role of Elvira, in Ernani, which, be it remembered, introduced her to an English audience in 1848; and the occasion was interesting, inasmuch as it enabled us to make a comparison of her present powers with her ability three years ago. At that time we very warmly acknowledged the merit of her performance, which gave such promise of rapid improvement. Her Elvira now is more matured in detail, but its treatment is in all its leading features the same, and exhibits that dramatic power, and that compass and freshness of voice which are at present more justly appreciated than on her first appearance among us. Throughout the boldness and impassioned energy of her acting, and its originality, were powerfully displayed; and in the great scene in the last act, where Ernani is compelled, by the implacable Don Silva, to fulfil his oath, and stab himself, Cruvelli startled her audience by the intensity of her passion."

Our largely circulated camarade, the News of the World, so often confounded with ourselves (by which we feel eminently flattered), wields a still more flaming pen:—

"Verdi's Ernani could have no more fitting representative of the part of Elvira than Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli; whatever amount of energy, fire, and impetuosity Verdi may impart to his music—whether he runs up to E flat in alto, or down to the F nearly three octaves below—Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli has commensurate power and energy to cope with them; and it is immaterial whether the brass peals forth in its extreme power, and that the whole resources of the orchestra are brought to bear simultaneously, as though every instrument were intended to display its individual capabilities at the same moment—the voice of Sophie Cruvelli rises above them all, and, soaring above the instrumental warfare, proves that, however trying Verdi's music may be for singers, that at least there are artistes able to cope with it. The French critics have stamped Cruvelli's Elvira as a great performance—and a very powerful one it certainly is. She gives the part with intense dramatic fire and energy, and brings out the music so as to win the heart of the most enthusiastic admirer of Verdi's music—if such an individual exists out of France, where audiences are more easily taken by storm than in this country—and with whom Verdi's music and its interpreters have charms that are not similarly appreciated in this country."

Thus much for Verdi, and thus much for Sophie Cruvelli, who, in becoming his champion, has rendered him a service which he can hardly repay.

ALBONI.

The Literary Gazette thus apostrophises the return of this superb vocalist to the boards of Her Majesty's Theatre:—

"The return of Alboni, after the absence of one season, was an event of great interest. She selected Cenerentola, the opera in which she first made her debut at this theatre in 1849. The success of Mdlle. Alboni in soprano parts bids fair to sweep away the dogma that a voice cannot be changed from one kind to another, so as to become available effectively for either soprano or contralto. That in her case the power of the lower register has been diminished cannot be denied; still the lower tones are available in addition to the higher, which have been acquired by clever practice. The precise effect of the experiment can hardly be made clear unless we could hear Mdlle. Alboni sing Arsace and Zerlina in the same evening. For our own part, we treasure two events connected with Alboni, marked by delight and astonishment—her first debut in Arsace, when not a breath of fame's trumpet had been blown, and the most ennuyé was startled with a new sensation at the sound of 'In si barbara sciagura'; and her singing of Amina, with all the fioriture of Persiani, at the Birmingham Theatre, in 1849. One more we look forward to, and that is in her Fides in the Prophete, about which we have heard no slight praise. Even Meyerbeer himself has expressed his good opinion of it at Paris; and this would be a test of the highest lyrical qualities. However, a more tasteful masterly singer of the florid style of Rossini, with a more delicate sense of the beauty of the true cantabile, than Alboni we cannot hope to hear. The 'Non piu mesta,' as usual, she sang with infinite grace and elegance, with a feeling of such perfect ease and buoyant freshness that created the greatest delight."

We entirely coincide with our illustrious and literary cotemporary.

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS has left London on a tour through South Wales.

FIDELIO.

(Continued from our last.)

Two lines spoken have a magical effect, not only in separating the quartet from the following duet, but in so completely preparing the hearer for the entirely new feeling this duet expresses, as to annul all the sense of monotony that must otherwise present itself from the close relationship of key and the similarity of tempo between these two movements. Nothing can be more at variance than the dramatic purport of the quartet with that of the piece that succeeds it—nothing could be more true to both than the rendering which our great master has given—yet, from the circumstance of these purely technical points of resemblance, the transcendent merit of the rapturous duet would be weakened in effect but for the few spoken words, which so much influence the impression created by the music, that they might be taken into count as portion of the musical design.

This interchange of exclamations of the new-united lovers—how much, how all does it convey in a few words! "Faithful wife, how hast thou for my sake endured!" and the thrilling reply of Leonore which, however facile of translation and however literally rendered into any other language, can never, out of German, have half the intensity of expression that the sound of the original words conveys, "Nichts, nichts, mein Florestan!" Here is the true heart language; not the flourish of words, the luxuriance of metaphorical figure, but, the concise, epigrammatic utterance of feelings, each word a heartfull, which identifies at once the hearer with the speaker and stops his consciousness to all emotions but those which are thus expressed. So, —an end to all the horrors of the last two years which have been accumulated to an awful climax in the action developed by the last quartet—all memory, all hope, are suspended in the ecstatic feeling of present possession. Leonore and Florestan feel nothing but the rapturous joy of their reunion, and we know nothing but this feeling.

The situation of this duet is one by no means unfamiliar on the lyrical stage—the happy meeting of two faithful lovers who have been separated by adverse fortune through the agency of melodramatic incidents. Several composers have in various styles sought to give expression to the rapturous outpouring of enthusiastic delight that we can all feel to be natural at such a situation; but the very incomplete approaches to success of the best of those endeavours that have come within our experience, prove how far more easy it is to suppose such a situation than to realise the expression of it. It would be from the purpose to adduce instances of what we esteem failure in the attempts to embody the feeling here supposed in dramatic music; it is all-sufficient to say that, so far as our powers of appreciation enable us to judge his treatment of the subject, we scruple not to declare Beethoven's rendering of it, in the duet under notice, entirely successful; so entirely successful as to stand aloof from all comparison with the various conceptions of other composers, and to be, in itself and of itself, a work of beauty, to that extent perfect, according at least to our vague ideas of perfection, that we make no exception in our unqualified eulogy of its merits. Wildly passionate, enthusiastic, impetuous, it fulfils all we can conceive in music (and we can conceive, or, as better said, suppose more in music than in any other art) of the expression of rapturous, unrestrained, unpremeditated joy, the unalloyed emotion of the heart from which, as we suppose, the capacity for regret has died out for ever. Thus much for the expression intended and so admirably fulfilled by the composer; the technical detail is subject to the most strict and at once the most simple principles of musical analysis. There is a chief subject which comes to a formal full close in G. Proceeding directly to the dominant of D, there is now a somewhat protracted passage previous to the introduction of a second subject in this, the fifth of the original key. A codetta, growing more or less out of this latter, brings us to the end of what, in symphony phrase, we may term the first part of the movement. We have then a short development of the chief subject, an admirably-contrived and wholly unexpected return to the original key, and a recapitulation of the first part, both subjects being now greatly condensed, and the second subject, or, at least, what portion of it is again employed, being given now in the original key of the movement. We cannot dismiss a piece that so wholly pleases us as does this short duet with making merely a dry catalogue of the outlines of its plan, and—though we know that all who can sympathise with the composer must entirely feel his intentions, and any, if such there be, who cannot so sympathise and so feel, are not likely to be excited to a feeling which is not intuitively natural to them by argument that appeals to the judgment alone, leaving the emotions untouched—we cannot forego the pleasure of expatiating to some short length upon the points of particular suggestiveness that especially strike us in this movement. The excited feelings to be expressed are the highest, the most refined, the most ideal of human emotions: the duty of the poet, therefore, through whatever medium, words, or forms, or sounds he express himself, is not to exalt, to refine upon, to idealise his subject in this as it is in almost every other situation that exercises the highest powers of imagination, but to elevate, to refine, to idealise his art by the adequate treatment of the subject; and the nearer his expression approach to truthfulness the better will this sacred duty of the poet be fulfilled. It is the truthful expression of this very unique duet that most of all moves us, more than the particular beauty of the melody, the richness or peculiarity of the harmony, or the effect of the instrumentation; and it is this truthfulness of expression that in our appreciation gives this duet so very distinguished a value. The passion of joy, unqualified and uncontrolled, is that in the expression of which music has been less frequently than with any other passion successful, and we are not disposed to give to either of the other imaginative arts a higher grade in the scale of success in this particular than to that of which it is our business to cultivate and our pleasure to enjoy the fruits. Gaiety has found many an exponent in all the schools of music; jollity, though perhaps less numerous, certainly not less successful interpreters; calm content, the cold water comfort of such as yield their impulse to their reason, and can measure illimitable ecstasy by the contracted confines of their passionless desire, finds expression in the conventional conversations of our daily intercourse, and however it may be idealised by the poet or the philosopher, it remains but a didactic piece of dulness at the best; but of joy, the pure passion that knows no bounds yet bounds all knowledge, we can in music, and we might, in either of the other arts, count the examples of truthful representation. The last movement of Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor, the conclusion of the overture to Oberon, will illustrate our meaning, and we think fully justify our assertion. Let us examine how this is fulfilled in the piece under notice. We feel the rapid and violent pulsations of the surcharged heart in the opening phrase that closes like the respiration of a long-drawn breath that has diluted the bosom with a pang of pleasure. The many repetitions of this enhance the intensity of its expression, and the phrase that follows it continues the same feeling under a somewhat gentler but not less rapturous phase. We may suppose in the two bars of adagio the characters suffused in tears of joy, the dew-drops of the heart, at the rapture they feel when they name the sorrows they have passed, their anguish each for other, not with regret but in exultation. The phrase that follows next renews the first excitement, seemingly to dash all moisture from the eyes, as though the symbol of sorrow, borne as joy's proudest trophy, were unworthy of this dimless sunshine of the heart since all untrue to it. Augmented by degrees to the utmost of enthusiastic ecstasy, the music attains the climax of passionate expression. The power of the human heart to feel, of the poet's art to embody feeling, seems to have reached its limit when the channel of emotion breaks into a new current; the unisonous passage in the orchestra that leads to the dominant of D conveys no less than all that has preceded it—the exultant feeling of the characters, but with an entirely new colouring. Then comes the loving, tender, coaxing fondness of these two commingled souls,—she, repeating with ever growing rapture, "Thou again in my arms!" the only and the whole knowledge that fills her consciousness; he, thanking Heaven for its great mercy, shows that his heart pours its emotions of more than gratitude all upon Leonore as Heaven's agent for his happiness. The last six bars growing out of this beautiful sequence, which introduce what we have spoken of as the dominant subject, form another, perhaps even still more impassioned climax than the last. How tranquilly pure is the next passage in which the lovers mutually seek, in the terms of religious devotion, an escape for those overflowing raptures in each other for which they vainly strive to find the true expression. Then the old enthusiasm renews itself in all its fervour, when they proclaim exultingly that they press each other to their breast; most admirably is here conceived the exciting motion of the accompaniment, which enhances to the utmost the intensity of the vocal phrases. More and more beautiful is the passage we have distinguished as the codetta that brings us to the conclusion of the first part, with the transient recurrence to the key of G, and its infinity of touching melody and irresistible expression. How doatingly seem they here to revel in the recollection of those bright spots in their mutual happiness, to recal which in memory is to live again the whole delight of their original enjoyment! Their ejaculations of joyous expressions, "Tis thou!" "Tis I!" "Oh heavenly rapture!" lose themselves at last in the fond repetitions of each other's names, the dearest exclamation, because the all-comprising, that they can utter; and oh how lovingly do they linger upon this luxury of sound, so very dear to speak, so dearer far to hear from the lips of the one most dear! The transition to A major has wonderful brightness. The repetition of the same phrase in the minor of the same tonic, conveys that keen sense of joy which is so kindred-close to pain as to flutter in our anxious grasp, seemingly insusceptible of retention. Then comes the culminating point of the whole duet, the wonderful manner of the return to the subject in the original key. The ascent by semitones to the third in B, with the continual iteration of the prominent phrase of the subject, the exciting suspense of the long prolongation of this interval, and the transcendent power of the G bass, which establishes the original key, produce an effect that only the very highest genius could conceive, that only the most consummate art could accomplish. The recapitulation of the chief phrases of the first part takes nothing from their intensity of meaning; and the few bars of concluding coda for the voices suggests the exhaustion of the very capacity of delight in a delirium of ecstasy. The concluding symphony conveys the passing away of the sense even of our present happiness in the dreamy irreality of unconscious thought, and so is fulfilled a perfect masterpiece of poetical expression that has scarcely a parallel, and can never be surpassed. We descend, perhaps, to littleness in remarking upon what is still far from unimportant, as an indication of the composer's conception of his subject, and a clue, if any be wanting, to the intention in his treatment of it, or at least a confirmation of our interpreting of this, and we shall, therefore, not suppose ourselves to derogate in the least from the unqualified beauty of the design in particularising its minutest details. That to which we would call attention is the very singular treatment of the words, and unjustifiable except by the result, which is sufficient to justify any and everything. The first line of the text,

"O namenlose freude, O nameless joy," is given not once, but repeatedly.

"O namen, namenlose freude," as though one should say in English "O name, nameless joy," which, if we mistake not, your strict grammarian would set down as indefensible, unmitigable nonsense. May we not be allowed, however, to regard it not merely as the prolongation of the metre for the convenience of the musical phrase, but as an intentional fondling with the syllables to signify a state of utter abstraction from all things tangible by the rules of reason, a forgetfulness, in the joyous transport of the moment, of the very terms in which to express it. This at least justifies that we speak of the delirium of ecstasy, and that Florestan, when summing up his whole power of fondest endearment in calling his wife again and again by the superlative of all love epithets, her own name, extends the title of tenderness to "Eleonore," with a note prefixed to the phrase, for the extra syllable shows with what toying earnestness of trifling, with what playful profundity of pleasure our hero is intended as giving himself up in reckless but wrongless abandonment to the always varying impulse of the ever-suggestive moment.

Here ends the dramatic action of the opera, and here is consummated the ceaselessly glowing intensity of the music, which to this point from the very commencement has ever increased and increased in interest and has now reached its climax. The wonder is now, not what new incident can rise to excite us in the action of the drama or to give fresh scope for the display of passionate expression for which the whole work is so obviously conspicuous, since the action is evidently complete, and the musical feeling that has progressed with the action can be no further developed, but what can be now done that will not pall upon the attention, which had been already excited to the utmost, and come as a platitude after the wondrous struggle for mastery between imagination and art, in which both win, that has been concluded in the last duet so worthy of the whole. This consideration, perhaps, makes what is to follow the most interesting portion of the whole opera, and it is decidedly not the least beautiful. G. A. M.

(To be continued.)

Reviews of Music.

"CECILIA"—Nocturne pour le Pianoforte.—W. E. JARRETT.—Weasel and Co.

Mr. Jarrett appears completely to have caught the nocturno tone. His "Nocturne" is by no means the most inelegant specimen of that class of pianoforte writing which has come under our notice; and though its peculiarity of form places strong originality out of the question, it is neither a copy from Chopin, from Dohler, from Henselt, from Field, nor from Thalberg, nor, indeed, from any of the Nocturno-wrights; but it is as much its author's own as if it were not a nocturno; that is, if a nocturno can be anybody's, which is doubtful. There is a certain flow of melody—nocturno melody—and a certain ease and grace in the arrangement of this flow of melody, which betokens solid acquirement and an unshackled grasp of the key-board, either and both of which are distinctions not to be held lightly. To produce a nocturno in 1851 which shall not be absolutely the pale shadow of five hundred others, is a feat of moment. Mr. Jarrett has achieved this feat, as may be gathered from what we have already adduced in consideration and in favour of his nocturno, which is in D, and which gives grateful exercise to the right hand and to the left, and which may be practised with advantage by those who would excel in the school of execution to which it essentially belongs—a school more modern than mischievous, more graceful than solid; nevertheless, a school which, if it permit its disciples to spend a larger portion of the day in the play-ground than in the study, at least does not lead them into hurtful gambols or injurious slothfulness. Mechanism is a great matter, and must not be despised. A school which tends to improve, if not to perfect that essential department of art, is at least entitled to respect; and though we never heard a nocturno that afforded us any strong musical sensation, with the exception of one by Mendelssohn in A Midsummer Night's Dream—which, if Chopin's be nocturnos, is not a nocturno—we have no disregard, but on the contrary, an indulgent consideration for nocturnos in general, and have, therefore, less hesitation in recommending Mr. Jarrett's nocturno as a highly successful example.

"KATY DEAN"—Arranged as a rondo for the pianoforte—R. ANDREWS.—Rust and Stahl.

Mr. Andrews has shown his versatility in this arrangement of the popular ballad, "Katy Dean," which we can strongly recommend as a thoroughly available pianoforte piece.

"VOCAL MUSIC SIMPLIFIED"—J. M. DEEMS—George Willig, Jun. Baltimore.

This little book is honestly what it pretends to be, "an elementary and progressive method of teaching vocal music in classes, with original exercises in solfeggi and vocalisation." Although there is nothing absolutely new in the system or its development, its conciseness and simplicity are sufficient to recommend it. Mr. J. M. Deems, the author, was a pupil of the well-known Dotzauer, of Dresden, and has made evident use of the instructions of his professor. His idea of vocal instruction is thoroughly legitimate, and his rules are laid down with praiseworthy clearness. The exercises, for one, two, and three voices, are highly useful, and really progressive. In short, we can without hesitation call the attention of all those whom it may concern to the "Vocal Music Simplified," as one of the most complete, while one of the most unpretending, compendiums of vocal instruction which we have had the advantage of seeing.

"MARION"—BALLAD—WRITTEN AND COMPOSED BY GEORGE LINLEY.—Campbell, Ransford & Co.

A simple ballad, displaying the best characteristics of its author, Mr. George Linley, who has obtained considerable popularity in this particular branch of vocal composition. The words convey in smooth verse a story which, repeated ad infinitum from the birth of time, can never become old, so long as there be young persons in the world of both sexes. Although this ballad offers no new point for illustration, it is a fine specimen of its class, and thoroughly agreeable. By the way, though the title-page attributes the words to Mr. George Linley, we find them in the inner page subscribed Robert Gilfillan.

Mr. Linley's song is illustrated by an unusually pretty portrait.

"HANDEL'S NEW SACRED SONGS"—1 to 8—EDITED BY R. ANDREWS.—J. Willis.

A selection of airs from the operas of Handel, adapted to sacred words from the Psalms, and other parts of Holy Writ, dedicated to the members of the (late) Handel Society. Although an objection may be held against the practice of setting music to words for which it was never intended, there is such a strong homogeneity in all Handel's solo vocal pieces, that the discrepancy hardly appears, and the songs may pass as if they had been originally intended for the purposes to which they are now applied. Our concert singers, and the lovers of vocal music for the chamber in general, are indebted to Mr. Andrews for having opened for their use a new mine, whose treasures are well worth exploring. We doubt, however, whether the announcement on the title-page, "that these songs are now published for the first time in England," be strictly correct. We are much mistaken if we have not seen several of them in print with the original words.

Among the set before us, we may single out two as purely Handelian and eminently beautiful—No. 7, in E flat, "Plead thou my cause, O Lord," (Psalm 35) taken from the opera of Orlando, and No. 8, in E minor, "I will sing of mercy and judgment," (Psalm 101) taken from the opera of Radamistus. We trust Mr. Andrews will continue the selection.

"THE PHANTOM CANOE"—By G. A. HODSON.—D'Almaine & Co.

This American serenade is illustrated by a tableau of the seven Female American Serenaders. It is in B flat, and the words are by Renton Nicholson, Esq., very good and pungent of their kind, and smacking of more geniality than the music of Mr. Hodson, which, though decidedly pretty and catching, seems to be made up of shreds and patches from the remnant of fairer tunes of all climes and characteristics. As a Nigger inspiration, even female, we cannot recommend it, but as a lively pot-pourri, with no claim to originality, we can and do.

"I CANNOT CHANGE AS OTHERS DO"—WALTER MAYNARD.—Cramer, Beale & Co.

This is one of the most pleasing and melodious ballads from the pen of a very rising and promising composer. Mr. Walter Maynard has contributed many agreeable trifles to the concert and drawing-rooms, but not one which has more thoroughly satisfied us than this. Inspired by the hypocritical love-verses of the shallow profligate, but eminently social buffoon, the Earl of Rochester, the better part of whose life was passed in courting servant-maids, and enlivening the leisure hours of that exquisite idiot, Charles the Second—who, though according to his sleek slaverer, "never said a foolish thing," never said anything but "Ods fish!"—inspired by the stupid staves of this distinguished dangler on the crown that sat upon an empty pate, Mr. Walter Maynard has found a melody so genial and sweet, that the nauseous nothings of the eager Earl, whose wit was to make straight truth crooked, the smooth sphere of wisdom angular, and the placid face of pure love blotched and pestiferous, are elevated into absolute sentiment. The song, however, was composed expressly by Mr. Walter Maynard for his friend, Signor Ferrari, and we are much mistaken if it were not rather the pleasant voice and manly style of that able and popular singer rather than the pert platitudes of the Earl, or the "Ode fish" of the rakish king whom he parasited, that helped our young composer to put a genuine flow of tune in G major. The accompaniment, which betrays throughout the careful and tasty musician, is due to that innate feeling for music which induced Mr. Walter Maynard to study with such ardour and success as to give cause for great hopes of his avenir. We recommend the ballad of "I cannot change as others do" without hesitation.

"GERALDINE"—Mazurka—THOMAS BAKER—Jullien and Co.

A Mazurka with a carefully-written introduction, with a pertinent F, which afterwards plays a prominent part in the theme. The Mazurka itself is sufficiently curt, buoyant, and rhythmic; but it is a pity that the second part in C minor, which is exceedingly pretty, should be spoilt in the last two bars at the foot of page 4, by an anticlimax, in which the dominant comes two bars too soon, and a cross relationship, in which F natural goes to G in the treble, while F sharp goes to G in the bass—an unhandsome concealment of consecutive octaves in the same direction. In other respects we have nothing but praise for "Geraldine," which is decidedly one of the most sparkling and danceable mazurkas which have for some time come under our feet.

"I CANNA LEAVE THE HIGHLAND HILLS"—Scottish song—Poetry by ANDREW PARK—Music by HENRY PHILLIPS—Charles Jefferys.

Andrew Park has given us one of his bonniest Scottish ditties. The music of Mr. Phillips is bold, and, like most of the music of the Pibroch school, wholly independent of harmonic restrictions; we must therefore accept the consecutive fifths in page 2 as characteristic of Highland notions of thorough bass. For its due effect the Scottish song should be sung by Mr. Phillips himself in his own popular and energetic manner.

"WINTER'S WARM FIRE-SIDE"—Written by E. S. H. B.—Music by W. F. WRIGHTON—Charles and Robert Ollivier.

A graceful ballad in A flat, with no peculiar characteristics to notice.

"SONGS OF HOME"—Happiness—Poetry by R. KITCHEN—Music by THOMAS BAKER—Jullien & Co.

If happiness and home be not wedded, then is happiness no happiness, but unhappiness. To be at home should be to be happy, or it were better to be abroad. If the husband be at home and the wife abroad, then is the husband unhappy, and vice versa. It is essential to make home absolutely happy, that every body should be at it—husband, wife, children, uncle and godmother. Therefore hath Thomas Baker, or rather Kitchen, the poet, in his verses, set forth with true judgment, that to be abroad is not to be at home; and Mr. Baker, on his part, with melody flowing and expressive, invented an attraction, in the shape of a "Fire-side song" (not Loder's), to keep every body in the house, supposing there be vocal talent in the family. That his object will be accomplished, and a wide spread of "happiness" ensue among a numerous class, who can afford to pay two shillings, we have not the shadow of a doubt. To conclude, we recommend the ballad of "Happiness" as a panacea for divided households.

"THEY TELL ME THAT THY HEART IS CHANGED."—Written by E. M. STENCHER, Esq.—Composed by THOMAS BAKER—Leader and Cock.

Mr. Baker has a decided feeling for melody and harmony, which this song indicates in more instances than one; but there is sometimes a want of finish which would seem to declare an absence of pains or inefficient musicianship. We cannot suppose the latter, knowing Mr. Baker to be an excellent musician; we must, therefore, presume the former, and give due warning in consequence.

In the song before us, there are many good, and some charming ideas, but there is too much—which, on the whole, is worse than too little. When Mr. Baker finds himself charged with a flux of musical thoughts, let him put some aside in the cupboard of his memory, and lock them up carefully to be taken out again on some future occasion, when invention lags. Par example, at the end of the ritornelle there is an idea which, being forced in for the sake of itself, and not of the song of which it forms a part, should be punched out from the plates when the next edition is being prepared. Mr. Baker, if he knows it not, must be told that means and end are distinct things; as it were, tools and the works; so to speak, chaos and the creation; and that to make the object subservient to the materials is to make the materials unsubservient to the object, whereby the materials are lost and the object not gained. With these reservations, or, rather, with this good counsel, or, better, with this exemplification of a philosophic maxim, to overlook, which is to look too far and grasp nothing—as one who would pluck a peach from this side of a wall, and extends his arm to the other, thereby getting the stem of the peach-tree in his abdomen, instead of grasping the fruit in his hand to be conveyed to the lips athirst for its ripeness.

Let this be a warning to Mr. Thomas Baker and other aspirants to the peach of perfection, and let us append for their benefit the inspiring precept, "Go on and prosper."

"GALOP DES PAPILLONS."—HARRY LEE CARTER.—Cramer, Beale, and Company.

A lively, pretty galop, far above the average of amateur efforts, introducing the popular air "I'd be a Butterfly."

Original Correspondence.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—The plan of management which I would suggest, is based upon the following broad principles, namely:—

The production of the very best operas to be found in the manner best calculated to insure their successful representation.

This brief heading involves two points of the utmost consequence. Firstly—In the choice of an opera I feel a conviction that professed criticism and the public taste will be found at serious issue, very much to the real advantage of science, although the contrary might appear; inasmuch as it has been the fashion of late to hold "MELODY" as vastly inferior to "MUSICAL DECLAMATION"—a feeling in which the masses do not, at present, concur, and it is to be hoped, for the sake of music itself, never will. Hence the small success which has invariably attended the production of an opera in which the publisher has found nothing to "sell." Acting upon this conviction, I would, firstly, choose an opera for its practicability—then, for its melodious character—and, lastly, for its declamatorial properties—but always without reference to its composer's name; thereby avoiding to merit ALONE the precedence over others.

Secondly—In the production or representation of an opera, I would suffer not even its most insignificant "role" to be otherwise than most ably filled; would expend less than usual upon comparatively worthless decoration, and more than usual upon the perfecting of its usual development, feeling assured that the strong point of operatic representation must always be the perfectness with which its music is rendered, all else being secondary in a very inferior degree. The ear, rather than the eye, should be appealed to—and the judgment left untrammelled by the meretricious glare of obtrusive spectacle.

Having thus exhibited my principles of action, it remains to be seen how they shall be carried into effect with the greatest economy of material, commensurate with the prospect of success.

The formation of a company of artists would be dependent on so many circumstances that its precise order can scarcely be determined on without special reference to some three or four individuals who would love to form its nucleus. If, however, the reader will turn to the number of the Musical World for the 24th of May last, it will be seen that I would place the controul (as I would also suggest the formation) of a company under seven principal officers, who should collectively form a committee, under the presidency of the general director.

This much effected, I would have drawn up, and embodied in one comprehensive legal agreement, a quantity of rules and regulations, upon the acceptance of which should depend every engagement to be made. This agreement should embrace the following propositions, together with some few only of the usual terms.

1stly. To abolish, entirely, the present mode of giving circumscribed "lines of business," excepting so far as must naturally arise out of vocal quality and compass.

2ndly. To insist upon an absolute and military obedience to the officers of the directors, who shall each be all powerful in his separate department.

3rd. To provide for the acceptance of a graduated scale of salaries, less than their registered amount, in the emergency of "bad business," &c., on its being made evident (through the agency of auditors, appointed by the company), that such is dictated by necessity, and not through arbitrary will or false pretence.*

4thly. To propose such a scale of "fines" as shall, for the common good, have the effect of rendering disobedience a too expensive luxury for every day use, &c.

The above, embodied in a legal (stamped) document would, under the supervision of the solicitor of the establishment, serve all the purpose of separate agreements, and should always be carefully digested by those who would seek to become members, as upon its adoption or rejection all engagements should depend.

It will be obvious, that many artistes of high merit and position may look upon the above suggested mode as somewhat derogatory to their acknowledged "caste." This I acknowledge to be true as matters now stand—but as matters now stand they cannot go on—for it is to the present system that we owe the non-existence of a National Opera. Such artistes will do best to consider that they stand alone at present, ONLY because others lack the opportunity of becoming prominent. Should opportunity offer, it will be abundant y seen that in default of Messrs. A, B, and C conforming to the rules above hinted at, Messrs. X, Y, and Z will be found both willing and competent to stand in their shoes, and what is still more, are now taking measures to do so. Yet, it must not be thence inferred that existing merit, or rather, that popular merit shall be cast aside, or even be permitted to be undersold by new aspirants; far from it; the proved worth of an appreciated name is always a tower of strength which no management would reject; but it is for the old stager to consider well his present position, lest the young stager should happen to be found in advance.

With regard to any rate of salaries—it would be both impolitic and unjust to attempt any scale with reference to the PRINCIPALS. Such will always have their market price, and should continue to do so; but it will be for them to propose, and for others to accept. With regard to subordinates, I hold that both the chorus and the orchestra should be better paid than is customary, and that in no instance should "deputies" be tolerated.

As a corollary to be inferred; in a company constituted as the above, the number of principals need not be so great as at present, because an artiste of good repute will never be permitted to rest idle whilst an inferior fills a subordinate part; on the contrary, whilst no leading artiste should usurp all the leading parts, no one should be at liberty to refuse a small part; it would then be for the leading artiste, so placed, to show what more he can do, than one of inferior merit; whilst his equal in position will have an opportunity of sharing the laurel crown, and the public shall become the gainers.

It is hard to express clearly and exactly any RULE by which the before-mentioned discipline could be enforced, otherwise than by a comparison of our now existing mode with that of the Italian operas. In the former, though three or four able "tenors" be on the establishment, and one only engaged in a principal part, the three remaining able "tenors" will remain idle rather than accept an inferior part. On the Italian stage no such folly exists; their rule is invariably to "use up" their highly competent artistes, and employ their inferior artistes only when the "cast" is very extended; within a certain limit, of course, but still to avoid, ever, the appointment of incompetency. Such, Mr. Editor, is a scanty outline of the main features of difference which I would endeavour to bring about between the system of managements hitherto adopted, and that which is advisable.

* The object of this clause is that, whilst honourable faith should be kept with the company, no litigious member should have power to sue the management for a violation of monied compact in this one respect.

The FINANCIAL part of my system shall form the subject, with your permission, of a letter next week; for it is upon that, as much as anything else, that success will depend.

I have honour to be, Sir, your obedient Servant,
PHILO-MUSICA.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Norma was repeated on Saturday, and attracted a brilliant and fashionable audience. Sophie Cruvelli, from the recitative, which precedes the "Casta diva," gathered power as she went on, and sang the aria, more especially the cabaletta, better than we have heard her yet. It was, in fact, a splendid display of vocalisation, and more than ever excited the enthusiasm of the audience, which at length exhausted itself in a double recall. The trio in the first act was as grand and powerful as before, and the whole of the second act, both in the singing and acting, betokened a larger amount of self-possession, and more control over "the magnificent natural gifts" (Athenæum) of the fair artist, than we have previously noticed. At the fall of the curtain, Sophie was compelled to appear twice, and each time was received with rapturous applause.

On Saturday Linda di Chamouni was revived, Sophie Cruvelli playing the heroine for the first time, and Marie Cruvelli making her real debut—her appearance in Florinda must count for nothing—before an English audience on the stage.

In each successive assumption of Sophie Cruvelli something new and entirely her own is sure to court admiration. Of the many Lindas we have seen, since Persiani first played the character at Her Majesty's Theatre, none has presented a complete and finished dramatic picture. This wanted vigour and buoyancy in the opening scenes; that was deficient in passion and earnestness, in the next act, where the character of the peasant of Chamouni rises to a tragic heroine; a third missed the quiet abstraction of the madness, and the thorough transformation of demeanor in the last scene, at the point where reason is restored; while some—the majority indeed—were remarkable for nothing but a general tone of insipidity, which, by the way, is not difficult to catch from the incongruous medley of incidents and sentiment of which the drama is composed.

Sophie Cruvelli readily avoided the insipid element of the character; and, in fact, it would have been far more difficult for her to have imbibed it; her fiercest opponents, whose lively fancies might enable them to charge her with every kind of fault of excess and short-coming, could not, by any stretch of imagination, be brought to picture her insipid. Sophie Cruvelli insipid!—as easily might fire be cold. In the first act the young prima donna wanted neither vigour nor buoyancy; on the contrary, she was overflowing with both; the pure heart and healthy spirits of the happy country maiden were emblemized to admiration in the physiognomy gestures, and tones of the songstress, whose voice, in the joyous air, "O luce di quest' anima," rang peals of rapture and delight. The second act brought out in strong relief the passion and earnestness that belonged to it. Here, in the duet where Antonio curses his daughter, and in the subsequent exhibition of despair, the powers of the tragic actress awakened, and Sophie Cruvelli, all herself, was impressive, pathetic, and intensely true. In the last scene the madness was assumed to perfection, and the restoration to reason exhibited one of the most charming strokes of natural acting we have witnessed for many a day. The rondo, sung in the original key, was a genuine display of fluent execution; the notes were impelled from the throat of the fair singer, like spray from a fountain, made sparkling by the dazzling presence of the sunbeams.

The part of Linda, however, is not entirely suited to Sophie Cruvelli who requires a larger area and wider scope on which to exhibit her powerful talents, than that afforded by Donizetti's opera, of which the pretty and sympathetic heroine, as far as dramatic colouring and drawing are concerned, is the veritable sister of Lucia. We can no more fancy Cruvelli descending from her tragic throne to hold high communion with such love-sick demoiselles as Donizetti's two pale reflexions of humanity, than we could Malibran, Pasta, or Grisi. For such artists as Persiani, Jenny Lind, and Sontag, Donizetti's Lucias and Lindas are admirably adapted, because they do not require any extraordinary amount of histrionic force or energy, and depend almost entirely for their success on their singing. We certainly never saw Linda before presented to our eyes so vividly and with so much reality; but, nevertheless, we think a night expended by Cruvelli on Linda di Chamouni is a night lost, which might much more worthily, highly, and holily—that is as regards ART, which we denominate a holy calling—be devoted to Fidelio, Norma, Semiramide, Donna Anna, Ninetta, or Amina.

Still we must chronicle an unequivocal success to the charming Sophie, who represented each successive phase of the character of Linda with irresistible truth, and a novelty of manner quite refreshing, after the stereotype editions with which we have been favoured of late years. The natural vivacity and buoyancy of deportment in the first scene were perfectly delightful, and again reminded us of Malibran, not in Linda—which she never played, and which being out of her line, Malibran would not have coveted to play—but in Amina in Sonnambula, a part in which we hope, ere long, to hear and see Sophie Cruvelli; and in which, we have not the slightest doubt, she will create an enormous success. Nous verrons.

Sims Reeves was excellent in Carlo, both as singer and actor, and very nearly divided the applause with Cruvelli in the popular duet, "Da quel di," which was rendered to perfection by both artists. In the cantabile of the second act his expression and taste were exemplified in a most unmistakeable manner, and his forcible acting elicited loud demonstrations from all parts of the house. We could hardly desire a better Carlo than Sims Reeves, and if we desire it, we should find no small difficulty in obtaining it.

Mdlle. Marie Cruvelli made a highly favourable impression in Pierotto. Her song behind the scenes, previous to her entrance, displayed a voice of soft and mellow quality, perfect intonation, and evident flexibility. Pierotto's first ballad, "Per sua madre," at once confirmed the presence of those valuable gifts. Mdlle. Marie Cruvelli is a thoroughly educated vocalist. Her method and her style belong to the best school. A little more appearance of dramatic energy and further experience with the stage, indispensable to all young singers, will render her a decided acquisition to Mr. Lumley's establishment. The appearance of Mdlle. Marie Cruvelli is much in her favour. Few Pierottos we have seen make up better for the part, or look so well. We must not pass by the charming singing of the fair sisters, Marie and Sophie, in the duet in the second act—the admired and familiar "Al bel destin,"—which was loudly applauded; and the elaborate cadenza à due, at the end, was greatly admired by the connoisseurs.

Coletti's Antonio has some fine points, and, although he misses the fine touches, and artistic nuances, we have seen given to the part, it is a manly and energetic performance throughout. Its roughness makes it all the better. The malediction derives additional force from the power of Coletti's voice, in which he is equalled by few barytones.

On Wednesday we had a grand miscellaneous performance—consisting of the first act of Masaniello; the second and third acts of Il Prodigio; a selection from Der Freischütz for Madame Fiorentini; and La Sylphide. This performance calls for no especial remark.

The Gazza Ladra was revived on Thursday for Alboni, who it may be remembered, played Ninetta with so much success, two years ago, at Her Majesty's Theatre. Alboni's singing in Ninetta from first to last, is faultless, and her acting, in its simplicity and truthfulness, has a novel and inexpressible charm. Nothing could be more exquisite than the "Di piacer" on Thursday night, nothing more mellifluous than Ninetta's share in the beautiful quartet, "Mi sento p-primere," nothing more touching and expressive than the duet, "E ben per mia memoria." But what most surprised us was the power Alboni displayed in the concerted pieces, where the upper notes are largely taxed, and the voice on a continual strain. Here Alboni proved beyond a doubt that she could sing every note of Ninetta's music without altering it, which to have done, we affirm, would have rendered the performance still more brilliant and effective. The closing prayer in the last scene was given with irresistible pathos, and the finale warbled with an ease and sweetness, which belongs to Alboni alone. No success could be more decided and universal, and Alboni was recalled after each act, and received with tumultuous applause.

Calzolari's singing is always to be admired in Rossini's music. His voice is extremely flexible, and his mode of phrasing purely and genuinely Italian. His first song, "Vieni fra questa braccia," with its sparkling cabaletta, "Ma quel piacer," was a fine specimen of florid vocalisation, and was warmly applauded. A little more fire infused into the acting would not have endamaged the reality of Ninetta's lover.

Coletti makes always a good father, and his Fernando is not less estimable than his other male parents. Florid music, however, is not Coletti's forte, although he contrives to sing it with not indifferent effect.

Lablache has lost but little of the power and pungency which nearly twenty years ago made his Podesta one of his most popular performances. We should have liked a better Fabrizio than Signor Casanova, whose small still voice was completely lost in Rossini's energetic strains.

Mdlle. Ida Bertrand made a sensible and pains-taking Pippo, and played and sang very effectively.

The opera was given in a curtailed form, and there evidently had not been too many rehearsals for band and chorus.

Between the acts, the charming triad, Rosati, Amalia Ferraris, and Marie Taglioni, danced a pas from Les Trois Graces; and after the opera, a scene from the L'Île des Amours was given by Amalia Ferraris, Rosa, Esper, Jullien, Lamoureux, &c., &c.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

After the first act of Norma, on Saturday, which, with Grisi and Tamberlik, could not fail of producing the usual excitement, the Elisir d'Amore was produced for the first time this season, with the parts similarly distributed as last year, with one exception—but that an important one—viz., Nemorino, which was given to a new candidate for tenoric honours in the person of Signor Ciaffei, an importation from Peterburgh, Stockholm, and various continental States. The cast of the Elisir d'Amore last year, embracing the names of Viardot, Ronconi, Tamburini, and Mario, verged closely on perfection. Mario acted Nemorino with inimitable gaucherie and rustic naivete, and his singing was superlative, especially in the "Una furtiva lagrima," which, as we have said before, would be well worth while to walk twenty miles to hear. Now, with due allowance for Signor Ciaffei's qualities as an artist, he is no substitute for Mario, and the opera flagged in no small degree without its accustomed Nemorino. Indeed, who but Mario, with his divine voice and incomparable singing—Tamberlik excepted—could make head against the acting of Tamburini and Ronconi in Belcore and Dulcamara, which is quite unsurpassable. Signor Ciaffei was completely thrown into the shade, and cannot pretend, for the future, to be placed in a prominent position at the Royal Italian Opera. Why Mario resigned a part in which he was always so successful, and, resigning it, why he did not place it at the disposal of Tamberlik, or, in case of Tamberlik refusing it, of Signor Stigelli, who, at least, would not prove incompetent in its interpretation, is to us a matter of no small surprise. The Elisir d'Amore is one of Donizetti's most perfect works, and if it be worth giving at all, is worth giving in a complete form. Ronconi and Tamburini are both inimitable in their parts, and Madame Viardot, bating her fidgetiness and exaggerations, acts and sings like a true artist. Why should not Mario or Tamberlik render the ensemble as irreproachable as possible by assuming the part of Nemorino? Had Mario appeared in the cast the theatre would have been more crowded.

On Monday, an extra night, included in the subscription, was given, in place of the last night of the subscription, the 13th of September, by general request, as it was announced, of the subscribers. Le Prophete was the opera.

On Tuesday, the Gazza Ladra was announced, with Signor Ciaffei as Giannetto, but the sensation created by the new tenor did not warrant the management in entrusting to him so prominent a part as that of Ninetta's lover. The opera was therefore withdrawn, and Semiramide substituted, with Tamburini in his original part, Assur. The house was not full; and here we are led to believe that nothing will draw now-a-days, but the grand modern French opera with a perfect ensemble. By the way, why does not Mr. Gye try the Zora (Mosè in Egitto)? A Grand French Opera to all intents and purposes. Formes would be very fine, or we are greatly mistaken, in the bass part, in which M. Zelger comparatively failed last year. Verbum sap. At all events, we are convinced Semiramide would only prove attractive with Alboni in Arsace, which is, perhaps, that incomparable singer's most finished and exquisite performance.

On Thursday, the Lucrezia Borgia was given, but not with the usual eclat—that is, not with the eclat of last season. The chiefest drawback was Mario's illness, which incapacitated him from undertaking one of his greatest impersonations, Gennaro. Tamberlik was substituted at a very short notice, but, with all that admirable tenor's abilities he could not master the part at a short notice; and so, as an inevitable consequence, he did not produce his accustomed effect. We think it hardly fair to Tamberlik to put him in one of Mario's most perfect assumptions on a sudden, and afford the public an opportunity of drawing unfair comparisons, which must necessarily be the case, under the circumstances. We only wonder Tamberlik would appear in Gennaro without having given it time and study. But the great tenor is ever willing to oblige, and does not always consider his reputation. Tamberlik's best excuse is, that he did not know the part.

Ronconi, who played Duke Alphonso for the first time, did not come up to all that was expected of him, and produced little or no effect. Neither the character nor the music suits him, and we should advise him forthwith to resign the part to Tamburini, in whose hands it has hitherto been recognised as a powerful and highly finished performance. No one has a greater admiration for Ronconi's talents than ourselves, as our readers must be well aware; but every artist has his specialty, and Duke Alphonso in Lucrezia Borgia is not one of Ronconi's specialties, in our opinion.

Grisi was as grand as ever in Lucrezia, and obtained the usual honours.

After the Lucrezia the favourite duet from Gnecco's comic opera, La Prova d'un Opera Seria, was sung and acted with roars of laughter by Madame Viardot and Tamburini; and the evening's performance concluded with selections from the last act of Roberto il Diavolo, for Castellan, Tamberlik, Stigelli, and Formes.

To-night the Gazza Ladra, with Mario (if he be well) as Giannetto; Grisi, Ninetta; Angri, Pippo; Tamburini, Fernando; and Ronconi, Podesta.

Sappho next week.

Dramatic Intelligence.

FRENCH PLAYS, ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—On Tuesday last, the long series of Mademoiselle Rachel's triumphs was brought to a close, after an engagement which has lasted two months, during which she has played regularly four times a week, besides occasional morning performances. After a careful study of Mademoiselle Rachel in all her parts, we remain confirmed in the opinion we gave in our first notice, that she has made immense progress, both in her conception of character, and in the elaboration of details. During the long period of her present engagement we have had every facility for minutely analysing each phasis of character as developed by the actress, of weighing each word, each intonation, as it fell from her lips, and we were astonished to find that each successive performance of the same part was a manifest improvement on the preceding one! that some fresh trait of character was indicated, that some new working of the mind was elucidated. Mademoiselle Rachel is too great an artist, too conscientious an interpreter of her text, to trust to sudden impulses or to chance inspiration; all her characters are, on the contrary, marked by deep study and a perfect control over her voice and gestures, which, while they are in the highest degree emphatic and energetic, or tender and passionate as circumstances may require, are yet toned down to the proper medium which excludes both exaggeration and insipidity. Yet we see none of the trickiness of art in her acting, no settled devices for producing certain effects, no formal stereotyped gesture or intonation indicative of poverty of invention, and reducing the whole histrionic art to the level of an automaton, every trace of study is carefully obliterated, every effect seems spontaneous, and all we perceive is the perfect embodiment of the character, and a desire to bring to bear upon it all the resources which deep reflection and continual practice unceasingly develope.

Mademoiselle Rachel's acting, on Tuesday last, in the part of Camille, was an admirable proof of this improvement and of her wonderful versatility of expression. She may be said to have outdone all her former performances; new details were presented in rapid succession, new traits of character were called into existence, a word accentuated in a different manner evoked a new reading and called up an association of new ideas, and gave a different colouring to the text. The general outline was the same, but it seemed more instinct with life and expression, it was more vividly coloured, more emphatic in its vigorous parts, more tender in its passionate scenes, in short the whole effect was greater than we have before witnessed. At the fall of the curtain one long burst of universal approbation, which lasted for several minutes, expressed the satisfaction of the audience, which was the largest we have seen this season within the walls of the St. James's Theatre. The stage was covered with bouquets, and the plaudits were continued long after the actress had bowed her farewell to the public. This series of performances has been more varied than on any other previous occasion. Besides the heroines of the classical drama an attempt has been made to gratify the public craving for novelty, in the shape of a new drama, entitled Valeria, and a piece by Victor Hugo, Angelo, and also a dramatic sketch, Horace et Lydie. In these pieces Mademoiselle Rachel played with her accustomed talent and was eminently successful; the fault of the choice was none of hers. Her principal attraction was, however, Scribe's play of Adrienne Lecouvreur, which sustains its popularity.

The performance of Adrienne Lecouvreur, on Monday night, was unexpectedly arrested in the most interesting part of the concluding scene. When, under the influence of the poison, the senses of Adrienne begin to wander, Mademoiselle Rachel tottered and fell back into the arms of Mons. Raphael, who luckily was near enough to interpose his aid and break her fall. The curtain dropped, and after an interval of a few minutes, M. Raphael came forward and explained to the audience that Mademoiselle Rachel had been taken suddenly ill, and that it was impossible for her to continue the piece. The admirers of the great tragedienne will be pleased to know, however, that the attack was merely a nervous one, and that no serious consequences have ensued. The immediate cause of this contretemps was sufficiently grotesque. Some person had introduced a small dog into the theatre, which began to bark just at the absorbing moment when Adrienne receives the casket containing the poisoned nosegay. This unseemly interruption took a peculiar effect upon the nerves of Mademoiselle Rachel, whose performance throughout the evening had betrayed an unusual degree of excitement, and disconcerted her so entirely as to lead to the result we have described. The audience behaved with the utmost courtesy and dispersed, after Mons. Raphael's explanation, without manifesting any expression of discontent. We hope that this incident, which deprived the audience of the most impressive scene of the evening, will serve as a warning both to the management and dog-fancying amateurs. Children in arms are not admitted into the theatre, and yet this cur was allowed to raise his discordant bark where the voice of an infant would be considered as a nuisance.

J. de C.

DRURY LANE.—No sooner had Mr. Anderson shut up "old Drury" than some other enterprising individuals have "come down with the dust" to open it again—the dust in this case being saw-dust; in other words, the late lessee has retired from the management to make way for an American and French Equestrian Troupe, under the direction of Messrs. Welch, M'Collum, and Co., who opened on Monday last, and no doubt believe that their horses, having four legs, will obtain a firmer footing in the theatre than their human predecessors, who, possessing only two, were ultimately left without even one to stand on.

The public are very fond of talking in a lamentable tone of the decline of the drama—the desecration of our National

Theatres, and so forth. Yet, who is really at fault? Managers who sacrifice all they possess in their endeavours to prevent so sad a state of things, or the many-headed monster itself, who is invariably ready, despite of all its pretended concern, to leave the stage for the circus—to give up the voice of the actor for the smack of the whip? Perhaps the reason of the public's preferring those accomplished animals, "Frisette," "Atar-gal," and "Jupiter," to Shakespere, Otway, and Bulwer, is because the horses are like themselves, of course, "fast," while it is the fashion to reckon the authors "slow." We will not, however, pretend to decide this much verata questio, but confine ourselves to stating that our Transatlantic directors have commenced their reign—we beg their pardon for employing a word so awfully redolent of the old country—we mean their undertaking—under the most brilliant auspices. The house was crammed to suffocation on the first night, and has continued so ever since. The performances themselves are very good, consisting of the usual tricks of dancing on large flat saddles, jumping over the never-absent scarves, standing on one leg, and managing to sit very uncomfortably on the side of a horse while the latter is in full gallop. By the way, we have often wondered whether insurance offices are ever rash enough to effect insurances on the lives of the ladies and gentlemen who exercise this very exciting profession; or whether the person wishing to ensure, is asked, after running up four or five flights of stairs, being poked in the ribs, and having double knocks, that would do honour to the most aristocratic footman, performed on his chest by the doctor, to see whether his lungs are sound—whether, we say, he is asked, "Do you perform the flying leap, or ride the wild horse of the Prairies?"

Besides the horsemanship, the programme offers a variety of other entertainments, such as the intelligent performances of Mons. Rocher's learned dog, the no less intellectual feat of walking up an inclined plane on a large globe, without the various countries marked on it, the supremely elegant spectacle of a man making himself as much like a frog as possible, and putting his head under his—we will not be particular in mentioning the exact place, but we do not believe that the position will ever become a very general one, until such time as people take to sitting on their heads instead of merely sometimes standing upon them. We could not help thinking, as we witnessed some of these daring gymnastic feats, that when the theatre is said to reflect Nature, "veluti in speculum," that the expression should, to suit the present times, be translated not "as in a glass," but, "as in a tumbler."

Among the performers we may mention our old favourites Mdlle. Caroline, and the little Loisset, who were very warmly received, and among those new to a London audience Mr. Eaton Stone and Mr. M'Collum, both exceedingly clever artistes. We are sorry to say that on the first night the former gentleman was thrown with great violence, injuring his shoulder very much, but are happy to add that he is now in a fair way of recovery.

To sum up, we think that Messrs Welch and M'Collum have a very good chance of success, and deserve it. They are perfectly right in taking the theatre for their performances if the public choose to support them, and should the said public still persevere in its lugubrious cant, and their conduct shows it is nothing else, about the before-mentioned "desecration of Old Drury," we shall simply reply in the words of Moliere—"George Dandin, tu l'as voulu!"

HAYMARKET.—By far the most numerous and fashionable audience we have seen at this house, since the final performances of Macready, assembled on Thursday night, to pay hom mage to that popular and admirable actress, Mrs. Walter Lacy, who took her first benefit on the stage. The performances consisted of the Hunchback, in which the charming beneficiaire sustained her original part, Helen; A Roland for an Oliver, in which she played Maria Darlington; a farce for Buckstone; and a brief concert. Mrs. Walter Lacy's Helen is vivid in the recollection of many play-goers as a piece of genuine and racy comedy, amalgamating in the most artistic and telling manner the lady and self-willed country maiden. When the Hunchback was first produced at Covent Garden with its complete and admirable cast, the Helen was universally acknowledged to be one of the best conceived and most finished delineations of the whole performance. Mrs. Walter Lacy has for some few years past been coquetting with the stage, and it is to her own want of decision or determination alone must be attributed the fact that she is not at this moment occupying a prominent position at our first theatre. Now that she appears to have come back in earnest, such talent as she possesses cannot be suffered to rest unemployed. In her own line—a most important one—Mrs. Walter Lacy has no compeer on the present stage; while her versatility, independent of her specialty, must constitute her a most welcome acquisition to any dramatic corps. The crowd assembled on Thursday night, the uproarious reception awarded to her on her first appearance, and the cheers which followed her throughout the performance, to say nothing of the furor at the end when she was recalled, manifestly demonstrate the high degree of favour in which Mrs. Walter Lacy stands with the public, and is significant of their desire to welcome her back to the stage of which she was and is so decided an ornament.

We must dismiss the performance with a word. Mrs. Walter Lacy looked as handsome and lady-like as ever, and played Helen with all her old vivacity and piquancy. She was admirably supported by Mr. Walter Lacy (as Lord Tinsel), who stands by himself as a faithful interpreter of the germs of aristocracy, the fops and beaux of the old and new regime. Mr. Walter Lacy's Lord Tinsel is an exquisite picture of consolatory dandyism and possessive flippancy. Both Mr. and Mrs. Walter Lacy played in A Roland for an Oliver with immense effect. Mrs. Walter Lacy's Maria Darlington is the best we have seen on the stage since Miss Foote; and the Alfred Highflyer of Mr. Walter Lacy is as remarkable for its spirit and animation, as for the true gentlemanly bearing, which is so strong a characteristic of his style. The benefit could not have been more successful, seeing there was three hundred pounds in the house.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Mrs. Warner has returned to her old quarters here, to fulfil a short engagement before her departure to America, and the season has consequently begun—for we presume that this is to be considered as its real commencement—unusually early. Mrs. Warner's impersonations of Shakespeare are too well remembered by the visitors of this theatre, to need particular remark, especially as the public are testifying their opinion by flocking in increased numbers to witness her performances, the theatre having been crowded to excess every night. The fair artiste looks as young and well as ever. Her appearance and acting in the last scene of The Winter's Tale, one of the most touchingly beautiful of the kind in the whole range of the drama, would, of itself, repay a visit to the theatre. Her drapery and attitudes on the pedestal are a model of classical elegance and appropriateness. We observed some new engagements. Mr. Barnett was the Autolycas. Mrs. H. Marston has resumed her former situation, and amused the audience as much as ever in her performance of the deaf old Maiden Lady in the little piece of the The Culpri.

MARY-LE-BONE.—This theatre continues to thrive under its new management, the house being invariably well filled. Melodramas and farces are the main features of the performances. Mr. Wyld, in the little piece of A Day at an Inn, exhibits his versatility in the assumption of a variety of characters, and Miss Williams (the fair lessee) lacks nothing of her usual attractions to the eye, as well as the judgment of her patrons. We have also been presented with a novelty in the person of a Mr. Sambo, an Indian actor (whether from east or west we have not been able to ascertain), whom, we must content ourselves for the present, by recommending to the visitors to this theatre, as a dramatic curiosity.

ADELPHI.—If Nature does abhor a vacuum, she certainly does so at the above theatre, where it is about as difficult for a Christian to obtain a seat after seven o'clock as it is for a Jew to take one in the House of Commons, although the former be as lavish of his oaths as the latter is chary of them. No wonder that Madame Celeste obtains such favourable verdicts when her audience is so "packed." If anything could have injured this invariable prosperity, we should have said it would have been the absence of that clever actor, Mr. Wright, who, we regret to say, has been obliged, from severe indisposition, to retire for a short period from the scene of his triumphs. But the Adelphi management seems to be particularly favoured—it is never at a loss. Mr. Wright falls ill—"quick, presto, pass"—Mr. Honey is at hand to supply his place until his recovery. We always held Mr. Honey to be a very talented actor, and the event has proved that we were not wrong. His personification of Muster Grinnidge, in the popular drama of the "Green Bushes," a part that Mr. Wright had made peculiarly his own, proves that Mr. Honey can strike out a new path for himself, and discover fresh veins of fun in a mine which every one had imagined was long since exhausted. Mr. Honey is essentially original—he possesses the vis comica in the highest degree; and—what in an author's eye is quite as precious a quality—a thorough respect for the text. Let but Mr. Honey continue as he has begun, painstaking, careful, and modest—content with his fair share of applause, and not spoiling scenes of more serious interest for the sake of a misplaced laugh, as some actors too frequently do—and he will soon become what he deserves to be, one of the greatest favourites of the public, and best support of that popular place of amusement, the Adelphi Theatre.

Miscellaneous.

THEATRICAL COMPANY FROM SYRIA.—A company of fifteen persons, Syrian Lebanese, from Syria, have arrived in London for the purpose of giving theatrical representations of the manners and customs of Syria. The company have travelled through France, and have arrived in London, by the steamer Fame, from Calais, it being their intention to give performances for some time on their route to other places for a similar purpose. The company are accompanied by their theatrical exhibition costumes and other effects.—Morning Post.

SIGNOR BRICCIALDI gave his Matinée Musicale, in the new Beethoven-rooms, on Tuesday week, before a fashionable audience. Molière's quintetto was performed in a highly efficient manner by Signor Briccialdi (flute), Herr Molique (violin), Messrs. Hill and Mellon (violins), and Signor Piatti (violin-cello). Miss Bassano sang F. Ronconi's Romanza, "Il Giglio" and "Virginia," and Gabriel's ballad, "Weep not for me," with admirable taste and expression. Signor Calzolari sang an aria by Bellini, and the "Una furtiva lagrima," from the Elisir d'Amore, both with infinite feeling and point. Herr Molique played "Due Melodie," for violin, in his usual chaste style, and Signor Briccialdi, in two fantasias from La Figlia del Regimento and Sonnambula, displayed great execution and brilliancy with clearness of tone and expression, and was warmly applauded. The duo for violin e contra basso, by Signori Sivori and Bottesini, was one of the most astonishing performances ever heard, and created quite a furore.

M. ACHILLE DE VIGNE, the pianist, has left London for Ghent.

MESSRS. H. AND R. BLAGROVE's fourth Quartett and Solo Concert was given at the Concert-rooms, Mortimer-street, on Friday evening, the 18th ult. Veit's quartett, No. 1, for two violins, viola, and violoncello, by Messrs. H. Blagrove, Clementi, R. Blagrove, and Lucas, was played with excellent effect. The "Hymne Russe con variazioni" received marked applause. Mr. W. H. Holmes executed an andante, of his own composition, and Mendelssohn's capriccio with remarkable taste and finish, and his pupil, Miss Rushforth, took part in a quintett of Ries, for piano, violin, viola, violoncello, and double bass, in a highly creditable style. This young lady is much improved since she first made her appearance at one of Mr. Holmes's Matinées, and gives promise of future excellence. H. Leslie's quintett, for two violins, viola, violoncello and double bass, was well received. Mr. R. Blagrove gave Regondi's popular Morceau de Concert, "Les Oiseaux," on the concertina, in his best style, and was ably accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Holmes. Miss Dolby sang two Nile melodies, entitled "The Almek are banished" and "My horse is of the Nedgi breed" in first-rate style, and in the last received a hearty encore. The concert concluded with Mayseder's solo quartett, charmingly executed, the points being admirably taken up. Mr. H. Blagrove was in fine play, and performed with more than his usual energy.

LIVERPOOL.—Mr. and Miss Vandenhoff, old favourites in Liverpool, have, this week, appeared at the Royal Amphitheatre in a series of their favourite characters at this theatre, and have been welcomed by large audiences with that fervour which their talents merit. Mr. Vandenhoff has played Richlieu in admirable style, and his clever daughter created a perfect furor in the Lady of Lyons, but her greatest triumph will we think prove to be Parthenia in Mrs. Lovell's new play of Ingomar, which has been produced with the most signal success. It is long since we have enjoyed so rich and intellectual a treat at a theatre as this drama has afforded us; it is admirably written, poetically conceived, and will give to the most blasé playgoer a feeling of pleasure to which he has long been a stranger.

Miss LEY, one of our popular concert vocalists, gave a matinée musicale on Saturday last, at the New Beethoven Rooms. The programme was unusually simple and quiet. Unlike most other givers of their annual entertainments, Miss Ley remained modestly in the back ground, and appeared twice only during the evening. Her two essays were in an aria by Vaccaj, called "Va la reca," and a ballad by Mrs. H. Arkwright, entitled, "If you're waking, call me early." Her audience seemed to prefer Miss Ley in the English song, which they encored, and deservedly so, seeing that it was given with much purity and unforced expression. Miss Ley has a voice of no great power or compass, but she shows a good management of it, and possesses both taste and musical feeling. The performance commenced with the adagio and last movement of one of Mendelssohn's pianoforte trios, excellently played by M. and Madame Goffrie and Herr Hausmann. Mr. Williams followed in an aria from the Clemenza di Tito, and Mr. Goffrie in a solo on the violin. Madame Macfarren was much applauded in the ballad from the Sleeper Awakened, "Forget it not," and the duet "Ah! fatal are those charms," from the same opera, with Mr. F. Bodda, was also very charmingly sang. Herr Hausmann gave his fantasia for the violoncello, on airs from Don Pasquale in his usual energetic and forcible manner. Miss Kate Loder delighted the audience with Thalberg's fantasia, on airs from L'Elisir d'Amore, on the pianoforte, and obtained a rapturous reception. Miss Kate Loder never played with more brilliancy or more effect. Ricci's eternal—not immortal—barcarole "Sulla poppa del mio Brick," by Mr. F. Bodda was given with his usual graphic effect, although it always gives us wonder why this song should have attained to any degree of popularity; a more unmeaning composition we never heard, yet it is sung everywhere. Miss Birch sang in her most finished style Costa's aria, "Dall'asilo della pace." The concert concluded with the quartett of Biletta, "I Poveretti," sung by Miss Birch, Madame Macfarren, Mr. Williams, and Mr. F. Bodda. Miss Bassano was announced but did not appear.

CRUVELLI's NORMA.—On Saturday night Mdle. Cruvelli resumed the character of Norma, which she has not performed for a considerable period. On the young artist's first appearance in this part, we stated, unhesitatingly, that it was one of the finest personations we have ever witnessed upon the operatic stage, and we have pleasure in repeating the expression of that opinion. Mdle. Cruvelli, in Norma, displays not only wonderful vocal abilities, but she also evinces the possession of powers of self-government, and of self-restraint, in the presence of temptation to undue vehemence. Her performance of Saturday was an admirable and intellectual effort, and the applauses which she received were legitimately earned, and such as she may fairly regard as honours.—Morning Chronicle.

ERNST.—The celebrated German violinist left yesterday for Paris, in company with his friend Eckert, the well-known pianist and composer.

FERDINAND HILLER.—This highly-esteemed and learned musician has been in London during the last ten days. His stay must be necessarily short, since his duties as principal of the Conservatoire demand his almost constant presence at Cologne.

MADAME BARBIERE NINI.—This renowned Italian vocalist has been some time in London, and will shortly make her appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre.

MADAME STOLIZ, the celebrated French dramatic contralto, is still in London.

MR. T. M. MUDIE has arrived in London from Edinburgh.

MESSRS. GRAY AND DAVISON's great organ in the Crystal Palace has attracted universal attention. The best organists, foreign and native, have played upon it; and there seems to be but one opinion about it, among competent judges—viz., that it is one of the finest instruments ever built by those eminent makers—which is equal to saying, one of the finest ever manufactured, at home or abroad.

HECTOR BERLIOZ.—This eminent musician, having fulfilled his labours as musical juror at the Great Exhibition, has returned to Paris.

THE DISTIN CONCERTS.—The twelve concerts given by the Distin Family at the Adelaide Gallery, were brought to a close last night, after a successful and well-deserved "run." Their receipt on has been highly gratifying, and the encores they have experienced nightly, especially as regards their judicious selection of good English glees, have been well merited. We have rarely heard glees so neatly sung. With respect to their execution on the Sax Horns, the Distins may be termed "exclusives" in their facile management of those instruments. The Euphonic Horns also (the Distins' own invention) are remarkable for their combined power and brilliancy of tone, and have been heard to much advantage in the hands of the inventors. The Distins leave town to-day for Jersey, where they will perform on Monday and Tuesday, previous to their tour through the English provinces; after which it is their intention to return to London, to give another series of concerts.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Signor Anelli will be noticed in our next.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—G.'s letter arrived too late, but shall appear in our next.

Advertisements.

THE CUCKOO GALOP.

AS performed by Mr. Distin and his Sons at the Royal Music Hall, Adelaide Street, Strand. It is arranged for the Piano, and Cornet-piston, price 3s., post free, and may be had of the publisher, Henry Distin, Military Musical Instrument Maker, 31, Cranbourn Street, Leicester Square, London; also My Polka, price 2s. 6d., Our Polka, 2s. 6d., Your Polka, 2s. 6d., and the Hippodrome Galop.

MESSRS. COCKS' NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

CHURCH MUSIC.

Just Published.

A COLLECTION OF NINETY-THREE CHANTS, for the use of the United Church of England and Ireland, compiled by John Bishop, of Cheltenham, with copious Introductory Remarks. Vocal score, with organ accompaniment, price 1s. 4d.

EXETER-HALL CONCERTS.—HANDEL'S ORATORIOS,

as performed at these concerts, large folio size, to admit of four or five persons reading from one copy, collated with the author's own manuscripts in her Majesty's library, full Vocal Score, with Pianoforte or Organ Accompaniment. These unrivalled editions, by John Bishop, of Cheltenham, are on sale as follows:—"The Messiah," cloth boards, 15s.; "Israel in Egypt," 15s.; "Samson," 15s.; "Judas Macabeus," 15s.; "Dettingen Te Deum," 12s.; the four "Coronation Anthems," 12s.; "Utrecht Te Deum," 12s.; "Utrecht Jubilate," 10s. 6d. Also, Haydn's "Seasons," 9s., and his "Creation," 15s.; Handel's "Serenata," "Acis and Galatea," 12s. Also Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," 12s.; and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," 12s. Large folio Editions of the above, for the Pianoforte, without words, by Czerny. Also Boyce's collection of Cathedral Music, edited by J. Warren, three vols., large folio, £6 6s.

HAMILTON'S MODERN INSTRUCTIONS for the PIANO-

FORTE, fingered by CHARLES CZERNY, twenty-second edition, large music folio, Four Shillings. This is the twenty-second edition, and a cheaper or more useful work was never published. Valuable as it has hitherto been to preceptors and students, the present issue is an improvement even upon the former ones, and such is the demand for it that the sale, we understand, now reaches the large number of five hundred copies monthly. It is complete in every point, and so simple and well arranged that a child might become proficient by attending to its directions. The exercises commence with standard melodies, and gradually go on increasing in brilliancy until the most sparkling music of modern composers is accomplished without difficulty. We are not at all surprised that the work should have become so popular, considering its merits and cheapness.—Victorian North Wales Chronicle, April 12.

NEW MUSIC.—Just published, a CATALOGUE of NEW

VOCAL and INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC, being Part IX. of the General Catalogue of Musical works published by Messrs ROBERT COCKS and CO. To be had gratis, and postage free, upon application to the publisher, 6, New Burlington Street, London.—Messrs. Cocks and Co. are now selling their elegant pianos at 22 guineas and upwards—list of prices gratis, and postage free.—N.B. Glover's Great Globe Quadrilles, 3s. and 4s. each. Cocks' Musical Miscellany is published monthly, 2 pence each. Stamped 3 pence.

Just Published,

PORTRAIT OF HERR ERNST PAUER,

Price 5s.

Schott & Co., 89, St. James's-street.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published,

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed, and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTE.

Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 210 Regent-street; Keith and Prowse, 48, Cheapside; and Cocks & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

MEYERBEER'S SONGS,

ENGLISH Version, Edited by FRANK ROMER, are now published by Campbell, Ransford, and Co., British and Foreign Musical Presentation Library, 56, New Bond Street.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

PIANO SOLOS.

Beyer, Ferdinand.	Valeriansdottler.	National Airs.	No. 18, 19, 20, 21, 22
" "	Op. 110.	6 Morceaux gracieux sur des Airs allemands favoris.	(To be continued.) In six books.
Brisson, Fred.,	Op. 35.	Le Chant du Rossignol.
	Op. 42.	Makouba.	Danse Arabe.
Brunner, C. T.,	Op. 120.	12 Morceaux faciles sur des Airs populaires.	In 2 books.
Mozart, W. A.,		Sonates, No. 1-12, a new Edition, in 12 books.

PIANO DUETS, TWO PERFORMERS.

Beyer, Ferdinand,	Op. 112.	Revue mélodique, No. 1, Don Giovanni; No. 2, Die Zauberflöte; No. 3, Norma.
		(To be continued.)
Cramer, Henri.		Potpouri, No. 31, La noce de Figaro; No. 32, Die Zauberflöte.
		(To be continued.)

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's-street.

NEW DUETS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

THALBERG	...	Beatrice di Tenda
ROSELLEN	...	Deux Melodies de Donizetti, 1 and 2.
ROSELLEN	...	Val D'andorre.
WOLFF	...	Valse Original.
WOLFF	...	Beatrice di Tenda.
SILAS	...	La Primavera, Ragatella.
KALLIWODA	...	Invitation à la danse.
OSBORNE	...	Pluie de Perles
SCHULTZ	...	Duo L'espagnole.
BEYER	...	Krieger's Lust March.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 261, Regent-street.

BLUMENTHAL'S LAST WORKS.

Violette	2s. 0d.
Rose	2s. 0d.
Primevère	4s. 0d.
March Militaire	2s. 6d.
Nocturne Impromptu	3s. 0d.
Consolation	4s. 0d.
Trois Mazurkas, Set 3	4s. 0d.
Scène de Ballet	4s. 0d.

Cramer, Beale, and Co. 261, Regent-street.

EASY PIANOFORTE MUSIC.CONCERTS DE FAMILLE. SIX AMUSEMENTS POUR LE PIANO, par F. Praeger.

- No. 1. Io son ricco.
 " 2. Trab, Trab,
 " 3. Il segreto per esser felice.
 " 4. Scenes that are brightest.
 " 5. Stay fleeting time.
 " 6. Quando il destino.
 " 7. Chant des croates.
 Price 1s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 261, Regent Street.

NEW PIANOFORTE PUBLICATIONS.

WESSEL and Co. beg to announce the publication of a New Work for Piano Solo, in twelve numbers, price One Shilling each, entitled—

"YOUTHFUL DAYS."

- | | |
|--------------------------------|---------------------------------|
| No. 1. "Nursery Tale." | No. 7. "The Dance on the Lawn." |
| " 2. "The Clock." | " 8. "Boating on the Lake." |
| " 3. "Sunday Morning." | " 9. "The Birdlet's Death." |
| " 4. "Playing in the Meadows." | " 10. "The Water-Mill." |
| " 5. "Grand Parade." | " 11. "Skating." |
| " 6. "Lullaby." | " 12. "The Evening Bells." |

Composed by

THEODORE KULLAK, OF BERLIN.

Kullak's "Youthful Days" (Kinderleben) is written expressly in an easy form and makes an acceptable present to young pupils.

WESSEL and Co., 229, Regent-street, corner of Hanover-street, Publishers of all the Pianoforte works of Theodore Kullak.

HEALTH WHERE 'TIS SOUGHT!

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Cure of a disordered Liver and Stomach, when in a most hopeless state.—Extract of a letter from Mr. Matthew Harvey, of Chapel Hall, Airdrie, Scotland, dated the 15th of January, 1850.—To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your valuable Pills have been the means, with God's blessing, of restoring me to perfect health, at a time when I thought I was on the brink of the grave. I had consulted several eminent Doctors, who, after doing what they could for me, considered my case hopeless. I had been suffering from a Liver and Stomach complaint of long standing, which during the last two years got so much worse, that every one considered my condition as hopeless. I, as a last resource, got a Box of your Pills, which soon gave relief, and by persevering in their use for some weeks, together with rubbing night and morning your Ointment over my chest and stomach, and right side, I have by their means alone got completely cured, and to the astonishment of myself and everybody who knows me.

(Signed)

MATTHEW HARVEY.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—
 Ague Constipation of Fevers of all Liver complaints Tumours
 Asthma the Bowels kinds Lumbago Ulcers
 Bilious Com- Consumption Fits Rheumatism Worms of all pains Debility Gout kinds
 Blotches on the Dropsy Head-ache Scrofula or King's Weakness, from Skin Dysentery Indigestion Evil whatever cause
 Bowel complaints Erysipelas Inflammation Sore Throats &c., &c.
 Colic Jaundice Die-Douloureux

Sold at the Establishment of Professor HOLLOWAY, 244, Strand, (near Temple-bar, London, and most all respectable Druggists, and Dealers in Medicines throughout the civilized World, at the following prices:—1s. 1ld., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box. There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients in every Disorder are affixed to each Box.

WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1851.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF

HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY THE QUEEN,
AND HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE ALBERT.

THE ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-EIGHTH FESTIVAL
OF WORCESTER, HEREFORD, AND GLOUCESTER,
FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF CLERGYMEN IN THE THREE DIOCESES,

WILL BE HELD

ON TUESDAY, WEDNESDAY, THURSDAY, AND FRIDAY,
THE 26TH, 27TH, 28TH, AND 29TH OF AUGUST,
IN THE NAVE OF THE CATHEDRAL AND IN THE COLLEGE HALL, WORCESTER.

President.

THE RIGHT REVEREND THE LORD BISHOP OF WORCESTER.

Principal Vocal Performers.

MADAME CASTELLAN,
MISS BIRCH, MISS DOLBY, MISS WILLIAMS,
AND
MADLLE. SOPHIE CRUVELLI.
MR. SIMS REEVES, MR. LOCKEY, MR. MACHIN,
AND HERR FORMES.

Principal Instrumental Performers.

LEADER—MR. H. BLAGROVE.
MESSRS. WATKINS, HILL, LUCAS, HOWELL, HATTON, SEVERN, CARD, NICHOLSON, WILLIAMS, BAUMANN,
C. HARPER, T. HARPER, HEALY, SMITHIES, ANDRE, CHIPP, &c. &c.
ORGAN—MR. AMOTT. PIANO FORTE—MR. G. TOWNSHEND SMITH.

CONDUCTOR—MR. DONE.

The BAND has been selected with the greatest care from the Orchestras of Her Majesty's Theatre, the Royal Italian Opera, and the Ancient and Philharmonic Concerts.

The Choral Department has been selected from the London, Liverpool, Birmingham, Worcester, and Gloucester Choral Societies.

And the entire Orchestra will comprise Three Hundred Performers.

ON TUESDAY MORNING, AUGUST 26th, AT THE CATHEDRAL,
A SERMON WILL BE PREACHED BY THE REV. E. H. CRADOCK, M.A., CANON OF THE CATHEDRAL.
PRECES AND RESPONSES ... Tallis. VENITE.—GRAND CHANT. PSALMS—CHANT ... Res. W. H. Havergal.
GRAND DETTINGEN TE DEUM.—Handel. Principal Singers—Miss Dolby, Miss Williams, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Machin.
JUBILATE.—Handel. Principal Singers—Miss Williams, Miss Dolby, and Mr. Machin.
AFTER THIRD COLLECT.—ANTHEM, "In that day."—Dr. Elvey. The Soli parts by the CATHEDRAL CHOIR.
BEFORE SERMON—Ps. xviii., (o.v.) AFTER SERMON—ANTHEM, "When Israel out of Egypt came." (cxiv. Ps.—Mendelssohn.)

ON WEDNESDAY MORNING AUGUST 27th,

ELIJAH.—Mendelssohn.

ON THURSDAY MORNING, AUGUST 28th,

SAMSON,—Handel. With selections from the CREATION.

PART II.

THE LAST JUDGMENT.—Spohr.

ON FRIDAY MORNING, AUGUST 29th,

THE MESSIAH.

FIRST CONCERT TUESDAY EVENING, AUGUST 26th,
THE FIRST WALPURGIS NIGHT. With a Miscellaneous Selection.

SECOND CONCERT, WEDNESDAY EVENING, AUGUST 27th.
Selections from JESSONDA. FRIDOLIN a Cantata, &c.

THIRD CONCERT, THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 28th.
Selection from EURYANTHE—Weber, &c.

PRICES OF ADMISSION.—ON TUESDAY MORNING: Nave 5s.; Western Gallery 2s. 6d.; Aisles, 1s. ON WEDNESDAY, THURSDAY, and FRIDAY MORNINGS, Nave, 15s.; Western Gallery, 7s. 6d.; Aisles 5s. CONCERT TICKETS: Floor of the Hall, 10s. 6d. Gallery, 5s.

TICKETS FOR ALL THE PERFORMANCES, £3 EACH.—NOT TRANSFERABLE.

* To prevent confusion, all Persons are required to provide themselves with Tickets. No money will be taken at the Doors. Tickets and Books of the Performances will be sold at DEIGHTON'S Library, 53, High-st.; STRATFORD'S Library, Cross, and Music Saloon High-street; and at Messrs. EATON and SONS, College-street; and at the principal Stations on the Bristol and Birmingham Railway.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. SOIREES EXTRAORDINAIRES.

IT is respectfully announced that the Week's Performances will be—

On TUESDAY, AUGUST 5, 1851,

LUCREZIA BORGIA.

Lucrezia Madame BARBIERE NINI,
(Her first Appearance in this Country).

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 6,

FIDELIO.

Leonora Mdlle. SÖFIE CRUVELLI.

AND SELECTIONS FROM

MUTA DI PORTICI

(MABIANTELLO).

THURSDAY, August 7, GRAND EXTRA NIGHT.

LA FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO.

Marie Mdlle. ALBONI.

To be preceded by the First Act of

NORMA.

Norma Mdlle. SÖFIE CRUVELLI.

FRIDAY, August 8, SOIREE EXTRAORDINAIRE.

DON GIOVANNI.

Mdlle. Albani, Madame Fiorentini, Madame Giuliani, Signori Coletti, Calzolari, and Lablache.

Applications for boxes, stalls, and tickets, to be made at the Box Office of the Theatre.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—FRIDAY NEXT, AUGUST 8th, will be repeated Haydn's Creation. Vocalists—Madame Clara Novello, Mr. Sims Reeves and Herr Formes. The Orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets 2s.; reserved, 5s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter Hall, or of Mr. Bowley, 63, Charing Cross.

JUST PUBLISHED.

TWO BOOKS of the most popular HYMNS and ANTHEMS, also OPERATIC GEMS from Rossini, Donizetti, Bellini, Meyerbeer, Pacini, &c., &c., easily harmonized, arranged, and fingered for the guitar by J. ANELLI, the Author of a Treatise and original Plan of easily playing that most graceful and expressive instrument of harmony, which may be had at the principal Music-sellers, and at the Author's Singing Academy, No. 4, Northumberland Place, Westbourne Grove, Bayswater.

GREAT DISCOVERY IN HARMONY.

Now ready, price 5s.

THE PRINCIPLES OF NATURAL HARMONY, being a Perfect System founded upon the discovery of the True Semitonic Scale, by J. J. Haite. London, Published by the Author, 76, Leadenhall-street. To be had of Messrs. Ewer and Co., Newgate-street, and Messrs. Cocks and Co., New Burlington-street.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

LAST WEEK BUT THREE OF THE SEASON.

SUBSCRIPTION NIGHT—MONDAY, AUGUST 4.

I PURITANI. GRISI, RONCONI, TAMBURINI, MARIO.

IN compliance with the general wish of the Subscribers, a SUBSCRIPTION NIGHT will be given on MONDAY, August 4, in lieu of the last Tuesday of the Subscription (viz., Tuesday, September 9). All Ivories and Tickets, therefore, for Tuesday, September 9; will be available for Monday.

On MONDAY, August 4, will be performed (for the second time this season), Bellini's favourite Opera

I PURITANI.

Elvira	Madame GRISI.
Henrietta	Mdlle. COTTI.
Valton	Signor POLONINI.
Georgio	Signor TAMBURINI.
Arturo	Signor MARIO.
Bruno	Signor SOLDI.
Riccardo	Signor RONCONI.

DON GIOVANNI. DONNA ANNA ... MADAME VIARDOT.

On TUESDAY next, August 5, in consequence of the numerous applications will be performed Mozart's Opera,

DON GIOVANNI.

Donna Anna	Madame VIARDOT.
Elvira	Mdlle. BERTRANDI.
Zerliner	Madame CASTELLAN.
Don Giovanni	Signor TAMBURINI.
Leporello	Herr FORMES.
Masetto	Signor POLONINI.
Il Commendatore	Signor TAGLIAFICO.
Don Ottavio	Signor TAMBERLIK.

The Opera will be supported by a Triple Orchestra, and Double Chorus.

GRAND EXTRA NIGHT.

LAST NIGHT BUT TWO OF LES HUGUENOTS.

On THURSDAY NEXT, AUGUST 7th, will be performed (for the eighth time this season), Meyerbeer's Grand Opera,

LES HUGUENOTS.

Principal characters by Madame Grisi, Madame Castellan, Mdlle. Angri, Mdlle. Cotti, Herr Formes, Signor Tagliafico, Signor Polinini, Signor Rommi, Signor Mei, Signor Soldi, and Signor Mario.

First Night of Saffo. On SATURDAY NEXT, August 9th, will be produced a new Grand Opera, entitled,

SAFFO.

The poem by M. Augier, the music by M. Gounod.

Composer, Director of the Music and Conductor, Mr. COSTA.

Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets for Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, or Saturday, to be obtained at the box office of the theatre, and at the principal Libraries and Music Sellers.

OVERTURES & SYMPHONIES FOR AN ORCHESTRA.

COUNTRY SOCIETIES wanting a set of parts of from 30 to 40 compositions suitable for such a purpose may hear of a bargain on application to Z. T. Purday, 45, High Holborn.

NEW BALLADS BY THOMAS BAKER.

HAPPINESS.

WHEN FRIENDS LOOK COLDLY ON THEE.

MY GENTLE COTTAGE FLOWER.

Price 2s. each, postage free. JULIEN AND CO., 214, Regent-street, where may be had all Thomas Baker's compositions.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 2, Studley Villas, Studley Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid, To be had of G. Purkess, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, August 2, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra,) payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 32.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 9, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence

BADEN BADEN.

After such a season as this, who would not like to pass a quiet month at Baden Baden? A quiet month! That is not so easy in the midst of fetes set in motion by the indefatigable M. Benazet—M. Edouard Benazet, a worthy son of his father—and patronised, bodily and spiritually, by the Grand Duke Leopold, the Grande Duchesse Marie of Russia, and other very notable personages. No—a quiet month is out of the question at Baden Baden, unless in the winter, when its superfluous population has dispersed, and the number of its inhabitants reduced to something like half a dozen thousands.

After such a season as this, however, who would not like to spend a month at Baden Baden, the prettiest, and sunniest, and hilliest of spas? The present season, thanks to the exertions of M. Benazet—architect, embellisher, and sole director of that splendid palace, the Maison de Conversation—is more than usually brilliant—Baden Baden was never fuller, never gayer. A parterre of laughing villas, and sparkling fountains, and many-coloured gardens, whether by day, when the sky is as gold, or by night, when the sky is as silver—when the sun-beams dance, or the moon-beams play, upon the tops of the trees that cast their grateful shadows over the swardy environs—Baden is equally a little paradise. The women are butterflies, glad in fine weather; at night their eyes are glow-worms in mid-air; at noon they stroll to the Trinkhalle, luxuriously listless——“gorgeous insects, floating motionless, Unconscious of the day.”

People from all climes, and in all costumes—of all habits, and of all tastes—of all idiosyncracies, and of all followings—assemble at Baden in the summer months. From this large swarm of pleasure-flies, it is uneasy to discover the preponderance of any one race—though, perhaps, the English and French are just now in the majority, while there are also of “Yankees” manyer than customary.

Music is always a great feature in the fetes of Baden Baden. In this most popular and humanizing of recreations M. Benazet has afforded his patrons many a delightful treat. Last year he got up a famous concert for Vivier, when that most inimitable of humourists was aided by the magnificent and munificent Jenny Lind, and the audience was composed of one-third crowned heads, one-third scions of royalty, and one-third wealthy travellers, and Vivier left Baden crowned with laurels and laden with 500 guineas worth of specie. This year we are promised something equally attractive, in the shape of the courtly Sontag, the superb Alboni, or the young and genial Cruvelli—Sophie, the fruit of whose Fidelio and Norma has sounded in every hill and valley, in every city, town, and village of the continent.

To reach Baden from London involves the easiest and pleasantest and dædalest of tours. Once at Ostend, and all the disagreeable part of the route is accomplished. You then visit old Bruges and its towers, Malines and its laces, Louvain and its Hotel de Ville, Ghent and its churches, Liege and its quays. You shoot through the hills to Verviers, by the many tunnelled railway, passing Chaude Fontaine, Pepinster, and many a charming spot. You sleep at Aix la Chapelle, with Carolus Magnus, not stopping to drink water at the Cathedral. You spend a night at Cologne, and pay homage to the supreme Dome by the light of the moon. You pass immediately to Bonn, dine at the Golden Star, with a real bottle of Geisenheimer; walk to the Minster-platz; glance at the frowning effigy of Beethoven, a giant in stone; and pass through the vines to Godesberg, where, if the weather be hot, you may repose under the hoary ruins of the Castle. A little boat now takes you over the Rhine to Königswinter, and, having climbed the Drachensfels, you row across to Nennenwerth, where Liszt did not come to dinner. Here you get at once into the dampschif, pass the Roman Andernach, Coblenz, and Ehrenbreitstein, the “fort of forts,” Stolzenfels, and the Loneley-beg, that inspired poor Mendelssohn with ideas for the stage; sweep by Mainz, with a sneer for its garrison; disdain the clean and straight streets of Mannheim, not even tarrying to pay homage to the statue of Goethe at Frankfort-Maine—until you find yourself at last safely sheltered under the crumbling walls of the magnificent chateau of the Counts Palatine. Here you confide yourself to Morpheus’s embraces; and the next morning, after a good breakfast and a bottle of Hocheimer, you proceed on your course, and in a brief interval find yourself at Baden Baden, the goal of your desires. At the best hotel you call for a bottle of Johannisberg, which will be brought to you in the shape of some first-rate Rudesheimer—note that Johannisberg is purely a myth—which well-flavoured beverage you quaff while ruminating retrospectively on the scenes and objects you have encountered on your journey.

Of Baden Baden more anon.

BARBIERI NINI.

The first appearance in England of this celebrated lady has been hailed by the press as an event of the highest importance. Our own opinion of her merits and pretensions will be found in good time. Meanwhile, we quote the articles of our chief cotemporaries:—

(From the Morning Post.)

The novelty at the above theatre last evening was the first appearance in England of Madame Barbieri Nini, a lady who for some time has enjoyed very great celebrity in Italy. The opera selected for her London debut was Lucrezia Borgia, and the admirable manner in which she personated the heroine fully justified the vast renown which had preceded her. We have seen almost all the famous Lucrezias both here and on the Continent, and assuredly never saw certain phases of the repulsive, but powerful character, more truthfully or grandly developed than they were by Madame Barbieri. The life-like reality and artistic beauty of her performance throughout the first act firmly established her in the good graces of the audience, who already felt that a great artist was before them. Her delivery of the opening recitative, "Tranquillo si posa," revealed declamatory powers of a lofty order; and the succeeding aria "Com'è bello," whilst it served to show the singer's perfect mastery over the mechanism of her art, was rendered with a touching expression, which went to all hearts. Nothing could be more true to nature than her look and manner where Lucrezia affectionately contemplates her son Gennaro, as he reposes in the bright moonlight. "How handsome he is!" exclaims the unhappy mother—what enchantment in that noble countenance! The pure stream of maternal tenderness swells up from the inmost depths of her guilty heart, and seems to quench for a time the all-consuming fires within her. She is filled with rapture; but anon returns the bitter consciousness of what she is, and, with a wild burst of anguish, she supplicates Heaven to spare her the unspeakable misery of being despised by her son, as she is by others. In the rendering of this passage Madme. Barbieri was very great indeed. The agonised tone of her voice fully expressed the terrible emotion of one who has reason to dread the loss of the only tie which binds her to existence. She carried the sympathies of the audience by storm, and thunders of applause followed this ebullition of histrionic genius.

Another beauty of a high order in this act, was her rendering of the solo "Ama tua madre," in which Lucrezia bids Gennaro love his unknown mother—pray for her—and hope that she may one day press him to her bosom. We never heard anything more exquisitely tender, more thrillingly pathetic. There was love in every note, but pure, holy, maternal love, rendered doubly interesting by the circumstance of its fearing to reveal itself to the being who should reciprocate it. The sweet mournful tones of the still haunt our memory, and we feel how inadequate are words to convey the effect they produced. At the conclusion of the first act Madame Barbieri was enthusiastically called for. In the second, we remarked many fine touches of nature, but there are certain points in it, requiring great force and energy, in which she did not quite equal certain celebrated representatives of the character whom we have seen.

'Prega' che l'ira placiasi,
Della sua sorte acerba.'

Throughout the third act, her acting and singing were perfect, and never was an encore more richly merited than that which her beautiful execution of the solo, "M'odi, ah! m'odi," elicited. After the final fall of the curtain, Madame Barbieri was called for three times, and heartily cheered from all parts of the house. Nature has bestowed upon this lady a soprano voice of rich and sympathetic quality, combined with intense musical and dramatic feeling, and study, with experience, have enabled her to make a noble use of these qualities. Mr. Lumley, therefore, may congratulate himself upon the acquisition of another really great artist.

(From the Morning Herald.)

"Mr. Lumley has certainly done no unwise thing in securing an engagement with Madame Barbieri Nini, the celebrated prima donna who, for some years past, has been well known here by name. Remembering previous disappointments under similar circumstances we apprehend the audience did not enter the theatre last night, when this vocalist made her first appearance in this country, in Lucrezia Borgia, with any great anticipations; but they were soon deceived. It was at once apparent that Madame Barbieri Nini was not unjustly entitled to the reputation which attached to her, and the wonder was that she had not been heard before. The advantages of youth, beauty, and stature, certainly do not belong to her, her features being large, and strongly marked with the Hebrew types, and her figure short and thickly set; but this was of little consequence. An artist in the best sense of the word, was present, and the impression upon the audience was unmistakable. The voice of Madame Barbieri Nini is a pure soprano, the middle of the register, exceedingly sweet and vocal, being the best portion of it, the lower notes wanting something in resonance and volume. Clearness and beauty are, however, the characteristics throughout, but few of the indications which but too obviously tell of professional wear and tear being perceptible. On the contrary, there was a sentiment of youth and freshness in the organ—at variance with appearances, certainly—which charmed while it astonished. The style of Madame Barbieri Nini put the spectator in vivid remembrance of Pasta, who probably has not been so nearly approached since she retired from the stage as in the present case. There is, perhaps, a leaning to a redundant form of elocution, but this is not felt to be inappropriate. To the principal dramatic situation in the opera, Madame Barbieri Nini gave a point and emphasis witnessed only in the performance of Grisi, breadth and grandeur of conception being as evidently visible, as firm, accurate, and well disciplined execution. Her delivery of the duet with Gennaro in the prologue, and that with Alfonso in the first act, were in every respect admirable—the dramatic feeling which animated each, receiving its crowning truth in the catastrophe, which was acted with a tragic spirit, forcible and interesting in the highest degree. We have never heard the pathetic aria, "M'odi, ah! m'odi," sung with such delicate and felicitous phrasing—with such finished and refined taste—and the ill-suppressed ejaculations of the audience prepared us for the encore which followed. The house, in a word, was lifted into an unexpected state of delight, by the ability they witnessed; and the recalls the debutante experienced after each act of the opera was accompanied by demonstrations too earnest and vociferous to be the result of intrigue.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

The vocalist who made her debut as Lucrezia Borgia last night, Madame Barbieri Nini, is no nervous and juvenile candidate for public approbation, having held the position of a prima donna in many of the Italian theatres for several years. Florence, we believe, has been her principal scene; but in Turin, Genoa, and other cities, she has been long and favourably known. We cannot but regret that a vocalist possessing so much merit should be introduced to the English public at so late a period of the season. Two months since Madame Barbieri Nini would have made a greater sensation here. But although the regular opera audience is beginning to disperse, we are satisfied that she will produce an impression amply sufficient to justify the liberal and spirited manager in the course which he has pursued. Madame Barbieri Nini's voice is of a charming quality, her power is great, her style thoroughly Italian, and of the best Italian school; and though time has somewhat touched a very fine organ, it is still of so high a quality as to give us ample reason for complaint that it was not introduced to us some few years since. Personal advantages the new singer has but few, her figure being very expansively developed, and her features strongly marked. But her voice is of an order that more than atones for any absence of external fascinations. Her action, though somewhat deficient in repose, is intelligent and appropriate; and in the painful scenes of the lyrical tragedy chosen for her debut she evinced an energy and an abandon which, coupled with her undeniably fine and telling style of vocalisation, obtained for her continuous and sincere applause. We have no hesitation in describing the first appearance of Madame Barbieri Nini as a most decided success.

(From the Daily News.)

Madame Barbieri Nini, who last night made her debut in this country, in the character of Lucrezia Borgia, is indeed a star of the first magnitude. She brought with her a great reputation; it being well known that she has long held the highest place in the principal theatres of her own country; but Italian reputation has so often produced disappointment of late years, that we have ceased to have much faith in it. In Madame Barbieri Nini, however, there is no mistake. Whether regarded as an actress or a singer, she possesses the gifts and attainments of a great and most accomplished artist. She seems to be a little turned of thirty, is somewhat short and stout in person, with features which, though not handsome, are capable of strong expression, and in her whole appearance has a general resemblance to Pasta, whom she likewise resembles in having more dignity and grace than one would at first expect from her figure. Her voice is a soprano, uninjured by time. It is at once powerful and sweet; pure, resonant, and possessed of that ringing, vibrating quality which is at once delightful to the ear and touching to the feelings. It is, moreover, extremely flexible, is emitted with great facility, and never fails, either in the most arduous passages of execution or the most violent bursts of passion. Her style belongs to the pure Italian school, rather of the past than the present day, exhibiting the most exquisite portamento, and that beautiful roundness and finish in every phrase which now-a-days is so very rarely met with. Add to all this that her singing is full of Italian fervour, and that music, in her mouth, is the very language of sentiment and passion.

Such being her qualities, it may easily be imagined that her Lucrezia Borgia was a splendid and triumphant performance. Before she had finished her first air—the cavatina, “Com'è bello,” sung by Lucrezia as she hangs tenderly over her sleeping son—she had quite carried with her the sympathies of the audience. The subsequent duet with Gennaro was full of pathos, Lucrezia's softness forming a striking contrast to the suppressed fury which distorted her features and smothered her voice, while she bore the taunts and insults of Orsini and his companions. The famous trio in the second act, while the Duke, in the presence of Lucrezia, administers the poisoned cup to Gennaro, made an extraordinary impression on the audience. At its close the curtain fell amid acclamations from every part of the house. In the last scene of all Lucrezia's frantic despair formed the climax of a performance which, for power and beauty, we have rarely seen surpassed.

(From the Times.)

Madame Barbieri Nini, who has been announced from the commencement of the season as one of the stars of Mr. Lumley's troupe, made her first appearance last night in Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia. Her success was unequivocal. It is hardly to the credit of our two Italian theatres that a vocalist who has for a great many years enjoyed the reputation of being the first singer in Italy, and who divided with Madame Tadolini, when that celebrated artiste was in her prime, the sceptre of Italian song, should have been allowed to devote her talents so long for the exclusive advantage of her compatriots, while to the boasted emporium of London she was but a name. Madame Barbieri Nini is, perhaps, the only famous singer of modern Italy who has never, till now, been heard either in Paris or in London. Better late than never, however; and though the charms of youth, whatever they may have been in Madame Barbieri Nini, have almost departed, the manner in which she was welcomed last night by a crowded audience showed that the English public are disposed to appreciate and applaud real talent, in whatever form and at whatever period it may be brought forward.

Madame Barbieri Nini owes much of her fame to the operas of Verdi, for which her style and physique eminently befit her. The Due Foscari and Macbeth were composed expressly for her; and it is chiefly to her exertions that the success of these works in the principal towns of Italy must be traced. On the other hand, the renowned prima donna has paid the usual penalty entailed upon the exponents of Verdi's music. Although, unlike poor Abbadia, who three years ago, at Her Majesty's Theatre, exhibited the wreck of a fine organisation, she has not fallen a victim to her penchant for the favoured composer of “Young Italy,” Madame Barbieri Nini has materially and irredeemably suffered. From what her voice is even now, however, may be easily imagined what it was years past, viz., one of the most magnificent ever heard. Some of the higher notes are still powerful and wonderfully brilliant; but the medium is worn, and the lower notes have a kind of sepulchral tone which is anything but musical. Nevertheless, Madame Barbieri Nini is a superb vocalist, and displays such an extraordinary degree of boldness, that the defects of a jaded organ are overlooked or forgotten in the daring impetuosity of her execution. It may be well accredited that at one period, as has been frequently recorded, the voice of Madame Barbieri Nini resembled, in a great measure, the scale of the clarinet, from its wide compass, its fulness of tone and mellow quality; and indeed, the peculiarities of that instrument, its faults as well as its beauties, are still to be remarked. The prominent characteristic of Madame Barbieri Nini's singing is its amazing energy. She dashes off her roulades with an aplomb and a force that leaves the ear no choice but to accept them, the momentary surprise arresting the desire to examine. Her expression is fiery and exaggerated, the feeling awakened by her finest passages being invariably that of astonishment, rarely, perhaps never, that of pleasure. In what may be termed the poetry of song Madame Barbieri Nini is altogether deficient. Throughout her entire performance last night, overpowering—foudroyant, to use a French term—as was its effect upon the audience, we candidly own that we were never once moved, as we have been moved a thousand times before in other singers, by one of those graceful, sweet, and tender touches which are the very essence and soul of the vocal art. Madame Barbieri Nini has none of those. Her talent, her style, her organisation are utterly opposed to them. The absence of charm is continually felt, while you are applauding her most skilful and original tours de force. The manner in which she hides the defects of her voice and sets the ravages of time at defiance, however, cannot be too highly extolled. Any singer in the world might take a lesson from Madame Barbieri Nini in this most important point. She has also an extraordinary facility in attacking the highest notes of the register. There is never the slightest hesitation. The power and certainty which the majority of singers can only attain by a gradual approach, Madame Barbieri Nini achieves without any preparation or artifice of mechanism. Her cadenzas, ornaments, and floriture are quite her own. They are more remarkable for independence than for grace, and are not always used with taste; but the unerring promptitude with which they are executed satisfies the ear so entirely that the judgment is left at a standstill. To sum up; with only a few notes, and those in the highest register, that have preserved their strength and freshness, Madame Barbieri Nini has studied to such good purpose, and pushed the resources of the art to such extreme limits, that to deny her to be one of the most admirable of vocalists would be to violate truth. As a counterbalance to this must be adduced certain faults in the manner of producing the voice, in the abuse of accent, and in the caricature of expression which, in a singer of her age and experience, render hope of amendment out of the question. We must take Madame Barbieri Nini for what she is, since she is not likely ever to be better or worse; and with this conviction we must pronounce her a great, a wonderful executant, in whom natural facility, an organ and a physique originally something far transcending the ordinary line, and a prodigious amount of courage and assurance, united to an ardent and unbending temperament, supply the place of poetry, grace, and legitimate sentiment, of which she is evidently destitute.

As an actress, we feel compelled to place Madame Barbieri Nini much lower in the scale than as a singer. Her person, her physiognomy, her carriage, are somewhat against her. She has the physical drawbacks of Pasta—being short, plain, and ungraceful—without the nobility of bearing, the sublimity of aspect and gesture, which, although nothing more than the result of intense application and consummate art, rendered that naturally ungifted woman one of the most perfect and unapproachable artists that ever trod the boards. The chief element in Madame Barbieri Nini's acting is a sort of vulgar energy, accompanied by an indomitable assurance, which carries her through in spite of everything, and cannot fail to be imposing at first sight. We are not used to indulge in comparison; but in the present instance we are compelled to break a rule which should never be lightly infringed. The model we have been used for some years to look up to, in the great part of Lucrezia Borgia, is Madame Grisi; and with so ambitious, practised, and mature a rival as Madame Barbieri Nini, it is impossible not to be forced into a consideration of the respective pretensions of the two. Our honest conviction induces to declare that, as a histrionic effort, the Lucrezia of Madame Barbieri Nini is not to be named in the same day with the Lucrezia of Madame Grisi. If we look at the grand points, we find the inferiority of conception painfully conspicuous. For example, in the finale of the first act (or prologue), when Orsini tears the mask from the face of Lucrezia, who can forget the mingled feelings of outraged dignity, offended womanhood, and suddenly conceived revenge, that play upon the features of Grisi, und declare themselves forcibly in her attitudes and gestures? Madame Barbieri Nini contents herself with escaping suddenly through the crowd, leaving the audience quite in the dark as to the effect produced upon the stately Borgia by the insult offered to her person. Again, in the scene where Alphonso gives the poisoned cup to Gennaro, the subtle indications of feeling that make the impersonation of Grisi an unceasing source of interest of the most intense and painful nature, in the hands of Madame Barbieri Nini are exchanged for a mere caput mortuum—a common-place exhibition of anxiety, and nothing more. In the following duet, where Lucrezia persuades Gennaro to swallow the antidote, it would be absurd to make a comparison; the distance between the two is as the distance between the poles. The last scene is equally wide of the mark; but it must be taken into account that, besides the gift of genius, apparent in the one and absent in the other, the extraordinary disparity in the personal attributes of the rival artists cannot fail to have an irresistible influence. While Grisi appears, among the unhappy victims of the Borgia poison, as a revenging spirit, sublime in her reproaches, Madame Barbieri Nini gives you the notion of an angry scold—her elaborately measured declamation, accompanied by a lisp, which robs her enunciation of emphasis and dignity, verging on the bombastic rather than on the truly impressive. To conclude: as an histrionic effort, we can only accord to the Lucrezia of Madame Barbieri Nini the merit of earnestness and energy; in all that is poetical, and beneath the surface, it is wanting.

The above analysis, written with the best good feeling, leaves us but little to say of the performance of last night. The great vocal effects produced by Madame Barbieri Nini were in the cavatina, "Com'è bello," the cabaletta of the duet with Gennaro, "Ama tua madre," the duet with the same at the end of the second (first) act, "Infelice, il veleno bevesti," and the cantabile, "M'odi, ah! m'odi," where the despairing mother vainly entreats her son to take the antidote. The last, a beautifully expressive melody, was so buried in bravura ornaments, that, to our way of thinking, the intention of the composer was altogether frustrated. Nevertheless, it produced an immense effect, and was re-demanded with enthusiastic acclamations. In short, the impression produced by Madame Barbieri Nini upon the house was undeniable. She was recalled after each act, and after the last no less than three times. The general sentiment was, that a great singer had been heard for the first time in London. The opinions we have ventured, after a most attentive hearing, are sufficiently decided; we shall, nevertheless, return to the subject on the next occasion, and, should we find reason to modify what we have advanced, shall be ready and pleased to do so.

The other chief characters were supported by Gardoni, Lablache, and Alboni. The glorious contralto produced the accustomed furor in the "Brindisi," and we have not the slightest hesitation in declaring that, according to the ideas we have been accustomed to entertain of pure and masterly vocalisation, the "Il segreto per esser felice" of Alboni was the finest artistic display of the evening.

From which it may be gathered that Madame Barbieri Nini, in the opinion of our cotemporaries, is an artist of extraordinary talent.

FIDELIO.

(Continued from our last.)

The finale forms what might well be called an epilogue to the opera, the action of the drama being so far completed in the previous scene that what remains to be developed in this might naturally be taken for granted as matter of course, and the exultant jubilation which is the chief feature, if not the prevailing characteristic of the composition being a musical rather than a dramatic effect, the proper and the truly poetic consequence of what has preceded it, but by no means a part, scarcely a continuation of it. The same is the case with the finale to Don Giovanni, in all that follows the chorus of fiends, during which the hero disappears, and with the finale to the Freischütz, in all that follows the death of Caspar, but there is this distinction between these notable works and the finale we are about to consider, namely, that in Don Giovanni the dramatic interest so entirely ceases when the libertine is carried away that the eminently beautiful music which succeeds is always omitted as being entirely incompatible with the modern requirements of stage effect, and in the Freischütz the musical and dramatic dulness of the greater portion of the finale goes far to annul the brilliant and very extraordinary and exciting effect of the whole of the opera, while in Fidelio, just when the interest of the action and of the music has attained its highest possible degree, the change of scene and the assumption of an entirely new character in the music, opposed in every respect to the gloominess or to the highly impassioned colouring of the music in the dungeon, the audience is inspired with a new feeling, and raised perhaps to a greater enthusiasm than by any other means they could be, by the very reaction of that powerful interest which it has been the fully successful aim of the whole opera gradually to stimulate to a most powerful climax. This is a great triumph of the genius and the skill of the musician over all the exigencies of theatrical custom, a custom grown out of the obvious necessities of the case, namely, that when the action of a drama has been developed to its crisis it is impossible to excite the interest or to retain the sympathy of an audience any longer; but, while we admire Beethoven for the powerful exception he has made to the general rules of reason and principles of propriety, and wonder at the means by which he has so gloriously succeeded in a situation, when Weber and even Mozart, the model for all time, have failed; we must ever bear in mind that this finale is a singular exception, and that it is so because it is this finale, since nothing short of what it is could be heard with patience, much less listened to with interest by any audience that can appreciate the prodigious beauties comprised in the rest of the work.

We are brought to the outside of the prison. The prisoners led forth by Jacquino are about to pass in examination before the minister, who had come with a state commission to investigate the condition of those placed under the governance of Don Pizarro. The governor attends upon him to give account of his charge, and the people throng in anxious multitudes to witness the ceremonial. Don Fernando, the minister, declares his mission to administer justice,—as a brother he visits his brethren, and whom his duty will allow him to help he will assist. Rokko brings forward Don Florestan and his devoted wife, and the threats and the insinuations of the governor have no effect to prevent his disclosing the history that had formed the action of the opera. Fernando recognises in Florestan his bosom friend, the champion of truth, who had been supposed dead, and placing Pizarro under arrest has him removed to await his time of judgment. He then orders Rokko to strike off the fetters of the unlawful captive, but, checking himself, he hands the jailer's keys to Leonore that she may personally complete the task she has so nobly undertaken, and thus far, so heroically fulfilled, of her husband's enfranchisement. Marcellino has one expression of surprise and regret at the disappointment of her hopes from Fidelio, but this feeling is absorbed in her generous sympathy with the rapture of the re-united lovers. All join in a prayer of fervent thanksgiving, and the whole terminates with a brilliant poem of joyous exultation, heaping honour and love upon the noble wife, whose constant firmness through all her trials has met its full reward in the accomplishment of her great task of passionate affection.

The opening movement is a chorus of prisoners and people rejoicing in the day that brings justice in bond with mercy before the portal of a living grave. Broad and clear and excessively simple, the harmony being almost entirely confined to the two chords of the tonic and dominant, and there being an utter absence of even the most transient modulation, this movement, which from its general style and its prevalent accent, we may describe as a march, announces at once the entire change of character that the music from hence assumes, and the entirely new feeling by which all the persons in the drama are now pervaded. A long symphony anticipates the chief matter of what is afterwards, in a somewhat more extended form, given to the voices. The principal melody is free and fresh, and tuneful, widely differing in every respect from that of the prisoners' chorus, which commences the first finale, as does the whole tenor of the movement, from that of the former chorus, in the same degree as differs the feeling of the state captives, who now come forth from their dungeons with the certainty of justice and the hope of liberty, whereas before they felt them to be enjoying but a momentary indulgence which was qualified by their knowledge of its short duration, and by the consciousness that they were still under such close observation that they were forced to repress those natural emotions which the sense of the pure air and the sight of the sun in heaven naturally stimulated within them. In this former instance it was all in keeping with the situation, and quite in character with the general expression of the music, that every allusion to the horrors to which the victims of tyrannous state policy knew that they must immediately return, should be uttered with all the shudderful aversion which the anticipation of the future from the retrospection of the past could not but suggest. In the present situation, however, we feel that the composer has injured the general effect of his music and sacrificed to a certain extent the propriety, if not the sense, of the scene by entering too minutely into the details of verbal expression. When he interrupts the regular swing of the movement to give a particular reading on the words, "Vor unser's Grabes Thor," and resumes the tone of brightness that otherwise pervaded the whole, on the concluding word of the sentence, "eracheint." Now, we have a general and a particular objection to this treatment, which we offer with the deepest deference, but which we feel it to be our duty to advance alike in respect of the peculiar excellence of the whole work, and with regard to our own zealous sincerity in the endeavour to do justice to this excellence with our tribute of deep felt admiration. First, then, we cannot but feel that the general feeling of overflowing gladness which the situation suggests, and which the music conveys, would not, nay, could not be broken for an instant and then resumed by the mention of the prison, mentioned as it is in the exultation of quitting it, in the apprehension of its horrors, nor even in the recital of them. Second, we feel that the sense of the words is at least perverted, if not absolutely burlesqued by the rendering here given to them; this is the literal meaning of the sentence, "Justice with grace in union before the door of our grave appears," and in Beethoven's rendering the words printed here in italics are always given with an especially mournful expression, interrupting the feeling of gladness that elsewhere prevails and that, to our comprehension, the complete meaning of the sentence under question particularly indicates in signifying that the door of the grave is brightened by the appearance of justice in union with grace. We have yet a third objection to this treatment of the passage which is, perhaps, of more musical importance than all we have yet proposed, and this is, that the continuity of the movement is more than once broken by the littleness of verbal description, and thus the general effect is impaired, if not destroyed.

Fernando's didactic address to the prisoners has about it an air of stiffness and contrivance wholly at variance with the evident spontaneity that chiefly characterises the opera, and it is neither musically interesting nor vividly effective. It concludes with a graceful phrase of melody, which, however, makes not up to us for the bleakness of the recitative that introduces it. In all this portion of the finale our composer appears to have struggled with the necessity of setting so many words to music rather than to have written music because the words inspired him, to have made, not created, what has all the character which betokens contrivance and want of geniality, which distinguishes art from nature. Of course, these remarks are widely general, and it is chiefly because Beethoven has given us the right to expect all from him that when, as in the present case, he fails of all, we find so vast an emptiness. It could not, however, be but that in any long amount of writing our composer must, in spite of circumstances that fetter him, in spite of uncongenial subject, in spite of himself, make some points of interest; of these we may specialise a passage in A, commencing where Fernando sees with surprise the fetters on Florestan, in which a somewhat curious figure of four semiquavers has an air of great originality; and a passage in F sharp minor, where the chorus express their execrations at the disgraced Pizarro.

The real interest of the finale begins after all explanation is ended, where there remains nothing but the thanksgiving and the exultation of the characters who now, as it were, separate themselves from the action they have completed to form their own apotheosis, losing personal in the ideal and making us forget the active possession of happiness in the abstract conception of happiness itself as a glorious and self-existent and all beautiful principle. The andante in F is a most poetical rendering of devotional fervor, pure and heavenly colour, but deep and earnest; glad, but with the enthusiasm of gratitude, not the rapture of passion. It is one continuous stream of melodious beauty, supported by, but in no wise subservient to, the harmony which is always single, unforced, and natural. It abounds in the most charming vocal effects, which are heightened by the accompaniment of constantly sustaining wind instruments, and it is remarkable for the happy admixture of the solo voices with the chorus. We cannot particularise points, as the chief merit of the whole is that it is a whole, and that no part stands out conspicuously from the rest, and thus we find its true beauty, namely, in its eminent fitness for its situation. Of a totally different, yet perfectly congenial character is the allegro that follows, including the stretto which grows out of it. Here we have a truly sympathetic, human, earthly feeling which touches all hearts with a master key that will everywhere unlock the channel of kindred emotion; who-ver has known the rapture of an overflowing, boundless, unalloyed, ecstatic gladness, find its expressions here, and feels his heart dilate with that larger, grander, nobler, worthier, manlier feeling than pride; the consciousness of fulfilling his part in the universal sympathy of what is good and great when he witnesses its competent performance. Excepting some most closely relative, very transient modulations, we may say that the whole of this last movement remains in the same key of C major, and even these modulations might be appropriately termed modulations within the key, since there is no decided point made in any but the original tonic, and these departures from it are only secondary phrases which so occur, as scarcely to disturb our feeling of the one chiefly prevalent key note. Here is an example of how great effects may be made out of little means, which prove, like the concluding movement of the first finale in Don Giovanni, and some of the choruses of Handel, that, in the hands of a true master who fully knows how to apply the resources of his art, the broadest, the grandest, the most imposing results are indeed produced from the most simple materials. We have here a fine, large, and truly noble subject given out by the full force of the chorus and orchestra, a subject so fresh, so heartfelt, and so entirely spontaneous in its character, that it is impossible for an uninitiated mind to hear it and not be kindled to enthusiasm; thus it sung the praise of the noble Leonore. We have then a short episode of the most touching loveliness wherein the two lovers interchange expressions of mutual endearment, and here we feel an expression of the gentlest tenderness equally perfect with the rendering of an universal, all imperious joy that characterises the whole of the rest of the movement. In this episode we have the only decided change of key in the whole, namely, a modulation through A minor into G, the dominant of the original key; but this dominant is so instantly quitted, as to leave the impression rather of a half close than of a decided change of tonic. A few bars for the chorus break this short passage for the solo voices from the succeeding solo of Florestan, which consists of the precise subject before assigned to the chorus, with which the movement opened. This solo is introduced by an orchestral passage that is the most entirely unique in its effect of anything in all the range of instrumental music, which if not so incomparably beautiful as it is entirely singular, has at least nothing to surpass it that has yet crossed our experience of instrumental combination, and the particular passage has so very much to do with the orchestral distribution and with the effect produced by it that the whole could only be imitated to be repeated, so that the present instance must always remain perfectly unique as it was the very first time it was heard. It consists of a series of triplets for the first violins on a sequence of first inversions, the first note of each triplet being an appoggiatura, the semitone below the root of the chord on which it revolves, while the oboe has the harmony note against this appoggiatura, a combination that strikes the practised eye as intolerably disagreeable, but on the ear produces an effect of incomparable piquance and brilliancy; this top line is accompanied by the second violins and violas, pizzicato, in unison with the clarionets, staccato, on the third and fifth of each chord. The figure is continued through the tenor solo, and gives not only an entirely new character to the subject, but throws such a glittering radiance upon the movement as brightens our thoughts with the recollection of a sparkling, quivering joyance, for long and long after the details of the music have passed away from our memory. Leonore has now to sing the same subject without any intervening episode, the effect of which is, this time, further heightened by a still more elaborated accompaniment. This consists of a counterpoint of semiquavers for the second violins and violas, which conveys to us a sense of the fleet, flattering suffusion of all joy and half anxiety that still fevers his very lifeblood, while the two quavers for wind instruments on the unaccented crotchets of each bar suggest the violent throbbings of her still agitated bosom, the tempest tumult of which is not to be lulled but by a long, unchequered sunshine, if even then, a being of her ardent, sanguine temper could sink into that tranquil morphine state of dreamless sleeping, which under the more respected name of content is but an apathetic indifference alike to the warmth in which its beams break, and to the very orb that suns him. The stretto then commences with a phrase of the chief subject in a considerably accelerated tempo, which is now much prolonged, coming after some time to a half-close on the dominant, on which pedal note an alternation of tonic and dominant harmonies accompanies a passage of very exciting brilliancy. There is then a phrase of lengthened notes for the six solo voices, responded to by the full chorus and orchestra, with a fragment of the chief subject; then, again, this same reciprocation of solo and chorus; then, the most striking effect in the whole finale, the introduction of a chord of B flat, just in the same manner that the identical same harmony is introduced in the Gloria of the Mass in C of Beethoven—that masterpiece of Catholic devotional music; and then the glorious burst of the harmony of G major, which stalks in with all the glory of a new created sunshine, with all the majesty of a bridegroom whose path is happiness and whose step is consciousness; then we have a closer alternation of solo and chorus, and then a wondrous passage in unison, which has the power of a whirlwind, and the grandeur of omnipotence—such an A flat there is in this as quickens to an almost sense of pain our power of attention, and makes us truly gasp in wondering ecstasy! This passage brings us back to the dominant pedal, and then we have a notation repetition of the whole of this course of overgrowing excitement, which gains if possible an intensity by this notation repetition. Finally, in place of the dominant cadence with which, before the circle was completed, the passage is prolonged by the introduction of a fundamental seventh on C, and then with a few bars of simple, broad harmony, the voices conclude, leaving to the closing symphony a recurrence to one of the most striking points of the movement, and a prolonged repetition of the harmony of the key note which terminates the opera, with all the grandeur that befits so glorious a work, leaving on the hearer a lasting impression of the consummate beauty of the opera, and of the consummate greatness of the master mind which created it.

NEWS OF LOLA MONTES.

Paris, July 30.

What has become of Lola Montes? is a question, I suppose frequently asked in London by many of the myriads who have seen or heard of the chances and fascinations—the wild exploits and adventures—of this admired and mysterious lady. The question is not difficult to answer to one moving in a certain “set” in a certain quarter of Paris not a hundred miles from the Place Vendôme—or to anybody else indeed who happens to “know all about it.” Lola is neither conquering another king, nor marrying another husband, though she could doubtless do both if she chose. The fact is, kings have become so unimportant all over the Continent, and husbands so ridiculous all over the world, that persons of the highest taste find neither worthy of their notice. Accordingly, the Countess of Lauds-feldt—the title that Lola has resumed since her residence in Paris—has taken a loftier flight, and has returned with more than her old enthusiasm and a promise of more than her old success, to that career in which she was once so briefly conspicuous.

The stage has lately become a favourite arena for titled ladies of high aspirations or low fortunes. But it is doubtful whether the appearance of even the Countess of Rossi or Barbieri Nini are events of such singularity or universal interest as that of the whimsical, wandering, eccentric, capricious, and bewildering Lola.

The fact however is certain, that Lola is to re-appear upon the stage; and the fact is disappointing that Lola will not appear in England, nor in France, nor indeed in Europe. America, which is just experiencing its “next morning” after its recent musical intoxication, is destined to be visited by a relapse, and to be again astonished out of its dollars and property, that is to say, supposing the Americans to have the good taste to behave with an appropriate degree of absurdity.

Meantime—pending the period of her departure, which is fixed for October next—the Countess is “taking steps” to regain that mastery over her art of which her long rest must necessarily have deprived her. The Jardin Mabille is the scene of her daily practice, and Mabille himself is its director. The favoured few admitted to these morning mysteries anticipate from the discriminating many who are so soon to sit in judgment, a reception something more than startling. To see, indeed, is inevitably to believe; and supposing the Americans to be neither blind nor mad at present, it seems very possible that they may soon become both.

The new dances of Lola Montes (which are shortly to be published) are six in number. Their arrangement, their method, their mechanism, au Mabillé; their grace, their originality, their character and nationality, are her own. And in this character and nationality, rather than in any conventional merit which belongs to ordinary dancing, lie their chief charm. They belong as evidently and irreparably to Spain as ever did its blue hills, its bull fights, its dark eyes, its donnas, and its duennas. I could say a great deal, in particular of the opening Tarantula, but to criticise in detail would perhaps be premature. Meanwhile it may gratify those who can look at the art with souls above a ballet-master, to know that the coming triumph of Lola Montes is not to be gained by an appeal to any low standard of taste.

For the rest it may be as well to mention that during her absence from the stage Lola has not lost any of those personal charms which can add éclat to her return. Her eye has lost nothing of its strange, and startling brilliancy, her form of its harmony and proportion, her motions of their grace. Above all, she is still young, and still enthusiastic.

For the benefit of those among your readers who are interested in business-like particulars, I may add that New York is to be the scene of her first appearance; that a report of her previous engagement at the Montansier, has no foundation whatever; and that she will reign in the new world as her own mistress, unfettered by Barnum or by any other person.

RACHEL.

(From the Morning Post.)

The career of Rachel affords a singular example of the power of genius. Born in obscurity, the native splendour of her talents burst through the clouds which overshadowed her opening life, and she had not completed her seventeenth year when she raised to a brilliancy which it had never before attained, the dramatic literature of France. We do not depreciate the glories achieved by Corneille and Racine, nor would we detract from the merits of those lesser lights which have followed them and Molière. We admit with equal readiness the noble illustrations by which Talma, his compeers and predecessors, rendered the undying works of which we speak familiar to the public mind of France. But it was reserved for Rachel to clothe with new and previously unknown beauties the finest creations of those immortal writers. She has made their heroines her own, and inspired them with a new and more sublime excellence. The severe monotony of French heroic verse she has translated into a harmony of rich and varied music, of which no one could have believed the language capable. On her tongue the stern rigidities and frigidities of French tragedy are changed into the glowing fluency of Shakspeare.

And the triumphs of Rachel are all her own. She owes her eminence to no master.

Rachel is a name, which, like Talma, was assumed as a nom de théâtre. Elise Felix—such is her real name—was born at Munf, in the Canton of Aarau, Switzerland, on the 28th of February, 1821. Her father is a native of Metz, and the maiden name of her mother was Esther Haya. M. Felix is a man of strong natural intelligence, who, at the time she was born, earned but a scanty subsistence for himself and his family, by pursuing the humble vocation of a hawker. After many changes of place he settled at Lyons, where the early years of Rachel's life were spent, and from thence, while she was yet under ten years of age, the family found their uncertain way to Paris, where they fixed their habitation in a poor dwelling in the Place de Grève.

Many are the anecdotes which float on the surface of contemporary literature with reference to the subsequent history of the great tragedian. Most of them are without any other foundation than the imaginations of their writers, or the gossip of general conversation. The indisputable facts may be very briefly told. In childhood she often accompanied her elder sister Sarah from café to café, picking up such slender contributions as the good nature of the company might bestow. Her education might be said to begin under the superintendence of M. Choron, who had established a singing class in his house in the Rue Monsigny. She was admitted to this class in the year 1831. In the following year she began to attend Saint Aulaire's class for declamation, and her first attempt in the art which she elevated and adorned, was made at the Théâtre Molière, where she essayed the character of Hermione, in "Andromaque." Her success procured for her an admission, dated October 27, 1836, to the Conservatoire. She was then placed under the tuition of Messrs. Michelot, Samson, and Provost, but it does not appear that any of these distinguished professors formed any very high idea of her capabilities, or anticipated the marvellous success which she was destined to achieve.

We find her next performing at the Gymnase, under the management of M. Poirsou, where she made her debut on the 24th of April, 1837. The piece was entitled "La Vendéenne," and appears to have been written for the occasion. She was "favourably but not enthusiastically received." But it was here that she attracted the notice which transferred her to the Théâtre Français, at which she made her first appearance on the 12th of June, 1838, in the character of Camille in "Les Horaces."

A debut at the Théâtre Français, in the dead season of the year, is esteemed in Paris an event of little importance. The candidate for fame is looked upon as a pupil. He is expected to pause where his predecessors have paused, and to imitate, rather than to strike out a path for himself. The wise are wont to shake their heads in doubt. Criticism dispenses her common-places—and the house is asleep.

"Madlle. Rachel's appearance," says one of her intelligent biographers, "had a marvellous effect on the old abonnés of the Français: she not only surprised them but kept them awake. They stared at each other, utterly confounded by her disregard of all traditions and real energy. The very performers were startled by her originality, and by the new meaning and force given to a word or a phrase by her way of uttering it: as Jules Janin said of her, 'You must not ask her before the piece begins how she will say a certain sentence, for she cannot tell you; the impulse is momentary and spontaneous. She is like the Pythonesse of Virgil, first pale, her body bent, her arms hanging down; but, on the arrival of the god, her exhausted nature recovers its animation, the fire mounts from her soul to her eye, her heart throbs violently, and sends forth the breath of passion and energy. She appears like an animated Grecian statue, so classic is her form.'"

The gradual impression made on the receipts of the Français will be seen by the following statements extracted from a work entitled "La Comédie Française, depuis 1830":—

Date.	Characters.	Gross Receipts:
1838. June 12.	Camille in les Horaces ...	752 francs.
... 16.	Emilie in Cinna ...	558
... 23.	Camille ...	303
July 9.	Hermione in Andromaque ...	373
... 11.	Emilie ...	342
... 15.	Hermione ...	740
Aug. 9.	Aménaïde in Tamcrède ...	620
... 12.	id. ...	422
... 16.	Eriphyle in Iphigénie ...	716
... 18.	Camille ...	594
... 22.	Aménaïde ...	800
... 26.	Hermione ...	1,225
... 30.	Aménaïde ...	650
Sept. 4.	Hermione ...	629
... 9.	Aménaïde ...	2,048
... 11.	Camille ...	1,804
... 15.	Hermione ...	1,218
... 17.	Aménaïde ...	1,118
... 23.	Hermione ...	2,129
... 27.	Emilie ...	3,150
... 29.	id. ...	2,400
Oct. 3.	Hermione ...	4,281
... 5.	Monime , in Mithridate ...	3,660
... 9.	id. ...	4,640
... 12.	Hermione ...	5,529
... 17.	Camille ...	4,440
... 19.	Hermione ...	6,131

During the thirteen years which have followed, the largest sum here set down would be deemed a very small receipt indeed for one of Rachel's nights. Her reputation has deservedly increased up to the present hour, and tragedy, which had been proclaimed extinct before her appearance, commands a vastly larger income to her theatre than any other species of entertainment.

The following extract from a letter addressed by Madlle. Rachel herself to Mr. Mitchell, whose spirited enterprise and refined taste has rendered her inimitable performances an ornament of the London season—gives a summary of what we have said in a manner which does honour to her heart. It is dated from Vienna, 21st September, 1850:—

"En vérité, quand J'énumère mes succès depuis que je suis au théâtre, Je me prends à me demander si ce n'est pas un rêve. Eh quoi! me dis-je, cette pauvre petite fille qui allait, il y a vingt ans, de café en café, chanter de pauvres chansonnettes pour gagner un léger salaire, se trouve aujourd'hui à la tête d'une littérature que la France honore; elle en est l'interprète, et déjà son nom et sa réputation ont traversés les mers! Oui, je me sens heureuse, et j'en serais fière, si le bonheur, dans les nobles cœurs n'empêchait tout sentiment orgueilleux."

Original Correspondence.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—The financial tactics only theatrical management will, of necessity, so much depend on the extent of CAPITAL employed, with regard to all actual disbursements, that I believe it useless to attempt making any suggestions upon the matter—further than this—PUBLICITY has been proved to be worth ALL its costs,—and in this respect no retrenchment need be advised, although some slight deviations from the beaten track is to be adopted,—my principal reform in the financial department would consist in applying the NEW broom (which sweeps clean) to the removal of those cobwebs which the abuses of past time have suffered to accumulate—namely to the ENTIRE ABOLITION of the order and free list system—to a PARTIAL curtailment of press privileges, and to an exact consideration of the means by which a certain class of females shall be excluded, whereby the patronage of a respectable public shall be secured.

With regard to the first of the above named,—one only opinion can exist when the matter shall be fairly considered—with regard to the second, I am aware that I tread a hallowed ground,—but at the same time I am aware that a community so intellectual and so omnipotent as the public press, requires only to have the matter placed before it in a proper light, in order to concede all reasonable demands.

That this point may show itself in the strongest possible light, suppose we adduce an instance—A. B. has engaged Drury Lane Theatre at a certain price,—knowing that a certain number of Renters Tickets must enter the establishment, free, whenever the curtain is drawn up.

What will the public think when it can be shewn that, provided the said A. B. shall have exceeded the usual privileges of a free list, and that the public press shall exceed its present undoubted rights—between 400 and 500 individuals can obtain admittance every night without payment of a single farthing!!!—yet such is the fact, and can be proved by simple arithmetic, whenever any one may choose to calculate the number of daily and weekly newspapers, which, together with reviews, magazines, &c., &c., have each (each but few exceptions only) the power of sending into any theatre, an Editorial representative and orders for two! It may here be urged that, instances are of rare occurrence wherein all the above named privileges are at once exercised, but this is merely in consequence of the paucity of attraction. Let but English Opera become as well managed as Italian Opera, and every one who could enter the theatre FREE would do so. There is, however, a bad fundamental principle attached to the order system which escapes general comment—namely, that the facility of OBTAINING orders prevents many accustomed play-goers from PAYING, who can afford both the means and the will. Thus an injury is inflicted not merely in “transitu”—but in “futuro.” I would therefore, as the result of abundant consideration, abolish the ORDER system ENTIRELY—in fact, so rigidly, as to permit of not even a single free admission, excepting the bona-fide representatives of the PRESS itself, every recognised member of which should be eligible on presenting his official card. In respect to a free list I see no recognisable vested rights, and would concede none—thereby closing the door effectually to all abuse of privilege. There is much more than this to be urged in extenuation of a sweeping reform—particularly as regards the impolicy of making a shew of success, where none exists, by filling a house with orders, in preference to playing to empty benches; but let the system be viewed in every light, and it will be found to result in the same thing—an empty hollowness—a deception which deceives no one—and which ultimately conduces to no other than the one usual routine—a shifting of the scene from the stage of “Drury Lane” to that of “Portugal street.”

With regard to the exclusion of any portion of Her Majesty's subjects from a place of public resort, there is at present NO LAW. It is well known that Mr. Macready did attempt, but did not succeed in effecting his purpose—yet the attempt did much good, and abundantly justified itself in the eyes of all right thinking persons. Should a charter of incorporation be hereafter attainable for a National Opera, it is just possible that some part of its enactment may provide a remedy for this evil, which at present operates much more greatly against dramatic interests than is generally supposed.

The next all-important branch of financial reform, is the arrangement which might be entered into between the Composers of Operas and the Publishers. At present no one knows exactly how the arrangement is made—it is a deed done in the dark, as if all parties were ashamed of it. The transaction is clearly a commercial one, and should be treated accordingly—to wit—There are three persons whose interests, in the productions of an Opera, may be called nearly equal. The Composer—the Producer, and the Publisher. Let these three be brought fairly together, and let something like the following agreement be entered into—

Preliminary.

So soon as an Opera shall have been decided on as “WORTH PRODUCING,” an estimate to be made of the cost of “mounting,”—say, £300.—after which—

Let it be proposed that the Publisher shall advance, to the Manager, one moiety of this sum, the Composer being suffered to stand neutral in consideration of having already expended his time and talents—and in conclusion—

Let the Composer's recompense begin with the first night's representation, which I would place at £20 per night, (from both Manager and Publisher), for five nights, after which it should be reduced to £10 for five nights more, and a corresponding decrease afterwards, according to the circumstances of the case.

By some such agreement, all parties would share the risk and would be equally interested in the profit. With regard to the Librettist, he might either be recompensed with the sale of his libretto in the house, or otherwise, according to arrangements with the Composer.

Having now, Mr. Editor, trespassed at more than usual length, I will conclude by stating that many other minor reforms would naturally spring out of those which have been pre-stated. It might also be politic to abolish all fees to box keepers, &c., to consider well the practicability of reforming the system of money and check taking, &c.,—and also, I believe, that such an improved system of management would grow the probability of obtaining higher prices of admission than are at present asked. I will, next week, suggest a mode by which the forthcoming dead-season may be rendered available for the purpose of bringing together a body of artists who may be willing to enroll themselves as provisional members of a National Opera, at the same time giving my idea of the extent to which such a body might wisely be constituted.

I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

PHILO-MUSICA.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

July 31st, 1851.

Sir,—Your report of the adjourned Annual Meeting of the London Sacred Harmonic Society is, I think, calculated to produce an unfavourable impression of its position and prospects on the minds of its subscribers and friends. I intrude a few remarks by way of explanation.

The actual loss of the Society during the first year was—£876 7 10

	second	251 10 6
Last fifteen months	- - -	110 0 0

	£1237 18 4
Allowed by Mr. Surman for Orchestra	- 97 15 0

£1140 3 4

So that our losses have decreased most rapidly, while subscriptions have every year increased. I think these are two signs of unmistakeable evidence we are not going down hill, but just the reverse. The fact is, we have passed through the storm of early trial, and the result is we feel now a new position should be taken, and one that evidences we know no fear, and are determined the Society shall progress; we begin this year with a contingent amount that will never for a moment impede our progress or curb us in our endeavours to further the Society's best interests. Should we prosper, and of that I have not even a shadow of doubt, I believe we shall never abuse it to attempt to depress others who may have to struggle on as we have who preceded them; and if we fall I am sure we shall fall without having done aught as a Society to tarnish its fair name or cause any to regret they were ever united with it.

Trusting to your known kindness to insert these few remarks,
I am, Sir, faithfully yours,

G.

P.S.—I enclose my card as required, as I do not wish my name to appear.

HANDEL'S NEW SACRED SONGS.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

MR. EDITOR.—In acknowledging, with thanks, your courteous and candid review of my adaptation and arrangement of Handel's New Sacred Songs, I am ready to admit the justness of your observations as to the previous publication in this country of some of them, as musical compositions, but certainly not all. Again, the adoption of sacred words does constitute a first publication in this country in that particular form; for let any one of the eight Sacred Songs be required, and no earlier edition than mine will be found to have existed, therefore I think the observation "now published for the first time" will be conceded as justifiable. Having a complete set of Handel's forty operas in my possession, in full score, it has been to me a work of love to endeavour to bring out some additional "gems of Handel," and by adapting sacred words where the character of the music was appropriate. I trust that in a short time these will be found no mean addition to the sacred works of Handel. In the entire operas, however, I do not find an available chorus, or concerted piece, that I can turn to the same account. But many of the songs are, certainly, of rare beauty, and purely Handelian. It has been a source of much gratification to me to receive from many of our first musical professors kind words of encouragement and approval of the work as it has proceeded; amongst whom I may name Madlle. Jenny Lind, Sir George Smart, Sir Henry R. Bishop, Professor Taylor, Mr. Wm. Knvett, and the late highly gifted Mendelssohn.

Yours, very truly,
R. ANDREWS.

Dramatic Intelligence.

FRENCH PLAYS.—ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—On Friday, the first of August, M. Bouffé made his first appearance after a three years' absence, during which time this celebrated actor has been prevented by indisposition from resuming his professional duties. Great credit is due to Mr. Mitchell for having been the first to tempt him from his retreat after his perfect restoration to health. Michel Perrin was the piece chosen for M. Bouffé's re-entree. This is one of Melesville's best compositions, and at the same time one of M. Bouffé's happiest conceptions. There is a heartiness of character, a naïveté of manner pervading the whole piece which win our sympathies at once, and rivet our attention up to the very last scene; we alternately laugh and cry with the kind, simple old curé who saves and perils the safety of France some three or four times in less than an hour. M. Bouffé entered fully into the humour and pathos of the part, and with the exception of Perlet, we never saw the character so well played before. His comedy was genuine in every respect, and with an utter disregard of stage conventionalities, he elicited universal approbation by the unaffected truth of his impersonation. Although somewhat thinner than he was a few years ago, M. Bouffé betrayed no symptoms of impaired health, and the general tone of his performance showed an actor in possession of his full powers and intellect. Indeed we may say that there was more finish in his acting than on any previous occasion. The whole conception was a masterpiece, but his indignation on finding that he has been, although unwittingly, playing the spy, the disgust with which he throws the purse at the feet of the minister made a powerful sensation on the audience. There was no exaggeration, nothing but the most simple expression of feeling, and the effect was a complete storm of applause. M. Bouffé was recalled after the play, and loudly cheered. Mdme. St. Marc played the part of Therese with great feeling, and the other characters were well sustained. On Monday last we witnessed the performance of Le Gamin de Paris. This piece is too well known to need any comment, and the principal character is too essentially French to captivate the attention of an English audience to the extent it does in Paris, yet the tone of the piece is good. There is a well sustained vein of good feeling running through the plot, and which makes it interesting, apart from the peculiarities of the character itself. We may say that M. Bouffé came triumphantly out of this very difficult ordeal. He played to the life the dare devil young imp of the earlier part of the piece, and so strong was our illusion that we almost fancied we had before us one of those young plagues who infest the boulevards and the barrières, and jeopardise the comfort of the tranquil and demure fiancé to a wonderful extent. In the second act a great change takes place, the scapegrace feels all the responsibility of the brother. The scene with the general was replete with sentiment and genuine feeling, and M. Bouffé drew tears from more than one pair of fair eyes. The part of the General was sustained by M. Lafont with dignity, and the perfect gentleman was visible in every gesture, in every inflection of the voice. On Wednesday we were prepared to see M. Bouffé in one of his most masterly creations, that of Grandet in "La fille de l'avare. Unfortunately, we were doomed to be disappointed. M. Saint Marie appeared before the audience and explained that a sudden indisposition would prevent M. Bouffé from redeeming his pledge to the public, claiming their indulgence, and begging leave to substitute M. Lafont, who had volunteered to play in Catherine; ou, La Croix d'or. This exchange was accepted, and M. Lafont accordingly appeared in his favourite part of Sergeant Austerlitz, which he never played better in our remembrance, being well supported by Mdme. St. Marc and M. Tetard. We sincerely trust that M. Bouffé's illness will not deprive us of the pleasure of seeing him in his favourite parts, of which we have preserved a most lively recollection. M. Bouffé is one of the few comedians still remaining whom we cannot afford to lose, as we see no chance of finding a successor of his superior attainments.

J. DE C.

DRURY LANE.—The Equestrian Circles seem to be rising in popular esteem. Drury Lane is crowded every night, and at Vauxhall, the Rotunda fairly divides attraction with the fireworks. At Drury Lane, in place of the popular and beautiful Anato, we have Madame Browes, who, if hardly equal to her rival in face and form, or in the strength and decision of her leaps, makes abundant amends in the breadth and energy of her style, and in the novelty and variety of her positions and attitudes. The feats of Messrs. McCallum and Stone and the young Loisset the reader must witness to appreciate. They have certainly never been equalled in the English equestrian circle. At Vauxhall, the lovely Anato looks and rides as charmingly as ever. The performance on the two horses, by Hernandez and his fair companion La Jeune Francaise, has a touch of impassioned grace in it, which, if it were seen oftener in these exhibitions, might add much to their attraction. It is the same power of association, or, if you please, dramatic painting, to which Madlle. Caroline has resorted with so much success; for she does little else but what any woman may be called on to do whenever she mounts a spirited horse. The charm consists in the fair artiste's doing this with the utmost conceivable ease and grace. In this object she is aided by a handsome face and a finely turned form, while the simplicity and keeping of her dress and appointments are made with great adroitness to conduce to the general effect. The graceful and flowing riding habit, delicate linen breastwork, the black beaver hat and feather—even the white kid gloves and small riding whip—all contribute to the graphic truth and unity of the picture. In fact, the astonishing feats that are witnessed nightly in the equestrian circles, should, like dramatic and other exhibitions of the kind, be made, if possible, to touch the imagination and passions of the spectator; otherwise although he may gaze and wonder, his memory will remain unretentive, and his heart cold. By perceiving this, Madlle. Caroline, at Drury Lane, and Hernandez and his fair companion at Vauxhall, have been enabled, with comparatively little exertion, to match their performances with the most startling equestrian feats of the season.

PUNION'S PLAYHOUSE.—People are not generally so fast asleep however "fast" they may be when awake—as to slumber on, undisturbed by a gentleman in the next room practising on that quiet instrument, the trombone, at two o'clock—and, in fact, at every other o'clock—in the morning. It is not therefore surprising that the gentleman, Mr. C. Shivers, who is afflicted with the propensity in question, should get turned out of every lodging he enters, until he is at last obliged to take refuge in the Shot Tower at Waterloo Bridge. Here he hopes to be able to give way to his weakness, or rather, considering the tones produced, his forte, for his beloved instrument without molestation, but meets a Mr. John Clumps who has also chosen the same retreat, for the purpose of avoiding the very trombone in question, having been completely blown out of his lodgings by it; and although not unwilling to feast upon music in an intellectual manner, is very averse to the "blow out" just mentioned, which he has not been able to digest. He soon listens once more to the "sounds so familiar to his ear," but instead of wiping away [the furtiva lagrima, after the fashion of the celebrated military gentleman so well known for the gush of feeling that overpowered him on once more beholding the village church, and the cottage near the brook, Mr. Clump seizes the trombone, and throws it over the balcony of the tower, and by so doing, as Mr. Shivers kindly informs him, kills an innocent being who was passing below at the moment. Mr. Clump believes the tale and delivers himself up to intense grief. He imagines he is irretrievably lost, but is shortly found—in this state, and in the Shot Tower—by a romantic young lady of the name of Sappho, and in search of a sensation. On meeting with, as she thinks, a murderer, she is highly delighted—the thing is so beautiful, so exciting, so uncommon. She aids the supposed criminal in his endeavours to escape, which are, however, unsuccessful. He is compelled to return to his airy abode—by the way, a policeman's airy abode is generally in another direction—and there discovers that Sappho is a long lost niece, and that she loves Mr. Shivers. He therefore gives his consent to their union, and the curtain falls upon an exceedingly witty, well-imagined, and clever little production.

The part of Sappho was played in a most intelligent and pungent manner by Miss Marshall, on whose shoulders most of the farce rested. This young lady is a valuable acquisition to the theatre. She is always good, and sometimes not to be surpassed, particularly when she has a character suited to her; for instance, with the exception of Mrs. Keeley, there is no one on the stage who can play a soubrette with such pleasing impudence and imperturbable coolness. She was very well supported by Messrs. John Reeve and Rogers. The latter gentleman is fast rising in public estimation.

At the conclusion of the piece, which the bills announced to be from the pen of Angus B. Reach, Esq., the applause was long and hearty, and the success complete. We thank Mr. Reach for the amusement he procured us, and beg to assure him that every Shot in his Tower told on the audience with wonderful effect.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The Gazza Ladra was repeated on Saturday, and went off even better than the first night. Alboni was in magnificent voice, and carried off all the honours, leaving but little to fall to the share of Lablache, Calzolari and Coletti, each of whom was admirable in his part. Mdlle. Ida Bertrand's Pippo was well sung, though, occasionally a little too obtrusive, and her acting showed a fair conception of the character of the farmer's boy. We must, however, advise Mdlle. Ida Bertrand that Rossini is allowed to be a good composer, and to have a tolerable knowledge of the requisites for the voice. We can assure her that her new cadenzas and alterations in the duet in E flat, in the prison scene, are not improvements on the original, whatever she may imagine; and would counsel her strongly to follow the example of Alboni, who always exhibits a thorough respect for Rossini. Mdlle. Ida Bertrand may follow the example of Alboni without any condensation.

On Tuesday, Madame Barbieri Nini made her first appearance in this country, in Lucrezia Borgia. Mr. Lumley, it would appear, is determined to carry out every thing to which he has pledged himself in his prospectus this season, even though he has far exceeded all the promises therein held out. Madame Barbieri Nini constitutes the ninth prima donna engaged this year, the eight others being Fiorentini, Caroline Duprez, Sontag, Alaymo, Ugalde, Nau, Cruvelli, and Alboni. Madame Giuliani might have been added, but that fair artist has lately restricted herself to parts belonging to seconde donne.

The house was crowded on Tuesday, and, independent of the curiosity excited towards the debutante, great interest attached to the announcement that Alboni was to resume her original part of Orsini, in the Lucrezia Borgia.

Madame Barbieri Nini comes with an immense reputation from Italy, where for upwards of twelve years she has reigned almost alone as Prima Donna Assoluta. Her appearance has been promised in this country for several years, but somehow the engagement threatened has not been completed, or entered into, has not been fulfilled. Madame Barbieri Nini, we are informed, shines most in Verdi's operas. Macbeth, and other operas were written expressly for her by Verdi; and other composers have also written to her peculiar talent. She chose to make her debut, however, in Lucrezia Borgia, preferring Donizetti to Verdi in which to make her initiative essay. Whether for better or worse can only be ascertained when Madame Barbieri Nini comes out in the Due Foscari, which she will do shortly.

We are not going to enter into a critical analysis of Madame Barbieri Nini's performance on Tuesday night. Premising that she is a very extraordinary artist, and that she created a sensation almost unprecedented, we shall reserve to ourselves the expression of our opinions until we have heard her a second time, and confirmed, or modified our impressions. Meanwhile we have furnished extracts from all the leading morning papers, and the reader may draw his own conclusions from what they contain. One thing is certain, Mr. Lumley has obtained a new prima donna, who promises to turn out an immense attraction. We shall have much to say of Madame Barbieri Nini in our next.

It is hardly necessary to add that Alboni's Orsini was inimitably sung, and that the famous Brindisi created the old furor.

The opera was followed by the favourite ballet of the Diabla a quatre.

On Wednesday Fidelio was repeated, with the first act of Masaniello. Taken altogether, the performance of Fidelio was perhaps the best yet given, at least as far as the principals were concerned. Cruvelli sang magnificently and was recalled after every scene. We never heard her in more splendid voice. At the end of the opera she was called for twice, and received with the utmost enthusiasm. The house was unusually full for an extra night, a hint to Mr. Lumley that Beethoven and Cruvelli are among his chiefest attractions.

In the first act of Masaniello Madame Fiorentini sang with her usual suavity and sweetness, and the inimitable Monti drew tears from all eyes by the irresistible pathos and beauty of her acting. The entire of the ballet was encored.

On Thursday Alboni made her first appearance as Maria in La Figlia del Reggimento, and achieved a new victory by her superb singing and admirable acting as the vivandiere. Our readers are already aware that Alboni created a furor at the Grand Opera of Madrid in Maria, and of course they will be led to expect nothing less at Her Majesty's Theatre. And such was indeed the case. Alboni was enthusiastically received throughout the performance, and seldom, if ever, produced a greater sensation on her hearers. A triumph like this cannot be overrated. Alboni had to contend against the vivid remembrances of Jenny Lind and Sontag in Maria, but having taken an entirely different view of the character from her predecessors, she did not provoke the slightest comparisons. Had she done so it might have been to her advantage. Alboni's Maria is one of the most simply natural and wonderfully easy performances ever witnessed on the stage. Her acting is quite as spontaneous as her singing,—as unlaboured and graceful. Like Duda, in Lord Byron's Don Juan, Alboni never seems to "think about herself at all." Alboni does not exhibit the ars celare artem, simply because she does not exhibit any art. We have no doubt but there are many who would prefer the theatric formality and conventionality, but for our parts we decide in favour of Alboni's perfect unsofistication.

Alboni was received with immense cheers when she entered. Her dress differed much from that of all the vivandieres we have seen. She wore no cap, and instead of the short petticoats and ankle boots of Jenny Lind and Sontag, had donned trousers and Wellingtons. The skirts of her petticoats, too, were much longer than those of other Marias we have seen—an unnecessary special pleading for modesty when trousers were used. The regimental jacket and trimmings were retained. Alboni looked remarkably handsome. Her face beamed all over with youth, health, and spirits, and she looked the very incarnation of happiness.

And then her singing. She was in adorable voice, and warbled like a thrush in prime when the shower has passed away in the smiling spring evening. And no thrush on topmost spray ever more loved to pour his unpremeditated lay upon the listening and hushed ear of late eve, than Alboni, to whom singing appears to come as natural as to a song-bird.

We were perfectly enchanted with Alboni's singing on Tuesday night. Singing which surprised us more we may have heard, but certainly no singing ever penetrated the tympanums of our ears, which more delighted, more rapt, and more thoroughly satisfied us.

We need not enter into details. All our readers are, or ought to be, thoroughly acquainted with Donizetti's pretty music in La Figlia del Reggimento, and all our readers are, or ought to be, familiar with Alboni's delicious tones; ergo, all our readers can have a tolerably shrewd conception how the music of Maria was given by Alboni.

The popular air "Ciascun lo dice," delivered with bewitching naïveté and irresistible animation, was encored tumultuously, and the Rataplan was received with little less ardour. Like Miss Poole, Alboni introduced the side drum, and made such good use of the sticks—we were on the point of making an excellent pun—that we should advise the renowned and novel-seeking Jullien to engage Alboni, instead of the sixteen French drummers for his approaching hybernal season, and, although we never lay the odds, excepting when we have the best of it, we don't mind staking 2 to 1 in any sum of money ourselves may name, that the glorious Maria and her one drum will make the sixteen noisy extracts from the National Guards beat an inglorious retreat. We hope our friend Jullien will take our advice, and look after Alboni. And all we have to say in the matter is—that we wish he may get her.

Alboni introduced the rondo finale from Balfe's Maid of Artois as the closing morceau, and sang it magnificently, displaying in lavish profusion the riches of her wondrous voice, and carrying away her hearers into an atmosphere of delight, into a heaven of her own creating, away from the theatre, from lights, from noise, from earth.

Frederick Lablache makes the best of Sergeant Sulpizios, and Gardoni one of the most interesting and mellifluous of Tonios. The graceful tenor was encored with great applause in his air in the second act.

A scene from the Cosmopolites followed.

Last night, Don Giovanni was repeated with Alboni instead of Sontag in Zerlina. We have only room to say that Alboni created an immense sensation in Mozart's peasant girl, and was the great feature of the performance. We trust Alboni may repeat Zerlina again, in order to afford us an opportunity of descanting at large on its merits.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert attended the performance.

The divertissement from Il Prodigio followed.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE performance of Rossini's fresh and sparkling opera, La Gazza Ladra, on Saturday night, was in most respects highly efficient. The cast of the principal characters was the same as last year, with one exception—the Pippo of Mlle. Angri—a decided improvement on that of Mademoiselle de Meric.

Ninetta, the first part in which Grisi obtained celebrity, is, perhaps, the best of her melodramatic impersonations. The great charm of this performance is its spontaneity. In the opening scenes, the keen enjoyment of existence, the offspring of an innocent heart and life unclouded by sorrow, is exquisitely painted; while its musical expression in the joyous cavatina, "Di piacer mi balza il cor," which flows from the lips of Grisi with a volume and richness of tone rarely united in a soprano voice, finds ample and powerful development. In the scene where Ninetta strives to protect her father from the jealous scrutiny of the amorous Podesta—in that of the accusation and arrest—in the trial and procession to the scaffold—and in the last scene when the guiltlessness of the unfortunate servant girl is so unexpectedly established, the acting of Grisi has been apostrophised sufficiently often in befitting terms of homage. Never, perhaps, did this admirable artist more entirely merit the praises that have been lavished on her than on Saturday night, when, with the zeal and energy which invariably distinguish her, she exerted all her strength to please and satisfy the audience, obtaining her well-merited reward in plaudits as genuine as they were frequent and unanimous. Ronconi's Podesta has been justly pronounced a masterpiece. The fun and humour of the first act, which though occasionally bordering on extravagance never quite attain it, are not more to be admired, as traits of comic power, than the serpent-like cunning and eager restlessness of the trial scene, where the wicked magistrate in using all his wiles to obtain the condemnation of his unhappy victim, discovers the blackness of his soul, and exposes himself to hatred and contempt in lieu of simple ridicule, are to be commended as subtle demonstrations of dramatic art, showing the actor's deep insight into the hidden springs of human nature. The first act of Ronconi's Podesta has perhaps been equalled in the element of provoking merriment, but the elaborate rascality of the last, indicated in every movement of the face and body, embodies Ronconi's special view of the character, and stamps it, in his hands, a thoroughly original conception. Quite as fine in its way is the Fernando of Tamburini, which, as a picture of rough and honest sentiment, of a true and affectionate nature under a lean and shabby exterior, has not been equalled by any other actor. In such parts the successor of Tamburini has yet to be met with. The music, moreover, is well suited to his particular style of execution; and the prominent features, such as the trio "Oh Nume benefico," the finale to the first act, the air "O colpo impensato," the trial scene, &c., were given with unabated vigour and excellence. Mario's Giannetto was perfect. As a piece of homely and unaffected acting this assumption may be placed among the most successful efforts of the great tenor, whose voice, by the way, in the aria d'entrata, "Vieni fra queste braccia," evinced agreeable signs of restoration to its native force and beauty. Mademoiselle Angri, in Pippo, was as genial and hearty as could have been desired; and nothing could be more spirited than her delivery of the lively bacchanalian air, "Tocchiamo, beviamo," or more careful and effective than her singing in the duet of the prison scene with Ninetta. The small parts of Fabrizio, Giorgio, and Lucia were ably sustained by Tagliafico, Polonini, and Madlle. Cotti; and Signor Soldi was sufficiently grotesque as Isacco, the pedlar, although his singing would have gained by a slight increase of vivacity. By the way, this gentleman and Polonini were eminently useful in the cast, each playing a couple of characters; the former doubled Isacco and the gaoler, the latter Giorgio and the Mayor—which all but ubiquity was rendered practicable by certain peculiarities of costume, that abetted rapidity of transformation.

The general execution (excepting in the trial scene, where the chorus were occasionally at odds and ends) was excellent. The overture, superbly performed, under Mr. Costa's direction, was unanimously encored.

On Monday, an extra night, included in the subscription, was given, when the Puritani was performed.

Don Giovanni was repeated on Tuesday, Madame Viardot playing Donna Anna. Madame Viardot was not in her best voice, and if she were we should have infinitely preferred Grisi, whose Donna Anna is one of her most powerful impersonations. The opera passed off well, although the house was by no means overcrowded.

On Thursday the Prophete was given, when Her Majesty and Prince Albert attended. The house was very full.

To-night the long talked of Saffo will be produced. The management, we are assured, has spared neither pains, nor expense in putting this chef d'œuvre of the composer on the stage in a style of efficiency and completeness; and Madame Viardot has spared no pains in procuring for it an adequate number of rehearsals—more than has been accorded to any work of Mozart, Rossini, Meyerbeer, or Auber. We shall, therefore, look for a perfect performance in M. Gounod's Saffo, a work which, from the extreme care and attention paid to it, would appear to be of more vital importance than any that has yet taken its stand in the repertory of the Royal Italian Opera.

ALBONI'S FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO.

(From the Times.)

IN her representation of Mario, in La Figlia del Reggimento—a complete "character-part," in the language of the English theatres—Mademoiselle Alboni, who performed it for the first time last night, has given what may be called a new reading. She has not the pastoral prettiness and simplicity of Jenny Lind, nor does she subdue the character like Madame Sontag, but she exhibits the vivandiere with a jocund truthfulness which has the pleasantest effect imaginable. The dress is her own. She does not attenuate the ankles of Maria in little fanciful boots, such as sylphides, when they become earthly, love to wear, but she puts on good substantial military trousers, and assumes an air of general robustness. Her delicious voice rolls through the lively melodies with which the opera abounds, and when she sings with her chorus of "fathers," every look and gesture is overflowing with unsophisticated happiness. The daughter of the regiment, she doats on her numerous parents, she loves the drum she beats, she lives in an atmosphere of enjoyment. When the dreadful fine lady snatches her away from her old comrades, and teaches her to sing the formal song, which has been composed only to be abhorred, many expected to see her use a little more spitefulness,—a little more hatred of the dull aria as a contrast to the affection for the dear "rataplan," but good humour seems to be inherent in the nature of Marietta Alboni, and do what she will, she cannot get into a bad temper. In all her joys, and in all her griefs—and these are very prettily represented both by voice and manner when she gives a parting embrace to her old friends—in all her emotions she is well supported by Frederick Lablache, who represents Sergeant Sulpizio, with becoming formality and engaging bonhomie.

Reviews of Music.

"THE TWIN POLKAS,"—WALTER CECIL MACFARREN. Wessel & Co.

Both exceedingly melodious, exceedingly rhythmical, and exceedingly well written. For "twins," however, they do not bear much resemblance to each other, and on the whole we prefer Marie, in C flat, to her sister, Julie, in A flat. These polkas may be recommended as useful and agreeable teaching-pieces, though not altogether of the easiest.

"LA COQUETTE,"—VALSE BRILLANTE.—IGNACE GIBSONE. John Campbell.

Mr. Gibson is not only a clever musician and an excellent pianist, but his compositions evince both fancy and finish. The "Coquette" is a very neat and graceful specimen of his talent. Without being at all difficult it is showy and brilliant. The themes are both good, and the whole is put together in a skilful manner.

We can recommend it at once as a skilful teaching piece, and an elegant morceau de salon.

"THE ISABELLA POLKA."—By P. EZEKIEL. H. White.

A lively polka which is likely to rival in popularity the "Honey-moon Polka."

"THE BRIDAL MOON"—BALLAD—Written by HARVEY SHELTON, Esq.—Composed by VAL. MORRIS. John Campbell.

A pleasing ballad in the sentimental style, the opening phrase of which bears somewhat too close a resemblance to a well-known melody in Norma.

"LA FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO"—FANTASIA BRILLANTE, OP. 5.—THE EARL OF BELFAST. Cramer, Beale & Co.

A brilliant series of variations, preceded by a short intrada, on the popular air, "Ciascun lo dice," from Donizetti's opera, requiring great command of the instrument, but with a sufficiency of elegant passages to recompense the player for the pains he may bestow in accomplishing them. Lord Belfast is one of the most accomplished of our amateurs, but his music is very difficult.

"AS I SAW FAIR FLORA"—GLEE FOR FOUR VOICES.—HENRY TOLHURST. C. Jefferys.

A specimen of vocal harmony, in four parts, highly creditable to the taste and musicianship of the composer, who has skilfully caught the tone of our ancient madrigal writers. We can recommend this composition as a pleasant and useful addition to the library of every English Glee Society. The only solo is for the bass voice, and this, though difficult, is effective.

PRIZE GLEE.—"AS A GARLAND ONCE I MADE," G. W. MARTIN R. Addison & Co.

This glee gained the second of three prizes given at the Glee Club, April 28th, 1849. It is therefore, of course, to be judged respectfully. But without having the opportunity of inspecting those glees to which the prize was not awarded, we cannot undertake to offer an opinion as to whether it merited the distinction conferred upon it. It is written for four voices in the key of C, but the harmony and melody are both devoid of that freedom of motion which is essential to pure vocal effect. Mr. Martin's chief object seems to have been to have avoided certain progressions forbidden by the laws of harmony, and he has succeeded, though not without the result of a limping rhythm, forced passages of unison, and occasional baldness in the disposition of the harmony, to which the Macassar oil of careful reconsideration might be applied with advantage. The great philosopher Bacon hath pronounced, "Pilosity to be incident to the orifices of moisture," and the scattered hairs of harmony, so rarely strewn throughout Mr. Martin's glee, may be accepted as an emblem of the dryness of his page.

"HASTE YE SOFT GALES,"—Glee, G. W. MARTIN. Robert Cocks & Co.

This is a better glee than the prize glee, but still open to criticism on the same grounds. Let Mr. Martin take more pains and we are sure he will do better.

"AS THE STREAM THAT SHINETH BRIGHT." MADRIGAL. G. W. MARTIN—Robert Cocks and Co.

The Madrigal is shorter, more melodious, and consequently more pleasing than the glees of Mr. Martin. The only fault we have to signalise is the monotony which must always arise from excess of closes, half and whole, especially repetitions of similar closes in similar keys which fatigue the ear.

"DANCE RECOLLECTIONS"—Caprice for the Pianoforte, introducing "Les Rats Quadrille," "Trab, Trab," "Dernier Valse de Weber," "Sturm Marsch Galop," "Schottish Polka," and "Indiana Waltz." Arranged by J. R. LING.—J. Williams.

The Dance Recollections of Mr. J. R. Ling form a sufficiently agreeable Caprice, the themes being of themselves not only popular but attractive, and well contrasted, the whole being arranged in the usual skilful and effective manner of the composer.

"SPEAK GENTLY"—W. T. WRIGHTON—Charles and Robert Ollivier.

To speak gently of this composition, it offers no especial point for criticism.

"PERSIAN LOVE SONG, 'HASTE, LEILA, HASTE, THE NIGHT WINDS SIGH'—AMELIA EDWARDS. Ewer and Company.

We presume that Miss Amelia Edwards is an amateur, and we therefore are not disposed to discuss with critical severity the merit of the Persian love song, which, however, may be praised for its liveliness.

"SECOND NOCTURNE"—ADRIEN TALEXY. Jullien.

What we adduced in our last in re nocturnes, may be re-perused in considering the present offering of M. Adrien Talexys at the shrine of popularity in D flat, with all the customary modulations and transitions, not forgetting the approved enharmonic change from D flat to A, &c. Seulement, we are unable to accord the same amount of praise for ingenuity and taste to the present nocturne of M. Talexys, as last week we had the pleasure of awarding to Mr. Jarrett's example.

"THE BEDFORDSHIRE WALTZES." Jullien and Co.

A pretty set of waltzes, beginning in E flat and ending in A flat, nicely written, not very difficult, nor very original, but acceptable as agreeable bagatelles.

"THE FAIRY WATCHER"—Song, Written by J. E. CARPENTER, Esq.—Composed by EDMUND B. HARPER. Charles and Robert Ollivier.

Does the composer of this pretty and well written ballad, in A flat, know a song by the late Charles Horn, entitled "A Moorish Maid?" If not, we recommend it to his inspection, in order that he may compare the phrase on the words, "Lullaby, sweet lullaby," with the burden of Mr. Horn's song. As far as criticism goes, we have no fault to find with Mr. Harper's music, which exhibits both taste and good feeling for harmony.

"FOUR AIRES DE BALLET FROM LE PROPHETE.—J. HERZ.—T. Chappell.

The sparkling and brilliant ballet music of the Prophete carefully reduced for the pianoforte, and made into exceedingly showy and effective teaching pieces. We can strongly recommend them.

"BLEST IS THE MEMORY OF THE PAST."—A TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF HER LATE MAJESTY, THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—J. M. WEBB.—Webb's Royal Music Saloon.

But for a passage beginning at bar three, in the bottom line of page two, and ending at the top line page three, which involves a superfluous repetition of the dominant half close, this song, which is very well written, might be taken for one of the canzonets of Haydn. Exhibiting, as this does, so much care and such an evident anxiety to attain finish, merits praise, and we have the greatest pleasure in recommending Mr. Webb's song to our musical readers.

"THERE WAS AN OLD WOMAN WENT UP IN A BASKET."
BALLAD.—WORDS BY MORTON.—ROBERT GUYLOTT.—Webb's
Royal Music Saloon.

Being composed by Mr. Guylott this is not the old air, but it is quite as good in its way. The first verse of the old song is retained," and Mr. Morton has added some fanciful and modern-fangled couplets to make up three more verses.

Miscellaneous.

M. PANOF, the eminent professor, a talented composer, has left London for Paris.

M. JULES STOCKHAUSEN, the popular vocalist, has left London for the Continent on an artistic tour. He proceeds in company with Ernst to Bale, Zurich, St. Gall, Lucerne, Neufchatel, Lausanne, and Geneva, where the great violinist intends to give concerts. Afterwards, M. Stockhausen proceeds to Vienna, where he is engaged to sing at the "Bach Gesellschaft." M. Jules Stockhausen will return to London next season.

MESSRS. H. & R. BLAGROVE gave their fifth quartett and solo concert at the Concert Rooms, Mortimer Street, on Friday morning, the 31st ult. Spohr's double quartett, in E flat, No. 4, for four violins, two violas, and two violoncellos, was most efficiently executed by Messrs. H. Blagrove, W. Blagrove, Watson, Clementi, R. Blagrove, Westlake, W. F. Reed, and G. Calkin. Miss Poole sang Haydn's Canzanot, "The Mermaid," lightly and trippingly, and Spohr's song, from Azor and Zemira, "Rose softly blooming," in her best style, and was received with the warmest applause. Mr. J. Balsir Chatterton's fantasia on the harp on Temas, by Mendelssohn—a capital pot-pourri, by the way—was a brilliant and sound performance. Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata for the violin and pianoforte, was delightfully executed by Miss Arabella Goddard and Mr. H. Blagrove, both executants entering fully into the spirit of the composer, and giving the true reading. Miss Arabella Goddard's performance was admirable, and was distinguished by great precision and firmness, as well as delicacy of touch. The youthful and charming artist, who bids fair to take a position among the highest in her profession, was repeatedly and continuously applauded throughout the sonata, and created quite a sensation. Seldom has an artist commenced her career with so promising a future before her as Miss Arabella Goddard. Let only her motto be, "Labour not vain," and a brilliant avenir must be hoarded up for her in the cupboard of the destinies. Miss Goddard was excellently supported by Mr. H. Blagrove, whose fine broad and even style is never more thoroughly evidenced than in the interpretation of the classic authors. Mr. R. Blagrove gave Regondi's fantasia on airs from La Favorita, on the concertina, very effectively. Mr. H. Blagrove in his impromptus ("Inconstancy"—"Innocence"—and "Lamentation and Rejoicing") rendered the illustrations of the varied feelings with considerable effect. He was loudly applauded at the end. Mendelssohn's quartett, in A major, for two violins, two violas, and violoncello, concluded the concert, which afforded evident satisfaction to a full audience. Messrs. Charles Salaman, and W. H. Holmes were the accompanists, and presided at the pianoforte with their accustomed ability. The sixth and last concert of the series is announced as an evening performance for Friday week.

MUSIC HALL, STORE STREET.—Miss Letitia Pitt gave a concert at the above locale on Tuesday evening, under the patronage of six distinguished names. The vocalists were Mrs. Alex. Newton, Miss Dolby, Miss Leslie, Miss Letitia Pitt, Miss E. Pitt, Mr. Bridge Frodsham, Mr. Henry Pitt, Signor Montelli, and Sig. Marchesi. Seldom have an audience expressed so much delight with an entertainment; nearly everything was encored—first, Mr. Henry Pitt was called upon to repeat Balfe's serenade, "Look forth, my fairest" (great applause); then Mr. Bridge Frodsham was bessed in a very charming ballad of Mr. Clement White's, in manuscript we believe (vociferous demonstration); then Signor Marchesi was moved to give a second time Mozart's "Qui Sdegno;" after which Miss Letitia Pitt was encored in Linley's song, "Come when the morn is breaking," and Miss Dolby in a MS. song by Duggan, "the Rose of Gauntlett;" and Mr. Bridge Frodsham and Mrs. Alexander Newton in Donizetti's "Da quel di che" (not accepted); and Mrs. Alexander Newton, Miss Letitia Pitt, and Miss Dolby in Campagna's barcarola, "Voga, voga, O marinaro;" and Signor Marchesi in the eternal "Nello Poppo del mio Brick;" and Miss Dolby again in Paucefote Esquire's ballad, "I would be with thee;" and Signor Montelli in "Il Bacio;" and Miss Letitia Pitt again, in the romanza, "Del non voler," from Anna Bolena; and Mrs. Alexander Newton, again, in Farmer's ballad, "I'll follow thee," which the lady, who was near worn out with her exertions, had the good sense to persist in refusing, and so the audience felt themselves gently rebuked, and refrained from shouting at the last two pieces. M. Schimon was the conductor, and carriages were ordered at eleven.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

F. D.—The English version of "Il Barbiere di Siviglia" may be had at Boosey & Co.'s, Holles-street. We do not think the other operas can be had in English. Try Addison or Cramer.—Edward Loder's Bass Song, "The Old House on the Rhine," written expressly for Herr Formes, would, we think, do. It is published by Williams, Cheapside.

MUSICUS.—1st query, "Box and Cox;" 2nd query, Between two and three years; but much depends on constitution.

THE NEW DISCOVERY OF HARMONY is received, and will be reviewed next week.

Advertisements.

FORTY PIANOFORTES AND HARPS

By Broadwood, Erard, Collard, Erat, Stodart, Wornum, Duff, Kirkman, Gange, and Organ by Flight and Robson.

MR. KELLY begs to announce he will submit for SALE BY PUBLIC AUCTION, without reserve, at the Rooms, 21, OLD BOND STREET, ON WEDNESDAY NEXT, 13th August, 1851, upwards of 40 new and second hand Pianofortes by the most celebrated makers, comprising Grands, Semi-Grands, Cabinets, Cottages, Piccolos, and Squares in Rosewood, Mahogany, Lebra, and Ocean Wood Cases, two double action Harps, a self acting Pianoforte playing 36 tones Patent Harmonium, a Seraphine, and excellent Barrel Organ by Flight and Robson.

MUSICAL LIBRARY OF THE LATE J. P. STREET, ESQ.

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, Etc.

PUTTICK & SIMPSON, Auctioneers of Literary Property WILL SELL BY AUCTION at their Great Room, 191, PICCADILLY, on THURSDAY, AUGUST 14, the Musical Library of the late J. P. Street, Esq., many years Librarian of the Madrigal Society, comprising valuable music in all classes, especially sacred music, Anthems and Motetts, many early and rare editions, a complete copy of Handel's works by Dr. Arnold, also modern music, and Musical Instruments of various kinds, Pianofortes by Broadwood, Wornum, and Stodart, Violins, Violoncellos, a first rate Concertina by Wheatstone, &c. Catalogues will be sent on application.

CHURCH MUSIC.

Just Published.

Just published.

Now ready, price 5s.

Cramer, Beale, and Co. 201, Regent-street.

No. 1. Io son ricco.

- No. 1. Io son ricco.
 „ 2. Trab, Trab,
 „ 3. Il segreto per esser felice.
 „ 4. Scenes that are brightest.
 „ 5. Stay fleeting time.
 „ 6. Quando il destino.
 „ 7. Chant des croates.
 Price 1s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent Street.

WESSEL and Co. beg to announce the publication of a New Work for Piano Solo, in twelve numbers, price One Shilling each, entitled—
"YOUTHFUL DAYS"

No. 1. "Nursery Tale."	No. 7. "The Dance on the Lawn."
" 2. "The Clock."	" 8. "Boating on the Lake."
" 3. "Sunday Morning."	" 9. "The Birdlet's Death."
" 4. "Playing in the Meadows."	" 10. "The Water-Mill."
" 5. "Grand Parade."	" 11. "Skating."
" 6. "Lullaby."	" 12. "The Evening Bells."

Composed by

THEODORE KULLAK, OF BERLIN.

Kullak's "Youthful Days" (Kinderleben) is written expressly in an easy form and makes an acceptable present to young pupils.

HANDEL'S NEW SACRED SONGS, 1 to 8, 2s. each; adapted and arranged by R. Andrews.

MOZART'S "Davidde Penitente," complete, 7s. 6d.; the English version adapted by R. Andrews.

SPOHR'S "Save me, O God," for double choir; adapted and arranged by R. Andrews.

BEETHOVEN'S Slow Movements from his Pianoforte Works, with sacred words
 "Songs for the Sabbath;" arranged by R. Andrews. bound. 12s.

London: R. Addison and Co.; Jefferys; Willis; Campbell and Co., Manchester of the Author, 9, Princess-street (removed from 4, Palatine Buildings), and 24, Oxford-street.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—Cure of a Red Leg of more than sixty years' standing.—Mr. Barker, of No. 3, Graham's Place, Drypool, near Hull, had ulcers on his leg from the age of 18 until upwards of 80, and although for many years he had sought the first advice in the country, nothing was found to relieve him. He often suffered excruciating pain, and long periods together, which incapacitated him from attending his business. He had given up all hope of getting a cure, when at last he was persuaded to try Holloway's Ointment, which he did, and however wonderful it may appear, the leg was thoroughly healed by their means, and by continuing to use the Pills alone after his leg was well, he has become in health so hale and hearty as now to be more active than most men of fifty. N.B.—The truth of this extraordinary statement can be vouched for by Mr. J. C. Reinhardt, 32, Market Place, Hull. Feb. 30th, 1850.

This Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in the following cases:—
Bad Legs	Coco Bay	Contracted and	Lumbago
Bad Breasts	Chiego-foot	Stiff Joints	Piles
Borns	Chilblains	E'phanitasis	Rheumatism
Bunions	Chapped hands	Fistulas	Scalds
Bite of Mosche- toes and Sand- Flies.	Corns (Soft) Cancers	Gout Glandular Swell- ings	Sore Nipples Sore-throats Skin-diseases
			Scurry Sore-heads Tumours Ulcers Wounds Yaws

Sold by the Proprietor, 344, Strand, (near Temple Bar,) London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World, in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6b., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

MR. BALFE

HAS the honour to announce to the Nobility, Subscribers to the Opera, and the Public, that his Benefit will take place

On MONDAY, AUGUST 11, 1851,

On which occasion will be presented (for the first time) an Italian Version of his Opera,

LES QUATRE FILS AYMON,

Under the title of

I QUATTRO FRATELLI,

With the following Cast—

Erminia	Mlle. SÖFIE CRUVELLI.
Clara	Madame GIULIANI.
Iolanda	Mlle. FELLER.
Eglantina	Mlle. LANZA.
Barone di Beaumanoir	Monsieur MASSOL.
Oliviero	Signor GARDONI.
Ricciard	Signor PARDINI.
Allardo	Signor MERCURIALI.
Rinaldo	Signor BALANCHI.
Uberto	Signor DAI FIORI.
Ivone	Signor COLETTI.

After which the First Act of Cimarosa's celebrated Opera,

IL MATRIMONIO SEGRETO.

Carolina	Madame FIORENTINI.
Elisetta	Madame GIULIANI.
Fidalmia	Mlle. ALBONI.
Paolina	Signor CALZOLARI.
Count Robinson	Signor F. LABLACHE.
Geronimo	Signor LABLACHE.

To conclude with the admired DIVERTISSEMENT, entitled

LES GRACES,

INTRODUCING THE CELEBRATED PAS DE TROIS.

Euphrosyne	Mlle. CAROLINA ROSATI.
Thalia	Mlle. MARIE TAGLIONI.
Eglia	Mlle. AMALIA FERRARIS.

Applications for boxes, stalls, and tickets, to be made at Mr. BALFE'S Private Residence, 14, Bruton-street, Berkeley-square; at all the Principal Musiciansellers and Libraries; and at the Opera Box Office of the Theatre, Colonnade.

SUBSCRIPTION NIGHT—WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 13.

It is respectfully announced that, in compliance with the generally expressed desire a SUBSCRIPTION NIGHT will be given on

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 13th, 1851,

In lieu of the last Tuesday of the Subscription (viz., September 2nd); all Ivories and Tickets therefore for that Evening will be available for WEDNESDAY, August 13th, when will be presented Donizetti's Opera,

LA FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO.

Maria	Madlle. ALBONI.
-------	-----	-----	-----------------

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

PIANO SOLOS.

Brisson, F.,	Op. 39.	Le Songe d'une nuit d'été.	Fantaisie.
Limmänder, A.		Les Monténégrins.	Ouverture.
Martin, Josephine,	Op. 8.	Villanelle.

VIOLIN SOLO WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO OR ORCHESTRA.
Saintow, Prosper, Concerto.

VOLONCELLO SOLO WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.
Piaiti, Alfred, Op. 12. Divertissement sur un air Napolitain.

FLUTE SOLO WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.
Briccioldi, G., Op. 63. Deux Fleurs. In 2 books.

SONGS WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.
Neuland, M., Starlight (English and German words).
" " Io t'amo (Italian and French words).
" " Songs and Legends of the Rhine (English words).
Piaiti, Alfred, Rends moi ton cœur (French words).
" " Album lyrique (Italian and German words). In 4 books.

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's-street.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

LAST WEEK BUT TWO OF THE SEASON.

SUBSCRIPTION NIGHT—MONDAY, AUGUST 11.

LAST NIGHT BUT ONE OF LES HUGUENOTS.

GRISI, CASTELLAN, TAMBURINI, FORMES, MARIO, TAGLIAFICO.

IN compliance with the general wish of the Subscribers, a SUBSCRIPTION NIGHT will be given on MONDAY, August 11, in lieu of Saturday, Sept. 6. Ivories and Tickets, therefore, for Saturday, September 6, will be available for Monday, August 11, on which occasion will be performed, for the last time but one this season, Meyerbeer's Grand Opera,

LES HUGUENOTS,

Principal characters by Madame Grisi, Madame Castellan, Mlle. Angri, Mlle. Cotti, Herr Formes, Signor Tamburini, Signor Tagliafico, Signor Polinini, Signor Rommi, Signor Mei, Signor Soldi, and Signor Mario.

Second Night of Saffo. On TUESDAY NEXT, August 12, will be performed, for the second time, the New Grand Opera,

SAFFO.

The poem by M. Augier, the music by M. Gounod.

Saffo,	Madame VIARDOT.
Glicera,	Madame CASTELLAN.
Pitria,	Signor TAMBURINI.
Alceo,	Signor MARALTI.

(His Second appearance this season.)

Il Gran Sacerdote,	Signor ROMMI.
Eraldi,	Signor SOLDI and Signor POLONINI.

And

Taone,	Signor TAMBERLIK.
--------	-----	-----	-------------------

Chorus of Priests, Gladiators, Conspirators, People, &c., &c.

GRAND EXTRA NIGHT.

IL FLAUTO MAGICO.—NORMA.

On THURSDAY NEXT, AUGUST 14th, a Grand Combined Entertainment will be given. The performances will commence with the first Act of

NORMA.

To which will be added for the fifth time, Mozart's celebrated work,

IL FLAUTO MAGICO.

The complete Opera. The whole embracing nearly all the principal Artists of the Theatre, viz., Madame Grisi, Madame Castellan, Miss Louisa Pyne, Madame Viardot; Signor Tamberlik, Signor Ronconi, Herr Formes, Signor Mario, &c., &c.

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor, Mr. COSTA.

Commence at Eight. Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets for Monday, Tuesday, or Thursday, to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre, and at the principal Libraries and Music sellers.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—FRIDAY NEXT, AUGUST 15, will be performed Mendelssohn's Oratorio, St. PAUL, as an additional Subscription Concert. Vocalists—Madame Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Whitehouse, and Herr Formes. The Orchestra, the most extensive available in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets, 3s.; Reserved, 6s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter Hall, or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC BY THOMAS BAKER.

"GREAT MASTERS FOR LITTLE PUPILS," a selection from the works of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, &c., easily arranged and fingered, price 2s. each number (4 numbers now ready). "We cordially recommend this work to all Teachers of the Pianoforte." Vide Era.—"As an instructive and at the same time pleasing work, we know of no publication that can surpass it. Bristol Mercury.—"This work will be of great use to Teachers."—Sunday Times. "Geraldine," Mazurka Brilliant, 2s. "Rose Leaves" (study in E minor), St. Julien and Co., 214, Regent-street, where may be had all Thomas Baker's compositions.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Studley Villas, Studley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Furkess, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, August 9, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra,) payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 33.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 16, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

SAPPHO.

The question of a year has been decided in a night. Sappho was presented at Covent Garden on Saturday, under the new title of Saffo. Change of name did not involve change of nature. Saffo remained Sappho to all intents and purposes. The difference was between the Paris and London audiences. At the Royal Italian Opera there is no organised claque; at the Theatre de la Nation there is a close phalanx of four rows in the centre of the parterre. The close phalanx of four rows in the centre of the parterre helped Sappho to a few nights of lingering existence, which Saffo in London may look for in vain, since our theatres (Dieu merci!) enjoy no such artificial means of prolonging life. In Paris the mock-enthusiasm of the "middle rows" may for a space light up the eye-holes of a caput mortuum; in London the skeleton falls prostrate, like the head of Ozymandias, not the ghost of a torch to illumine its forehead with an evanescent flash. As the effigy in stone of him who said,

"My name is Ozymandias, king of kings," now reposes on the strand—legs erect, yet trunkless, its shattered visage buried in the sands, a mutilated emblem of mortality—so Saffo, headless and recumbent, shall sleep in the desert of oblivion, now henceforward, and for ever—the semipiternal memory of a sham.

"Look on my works, ye mighty, and despair!
Nothing beside remains."

It was a chivalrous notion of our excellent friend, M. Augier—who has immortalised himself in the simple prattle of a child (Gabrielle)—to exalt the character of Sappho. Sappho was renowned for her beauty, and her poetic fire; but Sappho was not renowned for her purity. M. Augier, however, has cleaned her of all earthliness, and placed her on the modern boards, a vestal; burning with a holy flame. Phaon, too, a boatman, who rowed the goddess Venus across the sea—when, disguised in the wrinkles of age, the Paphian deity was bound on a mission into Asia—and who received as his guerdon a cosmetic, with which having rubbed himself, he became as comely as erst he was unlovely, rises from the pen and ink of the French poet, a sort of hybrid Pollio, still duller and more insipid than that dullest and most insipid of proconsuls. Pittacus, one of the seven wise men of Greece, stirred up for the occasion into a tyrannical despot behind the scenes, is made the bugbear of the story. A drivelling idiot, Pythias, always amorous and always drunk, and Gly-cere, a jealous wanton, are the lock and key that open the door to the intrigue, by means whereof Phaon is banished from his country, and Sappho precipitated from a rock—a rock which the ready Mr. Grieve, well versed in classical lore, has boldly entitled Leucas. The other personage, Alceus the poet, Sappho's lover—metamorphosed into her rival by M. Augier—is the key-stone of the conspiracy against Pittacus, wherein Phaon is concerned, which Pythias discloses to Glycere, and Glycere employs adroitly enough to gratify her passion for Phaon, and consummate her revenge upon Sappho—Sappho, who, perforce of eloquence, had robbed her of the loose affections of the boatman. These are the materials which M. Augier has worked up into three dreary acts, each in itself sufficient to stretch the public mouth into a yawn.

The day is surely over when such a subject as Sappho could interest, either in a drama or an opera. Perhaps, however, if a great poet took it in hand, for Rachel; something might be made of it; but no other than that incomparable artist, who elevates whatever she approaches, could endow the personage of the Greek lyrist with reality, and make her pass current for solid flesh and circling blood. It was, therefore, a grave mistake on the part of M. Augier, M. Gounod, and all concerned in the matter, to select such a theme for an opera in three acts. Moreover, M. Augier has not done his task cleverly. We could pardon his violations of history and tradition, if they were productive of good effect; but nothing can be more vapid, cold, and spiritless than the conspiracy which is the pivot of the action. Some of the incidents are absolutely silly. Take, for example, the manner in which the plot is discovered. The conspirators cast dice for the honourable position of Pittacus' assassin. The chance falls to Phaon, who, with the others, signs a manifesto, which Phaon confides to Pythias—because he is the richest—to "have it well copied by two faithful slaves." Pythias, inflamed with wine, and desirous of seducing Glycere to his will, confides the secret and the scroll to her keeping. Can anything be more absurd? The conspirators must have been either intoxicated or beside themselves to make so light of a document so precious. Phaon's position in the second act is ludicrous. At the instigation of Glycere, who holds the fate of the Mytelenean in her keeping, Sappho is compelled to declare falsely that her love for Phaon is extinct; whereupon, as soon as the words are uttered, Phaon, who must needs have a compagnon de voyage, in his banishment, turns round coolly to Glycere, and proposes that she shall go with him instead! Oh! Emile Augier—Oh! Gabrielle!—Oh! Phaon!—Oh! Columns!

To conclude abruptly—the libretto of Sapho offers some good situations for musical colouring, but is tedious, unnatural, and void of dramatic interest. It is M. Augier's first failure; let us hope it may be his last.

Of M. Gounod we would rather say nothing; but duty forces us to the unpleasant task of condemning the music of Sapho without reserve. A work more full of pretension and more empty of merit we never heard. We confess ourselves wholly at a loss to account for the admiration of those who announced it beforehand as something hors ligne, as an inspiration of the highest genius and originality. We can find nothing in it whatever but a series of incoherent passages and clumsy experiments. Here and there a bit of melody, broken on the wheel of fantastic conceit, and here and there a pretty, occasionally a novel, effect in the orchestral accompaniments, and we have named all that intense curiosity and a zealous search for beauties enabled us to pick out from the waste of weeds and rubbish that constitutes the garden of M. Gounod's muse. The verdict of two audiences (on Saturday and Tuesday), delivered in silent indifference, absolves us, however, from further protest against a mistake which is now, as the French say, constaté, beyond further dispute. We shall never forget the dullness that folded the house in its embraces on Saturday night. Almost every one appeared to be dozing; till at the end the audience dispersed in mute unsociability, without exchanging comment or remark, like a party of somnambulists, with rigid mien, and eyeballs fixed, marching unconsciously towards some unknown goal.

Jam satis! Henceforth let not our prophecies be questioned. We are never wrong. Why should we be? Clad in the armour of faith, we brandish the spear of truth, and hold up the shield of conviction. None can hurt us. Nor do we desire to hurt others; but with the best good-will we take leave of M. Gounod, sincerely hoping that his second opera may deserve and obtain a more favourable reception than Sapho in Paris, and Saffo in London. Vivat Regina!

Reviews of Music.

"DIE LANDESHAFT,"—IMPROMPTU—HENRY WYLD. R. Mills.

An exceedingly well-written and sparkling etude in E, displaying both good musicianship and taste. As an useful exercise, pour delier les doigts (unbind the fingers), we can strongly recommend it; equally so as a short, agreeable, and sensible piece of music.

"LE MANCENILLIER,"—SKEINADÉ POUR LE PIANO—L. M. GOTTSCHALK. Schott & Co.

If there were as much variety in the style of this piece as in the marks and indications of expression, there would be considerable variety in this piece. This piece, professing to represent the "Mancenillier,"—a tree, or a gum—must be regarded in the light of a piece representing a tree or a gum—so to speak, the tree of a tree. The style of this piece is monotonous, and we think a more appropriate title would be "Mandragora." This piece is in G sharp minor, and no mistake; although it diverges enharmonically at divers reprises into A flat major, which is dedicated to Madame Mennechet de Barival, by the author, who is from Louisiana, and must have been in a melancholy mood when he wrote this piece. What feelings a man may experience sitting in summer beneath the shade of a "Mancenillier," supposing it be large enough to sit under in summer, this piece may possibly indicate. For our own parts, we find this piece lugubrious, and are therefore loth to recommend it as a diversion for ordinary occasions, whatever we might feel inclined to do for extraordinary occasions. This piece is one of many musical illustrations of trees and gums indigenous to the slave states, but we cannot pronounce it a lively specimen of its composers.

"THE LEONORA WALTZES"—DEDICATED TO THE BARONESS REHAUSEN—G. A. DURLACHER. Charles Ollivier.

A lively, and agreeable, and useful set of waltzes, in the usual form of introduction and coda. There is rather too much similarity between the two first figures, but the others are well contrasted, and the coda is spirited and effective.

"THE MOUNTAIN ECHO"—"THE SONG OF THE ALPINE HUNTER"—WORDS BY FREDERICK MORTON—MUSIC BY ROBERT GUYLOTT. Webb's Music Saloon.

The only characteristic of Mr. Guylott's song is vivacity, but in his vivacity the composer should have endeavoured to steer clear of the chœur de chasse in Guillaume Tell, to which the tune bears too strong a resemblance to be purely accidental.

"SEVENTH CONCERTO FOR THE VIOLIN,"—CH. DE BÉRIOT. Schott and Co.

Any contribution from the pen of M. de Beriot, the head and front of the Great Belgian School of the violin, must be acceptable to the professors and amateurs of the king of instruments. The seventh concerto of M. de Beriot is not a concerto properly speaking, but, properly speaking, a concertino. The first movement, in G major, does not come to a close, but conducts by a half-close into the second, a kind of romanza in B minor, andante tranquillo, which, in its turn, refuses to come to a full close, but by a mixed close conducts to the last movement, a rondo in G major, the original key. Each of the movements is good of its kind. The themes are broad, melodious, and well opposed, either to other; the plan clear, simple, and musicianlike; the accompaniments rich and satisfactory, though perfectly unelaborate; and the whole bears the indelible stamp of the master. As in all the compositions of M. de Beriot, the evidences of a great school are apparent. The passages are remarkable for their brilliancy, fluency, and effect, and admirably adapted for study, or the display of proficient executancy. It is unnecessary for us to recommend the concerto, since the name of the composer will insure its reception wide and far.

FIDELIO.

(Continued from our last.)

Having now detailed every particular of the action of Fidelio, and examined minutely how this action is illustrated by the music, how not a point of character, not a demonstration of feeling, scarcely the expression of a single word is disregarded by the composer, we can with better justice to our subject, to our readers, and to ourselves, than we could have done at the commencement of these papers, before we had furnished matter for reference in our remarks on the plot of the opera of Beethoven's musical interpretation of it, and made our readers familiar with the same, enter into an analysis of the several overtures which, with different intentions and with different success, all most powerfully indicate the story and the principal characters in it, and thus each would appropriately preface the work.

The four overtures to this opera form at once a most valuable study to the musician, and a highly interesting example both of the gradual development of some of Beethoven's loftiest thoughts, and of his excessive care in perfecting their arrangement. They furnish also a striking proof of the high esteem in which our composer must have held his opera, since we may well suppose that had he not been fully satisfied with it as a whole, he would not have rejected so many truly beautiful ideas, and spent so much pains in writing and rewriting to complete an overture that should content him as the finishing stroke of so important a work.

Schindler, the biographer of our great master, indulges himself in a certain amount of twaddlesome gossip that purports to be a history of these four compositions; but his account is so distinctly marked with all the characteristic of irreality that nothing less than a condition of the most unfledged amateurship with the disposition to seek wonders in everything, and to create where it fails to discover them, and to worship with credulous idolatry, indifferent whether it have found or created—nothing short of such a condition could render one capable of receiving this account with any degree of attention, much less of respect. Beethoven's inadequate historian tells us, that the first overture, when privately rehearsed at the house of Prince Lichnowsky, was found to be too light for the subject—that the second was found to be too difficult for wind instruments—that the third was found to be too difficult for string instruments (whence we are to infer that the composer had gained so little by his long experience as to leave him, after the production of four symphonies, and many other works of magnitude, ignorant of the various capabilities of the several instruments in the orchestra)—and that the fourth, which is, whatever be its merits, certainly the least strikingly characteristic, or, as the favourite phrase is, descriptive of the persons and incidents of the opera, was found to strike the fortunate balance between levity and elaboration. That Beethoven may have had a private trial of his first overture, and have been discontented with its effect, or dissatisfied as to its fitness for the subject, is likely enough from the fact of his having composed a second; but the story of the too great lightness of this first composition is sufficiently disproved by the much greater lightness in the character of all the subjects, and in the general effect of the fourth, which, it is pretended, so happily attains the standard of gravity, as, on this account, to supersede the other productions. The story of the too great difficulty for wind instruments in the second overture is disproved by the greater difficulty of many passages in the third than of any in the previous production. That of the too great difficulty for string instruments in the third overture is disproved by the equal difficulty in the fourth; and both these last stories are rendered absurd by a comparison of the overtures with the rest of the opera, when they will be found to present no particular difficulty that is not quite in keeping with the general style of writing for all the instruments throughout the work. The internal evidence of the compositions themselves suggests this conjecture of their probable history, namely, that Beethoven felt his brain to be pregnant with a more extensive, a more elaborate, and in all respects a grander illustration of what must have been a heart's favourite subject with him, than was fulfilled in the first overture, which we are much disposed to regard, from the smallness of the score, from the abruptness of the conclusion, and from other indications of haste in the plan, and in the instrumentation, as a purely experimental work, written hastily to take advantage of some particular occasion when some opportunity offered for its private trial and judgment—that this more extensive, more elaborate, and grander illustration of his subject was embodied in the second overture, but that the ideas which this overture comprised were still immature, the embodiment was not yet ripe, and their production, in fact, served but as a sketch for that which followed it;—that the third overture realised the utmost of the composer's intentions that were unfulfilled in the second, which we trace entirely in its remodelled and greatly modified form; but we trace it as we do the infant in the man, the first conception in the perfect execution; and lastly, that this great overture in C having been found to exceed the necessary limits and proportions, and to fail in some of the requisite essentials of a theatrical overture, Beethoven, in a fit of disgust, or of what, in a less pre-eminently great man, would be called fretful peevishness, resolved, for the reproduction of his opera, under its new title of Fidelio, to write a fourth overture, that should differ from the other three in every possible particular (even in the key, which in those first three is the same), and to level his thoughts with the exigencies of his occasion; and we have here the interesting advantage of a treatment of the subject so different from all that he had previously produced, as if it had proceeded from another composer; and in this treatment of the subject, and the entirely new aspect under which himself must have considered it, and which was necessary to the production of so distinctly separate a composition, he was doubtless favoured by the lapse of time that passed between the production of this and the first three overtures, which were doubtless written under one feeling and at one period. Let us see whether an analysis of the several compositions supports this hypothesis; begging that, if we appear somewhat fantastic in our guesses at the possible meaning of the composer, we may be understood rather as wishing to indicate where a meaning is to be seen than as presumptuously, much less positively, offering our rendering of it as the true one.

The first overture, according to the unexceptionable precedent of Mozart, is in the same key as the last finale—a precedent of which we find ourselves to be involuntary admirers, since, to our feeling, there is about a work, whether longer or shorter, which is so constructed, an air of completeness that is greatly wanting in a composition that commences in one key and ends in another; an air of completeness that seems to bind the whole together as a whole, instead of leaving its several portions as so many separate, self-complete pieces, which, without such a chain of connection, they must always, to a certain extent, appear.

This overture commences with an introductory andante that is obviously intended to be entirely descriptive; and though as descriptive music we find in it very great interest, as music apart from description we find in it but little attraction. The sustained unison, on the dominant, suggests the vague feeling of lonely hopelessness in which we may suppose Leonore, the young, the passionate, the all-devoted wife, when Florestan, also young, and noble, and chivalrous—the husband of her heart—has by some unknown power been snatched from her. She is ignorant of his destiny; the only thing that supports her in her solitary misery is an indefinite feeling that he may, that he must live, and that Pizarro, whom he has disgraced, may be a clue to his discovery. The mysterious passages for the violins alone suggests her looking abroad into the wide, the vacant world vainly for redress, vainly for consolation, and her being thrust back upon herself, in whom she finds the only representative of her absent husband lover, to assure her of his faith, his love, and to stimulate her to endurance in honour of his memory. So, the second long-sustained dominant note, with now an increased number of instruments; then is a portion of the violin passage resumed, but now with full harmony; and this to us denotes a purpose formed. The repetition of this phrase in another key by wind-instruments suggests the confirmation of a resolution, and the extended series of scales and arpeggios divided between the string-instruments, and interspersed with short plaintive phrases for wind-instruments, may well be meant to depict her entering with that worst kind of despair, the nullity of hope, upon her arduous and anxious search for her beloved, and the pangs of anguish to which this subjects her. We may then suppose, in the scale of C, where all the string-instruments join in unison, an expected approach to the object of her heart's longing—the passage in which the first violins, in alternation with the other instruments, forms a kind of inverted pedal over a harmony that very unsatisfactorily wanders between the keys of C minor, and B flat, and E flat (which is, indeed, according to our judgment, a beautiful thought ill expressed)—this passage, we conjecture, may signify the quick and strong pulsations of her dilating bosom as she still expects that she reaches nearer and nearer to the attainment of her one great, loving desire; and here the break in the motion, the stop upon the A flat for the sad passage in single notes and in slower measure, represents her turning away from a disappointment choked with a sorrow that she may not, dare not, utter. The short phrase of melody in C minor suggests to us Leonore again alone, hopeless, powerless, with an almost breaking heart. The unisonous passage of triplets that breaks out of this suggests her indignation at her own despair, which now assumes the character of recklessness in place of hopelessness, of caring for nothing in place of expecting nothing. The passage which brings us to the half close on G, with the triplet arpeggios for the violoncellos, suggests to us her appealing to her own presentiments with the fruitless question, "Oh, whither?" And now we may imagine that she arrives for the first time at the prison, and her presentiment—or, if you will, the almost supernatural power of magnetism that chains her to the spot—answers the inquiry of her vague desires, "Rest here."

The dominant passage that introduces the allegro, and indeed continues for the first sixteen bars of this movement, suggests once more the eager impatience of an almost fulfilled desire; but now the forcible throbbings of the anxious heart come from a more healthful impulse than before; we now feel that there is true, fervent expectation, confident though perhaps groundless, whereas then, although we could find no other word to express it, we had more the feeling of that hectic offspring of desire which assumes the lustrous freshness of expectance, though in truth it be but a morbid wish, having not even the transient, or, at best, the fragile vigour of a fondled hope. Now we have the irresistible impulse, the "innere Triebe" of Leonore's aria with all its force in the very exciting subject in C major; another dominant passage denotes the confirmed expectation that strengthens the impulse, and the impulse, urging our heroine to more and more endurance, is expressed in the resumption of the subject. A vigorous, continuous, and always melodious prolongation of this subject brings us to D as the dominant of G, and here immediately commences the second subject, or, to speak better in the present instance, that series of phrases which constitutes the dominant portion of the movement. The digression from the key of the dominant which takes place in the course of this is worthy examination; it is striking though by no means singular, having precedent in Mozart and in earlier works of Beethoven himself; it consists of a natural transition through G minor into B flat, which last is made to take considerable importance, and a gradual return to the starting place of G major, and this is so arranged as to have all the startling effect of entire novelty and to form a happy relief from the else very long prevalence of the key of G minor, without in the least taking the character of an extraneous, unnatural, or irrelevant modulation. The opening phrase of this dominant subject, or, we should describe it better as the first of this series of subjects, is an unrestrained, and spontaneous, and truly beautiful outpouring of passionate expression; it indicates a lofty and a great enthusiasm, and it can scarcely fail to excite one. The very exciting effect of the syncopated passage with which it opens, the change to the minor with a continuance of the same passage, the interruption of the cadence and the prolongation of the rhythm, by the repetition of a phrase in which the employment of the dominant ninth is conspicuously beautiful, and the rapturous effect of the transition to B flat major, are each a point to prompt a cry of admiration, and, unitedly, cannot fail to carry away with them the feelings of all whose hearts are open to the influence of this highest order of expression. All this depicts, not the sorrows, not the endurance, not the convulsive ebullition of hopes which are the parents of disappointment, but the love, the glowing, the devoted passion of the heroine, and depicts it with a truthful fervour that proves how almighty is the power of musical expression. The long unisonous passage commencing in B flat, and leading to an inversion of the dominant harmony of G minor, brings before us the evil principle, shows Leonore willlessly depressed by the presence of Pizarro, feeling intuitively that he influences her destiny, but having no more than an indistinct foreboding of what part he has fulfilled in the tragedy of her life. The bright effect of the reentry of the major key, the recurrence to a portion of the chief subject of the movement, the impassioned passage of syncopation that grows out of this in continuation, the increased intensity of this passage by means of its recommencement from an unusual and quite unexpected point, its prolongation by a bold and exciting passage in unison, the recurrence again to the opening subject and the gradual dying away of this, form a beautiful coda to the first part, and suggest the continuance of the metaphysical design of the overture, in a manner so striking that we think it can scarcely be mistaken. We have the triumph of Leonore's ever sustaining impulse over every discouragement, over every trial, over every wavering weakness that characterises woman's nature; we have the exultation in anticipated success rising to the rapture of almost certainty, and we have again the impulse which has led her through so much, which will lead her through all, lulling the perturbations of her agitated heart with assuring encouragement; lastly we have her falling into the soft sleep of silent satisfaction, that satisfaction which is the child of resolution and the parent of confidence.

The two very unceremonious bars with pauses that take us at once without gradation, or without preparation into the key of E flat, have to us rather the appearance of being introduced for convenience, for the sake of bringing about the change of key, than for any effect, musical or descriptive, that they were to produce: and here it is we think it allowable to surmise that Beethoven may have designed, had he been content with the general effect of this overture, to have extended the plan, and to have introduced the elaborations of a second part in which he is so eminently successful, in the total absence of which the present composition forms an almost individual exception from the rest of his works. All we can devise of meaning in these two bars (the thought is somewhat whimsical, pray excuse it if it be irrelevant), all we can devise is a kind of scene-shifting, as though it should be said, "Enough of Leonore, there are other things to take our attention which she has occupied quite long enough for her share, and now we will proceed to Florestan in his dungeon:" and so like the changing the scenes in a theatre, or the leaving one set of characters in a most interesting crisis to return to another of which we have heard nothing for the last dozen of chapters in a novel, we find ourselves suddenly transported into an entirely new range of ideas, to which we must accommodate ourselves accordingly. We have now an adagio which is to be regarded as a kind of episode in the movement. This commences with the slow movement of Florestan's aria, where he laments that happiness has fled from him in the spring-days of his life. There is a curious effect of rhythm from the extension of the third bar of this melody into two which, as it is here done, to our appreciation much enforces the expression and enhances the purport of the phrase. This melody is repeated with a florid arpeggio accompaniment for the violins and violoncellos, but this time without the prolonged rhythm. A strange, dreamy thought, conveyed by iterated chords for wind instruments on the unaccented notes of the measure, expresses to us the prisoner trying to abstract himself from the consciousness of his sorrows, from the sense of his wrongs, from the feeling of his solitude, and finding beyond these nothing but an empty blank in the whole realm of thought; then we have in another key the first phrase of his song of complaint, then again the thought of wondering vacancy that leads to another reprisal of the first phrase of the melody in again another key, which indicates that however he may seek to fly it, however it may change its colour, the one, the constant, the ever-during regret will still be the uninterrupted companion of his lonesome cell. This time, however, the complaining phrase is prolonged, and, gradually extending itself into another current of thought, is lost at last in the happy idea of Leonore's passionate and faithful love; this is obviously suggested by the introduction of a prominent phrase of the second subject of the overture, and the almost imperceptible stealing in upon this of the dominant passage that opens the principal movement which now enters in the return to the allegro in the original key of C major, and the regular recapitulation of the first part.

The subjects are here brought much closer together than before; the first subject leads to the dominant harmony on G, instead of on D as at first, and so is brought in the second subject, Leonore's fanning with the wings of her desire the fire of her own most pure though ardent passion, in the original key of the movement with the digression, now through C minor into E flat. Then we find her again borne down by the magnetic influence of Pizarro's presence; but this striking and characteristic passage instead of leading, now, to a triumphant burst in the major key, conveying the thought of a proud defiance of such metaphysical influence over her mind, arising from the determination to subject all physical influences to the love-might of her will, instead of now leading to this, the passage may be said to wind away through a considerably extended intricacy until it steals into the key of C major, where commences a coda differing entirely from that which closes the first part.

We have now a long crescendo formed on a phrase of the principal subject, repeated alternately on the time of the dominant harmony,—this must be Leonore's "innere Triebe," impelling her now to the last, the greatest of all her noble acts of true devotion and heroic love. The climax of this crescendo is a powerful passage for the whole orchestra, that must, undoubtedly, have been the germ of a passage on most of the same harmonies that forms a most important feature in the second overture, and, like all the good points of this composition, is introduced in the third. This indicates, of course, the ultimate success of our heroine's long and arduous search, and the passage from Florestan's aria where he sees an angel in the form of Leonore, given with the full force of the orchestra presents to us the rapturous ecstasies of his clasping her in his arms. After a pause on the dominant, which we may suppose a breathing place in the transport of the lovers' tumultuous delight, our old dominant passage triumphantly introduces once more the chief subject, as though Leonore should exclaim, "All is accomplished!" and this gradually dies away, as we may imagine she begins calmly and dispassionately to recount to her regained husband the long story of her many trials; and it dies and dies until it seems to melt into the oblivious dreaminess of a half-remembered tale, and then, as though the composer feared his audience might go to sleep with his tale, and, like Charles the Twelfth at the end of Mazeppa, prove to have had all the thrilling interest of the story and the beautiful poetry to boot thrown away upon them, we have four thumping chords of C for the whole orchestra that cry out most wordfully, "Wake up my friends, we are going to begin the opera," and thus abruptly, quaintly, and, we think, not quite satisfactorily, nor agreeably, the overture, and our comments on it, close together. G. A. M.

ALBONI'S MARIA.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

MDLLE. ALBONI's Figlia del Reggimento has so many charming points about it that we can afford to forgive its want of dramatic vividness. Mdlle. Alboni is one of that very small band of vocalists whom the town is content—nay, delighted—to hear, no matter under what circumstances. Her exquisite voice is always welcome, and we should be worse than ungrateful to cavil, after an evening of such very high gratification as any one of her appearances affords. The difficulty Alboni must have felt in dealing with the part of Maria is physical, and arises from a specialité with which it would be worse than ungenerous to quarrel. The overflowing good nature and bonhomie so palpably characteristic of the great artist interfere with the lights and shades of the character. Half petulant, half affectionate, and wholly impulsive, the Daughter of the Regiment is essentially a different person from the placid-looking lady who now takes the rôle in question. The self-willed child of the soldiery becomes in her hands far too amiable a being, whose wildest manifestation of temper is an occasional inclination to bouder when much crossed. And when the pet of the regiment is elevated into ladyhood, instead of struggling with her satin fetters, Alboni seems only to utter a quiet protest against being bored with them, and in the very singing lesson (constructed for the display of selfwill), she is too conscious of her powers to perform that, or anything else that may be required of her, to make any violent fuss about it. How, therefore, can we cite as a blemish what really ought to be considered a merit? And how, again, can anybody quarrel with the personation, when he comes fresh from the incessant gush of melody poured out by Alboni? Exquisitely facile and flowing, her execution glitters with ornament, affixed in most artistic fashion. The whole performance is a triumph of vocalism, achieved by an organ of which it is impossible to speak with too fervent admiration. If Alboni do not add a leaf to her laurels by her Figlia, she certainly does not lose one.

MADemoiselle ANNA ZERR.

We copy the following from the letter of the Austrian correspondent of the Times, which appeared yesterday:—"Although my letter has attained an unusual length I cannot refrain from informing you of what happened to Miss Anna Zerr, the prima donna, on her arrival from London. She received orders from the Lord Chamberlain to return her diploma as Hofkammer Sangerinn (singer in the petits appartements of the Court), and, as a further proof of loss of favour, she will not be permitted to sing in the Imperial Opera-house during the year, for which she is engaged. The crime committed by Miss Zerr was the having consented to sing for the benefit of the Hungarian refugees in England."

Let the charming singer come back to London, and she will have an uproarious reception.

M. GOUNOD'S SAFFO.

[Having elsewhere offered some observations on the opera of Saffo, it is enough here to reprint the following notice of its first performance from the Times of Monday, with every word of which we fully agree.—ED. M. W.]

On Saturday night a new opera in three acts, entitled Saffo, the music by M. Charles Gounod, was produced, with every advantage which the resources of the theatre could bestow, but with a degree of success by no means flattering to the author and composer.

It is only within the last twelve months that there has been any question of M. Gounod, although more than ten years ago, a pupil of Halevy, at the Paris Conservatoire, he gained the "prix de Rome," invested with which most indiscriminate of honorary diplomas, he travelled to Italy in quest of classic inspirations. Afterwards, imbibing an ecclesiastical turn, M. Gounod began to compose for the Church; and some of his sacred pieces were brought forward by the enterprising Mr. Hullah, at one of the "Monthly Concerts," in St. Martin's Hall, last winter. These were criticised as crude and undigested efforts, and on being repeated at a subsequent performance, did not succeed in creating a more favourable impression. M. Gounod has also written a symphony, and other works, for the orchestra, besides a variety of songs, for voice and piano, which have enjoyed an enormous reputation in certain quarters. Indeed, it may be considered unfortunate that M. Gounod should have stepped over the barriers of the social circle to submit his pretensions to the judgment of the world, which, being indifferent, will, we apprehend, go far to reverse the opinions of his friends. So great, however, was the private repute of M. Gounod, and so loud and continuous were the praises of his intimate acquaintances, that the noise of his fame penetrated through the walls of the "Grand Opera," and reached the ears of M. Roqueplan, who pledged himself to bring out an opera, of which M. Emile Augier (author of Gabrielle) was to construct the libretto, and Madame Pauline Viardot Garcia to sustain the principal character. Here was a chance seldom accorded to a beginner—for M. Gounod, in spite of the lapse of ten years since the "prix de Rome," was a beginner in the dramatic field of composition. Sapho was first represented at the French lyric theatre on the 16th of April, 1851, with how much success may be surmised from the fact that, up to the present moment, nearly four months since, it has been played seven times. But Mademoiselle Masson, a clever and popular singer, having proved her competence to sustain the part of the heroine, in the absence of its original representative, there was no apparent obstacle to the "run" of Sapho, which leads to the natural conclusion that there must be a deficiency somewhere. Let us endeavour to point it out.

As in the Italian version of Sapho ("adapted" by Signor Fontana, "edited and translated" by Signor Maggioni) the style and merits of M. Augier's versification, and doubtless most of the poetical ideas, have inevitably deteriorated, we shall confine our observations to the plot. The story of Sappho, more especially the episode of her passion for Phaon, the Mytelenean boatman, whom the Paphian goddess made comely by an ointment, has been often used as a vehicle for music, but rarely with success. La Barre, Rameau, Piccini, Martini, Mayer, Reicha, and Pacini, have all composed operas on the subject. The last, the Saffo of Pacini, is alone remembered now, but its merits are so slight, that, in all probability it will soon be gathered to its predecessors in oblivion, and we fear M. Augier has at best supplied the wings for another musical ephemeris, to appear and perish in an equally brief space. We cannot compliment the elegant author of Gabrielle on his plan of a book for music. His Sapho might have been turned into a pretty poem, but it makes a very dull libretto. In the first act, at the Olympian games, Alceus and Sappho contend for the poetical prize. He sings of liberty, she of love, and the palm is awarded to Sappho. Phaon, whose heart but now was with the courtesan Glycere, while his esteem was with Sappho, inflamed by the eloquence of the poetess, transfers his affections to her. Meanwhile Alceus is organizing a conspiracy against Pittacus, one of the seven wise men, metamorphosed into a tyrant for the occasion. In the second act, Pythias, a Lesbian, given to wine, and a mauvais sujet into the bargain, betrays the secret of the conspiracy to Glycere, the courtesan, who resolves to make use of it to regain the love of Phaon, and revenge herself upon Sappho. Phaon, designated by lot to take the life of Pittacus, has signed a manifesto, and confided it to Pythias, on the pretext that the latter, being the richest, can best afford to "get it copied." Possessed of this document, Glycere menaces Sappho with disclosing the matter to Pittacus. To save her lover, Sappho feigns that her affection for him no longer exists, and, to save himself, Phaon submits to banishment with Glycere, in whose company he philosophically consoles himself for the fickleness of Sappho. In the third and last act the abandoned Sappho watches the departure of Phaon and his companions; falls into a swoon, which endures long enough for a shepherd to sing a song, to the accompaniment of his pipes; awakes; apostrophises her lyre; climbs up a rock; and ultimately throws herself into the sea. A more uninteresting libretto could not well be imagined, nor one less suited to music.

We regret to be unable to record that M. Gounod has justified the eulogiums lavished on him in advance. On the contrary, he has failed to sustain his forced position. The characteristics of his music are want of melody, indecision of style, ineffective treatment of voices, inexperience in the use of instruments, accompanied by an affectation of originality disclosed in strange and unsuccessful experiments, excess of modulation, monotonous in itself and proceeding from inability to develop phrases, contempt of established forms, and a general absence of continuity, vexing the ear with beginnings that rarely arrive at consummation. Against these drawbacks we are able to tender but few compensating qualities. We are sorry for it; but our duty is to say the truth, however unpalatable, to ourselves, as to others. M. Gounod has to learn that quaintness is not originality, that meagreness is not simplicity, and that noise is not richness. The continual strain upon the voices, as much in the choral and concerted music as in the airs and recitatives, is alike wearing to the audience and executants. The introduction of the first act has a certain vigour, which leads to the anticipation of something better than what follows. Phaon's air, too, describing his remembrance of Glycere, has a graceful melody, which, more naturally developed, would have made a beautiful song. This is the most attractive piece in the opera, although the encore was in a great measure owing to the perfect singing of Signor Tamberlik, who exerted himself, throughout a most arduous and ungrateful part, with a zeal, energy, and talent that entitled him to unqualified praise. An air, written for Madame Castellan (Glycere), now introduced into the opera for the first time, ends with a cabaletta, which is nothing better than a feeble copy of Verdi. The choruses by the priests and the people at the temple, when Alcæus and Sappho contend, are confused and ineffective. The address to liberty, by the former, and the legend of Hero and Leander, by the latter, gave occasion for musical expression and contrast, of which M. Gounod has neglected to avail himself. His music is flat, dull, and wholly devoid of rhythmic tune, except in the last movement of the Sapphic improvisation—a cabaletta in the style of Pacini, and singularly out of keeping. The duet in which Saffo and Phaon protest their mutual love expresses little or nothing; while the final chorus, so much lauded, is another noisy essay after the manner of Verdi. The second act is, if anything, feebler than the first. The chorus, "Gloria a Bacco," and the drinking song of Pythias, are common-place and devoid of character. In the trio for the conspirators the martial movement, "Noi giuriam morte," would be better if the voices were not so arduously taxed; the encore, however, was due to the ability of the chief executants—Tamberlik, Tamburini, and Maralti. By far the most effective piece in this act is the duet in which Glycere obtains the secret and the manifesto of the conspirators from Pythias. The last movement of this has some really charming passages, and pretty instrumental effects. The whole was admirably sung and acted with the utmost spirit by Madame Castellan and Signor Tamburini. The trio for Sappho, Glycere, and Phaon, comprehending the triumph of the courtesan and the despair of the poetess, forced by her unrelenting rival to deny her love for Phaon, is the longest, but the most rambling, vapid, and unmusical composition in the entire opera. It is passion torn to tatters, without a vestige of expression or a gleam of sentiment. The preceding scene, in which Glycere compels Sappho to her will, both in regard to dramatic and musical effect, is a tissue of exaggerations from first to last, while the position of Phaon, in the trio just mentioned, is too absurd to excite either interest or commiseration. The third act has the merit of being short, but except the shepherd's song, with its ground-bass and imitation of the bagpipes (sung with fine taste by Signor Stigelli, and encored), there is nothing connected or striking in the music. The opening air, in which Phaon calls upon Sappho in his despair, despite the splendid dramatic singing of Signor Tamberlik could not emerge from its dullness. A C in alt., however, at the end of the agitato, which the great tenor gave from the chest with prodigious force, brought down a burst of applause, and sustained the wavering endurance of the audience. The concluding song of Sappho, addressed to her lyre, previously to throwing herself into the sea, which should have been the most impressive piece of music in the opera, is nothing more than an ordinary French romance, with an arpeggio accompaniment. It gives us pain to be obliged to criticise thus severely the first opera of a new composer; but were we to go out of our way to pay unmerited compliments, we should be deceiving the public, without benefiting either the theatre or the composer. Let M. Gounod console himself with the fact that Sapho is his maiden essay, and the hope that experience may bring facility, taste be refined by knowledge, and invention ripen with maturity. Should his next opera betoken improvement, and deserve praise, none will feel happier, or be more anxious to acknowledge and applaud, than ourselves.

Of the execution we have but few words to say. We never saw Madame Viardot in a more lengthy and fatiguing part than Saffo, one more cruelly arduous and exacting, and at the same time more unfitted for her peculiar talent. The conscientious artist was always present, spurred on by zeal and resolution; but the physique was wanting to realise the indications of the mind, while the continual strain for effect only lessened the chance of attaining it as the opera proceeded. M. Gounod has by no means been skilful in measuring the capabilities of Madame Viardot's voice, which is wholly incompetent to such unceasing exertion. Where the music admitted of expression and true pathos, Madame Viardot sang beautifully; but such moments were rare. Only the most consummate ability could have helped her through the rest. The acting of Madame Viardot exhibited throughout that intelligent and elaborate filling up for which it is always remarkable; but her movements and poses were more than usually studied and artificial. Tamberlik's performance cannot be praised too highly; out of very meagre elements he made a good part, and sang the music, difficult and unthankful as it is, magnificently. Tamburini made the somewhat unmeaning character of Pythias amusing by his quiet humour, and gave the drinking song with immense spirit. Maralti's first appearance this season might have been in a more grateful part than that of Alcæus; but whatever could be made of it he effected in an artistic and satisfactory manner. Stigelli only appears in the last scene, to sing the shepherd's song, to his excellent reading of which we have alluded. Madame Castellan was terribly taxed in the music of Glycere, which in most instances is neither vocal nor melodious; but she exerted herself with the best goodwill, and obtained a great deal of applause in her air. The trio of the second act, at times, was dangerous to the intonation of the charming singer, and no wonder. M. Rommi merits a word for his careful singing in the High Priest; and Signors Soldi and Polonino gave strength to the ensemble by undertaking the insignificant parts of the heralds.

Mr. Costa had never a more trying duty to accomplish, and never deserved more hearty praise. The almost faultless manner in which the instrumental accompaniments, always difficult, rambling, and incoherent, were rendered by the superb orchestra under his direction, and the power and decision of the choruses, in spite of the awkward manner in which the vocal parts are disposed, showed that the opera had been rehearsed with the utmost anxiety and vigilance, and that every means had been exerted to do justice to M. Gounod and sustain the reputation of the theatre. In the scenic and costume departments the same care was manifested. Nothing could be more appropriate and complete. If, therefore, the feeling of the public, suggested at the end of each act by the silence of the large majority, and established by the coldest indifference at the conclusion, impels us to pronounce M. Gounod's Saffo a failure, it is only justice to add that the result must be laid unconditionally at the door of the author and composer, in whose behalf the whole means of the establishment were devoted, with an energy and unremitting attention worthy of a better cause.

Original Correspondence.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Having in the foregoing series of letters, given a few of the most prominent reasons why the institution of a national opera should be attempted, and having also given a very brief outline of the principles upon which such an undertaking should be based, it should not be hence inferred that such are the only reasons, far from it, there are very many others; and as for reforms, they too are so numerous that to mention them only would be to cover a vast space, for which reasons alone have I circumscribed them; my readers will therefore be pleased to consider that neither my condemnation of the old system—nor the reforms contemplated in my new system are bounded by the observations contained in these letters. A few remarks will therefore not be misplaced.

In regard to a choice of operas—heretofore managers of theatres have shown either great favouritism, or singular want of judgment in admitting to their boards only the works of certain known authors, regardless of the fact that MELODY should be the STAPLE of their choice. They have almost invariably fallen back upon old authors rather than encourage new ones, either from fear, or over confidence, quite unobservant of one singular, but fully appreciable circumstance, namely, that a musician's first work is usually fuller of melody than his second; and that no musician, however great, can summon the faculty of writing well at volition. To bring a case in point—five operas have appeared, seriatim, at Her Majesty's Theatre, each of these five being written by a most eminent musician, each, too, in its turn has been trumpeted forth as a wonderful production, yet which of these five operas will live through another five nights? I may even go further and say—which of these five operas contains a single one aria (or? we except one bravura in Auber's opera) such as will hereafter be listened to with pleasure in a concert room? Yet these said five operas have either been written "to command" or chosen deliberately, because their authors were known, and entirely because it was deemed unwise to try new men. Can any sensible person believe that Italy—the land of song, contains no musician capable of better things than Verdi?—but a truce to all suppositions of this kind—it is WELL KNOWN that admirably as both our Italian Operas are managed in regard to their musical interpretation, they are as ill managed as possible in regard to a choice of works. Let but ANY management invite a competition of talent—and choose fairly between the competitors, and neither Italians nor English will fail to discover a mine of wealth such as hitherto has scarce been dreamed of in their philosophy.

The constitution of an orchestra is another matter of extreme importance to which I believe it necessary to advert. Up to the present moment, our operatic orchestras have been characterised by their noisy effects. This may be said to be the fault of the composer for the time being, but it is nevertheless a fault, and cannot be too sufficiently reprobated. I have not only considered over the cause myself, but have carefully collected the opinions of others, and this is the result—namely, that there is a too frequent use of the trombones, as also of the cornet à pistons, and usually a conspicuous want of tenors; to remedy which I would counsel the more frequent use of the violoncello as a tenor instrument, leaving the contra-bassi to take their own distinct parts instead of being merely the echo of the violoncelli. In conclusion of this subject, I subjoin a list of the orchestral force which, in my humble opinion, should form a well apportioned band for a national opera, on a moderate scale—

Violini Primo 7; V. Secondo 5; Tenori 6; Violoncelli 5; Contrabassi 3; Flauti 2; Clarionetti 2; Oboe 2; Cornet 1; Tromba 1; Corni 3; Corno Bassetto 1; Tromboni 3; Fajotti 2; Tymponi according to circumstances; in all 45 or 46.

For such an orchestra a chorus of 70 individuals would be amply sufficient, yet not too much, and à propos of chorus writing. It is extremely desirable that the accompaniment should be kept under the vocal score—and not, excepting in rare instances, go above it, either in force or compass.

With regard to the extent to which an operatic company might be formed—that would, of course, depend upon the theatre to be filled, yet I am of opinion that a very much less extensive number than is usually thought requisite might be found to suffice, if the system which I have ventured to propose were adopted, even to the extent of a large pecuniary saving.

I will now conclude this series of letters by inviting all those members of the profession who may agree with me that a reform is necessary, to co-operate in their endeavours to bring about the institution of a National Opera by the following homely but only practicable means—namely, to send their names and addresses (under cover) to the Publisher of this Work, for the purpose of selecting such amongst them as may feel disposed to act in concert as a COMMITTEE OF ACTION. And in order that no squeamishness or fear of ridicule, or dread of offence (towards certain quarters) may operate to disadvantage, let it be distinctly understood that every name sent in shall be kept sacred from all eyes except those of them who originate the present movement. I would suggest that all who may send will range themselves under the heads of “vocal principals,” “composers,” “instrumentalists,” or “chorus,” each individual specifying his or her essential qualifications. Should this be done, it will be for the Committee which shall be appointed to decide upon the peculiar means hereafter to be adopted. The first and all important step being to find a CO-OPERATIVE body of respectable artistes, willing to advance their own common interests by a combination of talent and energy. With this I conclude, observing that the proprietors of this journal have kindly and liberally offered every assistance in their power towards forwarding the object in view—as earnest of which see advertisement in the last page.

I have the honor to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
PHILO-MUSICA.

NATIONAL OPERA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Having been the first—at least the first this year—to draw attention to the state of English Opera in several articles which you deemed worthy of insertion, you may perhaps consider me entitled to comment on the suggestions of your correspondents on this subject, although from continued ill-health I have withdrawn from all idea of interfering, save to point out from time to time such errors as in my humble judgment are to be avoided, and such courses as it may seem expedient to pursue.

Upwards of two months ago, in consequence of the remarks and letters respecting English Opera, which appeared in your columns, an irregular kind of meeting was held somewhere, at which after a variety of suggestions, and amongst others, as I was informed, one by which a certain music publisher would have secured nearly all the benefit to himself or to his class. The meeting arrived at the conclusion that nothing could then be done as there was no house to be obtained.

I deem this a most fortunate event, since such a conclusion shows how little was such a meeting able to cope with the difficulties of the question; having broken down before the smallest of them.

I am glad to see your correspondent Philo-Musica again in the field, especially as we hear no more about petitioning parliament for assistance, but my comments on his suggestions must be taken in good part, although they may at times run counter to them. He will give me credit for wishing him, and every one, all success provided it be legitimately obtained, with a view to the main point, and not to gratify merely the vanity or ambition of a few. With regard to his present scheme, many parts of it seem carefully considered and good; but until the financial portion of it is before us, one cannot be quite sure of understanding it perfectly. For example, I gather from Philo-Musica's letter that he proposes to establish an English Opera under the management of seven principal officers and a director; in other words somewhat on a similar plan to one I have before advocated, viz., a modified republic.

But if I am right in thus reading Philo-Musica's letter, I would ask of what use is the rule No. 3; providing for “a graduated scale of salaries, less than their registered amount?” since if it is a republic in any form, with the exception of the lowest classes, there can be no specified salary, as the whole proceeds (a fluctuating amount) must be divided: but if the salaries were fixed and, after paying them, by some strange chance a balance remained in the treasury, how should it be appropriated? The rights of each individual would be infringed if the money which each assisted to gain should be carried over to “next season,” when perhaps the same individuals might not be engaged. It is not likely that at first there would be any great surplus, but whilst framing a scheme, it is as well to do it with proper care and consideration. However, until Philo-Musica expounds the pithy part of the question, and explains whence he will draw the sinews of war, I shall look with silent interest, and possibly some amusement, on the “chateaux en Espagne,” which I doubt not many scheming heads are now building, though it may not be out of place to remind them that their castles are to be built neither in the air nor in Spain, and therefore that it will be well to season their poetical visions with a little practical common sense, and I congratulate Philo-Musica, for one, on having progressed so far without having run against any insurmountable obstacle or broached too wild a theory—Au reste nous verrons.

I have the honour to be, Sir, &c.,
F. G. B.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

(To the Editor of The Musical World.)

14th August, 1851.

SIR,—I am afraid that the explanation of G. will not do much to reassure the subscribers to this Society.

I should have been glad to have found its prospects improving, but, in the face of the figures given by G., I cannot indulge in such belief. These show such a continuous drain upon the Society that it is not likely parties will be found willing to continue the perilous honour of taking a prominent part in the responsibility of the direction, or run the risk of involving themselves in its liabilities by becoming members of it.

A more serious view of the affair, to men of business habits, arises from a comparison of the accounts as now put forth, with those given at the previous meetings.

In the report for the first year, the subscribers were informed that the outstanding accounts then due amounted to £406 3s. 4d. less, £11 14s. 2d. in the Secretary's hands. The loss is now stated to have been £876 7s. 10d.

At the end of the printed balance sheet appended to the second years' report is the following—“The outstanding liabilities of the Society are about £500.”

They are now run up to £1127 18s. 4d. At the third annual meeting, held in April last, the subscribers were informed that the liabilities had been reduced to about £350. The loss is now admitted to have been £1237; although in this amount it is understood that an additional sum of nearly £500, charged by Mr. Surman for the loan of music, has been struck out of the accounts by the Committee.

The explanation of G. would have been more to the purpose had he informed your readers of the amount of the increased (?) subscription list.

With accounts “cooked” in this fashion it cannot be wondered that your correspondent thinks a report of the proceedings of the adjourned general meeting calculated to produce an unfavourable impression. It is, however, only due to the subscribers that they should know the real state of affairs, and I for one have to thank you for the information afforded me by your report of the meeting which, for obvious reasons, I did not feel inclined to attend.

A SUBSCRIBER.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Handel's Messiah is to be performed on Friday 29th. inst. There will be no performance next Friday.

Dramatic Intelligence.

FRENCH PLAYS.—ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—Since our last, Monsieur Bouffé has rallied from his indisposition and has appeared in his great part of "La fille de l'Avare." Of the piece itself we cannot speak in terms of praise, inasmuch as the author having followed in the track of Molière, although taking for the ground-work of his drama the novel of Eugénie Grandet by the late Monsieur de Balzac, has between these two masterpieces fallen to the ground. "Qui embrasse trop, mal étreint," is a proverb in every way applicable to the author of this piece; why not be content with the simple story presented by Balzac? There is a pathos in this interesting tale, which combines all the essentials of dramatic effect; why attempt to give us a dilution of the great scene of Molière's Avare? Of the wind-up we do not complain so much, we are accustomed to this sacrifice to popular feeling, and do not begrudge the lovers their happiness, neither have we any desire to send the fairer portion of the audience home with tears in their eyes. On the whole we consider the piece as feeble and uninteresting, but as a vehicle for the acting of Monsieur Bouffé we are led to consider it with a certain amount of favour. The words put into the mouth of old Grandet are not in themselves of much significance, but the actor's delivery heightens their meaning and gives them importance. His bye play conduces to fill up the part, and we thus have before us a picture which is of itself a complete study, perfect in all its details and devoid of anything like exaggeration. In the first act we are presented with the miser pursuing the usual tenor of his every day avocations, we get an insight into his character, we see him laboriously building up the edifice of his fortune. The avidity with which he seizes on the gold which returns to his coffers; the regret, the anguish, with which he parts with his purchase-money were admirably portrayed by M. Bouffé. The scene with his lawyer was a master-piece of acting. In the following act we have the struggle between his love for his money, and his love for his daughter, in which the former is victorious, although the author has feared to work out the position to its extreme consequences, ending by a sort of compromise, which robs us of the small respect we may still have left for the old man, who turns out to be little better than a rogue who dishonestly withholds his daughter's portion. During this act M. Bouffé proved himself a complete comedian, the sudden change from self-gratification to anguish and despair when he has discovered the robbery was admirably conveyed. The wild haggard look, the glossy eye, the dishevelled hair, the complete prostration of the faculties, proved the terrible violence of this passion, by which all his other instincts are as it were absorbed. A more complete picture of despair cannot well be conceived. The part of Eugénie was well sustained by Mademoiselle St. Marc, who, to a certain extent, shared the honours and applause with the great comedian. This lady has latterly made much progress and promises to hold a distinguished rank in the profession. The other parts were also respectably filled, more particularly that of the lover by M. Lagrange, who managed to play with a sufficiency of warmth without at all verging on exaggeration.

J. de C.

HAYMARKET.—A translation of the libretto of Adolph Adam's well-known La Reine d'un Jour (which it will be remembered has been performed at more than one of the London theatres), has been taken by Mr. Edward Fitzwilliam as the framework of a ballad opera, brought out on Wednesday night at the Haymarket, with great success. This young composer, the son of the celebrated actress, has already distinguished himself as a writer of a variety of songs, apropos to certain dramatic pieces produced at the Lyceum and elsewhere; and once upon a time the public were invited to the hearing of a Stabat Mater bearing his name, besides other ecclesiastical attempts, which betokened the promise of considerable ability. His present effort does not take a very high ground; scarcely any of the pieces contained in the Queen of a Day rising above the ordinary ballad level; though as ballads—as pieces of vocal music for chamber use—they are of a very superior order, and surely calculated to become popular. The two acts comprise an extensive variety of these simplicities, pretending to no specific dramatic character, but exceedingly pleasant to listen to. Mr. Fitzwilliam possesses an agreeable vein of melody, and in the present case he has demonstrated it very advantageously, while the instrumentation of the several morceaux betrays a more than ordinary knowledge of orchestral resources, as well as a laudable ambition to desert hackneyed roads for others less familiar and less trodden. The house was disposed to give a friendly acceptance to all they heard, and encores were enforced with a vehemence which admitted of no denial.

The opera was very neatly played and sung by the artists who were concerned in it. We never heard Miss Louisa Pyne, who personated the extempore Queen, sing more prettily than she did on Wednesday night, and the composer no doubt was indebted to her for no small portion of the success which his effusions met with. Mr. W. Harrison was also a coadjutor of value, as the encores he received plainly testified. Mr. Weiss represented the innkeeper, who, like the prudent vicar, votes on either side according to the policy of the moment, with the dryness peculiar to himself, while Mr. Stuart, Mrs. Stanley, and Mrs. Caulfield filled the remaining parts with all the histrionic vivacity that was required.

ADELPHI.—Mr. Hudson has been making his half-dozen last bows here, to an English audience, before his trip across the Atlantic. Lover's comic drama, Rory O'More was well chosen, for it has evidently been written for the original representative (whoever he was) of the hero, with the exception of whom, it contains but little pretension, either to character or plot. Mr. Hudson's portrait of the shrewd, light-hearted, generous Irish Peasant, was given with even more than his accustomed vivacity and exuberant animal spirits. Miss Woolgar as Kathleen, made the very best of a part which is quite unworthy of her. The house has been choke-full all the week.

THE DISTIN FAMILY.—These clever artistes performed on their Sax-horns, and sang various madrigals, glees, &c., on Tuesday week and four following evenings at Jersey, and on Monday and Tuesday last, gave concerts under the patronage of the Governor at Guernsey. Thence they returned to England, to make a professional tour in the provinces, after which, they will return to London about the first week in October. They have been well received everywhere.

THE "CONCOURS" OF THE CONSERVATOIRE OF PARIS has just taken place. The two first prizes for singing and acting were unanimously accorded to Mdle. Palmyre Wertheimer, pupil of Bordogni. Her voice, method of singing, and dramatic talent, took every one by surprise. Much is to be expected from Mdle. Palmyre Wertheimer when she makes her début on the stage, which is shortly expected.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Madame Barbieri Nini, appeared for the second time on Saturday night, in Lucrezia Borgia, and excited the same furore as on Tuesday. We confess we still find some difficulty in arriving at the true merits of this celebrated artist. We set off with saying that Madame Barbieri Nini is a very extraordinary singer, and in some respects one of the most finished we ever heard. The studied and practised vocalist is always evident, and the artist always feelingly live to her business, whether of singer or actress. We think her style and method—although occasionally open to the charge of extravagance—are built upon the best Italian models, and there is no doubt that she belongs to that legitimate school which numbered in its ranks Colbrun, Catalani, Pasta, Pizaroni and others. If Madame Barbieri Nini has to a certain extent lost the freshness and delicious quality of her voice, she yet retains sufficient to satisfy all but the most fastidious ear. Her piano singing is still exquisite and entirely satisfying, and it is only when she forces her voice that we perceive the lack of power, and the falling off in its freshness. We are told that Madame Barbieri Nini has been long celebrated in Verdi's operas, some of which have been purposely written for her. We know not that, but, if it be true, Madame Barbieri Nini must have lost much of her former power, for it seems to us that Verdi's music requires much more force than she now possesses. Perhaps continually singing in the works of young Italy's composer has deprived her voice of its strength. This is not at all improbable; it would be less likely, that, singing Verdi's music for years, she could have retained its quality and strength. It is to be lamented that Madame Barbieri Nini had not come to this country while yet in the zenith of her power and reputation. Her name still stands highest among the high in Italy, but something of this, no doubt, must be attributed to past memories. Why Madame Barbieri Nini did not appear in England before the present year is to us a mystery unfathomable. Surely great singers are not so plentiful that such an artist should have been overlooked and lost in their brilliancy. Even when fiery speculation started a rival opera house, and all Europe, as it was supposed, was searched for stars of the first magnitude, why was Barbieri Nini allowed to raise her tempests only in Milan, Naples, Florence and Rome? Did the noise of her triumphs never reach the ears of Mr. Lumley, or Mr. Gye? Were the Italian and French journals perused with contempt, and the artist treated as a myth? But such was also the case with Tamberlik, one of the greatest tenors of the present age, who, but for Ronconi's single recommendation, might have yet been singing Verdi's music to the crowded benches of the Barcelona opera house. These things, we repeat, are unaccountable. At this moment in some retired theatre of Italy there may haply exist some embryo Jenny Lind, or full-blown Malibran, which it will be left to the enterprise of a Buon to discover and bring to England.

While Madame Barbieri Nini appears to have lost some of the freshness and quality of her voice, its compass and evenness of tone are still retained to a remarkable degree. The upper tones apparently have not deteriorated. These are singularly telling, and are always attacked with precision. The manner in which Madame Barbieri Nini takes a C or a C sharp in alt, betokens an amount of skill which singers might study with advantage. There is no mistake about her taking a high note. She does not jerk it out, or jump at it, or get rid of it as soon as touched, but attacks it with ease and sustains it without shrinking. Her cadences, if sometimes overlaboured, are dazzling for their novelty and boldness, and executed in a manner which may safely be pronounced faultless. Indeed Madame Barbieri Nini attempts nothing in the executive way which she does not accomplish; and we remember few singers who better satisfy us with respect to her ornaments. Madame Barbieri Nini's mode of pronouncing is remarkable. Not only is every word heard with distinctness, but every syllable, nay, almost every letter. There is a tendency to exaggeration in this; but the fault is perhaps on the right side, and for our own part we are glad to hear and understand what the singer says, and consider it an essential point of vocalization to utter the words intelligibly. Madame Barbieri Nini possesses this art of articulating her words with curious distinctness in common with Pasta, Catalani, Malibran and Viardot Garcia. Distinct enunciation is one of the first principles of singing, as every one knows, and yet how many singers are there, whose words are but a mere jumble, and whose mouths do not appear to be always in the same position, no matter what sounds they have to emit, what syllables to utter?

Neither the face nor the figure of Madame Barbieri Nini is well adapted to the stage. The former is plain and inexpressive, the latter dumpy, and by no means remarkable for grace. Under the influence of strong feeling, however, Madame Barbieri Nini's features are kindled into unmistakable intelligence and animation, and there is that in her attitudes and gestures, which, despite the drawback of an ungraceful person, betokens a kindred mind for the grand and the dignified.

We shall await with much curiosity the appearance of Madame Barbieri Nini in her next part, which, we understand, will be Anna Bolena. In the mean time we may add, that while opinions are conflicting with regard to her merits on certain points, all agree that she, Nini, is an extraordinary singer.

The production of Balfe's comic opera, Les Quatre fils Aymon, on Monday night, under the Italian title of I Quattro Fratelli, for the benefit of the composer, was an event of more than ordinary interest. The plot and the music of this sparkling work are well known. M. M. Leuven and Brunswick never invented a more ingenious and amusing libretto. Balfe never wrote music more lively, untiring, and vivacious. It is not necessary to enter into details, since none of our readers can have forgotten the adventures of the four sons, who, left penniless by their father, Duke Aymon, through the wit and spirit of the enchanting Erminia, daughter of Baron Beaumanoir, the stingy, get wives and fortunes; the lucky Ollivier obtaining the hand and heart of Erminia, while the three brothers are united to her three cousins, each fairer than her neighbour.

Falstaff was written expressly by Balfe for the Italian stage; Les Quatre Fils Aymon was composed for the Opera Comique in Paris. Nevertheless, we even prefer I Quattro Fratelli, as an Italian opera buffa, to Falstaff. We may be wrong, but we are right. The cast at Her Majesty's Theatre gave Balfe a chance that he never had before in France, in Germany, or in Belgium. Such an Erminia as Cravelli was enough to make the success of an opera of less merit than that of Balfe. A more elegant, yet brilliant and dashing piece of comedy was never seen. Every one of the three costumes suited Cravelli to admiration; indeed, in this particular, it would be difficult not to suit her, since she suits every dress so well that the dress must needs look handsome that she wears. In every scene Cruvelli was the life and soul of the action. She was quicksilver; and yet, in the midst of her incessant movement, every thing she did was graceful, natural, and easy. She had already proved herself a tragedian in Fidelio and Norma; in Erminia she came out as a sterling comedian.

The music of Erminia is well fitted to Cruvelli; and to make the part of more importance Balfe has written two new airs de bravoure. The first is a complete feu d'artifice of difficulties, requiring a facility of execution, a power and a range of voice which few singers possess, but which Cruvelli, thanks to nature, has entirely at command. The burden of the song goes to say that Erminia does not care to be a duchess; and Cruvelli sings it as if she did care to be a duchess, or indeed anything but a singer. The second air, a rondo finale in the modern style, is even more brilliant and showy than the first. At the same time it is more concise, and consequently more effective. Cruvelli sang it superbly. The trills, and scales, and arpeggios, and roulades, and points d'orgue, were executed with marvellous skill. In short, we have never listened to a more finished and admirable exhibition of vocal talent. It created a furor; and no wonder. The following extract from the notice of the Times, however, enters more fully into the merits of Cruvelli's Erminia than we are able to do at the present moment; we therefore quote it as an apology for our own want of words:

"The dashing Erminia was impersonated by Mdle. Sofie Cruvelli, to whose share the chief labour fell. Besides the original music belonging to the character of Erminia, Mdle. Cruvelli was entrusted with two bravura airs composed by Mr. Balfe for the occasion. The first of these, "Di Duchessa il nome altero," is very long, full of traits de force, intricate floriture, points d'orgue of the most elaborate nature, scales chromatic and diatonic, arpeggios, &c., involving endless modulations, and taxing the register of the voice throughout a compass of nearly three octaves—from D in alt. to F sharp below the lines. Nevertheless, although executed with marvellous adroitness by Mdle. Cruvelli, it failed to produce a proportionate effect—proving that extraneous intervals, velocitous roulades, and trills and flights, that are nothing more than trills and flights, have no absolute charm, unless accompanied by sentiment, and made subservient to form, in the absence of which the office of music as a medium of expression is set at naught, and the astonishment of the few who comprehend the difficulties surmounted, becomes a very poor compensation for the indifference of the crowd, untouched and apathetic without being able to explain the reason. The second air, the rondo finale of the third act ("Or qui verra"), was quite another thing. Here the difficulties were even greater and more various; but the theme was joyous and appropriate to the matter in hand, the design simple, and the whole musically interesting. A more brilliant and dexterous piece of vocalization has seldom been heard; and, as there was nothing forced or unnatural in the music, the rich voice of the young singer, full, clear, and telling from the highest note to the lowest, gave an additional charm to the extreme facility of her execution, and stirred up the audience to a genial display of enthusiasm. In her general performance, Mdle. Cruvelli evinced quite enough of the intelligence and accomplishments of a true comedian to show that, when thoroughly perfected in the character, which at present can hardly be expected of her, Erminia will be one of her best assumptions. Her singing in the lovely ballad, "Giovin bella," one of Mr. Balfe's happiest thoughts, was full of expression; and in the duet in F with Oliviero—the cabaletta of which "Quando tornar ridente," is, perhaps, the most beautiful melody in the opera—her voice blended charmingly with that of her partner, Signor Gardoni, and the impression produced was undeniable. Mdle. Cruvelli's most genuine and deserved success, however, both as an actress and a singer, was achieved in the scene where Erminia advises her three cousins on the best mode of pleasing the tastes of their husbands (act 3). Nothing could be bolder, or more animated than her delivery of the martial phrase, "Sposo hai tu d'amor guerriero," addressed to Clara, and nothing more neat and graceful than her execution of the sparkling staccato passage, "In sai ben condir," to Iolande, which completely captivated the audience, and was encored with unanimity. By her performance of Erminia, Mdle. Cruvelli has decidedly risen another step in the favour of the public.

After which it is unnecessary to say more than that next to Fidelio and Norma, Erminia has been the greatest and most legitimate triumph of Sophie Cruvelli.

M. Massol, in the part of the Baron de Beaumanoir, proved himself a capital comic actor. Every one knew he was a fine singer, but few anticipated from the popular barytone such a genuine display of spirit and fun. His grand aria buffa, where the baron gives his orders about the feast, was admirably sung, and the comic duet with Coletti, one of the most genial things in the opera, went off to admiration. It is a pity that the approaching autumn season in Paris, which demands great preparations in advance, should necessitate the speedy departure of M. Massol. His departure will be deeply felt, and Mr. Lumley would do well, if, under any circumstances, he could retain his services, until the end of the season.

The other characters were well filled. Gardoni was delightful as Ollivier, and never sang with more taste and feeling. He gave the charming ballad "Gia tarda e nera," a gem in its way, to admiration. Mdle. Giuliani was excellent as Clara. A new cavatina, "Tutto ben riuscì," composed for her by Balfe, and sung in the most artistic and satisfactory manner, was one of the hits of the evening. The parts of the other two cousins, Iolande and Eglantina, were less efficiently played by Mdles. Feller and Lanza. Riccardo, Allardo, and Rinaldo, three of the four brothers Aymon, received full justice at the hands of Signors Pardini, Mercuriali, and Balanchi, and Signor Coletti was perfect as the major-domo, Ivon.

The opera went off with immense eclat. Balfe was complimented after each act with a call and a volley of applause. All the principal singers were recalled at the end of each act; at the conclusion Cruvelli came forward alone, at the unanimous summons of the house; and to sum up, Balfe was led on by Gardoni and cheered "to the echo." We have rarely witnessed a more genuine success.

On Tuesday Lucrezia Borgia, with Madame Barbieri Nini for the third time as Lucrezia. A selection from the Diabla a Quatre followed.

The performances on Wednesday consisted of the last scene of the Due Foscari, for Coletti; the Figlia del Reggimento, and the divertissement from the second act of Il Prodigio. Alboni's Maria produced a far greater effect than it did on the first night, and the audience were roused to a real state of enthusiasm by the rondo finale, from Balfe's Maid of Artois, which Alboni warbled with wonderful brilliancy and incomparable ease.

Don Giovanni was repeated on Thursday with the same cast as on the previous Friday, Alboni's Zerlina being its most remarkable feature. Certainly, for pure, legitimate, and unadulterated singing, nothing we have ever heard surpasses that of Alboni in Zerlina. Mozart's music is preserved inviolate, and every effect is produced without the slightest effort, or attempt at display. As a piece of vocalization Alboni's Zerlina is a grand model. The opera was followed by the ballet, Les Trois Graces.

Balfe's opera I Quattro Fratelli was repeated last night, and went infinitely better than on Monday. This was to be expected, as the performers were not quite up to the mark the first night. Cruvelli was immensely applauded, especially in the rondo finale, which created a furor, and sang with even more fire and finish than at the first performance. So great an effect has the charming cantatrice produced in her comic acting and singing, that a general wish has been expressed to hear her in one of Rossini's operas buffa. Why not the Conte Ory, say we, especially, if we mistake not, as it was promised in the prospectus this season?

The divertissement from Il Prodigio followed.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday, M. Gounod's new and anxiously awaited opera, Saffo, was produced for the first time in this country. Of M. Gounod's Saffo we have had our say elsewhere, to which we refer the reader curious of the new composer's genius and acquirements.

On Monday—an extra night, but given as a subscription night—the Huguenots was played. The performance calls for no remarks.

Saffo again on Tuesday, and the sensation created by M. Gounod's chef d'œuvre may be gathered from the fact that the theatre was almost empty on that night, so thin an audience never having been seen at the Royal Italian Opera.

On Thursday, Norma, with the cloister scene from La Favorita.

CRUVELLI'S ERMINIA.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

Cruvelli acquitted herself brilliantly. The opera affords little scope for her especial powers, but her personation of Erminia was most lively and intelligent, and she sang with the utmost spirit and fire. Her finale was one of the most magnificent displays of elaborate vocalization we have ever heard, and would in itself have been sufficient to establish a singer's reputation. The artists were called after each act, and at the close, and then a special call was raised for Cruvelli, a well-merited tribute to her exquisite effort at the end of the work.

(From the Morning Herald.)

The opera was most efficiently cast. Cruvelli entered with great enthusiasm into the part of the heroine. The gay, fluent music of the Quatre Fils Aymon, as prettily flippant and flexible as any that was ever met with on the French lyrical stage, could scarcely have a better exponent than in this lady, who sang and acted with zeal, liveliness, and point.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

(From the Morning Post.)

Independently of its old established influence, peculiarly auspicious circumstances having secured the prospects of the present season, we hear that the management has for some time past been content to carry on, quietly and silently, the preparation of the new campaign. We had indeed ourselves observed, en passant, some days since, that the box-office was open, and busy in receiving the votes of subscribers, whilst the stage-door was besieged by the newly arrived followers of Euterpe and Terpsichore, hastening to the first review. The season will begin about the 15th of next month.

As far as we can glean, the following are the resources of the present season; and it will be seen that, whether we look to the established talent familiar to us, which time has not impaired, or to the new virtuosi who come to us for the first time, with ample certificates of fame, the array is both brilliant and formidable.

The first artist to be mentioned is Jenny Lind, who will arrive in March. Her presence alone ensures success. Her triumphs last year, when unknown to us, surpassed all precedent; every one would see her, and but a tithe of those who wished succeeded. Since that time her visits in the country and her triumphs abroad, which have kept public attention constantly alive, have increased the avidity to behold her in England, whilst one hears on all sides of foreigners of mark who intend to come from abroad during the season to gratify their longing to behold her. For the subscribers of last season we hear that she has great novelty in store; not only is it intended that she should perform in new operas, but her interpretation of favourite parts, like those of Desdemona, Donna Anna, Lucia, &c., will far surpass the attraction of any other form of novelty. There are classical operas, like the Zauberflöte of Mozart, &c.—the most perfect works of the great masters—which have been totally lost to the musical public for many years for want of congenial talent; it is intended to revive some of these dormant classical works this year. Another prima donna, of European fame, will visit her Majesty's Theatre early this season,—we allude to Erminia Tadolini, whose appearance has been so often apparently compassed, even vainly announced as positive, in past years. This great artist's fame is too familiar to the musical world to need much comment. At the great imperial theatre, La Scala, she has been engaged almost every year at the brilliant epoch, the Carnival. At San Carlos, no prima donna has been able to secure a triumphant footing since she left it, so great a favourite was Tadolini with the Neapolitans. In Germany her success has been no less marked and constant. Fortunately, for the variety it will afford, her style and line of parts are totally contrasted with those of Mdle. Lind; and she is about to renew in London the career she followed in Vienna, where she sang, for one season, at the same time as the great Swedish vocalist, maintaining the most amicable rivalry. We have to announce another vocalist, one of the youngest amongst the successful prime donne at present on the stage, Signora Cruvelli, who, some short time since, made so triumphant an entrée upon the great operatic theatre, La Fenice. Her person, we hear, is handsome and commanding; there is the fire of genius in her voice and in her dramatic action; her intonation is truthful, and her organ is clear, powerful, and sonorous—the latter being qualities essential for great success in a theatre of so large an area as that in which she made her debut, and qualifications which are deficient in the majority of prime donne (when they do not strain their vocal power), either from original want of power or from the effect of fatigue and age. Our readers will be happy to hear of the return of Adelaide Moltini to Her Majesty's Theatre. If we mistake not, she is one amongst the artists already arrived. She was always a great favourite with the English public, and her absence has been often alluded to with regret. Louisa Abbada, a distinguished vocalist, of great histrionic power, who has performed with success the parts of primo cartello, at all the great theatres of Italy, is another important acquisition announced. She is said to possess all the peculiar gifts necessary to the faithful and effective interpretation of the more modern school of Italian music. There will be a young debutante this season, in the person of Signorina Sofia Vera. If we are not mistaken, she is the daughter of a lady of eminence as a vocal artist, who has married advantageously, and retired from the stage, and was desirous her daughter should not enter into its trying career; but, on the part of Signorina Sofia Vera, the love of art has been too strong to resist, and sanguine hopes are entertained of her success.

Amongst the contralti mentioned is Mdle. Schwartz, who is immediately expected. Those who have visited the Austrian capital cannot have forgotten the talent and prepossessing appearance of this accomplished young vocalist. For want of time and space we must pass over the second donne expected. The tenori will be, first, that great favourite of the public, Italo Gardoni, who, in spite of all the interested prophecies to the contrary, will arrive in London on Monday next. The efforts made to tempt this young tenor from his present engagement sufficiently attest the increasing value of his talent. There will be two other new tenors. Report speaks very highly of the first engaged, Signor Cuzzani—"the tones of his voice are genial, with an impassioned, penetrating timbre, and vibrating accent; and, possessing great and intuitive knowledge of the stage, he has never failed of success." Another young tenor, the news of whose engagement only reached London yesterday, is supported by the warmest eulogies of the highest judges in the musical world, particularly the Countess de Rossi (Sontag), the Earl of Westmoreland, and Meyerbeer. His name is Labocetto. He has been engaged during three consecutive seasons at the same theatre where Gardoni established his first reputation—the Italian Opera at Berlin. He is young, his voice is sweet, of very extended register, and he sings in the style of Rubini. Whilst speaking of this class of vocalists, we may here state that we entertain no small degree of hope from private and authentic sources of our own, that her Majesty's Theatre will be visited this season by another tenor, to whom no other at present on the stage can be compared.

As to the bass voices announced, all the other operatic stages in Europe could not furnish such a galaxy—were it only that there is not, and never will be, another Lablache, and he is once more coming to head them. With him will arrive Coletti, second to Lablache alone; likewise that sound sterling basso, Bouché, and that excellent musician, F. Lablache. To this has been added this season another baritone, Signor Belletti. This vocalist for several years was in the same troupe, and sang constantly with Jeany Lind in her most favourite operas. He is represented to be full of nervous energy, an excellent actor as well as singer. We must pass over in our haste the other singers, such as Signors Guidi, Solaris, &c., who will render the operas effective by giving full value to the secondary parts.

The ballet department will, as in general, embrace successively, and sometimes at the same moment, almost all that is worth acquisition of first-rate choregraphic talent in Europe. There will be two maitres de ballet—Perrot and Paul Taglioni; each will compose a new grand ballet, besides bringing out the compositions of others, with divertissements, &c. The former is already actively engaged in marshalling his troupe. Besides the compositions of the maitres de ballet, and amongst the works written for this theatre, is a ballet expressly composed for Her Majesty's Theatre by the greatest of living playwrights, the celebrated M. Scribe. We have heard it asserted that by this ballet the season would begin. Rosati, the fascinating dancer and mime of last season, is already arrived, and with her the young Marie Taglioni, who has created a furor in Germany. Carlotta Grisi will arrive with a new ballet six weeks earlier than last year. Cerito and St. Leon will re-appear at their customary time, and the new ballet, Des Cinq Sens, will be given as soon as it is possible. The new corps de ballet has been selected from amongst the most promising danseuses of that class of choregraphy. This year much is expected from the young élèves of the establishment, Thevenot, Julienne, Lamoureux, so warmly applauded last season, but now grown up to be accomplished dancers. To these and to that excellent dancer, M^{me}. Petit, are added Emilie and Fanny Pascalis; a young and interesting danseuse, M^{lle}. Ansene, &c.

The list we give, both of the vocal as well as the lyrical part of the company, is very incomplete, and we pass over many meritorious favourites; but we shall no doubt have an early opportunity of drawing further and more complete information from official sources. In the meantime the opening of Her Majesty's Theatre being the great event of the season, we have thought that, however premature, the information we could supply would interest the public. (1848.)

Miscellaneous.

THE LYRIC CLUB devoted last Monday evening to a performance of some of the works of Sir Henry Bishop, and the full appearance of the large room of the Whittington Tavern evinced the high estimation in which this gifted composer is held by the public. The selection consisted of glees, rounds and choruses, the solo parts being sustained by the Misses Wells, Mr. Holmes, Mr. Howe, Mr. Donald King, Mr. Wilkinson and Mr. Lawler. "Sleep Gentle Lady" in the first part, in which Mr. Wilkinson's bass voice told to great advantage, we specially mention as a perfect specimen of glee singing, and in the second part we noticed particularly the chorus "The Tiger couches in the Wood;" "Haste let us leave the Shore;" and the solo and chorus from the Maniac, "Welcome lady fair." In this last piece Miss Wells sang the solo with energy and precision and was warmly applauded. The quartet "The Silver Queen," is a beautiful specimen of Bishop's varying style, and but for the inefficiency of the bass, (an amateur we believe), would have been very finely sung. It is a pity that with the host of first rate professional glee singers always present at the Lyric concerts the solo part of any glee should be given to an amateur who at best cannot be expected to impart to the performance that finish which the experienced executant can alone supply. The concert concluded with the Tramp Chorus, a composition which will endure as an example of choral writing when most of the ephemeral productions of the present day have long since passed into oblivion. Mr. Longhurst presided at the piano and Mr. Shoubridge conducted with much ability. The next concert of the Club will take place on Monday the 8th of September.

THE EXHIBITION ORGAN.—On Saturday last Dr. Bexfield performed upon the Large Organ built by Gray and Davison and erected at the east end of the Great Exhibition. This instrument has 13 stops in the Great Organ, 9 in the swell, 8 in the choir, and 4 in the pedals including a 16 feet Bombarde of intense power. The following was Dr. Bexfield's Programme of performance. Prelude, extempore. Fugue, extempore. Dead March in "Saul," Handel. "Ground" composed in 1678, Purcell. Air, Mozart; arranged by W. R. Bexfield. Fugue in G major, No. 4, W. R. Bexfield. Representation of a Storm, W. R. Bexfield. Pedal Fugue in G minor, J. S. Bach. Hallelujah, Handel.

HAYDN'S FIRST STUDIES IN COMPOSITION.—"Less precocious than Mozart, who, at thirteen years produced an applauded opera, Haydn, at the same age, composed a mass, which honest Reuter very properly ridiculed. This sentence surprised the tyro, but, full of good sense at that early period, he was soon aware of its justice: he was sensible it was necessary to learn counterpoint, and the rules of melody, but from whom was he to learn them? Reuter did not teach the art of composition to the children of the choir, and never gave more than two lessons in it to Haydn. Mozart had an excellent master in his father, who was an esteemed performer on the violin. It was otherwise with poor Joseph, a friendless chorister in Vienna, who could only obtain lessons by paying for them, and who had not a half-penny. His father, notwithstanding his two trades, was so poor, that when Joseph had been robbed of his clothes, on his communicating his misfortune to his family, his father, making an effort, sent him six florins to refit his wardrobe. None of the masters in Vienna would give lessons gratis to a boy of the choir who had no patronage; and it is to this misfortune, perhaps, that Haydn owes his originality. All the poets have imitated Homer, who imitated no one; in this alone he has not been followed; and it is perhaps owing to this more especially, that he is the great poet whom the world admires. For my own part, I wish, my friend, that all the courses of literature were at the bottom of the ocean: they teach people of small abilities to produce works without faults, and nature makes them produce them without beauties. We are afterwards obliged to wade through these dull essays: our love for the arts is diminished thereby; while the want of instruction will, assuredly, never stop the course of a man whom nature has formed to be great. Look at Shakespeare, at Cervantes; it is likewise the history of Haydn. A master might have prevented him from falling into some of the faults which he committed in the sequel, when he wrote for the church and the theatre; but he would certainly have been less original. He alone is the man of genius, who finds such delightful enjoyment in his art, that he pursues it in spite of obstacles. The torrent which is destined to become a mighty river, will overthrow the dykes by which its course may be restrained. Like Jean Jacques Rousseau, he bought at a second-hand shop, some theoretical books, among others the Treatise by Fux, and he set about studying it with a perseverance, which the horrible obscurity of the rules could not overcome. Labouring alone, without a master, he made an infinite number of little discoveries, which were afterwards of use to him. Without either money, or fire, shivering with cold in his garret, and oppressed with sleep as he pursued his studies to a late hour of the night, by the side of a harpsicord out of repair, and falling to pieces in all parts, he was still happy. The days and years flew on rapid wing, and he has often said, that he never enjoyed such felicity at any other period of his life. Haydn's ruling passion was the love of music rather than the love of glory: and even in his desire of glory not a shadow of ambition was to be found. In composing music, he sought his own gratification rather than to furnish himself with the means of acquiring celebrity."—Aurelian.

VAUXHALL-GARDENS.—The foreigners, who were to be seen in large numbers last night at these gardens, will have formed a notion of what we are pleased to content ourselves with in the shape of public amusement neither flattering to our taste nor to our sense. The occasion was a special one, the entertainments being for the benefit of Mr. Wardell, the present lessee of the property, and unusual exertions were made for the attraction of the public. The chief feature relied upon seems to have been the ascent of three balloons at the same time, and accordingly at the hour appointed for this threefold event to come off, the greater portion of last night's visitors to the gardens had already assembled. Vauxhall by daylight is not the most cheering spectacle in the world, and perhaps the depressing effect of the dark and dismal entrance resembling some sepulchral vault, and the dreary prospect of close, heavy-looking boxes, melancholy trees, and seedy shrubs, contributed to give this first portion of the entertainments a stern and sombre cast, from which, but for the enlivening effects of a shower of rain, it would have been impossible to recover. A more dull and uninteresting sight than an ordinary balloon ascent, can scarcely be conceived, and what accession of interest or amusement is to be derived from seeing two, three, or more huge dingy machines go up in the air, with a few commonplace personages appended to them, it is not easy to perceive. With the exception of this proceeding, which was witnessed with due solemnity, and a few additional whirligigs to the fireworks, with which, as far as the most steady and respectable portion of the public are concerned, the evening concludes, there was nothing to distinguish this from other Vauxhall nights. The measures taken for the amusement of the public have been the same for some years past, and require no special description. The performances in the circus and the display of fireworks, are the only occurrences during the evening which at all repay the weariness and bore of loitering about among staring refreshment boxes or gloomy alleys, rendered gloomier by coloured lamps disposed without taste, and scenic effects devoid of illusion. The musical arrangements, whether as regards what is called the concert—a set of inferior and vulgar performances—or the dance music, are worse than anything that has been heard in England since the revolution effected in such things by M. Jullien. If we are to have places of out-door amusement at all, it is high time that we should show ourselves capable of appreciating the taste and invention exhibited in similar establishments abroad, and with the large public ready to support anything conducted with spirit and liberality, there is no reason why the example of our neighbours should not even be surpassed.—Times.

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—There are few pleasanter evening lounges to those who have been living all day in the heat and smoke and dust of our huge Babylon, than these Gardens. The taste with which they are laid out, the completeness of their appointments, the care and attention in conducting the amusements, and the combination of instruction and entertainment which they afford, render them, perhaps, the most deservedly popular of recreations in or about London. The picture—which is the Temple of Janus, with the Colosseum, and the surrounding parts of ancient Rome—is interesting as well as beautiful. The orchestra is still under the direction of Jullien, the universal and powerful, whose name alone is a tower of strength and a load-stone of attraction. Among the vocalists are Mr. Leffler and Miss Messent, and the musical novelty of the week has been a new song composed by Mr. Baker and sung by Miss Messent. The words are on the oft-repeated but ever fresh subject of the heart's first affection. It has a clear and graceful melody of the simplest ballad form, and, by the aid of the neat voice and delicate singing of the fair executant, obtained an encore, the mellow and birdy tones of Miss Messent's voice telling with pleasing effect in the open air. A catch, sung by the gentlemen, obtained a like honour. Catches are comic part-songs, the words having cross readings. The wisdom of our ancestors held them in high repute, but as they were chiefly remarkable for their indelicate allusions and double meanings, and for their utter worthlessness as musical compositions, they have been dismissed to the dust-hole of oblivion, in which they are certainly destined to remain, in spite of their bearing the seal of the ancestral wisdom upon them. Two or three only have been preserved. The best is that in which four gentlemen dispute fiercely about the age of their Mistress. This was given on the present occasion, with due comic effect, by Mr. Leffler and his companions. The fireworks here are gorgeous and unique, and the early hour at which the amusements terminate, is not the least of the many claims which these gardens have on public support.

HAYDN'S LAST RESIDENCE.—"At the extremity of one of the suburbs of Vienna, on the side of the Imperial park of Schoubrunn, you find, near the barrier of Maria Hilf, a small unpaved street, so little frequented that it is covered with grass. About the middle of this street rises an humble dwelling, surrounded by perpetual silence. It is there, and not in the palace of Esterhazy, as you suppose, and as in fact he might if he wished, that the father of instrumental music resided; one of the men of genius of the eighteenth century, the golden age of music."—Aurelian.

THE LEATHER EAR.

Men of true piety, they know not why,
Music with all its sacred powers decry.
Music itself (not its abuse) condemn,
For good or bad is just the same to them.
But let them know they quite mistake the case,
Defect of nature for excess of grace;
And while they reprobate th' harmonious art,
Blamed, we excuse, and candidly assert,
The fault is in their ear, not in their upright heart.—

Extracted from —, by Aurelian.

HAYDN IN HIS OLD AGE.—You knock at the door: it is opened to you with a cheerful smile by a worthy little old woman, his housekeeper; you ascend a short flight of wooden stairs, and find in the second chamber of a very simple apartment a tranquil old man, sitting at a desk, absorbed in the melancholy sentiment that life is escaping from him, and so complete a nonentity with respect to every thing besides, that he stands in need of visitors to recall to him what he has once been. When he sees any one enter a pleasing smile appears upon his lips, a tear moistens his eyes, his countenance recovers its animation, his voice becomes clear, he recognises his guest, and talks to him of his early years, of which he has a much better recollection than of his latter ones; you think that the artist still exists; but soon he relapses before your eyes into his habitual state of lethargy and sadness.—Aurelian.

THE ALPINE GOATHERD.—The goatherd of the Alps, free as the air he breathes, runs through the gamut at a breath; and, with a firm and powerful voice, calls up the sweet reverberations of the rocks by which he is environed. Without being restrained by rules, to which he is a stranger, and which would but impede the spontaneous effusions of his soul, he prefers those tones that fancy inspires, and which his organs seem to have the natural gift to modulate. He rarely repeats them in a manner exactly the same, even if solicited to do so. Inspired by the scenery, and the circumstances by which he is surrounded, and guided by a sort of instinctive talent, he creates new sounds, and new modulations, and varies his melody without being conscious that his song is beyond the rivalry of art.—Extracted from —, by Aurelian.

FRANCIS JOSEPH HAYDN was born on the last day of March, 1732, at Rohran, a small town, fifteen leagues distant from Vienna. His father was a cartwright; and his mother, before her marriage, had been cook in the family of Count Harrach, the lord of the village. The father of Haydn united to his trade of a cartwright, the office of parish sexton. He had a fine tenor voice, was fond of his organ, and of music in general. On one of those journeys which the artisans of Germany often undertake, being at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, he learned to play a little on the harp; and in holidays, after church, he used to take his instrument, while his wife sung. The birth of Joseph did not alter the habits of this peaceful family. The little domestic concert returned every week, and the child, standing before his parents, with two pieces of wood in his hands, one of which served him as a violin, and the other as a bow, constantly accompanied his mother's voice. Haydn, loaded with years and with glory, has often, in my presence, recalled the simple airs which she sung; so deep an impression had these first melodies made on his soul, which was all music! A cousin of the cartwright, whose name was Frank, a schoolmaster at Hamburg, came to Rohran one Sunday, and assisted at the trio. He remarked that the child, then scarcely six years old, beat the time with astonishing exactitude and precision. This Frank was well acquainted with music, and proposed to his relations to take little Joseph to his house and to teach him. They accepted the offer with joy, hoping to succeed more easily in getting Joseph into holy orders, if he should understand music."—Aurelian.

Advertisements.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

PIANO SOLOS.

Brisson, F., Op. 39. Le Songe d'une nuit d'été. Fantaisie.
Limmerer, A. Les Monténégriens. Ouverture.
Marita, Josephine, Op. 6, Villanelle.

VIOLIN SOLO WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO OR ORCHESTRA.
Seipen, Proper, Concerto.

VIOLONCELLO SOLO WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.
Platt, Alfred, Op. 12. Divertissement sur un air Napolitain.

FLUTE SOLO WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.
Briccialdi, G., Op. 63. Deux Fleurs. In 2 books.

SONGS WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.
Newland, M., Starlight (English and German words).
" " Io t'amo (Italian and French words).
Platt, Alfred, Songs and Legends of the Rhine (English words).
" " Rends moi ton cœur (French words).
" " Album lyrique (Italian and German words). In 4 books.

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's-street.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published.

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed, and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTE.
Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 210 Regent-street; Keith and Prowse, 46, Cheapside; and Cooke & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

GREAT DISCOVERY IN HARMONY.

Now ready, price 5s.

THE PRINCIPLES OF NATURAL HARMONY, being a Perfect System founded upon the discovery of the True Semitonic Scale, by J. J. Maitre. London. Published by the Author, 76, Leadenhall-street. To be had of Messrs. Ewer and Co., Newgate-street, and Messrs. Cooke and Co., New Burlington-street.

EASY PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Just published. 1

COMPOSED BY FERDINAND BEYER,
"A SHOWER OF PEARLS."

12 Recreations, price 1s. each.

No.	1. Der Schottische	in G.
"	2. Postillon de Moscou	in C.
"	3. Montecchi e Capuletti	in G.
"	4. Through the Forest	in F.
"	5. Air Tyrolien	in C.
"	6. Chorus from Norma	in G.
"	7. Hymne Hollandaise	in C.
"	8. Le Zapateado	in G.
"	9. Zauberflöte (Mozart)	in F.
"	10. Austrian Hymn (Haydn)	in G.
"	11. Russian Hymn	in A.
"	12. Carnival de Venise (Ernst)	in A.

Wessel and Co., 239, Regent Street. Publishers of all Beyer's works.

I QUATTRO FRATETTI, BY M. W. BALFE.

THE Music of this Opera, with Italian Words, as performed at Her Majesty's Theatre, is now ready. Amongst the most popular vocal pieces are the following:—

Gia tarda e nera	Sung by Signor Gardoni.
Al mio prazare	" Signor Colletti.
Giovin bella nobil figlia	" Madlle. Sofie Cruvelli.
Parl a bella fresca rosa	" Signor Gardoni.
Dice Ognun che il quardo	" Signor Pardini.
Son felice appieno. Polacca	" Mad. Giuliani.
Dal momento fortunate	" Madlle. Sofie Cruvelli.

Also, the Overture and Books of Airs as Solos and Duets, by Burrows, Watts, & Co. Addison & Heller, 210, Regent Street.

THE ORGANIST'S COMPANION,

BY JOHN GOSS, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. A series of voluntaries, for the commencement, middle, and conclusion of divine service; also, a collection of interludes or short symphonies, to be played between the verses of the psalms or hymns, in numbers 2s. 6d. each, or 4 vols., 12 each.

PAROCHIAL PSALMODY.

A COLLECTION of Ancient and Modern tunes; also a variety of favourite responses to the Commandments, with directions for chanting, with an accompaniment for the Organ or Pianoforte, by John Goss, price 6s.

SACRED MELODIES.

SELECTED from eminent composers, and arranged for one or two voices, with an accompaniment for Organ or Pianoforte, by J. Goss, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. Price 6s.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

HEALTH WHERE 'TIS SOUGHT!

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Ours of a disordered Liver and Stomach, when in a most hopeless state.—Extract of a letter from Mr. Matthew Harvey, of Chapel Hall, Airdrie, Scotland, dated the 15th of January, 1850.—To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your valuable Pills have been the means, with God's blessing, of restoring me to perfect health, at a time when I thought I was on the brink of the grave. I had consulted several eminent Doctors, who, after doing what they could for me, considered my case hopeless. I had been suffering from a Liver and Stomach complaint of long standing, which during the last two years got so much worse, that every one considered my condition as hopeless. I, as a last resource, got a Box of your Pills, which soon gave relief, and by persevering in their use for some weeks, together with rubbing night and morning your Ointment over my chest and stomach, and right side, I have by their means alone got completely cured, and to the astonishment of myself and everybody who knows me.

(Signed)

MATTHEW HARVEY.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—
Ague Constipation of the Bowels kinds of all Liver complaints Tumours
Asthma the Bowels kinds of all Liver complaints Tumours
Bilious Com- Consumption Piles Ulcers
Blotches on the Droopy Debility Gout Rheumatism kinds Skin Dysentery Head-ache Scrofula or King's Weakness, from Bowel complaints Erysipelas Indigestion Evil whatever cause
Colic Inflammation Sore Throat &c., &c.
Jaundice Tie-Deoulourux

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

LAST WEEK BUT ONE.

LAST NIGHT OF IL FLAUTO MAGICO.

ON TUESDAY NEXT, AUGUST 19th, will be performed (for the last time), Mozart's Opera,

IL FLAUTO MAGICO.

Remina	Madame CASTELLAN
Astrifammante	Miss LOUISA PYNE.
Egle	Mdlle. MORRA.
Arethusa	Mdlle. BERTRANDI.
Iperethusa	Mdlle. VINTALE.
Papagena	Madame VIARDOT.
(Who has kindly undertaken the part.)
Sarastro	Herr FORMES.
Monostato	Signor STIGELLI.
Oronte	Signor SOLDI.
Two men in Armour,			(Signor ROMMI, and
			Signor MEI.
Demofoontes	Signor POLONINI.
Papagena	Signor RONCONI, and
Tamino	Signor MARIO.

EXTRA NIGHT.

LAST NIGHT BUT ONE OF LE PROPHETE.

On THURSDAY NEXT, AUGUST 21st, will be performed, for the last time but one, Meyerbeer's Grand Opera, LE PROPHETE. Principal characters by Madame Viardot, Madame Castellan, Herr Formes, Signor Tagliafico, Signor Soldi, Signor Mei, Signor Stigelli, Signor Polonini, and Signor Mario.

SUBSCRIPTION NIGHT, FRIDAY NEXT, AUGUST 22nd. OTELLO—DER FREISCHUTZ.

In compliance with the general wish of the subscribers, a subscription night will be given on FRIDAY NEXT, AUGUST 22nd, in lieu of Tuesday, September 2nd, all Ivories and tickets for Tuesday, September 2nd, will therefore be available for next Friday, August 22nd, on which occasion a combined entertainment will be given, commencing with, for the first time this season, Rossini's favourite oper.

OTELLO.

Desdemona	Madame GRISI.
Emilia	Mdlle. COTTI.
Otello	Signor TAMERLIK.
Rodrigo	Signor CIAPPEL.
Jago	Signor RONCONI.
Elmiro	Signor TAGLIAFICO.
Doge	Signor POLONINI.

To conclude with the Second Act of Weber's romantic opera

DER FREISCHUTZ.

The principal characters by Madame Castellan, Mdlle. Bertrandi, Signor Maralti, and Herr Formes,

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor, Mr. COSTA.

Commence at Eight. Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets for Tuesday, Thursday, or Friday, to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre, and at the principal Music-sellers and Libraries.

THE POPULAR SONG OF THE DAY.

"TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWAY," composed by THOMAS CHANTREY. A new edition of which is just issued, may be had at ADDISON & HOLLIEN'S, 210, Regent-street, London. For simplicity, elegance, and originality of melody, it is unrivalled.

Also, by the same author, "Why wilt thou not love?" and "The dream is past."

JOULE'S DIRECTORIUM CHORI ANGLICANUM.

Second Edition, price 1s., in cloth 1s. 6d.

"THE most complete Choral Service book that has yet appeared." Dedicated by permission to the Lord Bishop of Manchester. For highly favourable reviews see "Christian Remembrancer," "Theologian," "Parish Choir," &c. &c. London: J. A. Novello.
A few copies of the quarto edition, price 16s., still on hand.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

LAST NIGHT BUT TWO OF THE SUBSCRIPTION,

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 20th.

IT is respectfully announced that, in compliance with the generally expressed desire, a

SUBSCRIPTION NIGHT

Will be given

ON WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 20th,

In lieu of the last Saturday of the Subscription (viz., August 30th); all Ivories and Tickets therefore for that evening will be available for Wednesday, August 20th, when will be presented

A FAVORITE OPERA,

In which Madame SONTAG will appear.

Applications for Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets, to be made at the Box Office at the Theatre, Opera Colonnade. The Opera to commence at Eight o'clock.

TO ALL THOSE INTERESTED IN THE FORMATION OF A

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

IT is requested that all Members of the Musical Profession, whether Composers, Vocalists, or Instrumentalists, who feel the necessity of reforming the present system, and be desirous of contributing (by their professional exertions) towards the formation of a NATIONAL OPERA, will have the kindness to send their names and addresses (under cover) to the Publisher of the Musical World, at their earliest convenience, for the purpose of selecting therefrom a sufficient number of artists to form a managing committee.

N.B.—No apprehension need exist with regard to any molested responsibility, as all expenses will be defrayed by the advertiser until further steps may be agreed upon.
Office of the Musical World, Aug. 16, 1851.

W. VINCENT WALLACE'S LAST NEW SONGS.

GO! THOU RESTLESS WIND.
THE GIPSY MAID.
SWEET AND LOW WIND OF THE WESTERN SEA.
THERE'S ROOM FOR HOPE.
ORANGE FLOWERS.
OLD FRIENDSHIPS' SMILE.
I MOURN THEE, BUT I LOVE NO MORE.
THE STAR OF LOVE.
COME! SMILE AGAIN:
I NEVER HAVE BEEN FALSE TO THEE.

Cramer, Beale, & Co., 201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

THE CUCKOO GALOP.

AS performed by Mr. DISTIN and his Sons at the Royal Music Hall, Adelaide-street, Strand. It is arranged for the Piano, and Cornet-piston, price 3s., post free, and may be had of the publisher, Henry Distin, Military Musical Instrument Maker, 31, Cranbourn-street, Leicester-square, London. Also, My Polka, price 2s. 6d., Our Polka, 2s. 6d., Your Polka, 2s. 6d., and the Hippodrome Galop.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

HANDEL'S MESSIAH will be performed on FRIDAY, 29th August. There will be no performance next Friday.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Stridley Villas, Studley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Furkes, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, August 16, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra,) payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 34.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 23, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence

BENEDICT.

The return of this accomplished and popular musician, from his tour in North and South America with Mdlle. Jenny Lind, will be hailed with unanimous satisfaction. It has been erroneously circulated that Mr. Benedict intends to retire from active life, and rest upon the laurels and the fortune he has reaped by his exertions in the New World. The truth is just the contrary. Mr. Benedict has no idea of relinquishing the eminent position he has so long and honourably maintained in this country. He will immediately resume the duties, interrupted by his temporary absence—as much as ever a professor, and, if we be not mistaken, more than ever in request. Such a man could not well be spared. As a pianist, as a teacher, as a conductor, as an accompanist, and last, not least, as a composer, Mr. Benedict decidedly stands in the first rank. His abandonment of any one of these capacities would be a source of regret to all who interest themselves in musical matters. We have, therefore, the greater pleasure in announcing that one so universally respected, both by amateurs and musicians, will continue to exercise that art of which he is assuredly one of the most distinguished representatives.

Mr. Benedict arrived on Saturday, by the Atlantic, in company with his friend and fellow-traveller, Signor Belletti, the talented and popular singer, whose absence from Her Majesty's Theatre has been continually lamented during the present season.

Mdlle. Jenny Lind intends remaining at New York during the winter—not, as we understand, to sing, but to repose herself after the fatigues of nearly a twelvemonth. Whether the “nightingale” will, at any future period, unbend from her resolution, and consent to warm the hearts of the Americans during the icy months, we cannot undertake to predict.

ALBONI.

The engagement of this great singer having expired she will presently start for Paris, where she is destined again to shine as the “bright particular star” of the Grand Opera.

Although only with us for so brief a period Alboni has seldom excited more genuine enthusiasm. Her rentrée as Cenerentola, after a whole season's absence, will be remembered as one of the greatest triumphs ever achieved by a professor of the vocal art. Alboni was still Alboni—the most perfect of singers. Her glorious voice, nothing deteriorated in tone, had extended in compass, gained in equality and increased in power. The sensation she created was prodigious. Never was a more startling effect made upon a vast and well instructed audience. The second performance of the Cenerentola was equally successful.

The Corbeille d'Oranges, which was played twice, brought out Alboni in the first original part ever written for her. Projected and completed by Scribe and Auber in great haste, while Alboni was in Madrid, this last joint effort of the two most fertile and ingenious of Frenchmen was hardly worthy of their own reputation or the splendid talents of Alboni. Nevertheless the vocalisation of the charming Marietta would have redeemed a much weaker opera than the Corbeille d'Oranges; and, while we could not but lament that something more favourable to her voice and style had not been prepared for her by the king of French composers, we could not fail to admire the brilliant manner in which Alboni vindicated her fame, and gave point and meaning to every passage in the music that offered any opportunity for legitimate effect.

Alboni's Ninetta in La Gazza Ladra, one of her first attempts in the pure soprano line, was eulogised by us, in 1849, as a masterly performance; and her reappearance this season, on two occasions, in the same part, only tended to confirm our first impressions. The “Di piacer,” as Alboni sings it, is in itself worth an opera.

The Figlia del Reggimento twice given, with Alboni as Maria, added yet more laurels to her wreath of fame. Anything more natural, piquant, and vivacious than her acting in the scenes with the regiment; anything more pure, animated, and irresistible than her singing throughout the opera, we have never heard; and none but deafmen could have remained unmoved at the tones which flowed from her lips in one incessant stream of melody. To hear Alboni beat the drum, better than any drummer, and to look at her saucy face and laughing eyes the while, did the heart good. She must get something new for the lesson scene, however; the old cadenza is a platitude, and does not suit her—simply because she cannot, and could she, would not, scream. Bakke's sparkling Rondo finale, from the Maid of Artois, sung as Malibran—for whom it was composed, was wont to sing it—was the culminating point of the opera. On the whole, Alboni's Maria is the best we have seen—the first act incomparably the best—but it has yet to be appreciated.

To say anything about Orsini, and the "Brindisi," except that on the four occasions when Lucrezia Borgia was given, with Madame Barbieri Nini, it produced the same furor as of old, would be impertinent. To praise what is above praise is not our office, nor to criticise that which is faultless.

In taking leave of Albani we have only to regret the shortness of her stay in London, and the disappointment at not having heard her in the Prophète. To the admirable beauties of her Fides we can testify, having seen her play that character several times in Paris. The part of Jean of Leyden would have suited our great English tenor, Sims Reeves, precisely; and it cannot be sufficiently lamented that the opportunity should have been lost. And now, farewell to MARIETTA ALBANI! May her shadow never be less!—nor her substance neither; we cannot have too much of a good thing, and Marietta is so good and unsophisticated that a bit less of her would be so much lost that had much better be retained. Long life to her!—with her lovely face, and merry smile—like strawberries buried in cream—or, to climb higher up the poetic ladder, like sunbeams glittering on a distant window.

CRUVELLI AND MOZART.

On Wednesday night Sophie Cruvelli proved herself worthy of Mozart and of herself. The opera was Le Nozze di Figaro, and Sophie was the saucy, dreaming, ardent Cherubino. How she looks, and moves, and acts, in Mozart's (not Beaumarchais') page, we need not repeat; enough that her impersonation was more complete and finished than before. But how she sang the airs deserves an apostrophe apart.

We have so seldom had to reproach Cruvelli with mistakes of judgment, that it gave us pain to rate her, on the first and second performances of Cherubino, for want of taste and want of appreciation, where the music of Mozart was in question. We could not believe that she, who understood so well and felt so deeply the profoundest beauties of Fidelio, would fail to approach with a like spirit the passionate melodies which Mozart has put into the mouth of Cherubino, elevating an ordinary character into a poetical creation. We were disappointed, however, and took occasion to express our dissatisfaction in plain terms. So much the greater is the pleasure with which we now make the amende honorable to the charming Sophie, who, by her singing on Wednesday night, completely reinstated herself in the esteem of musicians, and delighted the general public beyond all measure. No changes, no fortitudo, no superfluous rallentandos, broke the course of Mozart's inspired melody, which flowed on without impediment, as a river to the ocean of its love. The exquisite beauty of the voice clad the tune of the "Voi che sapete" in gorgeous hues; and it sailed along the waves of the air, impelled by the breeze which was the breath of the songstress, as proudly as that "golden ship on a sunny sea," of which the poet Shelley so often dreamed and wrote. Sophie Cruvelli was more than herself. She had bent her head to the great name of Mozart, had bound her will with the strong cords of resolution, and laid it on the altar of the god of music, as a sacrifice. The young girl, in whose ears the applause of the crowd is for ever ringing—an echo of the past, or a prophecy of the future—disdaining to court the general favour, in descending from the high and classic pedestal on which she had placed herself, by her communion with Beethoven, was sublime. But let it not be thought that the crowd was without feeling, without heart. No—since Sophie Cruvelli first appeared before a London audience, no effort of her talent has been more enthusiastically acknowledged. The applause and the encore were spontaneous and one; the song, repeated with the same purity and reverential deference to the composer, produced the same unanimous pleasure. A poetical friend of ours—Mozart and Beethoven, (and Cruvelli) mad—in the fever of his satisfaction, improvised the following acrostic, in the sonnet form, to which the fourteen letters that make up the two names of SOPHIE CRUVELLI, helped him not a little.

TO SOPHIE CRUVELLI,

(On hearing her sing "Voi che sapete," at Her Majesty's Theatre, on Wednesday, August 20, 1851.)

Sing on, sweet warbler, with the beaming eye,
Onward and onward, let thy waves of song
Prophetic flow, in tones that cannot die,
Having no end but in the memory's wrong.
Inspired maiden! raise thy voice on high;
Envy herself cannot resist thee long.

Charm us, enchantress! with that air again;
Rare melody like thine doth soften pain.
Unloose the silver strings! To thee belong
Variety of tones that reach the heart.
Enamoured silence wakens at the strain,
Lending a voice in echo to Mozart.
Like a faint shadow on a sunny plain,
It hovers near thy lips—alas! in vain.

We cannot say much for the "sonnet-acrostic" of our friend, which has little poetry, less clearness, and is, indeed, quite unworthy to be dedicated to Sophie Cruvelli. The idea of Echo being the voice of Silence is tolerably far fetched, and the simile of the shadow is very shadowy. Nevertheless, as it was an improvisation, written con amore, and as the author would give his eyes to see it in print, we have printed it, trusting that it may find its way, after all, into the Opera Box. Meanwhile, we must apologise to our readers, and more particularly to Mdlle. Cruvelli, whose great merits should have inspired a better sonnet than that into which our mad acquaintance has tortured the initial letters of her name.

MADAME CELESTE.—We believe it is the intention of this popular artist to start for America very shortly. Mr. Webster also intends paying the Yankees a visit some time next year.

A NATIONAL OPERA.

Where is the money to come from? Without money it is no use talking. Find your money, and begin. Money can lease, or buy, or build a theatre; money can set it agoing, money can keep it on its legs; in short, money can do anything.

We are "a nation of shop-keepers." The stigma is, unhappily, too well founded to excite anger. We are "a nation of shop-keepers," and as "a nation of shop-keepers" we must look at the question of a National Opera. If we do not, we examine it with other eyes than our own, and the conclusion we arrive at helps us to nothing. This view of the matter, however, by no means induces despair. On the contrary, we are for continuing the agitation in every possible quarter, and by every possible means. If the government inclines in the end, so much the better, if not, so much the worse; but whether or not, it very little affects the real question. For our own parts we have no hope of any assistance or encouragement from the state, which persists in regarding all public amusements not as necessities of home policy, but as speculations of private individuals. The state does not consider itself in any manner concerned in the interests of private individuals. The state allowed the National Drama to die of exhaustion, without holding out a helping hand, and yet the national drama is represented by Shakspeare and a dazzling array of great names that have made our stage literature the richest and noblest in the world. The National Opera, unfortunately, is represented with no such distinction, Purcell, Arne, and Bishop—these are our traditions; and as far as the stage is concerned, the present influence of their works is insignificant. What right, therefore, have we to ask the state to do for the National Opera what the state neglected to do for the national drama?—for Purcell, Arne, and Bishop, what was not done for Shakspeare, Congreve, and Sheridan?

Agitate, agitate, agitate! Talk continually, and everywhere. Endeavour to prove that a National Opera is a public want, that the speculation would pay, and amidst "a nation of shop-keepers" it is odd if some responsible persons do not come forward with money, and plenty of it. We must confess, after reading attentively the last letter of "Philo Musica," that we cannot see what his arguments have to do with the subject. It seems to us of little consequence, at this step of the discussion, how many fiddlers and how many singers are to constitute the troop. Get your theatre—or rather, catch your speculators, and then discuss such matters in detail. At present they are impertinent to the question. We must also enter a protest against the idea of our correspondent, that the National Opera, when it comes into existence, is to be a theatre for the essays of beginners. This would be a sad mistake. The public of London are too knowing to pay for a series of experiments. We do not mean that no first works should be tried; but we cannot possibly agree that every young composer who has a manuscript opera in his portfolio should consider himself aggrieved if it be not forthwith accepted by the National Opera. The National Opera would soon be bankrupt if such a policy were adopted. No, all success depends upon the fortune of war. The notion of an individual having any positive claim upon a theatre, beyond that derived from a well-earned reputation, is preposterous. Reputations are obtained in all sorts of manners. Everyone has his throw, and for him who is blessed by the stars the dice turns up a favourable number. If each composer who had a work completed were led to suppose that he possessed an absolute claim upon the National Opera, the direction would be saddled with at least a hundred in a season.

Our idea of a National Opera is the same as the French idea. The Theatre de la Nation, or Grand Opera, and the Opera Comique—these are National Operas. They are national because it is understood that the French language shall be the medium of interpretation, not that French composers and French executants alone shall be engaged. The love of music has spread far too widely and rapidly to admit of any such narrow ground of action. In England the failure of the Society of British Musicians has stamped the system as a mistake, founded upon egotism and petty selfishness. Those who dread competition should keep in doors. This is the age of competition; competition stalks the streets, and the principle of free trade has been established irrevocably. A National English Opera, therefore, means an Opera with the English language as the medium of interpretation, for which original works shall be composed by the musicians of Europe, and executed by the artists of Europe, the best that can be secured, according to the means of the establishment.

Our musicians have long been falling into the error of the protectionists. Their cry has been "Save us; we are ruined by the foreigners." To speak advisedly, this is all "fudge." If the "native" have no better argument he had better hold his tongue. Why should the native musician be protected any more than the native green-grocer? It is the public who should be protected against the inflictions of mediocrity. A nice thing, indeed, to have a National Opera from which Mendelssohn, had he lived, would have been excluded, on the grounds that he was a foreigner; or Malibran for the same reason. There are very few Mendelssohns, and very few Malibrans; certainly none in Europe now, much less in England; and this is a strong reason why we should welcome them with avidity wherever we can find them. A National Opera should be an example, not a seminary; a point to look forward to as the goal, not a place for the unfledged to try their wings. The best artists and the best music should be heard there, while the young and inexperienced should go to listen and improve. We would not give a farthing for any other kind of national opera than one to which merit alone should be the passport of safe conduct. Imagine the London public, blasé and satiated, patronising a theatre in which the staple entertainment is to be a series of undigested works, performed by a company of mediocre artists, whose only badge of distinction is having been born in England! The notion is ridiculous—in 1851 especially. The Crystal Palace has towered over all such prejudice and bigotry. The Crystal Palace has fixed for ever and ever the principle of free trade—to oppose which now argues unmanliness or imbecility.

Brother musicians—composers, singers, players—take a better and a wiser view of the question. Work hard, support each other, speak the truth, abhor cliques, agitate, and something will turn up. If you imagine that the public will pay to see an opera because it is composed by a Briton, or to hear a singer because he was born in these realms, instead of because the opera is good, and the singer talented, you will be out in your reckoning. Such a speculation will never answer. Common sense, liberality, free trade, and the march of intellect are all against it. Compete with the foreigner in talent, and beat him if you can. It is no use making faces and saying “I am an Englishman.” The public to be amused does not care a straw for your nationality. Moreover, recollect that it is to the foreigner we owe the present advanced condition of our musical taste. Before Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Rossini, Auber, Spohr, and Mendelssohn were familiarly known in this country, the Siege of Belgrade, the Haunted Tower, and the Cabinet, were boldly entitled operas, while now they would simply be announced as “plays interspersed with songs.” Owing so much to the foreigners, having learned so much from them that we are now capable not only to understand, but to criticise, do not let us arraign them as enemies, do not let us kick down the ladder up which we have climbed. The fact of musical talent existing largely in England none acquainted with the matter can deny. It is our duty to make the best of it, which can only be effected by labour, courage, and perseverance. The cry against the foreigner is simply calculated to raise an echo in derision.

CATHERINE HAYES.

The Irish Syren is about to leave the shores of Great Britain, cross the wide Atlantic, and, for the first time, rest her little feet upon the soil of America. Having filled the old world with the melody of her tones, she is going to enchant the new. That brother Jonathan will welcome her with open arms who can doubt that doubts not the largeness of brother Jonathan's heart. Catherine Hayes—the gentle Kate—has but to move her lips, and brother Jonathan, who with all his boasting lacks neither sentiment nor soul, will straightway be enslaved. An English, an Irish, a Scotch, or even a Welch ballad is enough to do the business. The general ear of America will incline to the dulcet strains of the sweet warbler of Erin, and the general knee will bend in homage to her beauty and her art.

Talk of her Italian triumphs, her English triumphs, or even her Irish triumphs as much as you please; it is our firm persuasion that the American triumphs of Catherine Hayes will surpass them all. She is just the singer for our transatlantic friends, who are keenly susceptible to natural expression, and instantly touched by a bit of genuine simplicity. In the ballad it may be safely said that Catherine stands alone. There is an inexpressible tenderness, a tenderness devoid of all affectation, in the delicacy of those tuneful flowers of song! She never overdoes her sentiment; she never hands it to you in a plate (like certain singers we refrain from naming); but goes direct to your heart with the innocent confidence, the irresistible persuasiveness of a child. This is Catherine's most admirable quality, and with this, or we are no prophets, she will kindle a new fire on the hearth of American enthusiasm.

In her Italian airs, in her sacred songs, and in her selections from the great German composers—Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and others—Catherine Hayes has won too high a reputation to need any eulogy at our hands. In short, America will hear her and be convinced of her admirable qualifications for shining in every school of vocal music.

Meanwhile we find among our provincial letters the announcement of four farewell concerts which Catherine Hayes intends to give previous to her leaving England. The first three for the 28th, 29th, and 30th inst., are to take place in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester; the fourth and last, at the Theatre Royal, Liverpool, on the 1st of September. Her coadjutors are Rebecca Isaacs, Martha Williams, Augustus Braham, Menghis, little Lavenue, and littler Sivori. And then—good bye! The charming bird of song will spread her wings and fly to the new world, made happier than the old by the possession of such a treasure. Our prayers will be for her speedy and safe return. If Catherine be home-sick, let her despatch a pigeon to our office, with the news; we will send off a steamer, swift and strong, to bring her back to England.

MDLLE. AND HERR GEIGER.

Having arrived so late in the season, Herr Geiger, of whose high reputation at Vienna and position at the Court we have spoken on a previous occasion, has found it expedient to postpone, until next season, the grand concert which was the main object of his visit to this country, and at which several of his compositions, among others, a symphony, were to have been performed. We have no doubt that Herr Geiger's reputation as a composer has been legitimately earned, and we anticipate with pleasure the opportunity of hearing and judging the merits of his works.

Mademoiselle Geiger, it appears, is also a composer of talent. What her compatriots think of her may be surmised from the following quaint review of one of her recent publications, which has been literally translated into quaint English by a German pen, from the columns of one of the German musical papers:—

Miss Geiger, who has been silent for a long time, has now finished a great composition for the pianoforte, under the title, "A Bouquet of White Roses." This bouquet is divided in four pieces, each of them has a peculiar name. "Disappointment," "A Thought of Thee," "Resignation," "Adio." Each of those is perfected with such a fresh sentiment, as if a genius did awake to life the slumbering thoughts which were reposing in the mind of that highly talented girl. From those four pieces we prefer the third, "Resignation," as well in idea as in excellent form, although it would be difficult to make a choice amidst those pretty smelling little flowers. We have no doubt that as soon as that lovely composition appears in public, she will be admitted to the highest circles, because elegance of the style is a characteristic sign of every one of those flowers.

We are further informed that, in addition to her musical talents, Mademoiselle Geiger possesses a strong feeling for the stage, and that she has acted at Vienna in presence of the first artists and judges in the country, both in German and French, with the utmost success. It is more than probable that arrangements now pending will enable us to announce that Mademoiselle Geiger next season will display her capabilities as an actress before an English public at Mr. Mitchell's theatre, in St. James's.

Meanwhile, the family Geiger leave England to-day to return to Vienna.

FIDELIO.

(Continued from our last.)

The second overture is so decidedly the "sketch" for the third, that to make a separate analysis of it would be but to anticipate our remarks upon the later, the finished composition; we shall, therefore, examine this together with the noble work for which our great master may be said to have prepared himself by the exercise of his powers upon the earlier production, and shall speak of them as one, excepting where, some important differences distinguish the two overtures, and so call for particular observation. The comparison of these two compositions, or, to speak better, these two forms of the same composition is a most interesting and a most valuable study to the musician. The two overtures under notice present an instance, almost unique in our art, of a sketch for a great work having come before the world, though with the classical master-pieces in painting, this is very generally the case, and in some few but most important examples in literature is also to be met with; so that the musician can rarely get behind the curtain of a composer's thoughts and ascertain how they have gradually moulded themselves into the complete form in which he has been satisfied to dismiss them from his care as fully ripened and mature, and the opportunity, when it occurs, of examining into the process of musical composition is, therefore, the more highly to be prized. In the present instance, the plan has been greatly modified; extended in some places and abridged in others, the working of the second part entirely reconstructed, the reprisal of the subject quite differently arranged, the coda much lengthened, and one new phrase, that is so conspicuous in beauty and so important in treatment as to assume the consequence of an extra subject introduced. The instrumentation too, is very greatly changed, so much so, indeed, as to make us wonder in perusing the score of the earlier work how Beethoven, who had already made so valuable experience in orchestral distribution and had proved himself so distinguished a master of that complicated art, should have had such evident difficulty in giving the true expression of his ideas as is evidenced in the striking alterations which he has here effected. For these variations in the disposition of the score which present so advantageous a lesson to the musical student, and so interesting a matter of curiosity to the musical connoisseur, we must refer the reader to the two scores themselves, as, without the aid of very copious musical examples, they are quite beyond the scope of verbal explanation; but of the differences in the plan of the two overtures, we expect to give such an account as will certainly excite and we hope satisfy the interest of our readers.

The grand overture in C (known by the original title of the Opera Leonore, is very much the most extensive work of its class that Beethoven produced, being more rich in ideas, more copious in design, and more elaborate in development than any other overture he has left us. Considered as a theatrical prelude, this overture must be pronounced unsuccessful, in so far as the two latter qualities we have ascribed to it, which give it preeminent importance as an abstract work of art, render it inappropriate for performance in a theatre at that period of the entertainment when the attention of the audience is yet unsettled, their interest unexcited, but their curiosity eager, impatient, and sensitively awake. It may be answered to this, with much seeming reason, that the overture has been recently played as an entr'acte, and has produced a great and legitimate effect; but we have to reply to this, that not only is the subject of the opera, which the overture most graphically illustrates, familiar to the audience, and the illustration thus rendered apparent; not only are the many phrases in the opera that are incorporated in the overture recognisable to all who hear them, and their significance as aiding to unfold the story thus rendered obvious; not only is the overture itself well known to the majority of the musical public, and the multitude of its ideas, the grandeur of its design, and the intricacy of its development thus rendered comprehensible to a cultivated intelligence, but the performance of Fidelio at the present time, is, in truth, a kind of ovation to the master, in which all who participate, either as executants or auditors, have, or should have, a feeling beyond that of the mere representation, a feeling of homage to the artist, no less than of enthusiasm for his work, and this renders them greedy of every thought, of every phrase, of every note that bears upon the matter, and would make the public hear an orchestra execute with patient interest, if not with unqualified delight, the whole of the four overtures, if convenient situations in the course of an evening's entertainment could be found for their performance, and therefore the present reception of the overture in question is no just criterion of its fitness for the purpose for which it was originally composed. Let us, however, consider it as a concert overture, as an abstract illustration of the beautiful story of the opera, and as a musical commentary upon the composer's treatment of the subject, and we shall find our delight in its beauties only divided with our admiration of the mighty powers of conception and arrangement that have concentrated in its production.

The introductory adagio presents to us the idea of a great and gloomy mystery. Unlike the first overture, this appears to us to commence at once in the prison, with the external sufferings and with the inward consolations of the injured Florestan. The long sustained dominant note, the descending scale in unison, the unexpected rest upon F sharp, the brief transition into the key of B minor and the insinuation of the key of C major, to which there is no satisfactory return, suggest to us the vague indecision of one whose thoughts, having no external nourishment, can only feed upon themselves and so ever reproduce themselves, returning always, as in a circle, to one constant starting point, the misery and the injustice of his confinement and the uncertainty of its cause. The interrupted close, that introduces the key of A flat with the beautiful adagio from the aria of Florestan, indicates the deceptive consolation which he finds in remembering the happiness that is now, in the spring days of his life fled from him, and which, for the moment seems, in the recollection, to live again. We expect then, that this touching melody is to be repeated, but are ingeniously disappointed by a series of very remarkable progressions, through which the first phrase only is constantly worked, until we come to a half-close on the chord of B major; this passage indicates the fallacy of our sufferer's blissful visions and their gradual melting away into the sad reality of his fetters and his solitude. Now we have an arpeggio passage divided in responses of three notes between the flute and violin, which forms an accompaniment to the first phrase of the previous melody, and proceeds through a series of modulations back to the key of A flat, where we have a grand, tumultuous burst of the whole orchestra; this passage is considerably extended in the third, which we shall always speak of as the finished overture, and the course of the modulations completely changed, and in this we see the judicious development of an idea that in the very brief form in which it appears in the sketch, has a somewhat fragmentary effect, as having no satisfactory connexion with the context, and being insufficient in itself to convey a complete idea. The expression intended by this passage, must be the same as that in the episodial adagio of the first overture, where, after the melody of Florestan's air has been given entire, a fragment of it is alternated with the two bars of iterated chords for wind instruments on the unaccented notes of the measure; here, as in that place the idea is presented of the prisoner vainly seeking in the deep abyss of thought for some resolution of the problem of his fate, for some point on which his hope may rest, some sign by which his apprehensions may be defined, and of the fathomless blank being continually crossed by the now regretful memory of his so early vanished happiness; the memory, which like a bird weary of flight in the desert air, hovers to and fro in a kind of dreamy delirium, supported by the accustomed mechanical and involuntary movements of its tired pinions. The impetuous, rushing passage, on a chord of A flat, which forms the climax to this chain of modulations, indicates the proud determination of a noble mind to defy fate, and by the inward feeling of superiority to conquer circumstances. From this point to the end of the introduction the finished overture differs entirely from the sketch. In the latter we have only four bars, which have to us no apparent meaning, except it may be to renew the sense of mystery with which the movement opened, to draw, as it were, a curtain of clouds upon the scene that has just been presented, which is to break away and discover the completely new train of emotions that are presented in the following movements; whereas, in the finished overture we have a very fine passage, which consists of slowly-repeated chords for wind instruments, interspersed at closer and closer intervals with the full power of the orchestra, and proceeds, by bold and vigorous modulation, to a half close on G; and then occurs a phrase of most exquisite beauty, which serves in the second part of the following allegro, where it is worked to such considerable length as to make it a very prominent feature of the overture. The natural interpretation of this grand and imposing, and afterwards very touching passage, appears to us to be, first, a carrying out the feeling last suggested, the true dignity of the moral hero, who, in his proper consciousness of right, looks down as from a tower with scorn upon the evil influences which restrain his actions, but cannot fetter his soul; and then the thought of Leonore and of her passionate love breaks like a meteor upon the darkness of his heart, and irradiates it with the brightness of a living joy. The figure for the basses that alternates this beautiful phrase of love, conveys the reality of his situation in opposition to the ideality of his dreams.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

After an absence of some weeks, Madame Sontag returned on Saturday, and appeared as Rosina in the Barbiers. The fair artist encountered a most flattering reception, and looked in excellent health and spirits. She was also in delightful voice and sang with all her wonted charm and fluency, and surprised and pleased her hearers. The Rhode's air and variations was as marvellous a display of execution as ever, and the variation with the arpeggio passages, as a matter of course, rapturously encored. Madame Sontag substituted the rondo finale from Alary's opera, Le Tre Nozze, which was hardly less remarkable as a brilliant specimen of finished and rapid vocalism.

Madame Sontag produced a decided impression both in her singing and acting as Rosina, and was frequently and continuously applauded throughout the performance. Nevertheless, we must acknowledge we have heard the celebrated songstress in music better suited to her voice and style, and have seen her in a part in which she shone with greater lustre as an actress.

The music of Rosina is written for a mezzo soprano, instead of a high soprano, which Madame Sontag's voice is, and hence the necessity of sundry alterations and substitutions, which were not always improvements on the original. This was exemplified unmistakably in the "Dunque io son" duet, and the "Ah! qual colpo" trio, both of which suffered materially by a total disregard to Rossini's score. Nor were we deeply impressed with Madame Sontag's version of the "Una voce," which, according to the written words and written notes, in our humble estimation, and with due deference to the charming and intelligent artist, requires more fire, more energy, and, so to speak, more devilment, than she thinks proper to infuse into it. Rosina is no simple drawing-room miss, with simpers, smiles, and other quiet enchantments of the very lady, but a true demoiselle of intrigue, quite proper certainly, but with a spirit beyond the control of guardians, and a self-will that brooks no let nor hindrance to any desire she may form; a veritable daughter, in brief, of the Southern sun, as Beaumarchais has drawn her, and Rossini so vigorously realised in his music. Where Madame Sontag adheres to Rossini's notes, nothing hardly could be better or more effective; but her voice could not in this way be always made available. Her singing throughout the first finale, bating certain alterations in the quintet, "Freddo ed immobile," was all that could be desired, and her share of "Zitti, Zitti," all but perfect.

At the end, Madame Sontag was called for with acclamations, and received with the greatest enthusiasm. The attendance was one of the largest of the season.

On Tuesday, Madame Barbieri Nini repeated the part of Lucrezia Borgia for the fourth time, and Alboni made her last appearance as Orsini. We were sorry to see Alboni take leave of the public in a part so entirely beneath her talents.

It is true the "Brindisi" always excites the old furore, and Alboni sang it more divinely than ever on Tuesday night, but the character is absorbed in the more prominent light of Lucrezia, and Orsini becomes a mere secondary personage even in the hands of Alboni. We had hoped to have seen Cruvelli and Alboni in Semiramide before the close of the season, and such, we believe, was the intention of the management, but something seems to have occurred which prevented its accomplishment, which is to be regretted, as every one was desirous of hearing Cruvelli and Alboni in the same opera, and Arsace, as every one knows, is one of Alboni's greatest parts, and the one in which she first made herself famous in the eyes and ears of a London audience. At all events, Alboni should have made her adieus in the Cenerentola or the Gazza Ladra.

Wednesday was included in the subscription in lieu of the last subscription night of the season, August 30th. The performance was Le Nozze di Figaro, and the divertissement from the Prodigo. Considering the period of the year, the house was fully and fashionably attended.

Of the general performance of the Nozze di Figaro, we have little to say. The artists all acquitted themselves well, and the opera was given with unusual spirit and never seemed to flag for one instant.

Madame Sontag's Susanna displayed all its usual charm and freshness, and her singing was as the warbling of a linnet that singeth its quiet tune in the leafy month of June. From all we have heard, however, of this lady's former performances, we should prefer her in the Countess, the music of which would suit her to admiration. The "Porgi Amor," and "Dove sono," from Madame Sontag's lips, would indeed be a treat.

The especial feature of the night was Cruvelli's Cherubino, which in every respect, exhibited a marked improvement on the two previous performances. That Cruvelli had given heart and mind to Mozart's Page was demonstrated not only in the greater amount of ease and spirit betokened in the acting, and the more careful rendering of the music, with the absence of all elaboration and effort, but in the rigid adherence to the text, which she did not violate in a single instance. We have tapped the fair Cruvelli smartly on the fingers for certain rude intrusions made upon the score of Mozart in her first and second performance of Cherubino, and were not sparing of our animadversions and comments, besides supplying wholesome counsel in profusion. Our advice, it would appear, has not been expended in vain. Cruvelli read, perceived its worth, and profited by it. Directed by our hints she preserved Mozart's eloquence in its purity and integrity, and dismissed the flagrant work and false ornaments which desecrated the native beauty of the original. Henceforth Cruvelli will refrain from clothing and adorning the simple statue with gauze, and fluttering veils, and flounces. The enthusiasm she created on Wednesday night by her exquisitely pure and unadorned singing in "Voi che Sapete," in which she did not alter one single note, must have taught her, that, with her voice and expression, Mozart had much better be left to himself, and not be-capp'd, be-furbelow'd and be-dizened by any master-tailor of the voice. We have rarely indeed heard a greater effect produced by any singing, and never in a more legitimate way. Cruvelli's singing was really divine, and, as we stinted our praise on a former occasion, she shall now have all she fully merits. The encore was tremendous, and, in the repeat, Cruvelli still remained conscientious to Mozart, and provoked more than before the acclamations of the audience. The "Non so piu cosa" was hardly less perfect an effort. It was most charmingly sung and with an esprit and an abandon that displayed real genius. In short, we were never more pleased, never more delighted with Cruvelli, who has now proved herself no less adequate a proficient in the melting love-strains of Mozart than in the profound inspirations of Beethoven.

On Tuesday, much to our surprise and chagrin, Florinda was repeated, and proved as dull and unattractive as before. We never knew an audience so lavish of their silence—to speak negatively—and never witnessed a greater expenditure of talents for no results. Cruvelli screamed the high notes as loud as she could, and Lablache thundered as stentoriantly as ever; but neither high notes Cruvellian, nor brassy tones Lablachian, with all two grand talents could bring to bear upon the acting, could provoke the audience to a single outcry or a palm-clapping. The curtain fell on each act without a hand, and the end was received with a death-like and ominous silence. We pitied Cruvelli, and Lablache, and Calzolari, and Coletti, and in short all concerned in the performance. Why was not Norma given?—or if Pardini has left London, why was not the Barbiere repeated? In fact anything, or nothing, would have been preferable to an opera, which, whatever may be its intrinsic value, the public will not have at any price. Better far to have closed the theatre for one night than, by submitting a work to the public and subscribers for which they have shown a decided distaste, to render the entertainments of Her Majesty's Theatre a subject for serious animadversion.

The divertissement from the Prodigo was relished amazingly after Florinda. The sparkling and brilliant dances were each and all received with loud acclamations, and people seemed to breathe freely as if they had been removed from a dense to a more rarefied atmosphere. Carolina Rosati appeared to dance more enchantingly than ever, and never was received with warmer or more continuous applause. Nor did the charming demoiselles Rosa, Esper, Jullien, Lamoureux Kohlenberg, &c., who danced the sub-solos, go unrewarded for their zeal and exertions. In fact Auber's delicious music and the splendid dancing of the star, Rosati, and her brilliant satellites, was never more warmly discussed and enjoyed.

The final performances of the season are now before us in black and white. The season itself is about "to die like a dolphin," each moment assuming a more splendid hue, "the last the loveliest till all is gone," as Lord Byron says in "Childe Harold," or "Don Juan," the former for a choice. To render this intelligible, the reader must know that Mr. Lumley, to add a new glory to his setting year, has engaged for the closing performances the popular, the fair, the fascinating, the multiple-talented and celebrated danseuse, Fanny Cerito, who will make her debut this season in her own ballet, Ondine, which will induce all the habitues whom Brighton, grouse shooting, and the York races have left in London, to rush to Her Majesty's Theatre to enjoy a new sensation. Madame Sontag, too, will resume this evening her original part of Maria in La Figlia del Reggimento.

On Tuesday—the last night of the subscription—Anna Bolena will be revived for Madame Barbieri Nini, with Rosati, Amalia Ferraris, and Cerrito in the ballet.

Four farewell nights, at playhouse prices, are announced for Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. On Wednesday, Sontag will appear in Sonnambula, and Don Giovanni will be given on Thursday. The ballet entertainments for these nights will include the talents of Rosati, Cerito, and Amalia Ferraris. The performances for Friday and Saturday have not been announced.

In our notice of Saturday's performance, we omitted stating that Marie Taglioni made her last appearance this season. Le Diable a Quatre was the ballet, and Marie, the charming and piquante, was applauded throughout with great animation. We, as well as all the lovers of the ballet, will welcome back Marie with open arms next season.

Last night Fidelio was repeated for the last time. We have but room to say that the performance was good, and Cruvelli transcendent. Mr. Lumley should wind up his season with Cruvelli and Beethoven—and one more representation of Fidelio.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday, Roberto Il Diavolo was represented, and, altogether, proved a great treat. Tamberlik was in immense force, and sang better than we have heard him in this opera. The oftener we hear Tamberlik in Meyerbeer's music the more satisfied are we, that of all tenors living, he is best suited for it; and greatly as we admire Mario in the Huguenots and the Prophete, we should be far from sorry if he were to resign his part, in them to Tamberlik. We do not go so far as to assert that Tamberlik would come up to the finest points of Mario's Raoul and Jean, but in the bolder and more energetic passages with which both operas of the composer abound, Tamberlik's voice would, undoubtedly, prove more telling and effective. If, however, we felt quite assured that Mario's voice would remain unimpaired while singing in Meyerbeer's music, we would not give him up for several Tamberliks, although each Tamberlik must necessarily be of great weight and value; but Mario suffers from overstraining his voice in the septet in the Huguenots, and from taxing his powers in an extraordinary degree throughout the invocation scene in the Prophete, and his surplus efforts in the Bacchanalian song in the last scene. Had Mario long since resigned his parts in the French operas to Tamberlik, it would have been much better for Mario, and much better for the management.

During the representation of the Roberto on Saturday night, two contretemps occurred, which somewhat militated against the completeness of the performance. Formes was taken suddenly ill, and could not appear in the last act. The last act was consequently shorn of much of its attractions. Mdle. Louise Taglioni sprained her ankle, and so the dances had to be cut. With these two drawbacks—serious ones it must be admitted—the opera passed off with considerable eclat, no small thanks being due to Grisi, who exerted herself to the utmost.

The performance of Il Flauto Magico on Tuesday, calls for no remark; nor does that of the Prophete on Thursday.

There has been some talk of bringing out Donizetti's Les Martyrs, as the winding up production of the season, for Tamberlik and Grisi.

• Dramatic Intelligence.

FRENCH PLAYS—An extra performance was given at the St. James's Theatre on Thursday night, for the benefit of M. Cloup, a name which has been from time immemorial associated with French plays in London.

The chief attraction of the evening was Le Chevalier St. George, in which M. Lafont made his last appearance for the present season, which another day will bring to its close.

The character of the mulatto Chrichton is admirably calculated to bring out the varied resources of this accomplished actor. It affords equal scope for that easy gaiety of deportment, and those sallies of dry and refined humour which distinguish his comedy, and the natural earnestness and unexaggerated vigour with which he is able to command the deeper emotions of his audience. Few actors can compare with him in the thorough possession of all the mechanism of his art, and, though others may make us laugh louder or startle us into more violent emotions, none perform a part with merit more equally sustained, or leave at the conclusion an impression more thoroughly satisfactory. The house, we are sorry to record, was an excessively thin one, but the small audience seemed to feel themselves called upon for extra exertions and did every honour to the last appearance of the actor as effectively as the most crowded assembly.

DRURY-LANE.—As we predicted—the MUSICAL WORLD by the way is always right in its predictions—Mr. Mac Collum and Co. have made a hit; the public flock in crowds to see them every night, and so great has been the patronage they have received that they give a limited number of representations by day in addition to those in the evening.

The performances, too, are judiciously varied—at least as much as their nature will permit, that is, to about the same amount as the well-known variation in the gentleman's diet, who always dined at the Cheshire Cheese, or the Cock in Fleet-street, and from one year's end to the other ordered "chops and steaks—chops and steaks—with occasionally, steaks and chops, by way of a change." In the like manner, at DRURY-LANE, we have Madame Brower and the Little Loisset and the Little Loisset, Madame Brower, et ainsi de suite. One really novel feature, however, in the programme, has been the appearance of a young lady on the tight rope, and trully the feats she performs surpass everything we ever witnessed in, or rather on, that line. She walks, runs, dances, and jumps upon it with as much certainty and ease as we could indulge in the same movements—were we to forget our critical dignity—on the trattoir in Regent-street, and besides this, wheels a barrow, sits in a chair and beats the drum, and all her rivals, with a precision, certainty and aplomb perfectly astonishing. We should say Mr. Mac Collum and Co. would make a longer stay than they first intended, although they might have been pretty sure that their quadrupedal performers, at least, would be successful, as there is nothing very extraordinary in horses "having a run."

SURREY.—Messrs. Shepherd and Creswick have been doing excellent business lately with opera. If our readers could witness, as we have done, the delight and attention with which our transpontine brethren listen to the chefs d'œuvre of Auber, Meyerbeer, Balfe, Wallace and a host of others, they would never again hear the parrot-cry "of the English are not a musical people," without giving it a flat denial. Everything requires cultivation—taste as well as any thing else. The man who honours Shakespere and reverences Tennyson would probably have done neither, unless he had pursued a course of reading which developed his mind, and led him by easy steps to the comprehension of the two great masters we have mentioned. So with music. It is absurd to imagine that people who have heard nothing all their lives but, "Oh! the Roast Beef of Old England," and other equally patriotic, but not particularly classical strains, could sit down and enjoy Mozart or Mendelssohn: but make good music more accessible to the million, and it will not be long before a marked change is visible. The Surrey management have gone upon this conviction, and while they are conferring a public benefit, they are pursuing a course which is most advantageous to their private pockets. For instance, last Monday the house was literally crowded to suffocation on the production of Meyerbeer's Huguenots, which was got up in the most creditable manner, and sung in a way which would have surprised many of our abonnés, who are still, perhaps, under the impression that opera is confined to Her Majesty's and Covent Garden. The cast was a powerful one, including as it did the names of Messrs. Travers, Borroni, and Corri, Mesdames Romer, Poole, and Annie Romer, assisted by a very good, and pretty numerous chorus. Miss Romer has returned to the stage after an absence of three years. Her voice is not all that it was,—we are not so much inclined to believe that it has actually lost much of its power, as that it has grown rather unmanageable from want of practice. Elle s'est un peu rouillée,—but spite of this, Miss Romer is still a charming singer. Miss Annie Romer has also returned, and been most heartily welcomed by her admirers, that is by the whole Surrey public, with whom she is a great and especial favourite. She made her debut this year in the Huguenots on Monday last. She never sang better; she has most decidedly improved since we last heard her. Her voice has lost none of that agreeable and pleasing freshness for which it was always so distinguished, and it has certainly gained in volume of tone and precision. Her rendering of the celebrated "Robert, toi que j'aime" brought down thunders of applause, and, what is more, deserved them. It was remarkable, not only for its artistic finish, but for the deep and serious expressiveness which Miss Annie Romer imparted to it. On Tuesday, Miss Annie Romer appeared in her favourite character of Maritana, and created even more decided admiration than she did in Valentine. The Huguenots and Maritana have been performed, alternately during the week, to crowded houses. Hitherto we have had to praise,—we have now to speak in a less favourable tone. The orchestra is far from being what it ought to be. This is a grand fault, and one which we are sure Messrs. Creswick and Shepherd will remedy. Let them be assured that it is their interest to do so, and that the old proverb, "Penny wise and pound foolish," though very homely, is, in the long run, generally found to turn out true.

Reviews of Music.

"COME LET US WANDER"—SONG FOR VOICE AND PIANO.—Poetry written in the style of Robert Herrick, by G. V. O.

"EDITH"—A SONG OF THE ELEVENTH CENTURY—Written by GRACE AGUILAR.—Emanuel Aguilar. Wessel & Co.

Like all we have seen from the pen of Mr. Aguilar, the songs before us give evidence of the thoughtful man, and the conscientious musician. Mr. Aguilar evidently writes con amore, and the care with which he elaborates and finishes his compositions sometimes runs into excess.

The first of the two songs under notice, written for a contralto voice, is much more unpretending than its companion, but is by no means less musically attractive on that account. The verses of G. V. O. are very good and even poetical, though we must confess we cannot trace any resemblance to the style of the quaint old English poet whom they profess to imitate. The melody which Mr. Aguilar has found to express the sentiment which they convey will charm the general ear by its unaffected simplicity, while the more cultivated listener will not fail to be struck by its grace and thorough applicability to the words. The accompaniment, though easy, is finished with great care, and the slight resemblance which may be traced to certain peculiarities in the manner of Spohr, will not be criticised as a defect, but welcomed as a pleasant manifestation of sympathy with the style of one of the greatest composers of the day. The song is in A flat, and the highest note in the voice line is F, so that it may be sung by the great mass of amateurs, male and female, to whom we recommend it as sterling music, free from pretence and exaggeration.

No. 2. "Edith," is of a more extended and ambitious character. The verses tell a pathetic story, founded on an historical incident, in simple and appropriate language. The music elevates the theme by its dramatic feeling, without sacrificing vocal effect. Its form is that of the scene—the chamber scene—of which the modern German composers, Lowe, Kalliwoda, and others, have given us so many examples, and it is a very favourable specimen of its class. It is in the key of C minor. The difficulties of the accompaniment are more than ordinary, but they are full of musical ideas, and evince a great facility in modulation and harmony. The melody, though somewhat fragmentary, is expressive and vocal, sometimes even passionate. Altogether, though this is not a faultless song, it has so many real beauties, that we cordially recommend it to our readers as a favourable specimen of the talent of its composer, one of our most rising musicians.

"ONWARD ROLL OUR FLEETING DAYS."—Sacred Canzonet, Sung by Miss Dolby.—Poetry by LEAPIDGE SMITH, Esq.—Music by JOSEPH THOMAS COOPER. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

This Canzonet is written with the true feeling for sacred composition. The symphony is solemn and reposeful, and the opening recitative constitutes a graceful introduction to the cantabile, which has a pleasing strain of melody throughout. It is in the key of D. The accompaniments are clear and well defined, and the whole wears a religious tone, not always found in works of this kind. The poetry of Mr. Leapidge, though somewhat diffuse, is creditable.

Original Correspondence.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of The Musical World.)

SIR—Your intelligent correspondent, F. G. B., having again entered into the controversy of a National Opera, I feel myself bound to respond, in some sort, to his letter of last week, although by so doing I may appear to arrogate to myself a degree of importance which is scarcely due. No matter for that, I am content to bear ridicule or censure, just as may happen, in the prosecution of what I feel to be a good cause.

Firstly, I must express great pleasure at the re-appearance of F. G. B. (and heartily wish that he may take in a stock of health to assist, with his counsel, the movement which is now progressing). Secondly, I hasten to assure him that no suggestion of his own, or dissent from any proposition of mine, will ever be received otherwise than in good part: let him therefore "say on."

In answer to F. G. B.'s oblique query, as to "where the funds are to come from," and how this scheme is to be set about "financially," I am constrained to say that my ideas upon that portion of the subject, although savouring of no extreme ingenuity, are such as would be inexpedient to give forth just at present, for reasons which are difficult to explain without endangering the success of the scheme itself. Your correspondent is evidently a man of discernment, and may possibly guess that it would be inexpedient to publish plans such as an enemy might turn to our own defeat—for be it known, that whereas a large body of individuals are in favour of some such scheme as the one now proposed—there is a small, but powerful "clique," whose interests are deeply involved in the preservation of things as they are, just as the old borough-mongers hated and opposed Parliamentary Reform.

I have endeavoured, throughout these letters, to steer clear of personalities, and to avoid all acrimonious censure, but the desire to be courteous must not render me impolitic, and I therefore beg to have it understood, that whilst I feel tolerably certain of obtaining the necessary funds in a legitimate way, I will not explain the mode, except to such body of individuals as shall (hereafter, I trust), consent to act as a provisional committee, and amongst whom I should be delighted to number F. G. B.

The one great difficulty to be surmounted in the prosecution of my scheme connected with musical artistes consists in the persuading of such to throw aside all petty jealousies, and to merge all selfish interests into one common good. This has always been the stumbling-block to success hitherto; and it is that alone that I fear now. For my own part, I can cheerfully say that, should the present scheme be brought to bear, and I were to hold any authority in its conduct, my own works shall be the LAST that I would attempt to bring forward, and my own personal friends the LAST whom I should attempt to serve, feeling as I do, that as rigid discipline of FAIR PLAY towards MERIT alone will conduce to that kind of success which it is my ambition to deserve.

A week's time will now suffice to show whether or not a sufficient number of artistes will be found to rally round the banners of reform, and to constitute themselves a respectable phalanx. Let them but do so, and let but an efficient committee be formed, and the sineus of war will speedily give nerve to their exertions, and a triumphant victory will be theirs.

When all is done, it will be something whereof to boast that "A. B. or C." was a first member of "THE NATIONAL OPERA;" and it shall (or ought to) be a fundamental regulation that the services given under such circumstances of difficulty should be most honourably entertained.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
PHILO-MUSICA.

CONSERVATORY OF MILAN.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

DEAR SIR—Will you favour me with the name of the principal Singing Masters at the Conservatory at Milan, and also the terms of admission to students.

Your obliged servant,
ELLEN.

[Signors Mazzucato and Lamperti are the principal professors of singing at the Conservatory of Milan. We know nothing about the terms of admission to that school of teaching. Perhaps some of our readers may supply the required information. [Ed. M. W.]

THE ROMANTIC IN MUSIC.

(FROM THE GERMAN OF AUGUST KALBEY.)

WHEN Carl Maria Von Weber opened to himself a new path, by that work of genius Der Freischütz, what is called romantic music was by several stamped as belonging to a peculiar school, and many an unsuccessful imitation was attempted under the title of "Romantic Opera." The wonderful and the legendary were alleged to be the necessary foundation of this species: spirits, and whenever possible, Satan himself, were essential ingredients. This kind of opera was pronounced to be the only one truly German, and opposed to the comic conversation-opera, and the heroic opera.

I cannot see what is to be gained by such a classification, or that it will at all tend to enlighten us on the question of the real essence of music.

The essence of the romantic was sought for in various contingencies, or single peculiarities: the first united with the second renders plain the conception of the romantic.

My own views of romantic art, briefly shown, may serve to justify what I have said.

First, I must state, that, according to my views, the romantic and musical are akin to each other, and that all music is of a romantic nature,—a proposition that will seem paradoxical to many, but which I shall endeavour to demonstrate.

The source of all the fine arts may be traced to the worship of God,—to religion. From this they have sprung; from this were formed their first rude beginnings, and the general religious feelings of a people have also given an individual colouring to their arts. The tie of religion and art is so close, that even those who will not acknowledge it, unconsciously feel its power. The religion of antiquity was essentially a natural religion: only among the Oriental nations the traces of a belief in divine manifestations display themselves. The art, which sprung from this natural religion, could not conceive other than sensual deities: it sought among natural forms for the expression of divinity, and hence in works of art the nearest approach to Nature's masterpieces was held to be the noblest design.

According to Aristotle the beautiful consists in the imitation of nature, a view of the matter, which, in the days of scepticism, e. g. among the French, revived in all its power.

Plato's views of art and the beautiful are opposed to these: he assumes original forms of beauty in the soul of the artist, which he has brought with him into the world, and which spring from a former and better state. Thus he regards most the ideal, while Aristotle chiefly regards the real.

Grecian art in general bears the character of an imitation, which is so perfect, that we should vainly strive to equal it, since we want the eye of the Grecian artist. The summit of human strength and beauty is, with the Greeks, divine: hence their heroes allied to the Gods; hence their Gods, though in heaven, live after the manner of men. The spirit of Grecian art displays itself in works of architecture, poetry, and sculpture. This last, which most obviously exhibits the forms of nature, bears very evidently in itself the elements of national spirit, and hence ancient art is in general called plastic.

But with respect to the music of the ancients—what was it? Godfrey Weber has, in his Theory of Composition, long ago called our attention to this point, namely, that the key to any closer acquaintance with that art is lost, and that our endeavours to attain it must fail. We have, we may almost say, less proof that we understand accurately the expressions of Ptolemy, Plato, and Plutarch relative to music, than that we have sufficiently, and in the spirit of the ancients, mastered the quantity and mode of expressing Greek and Latin words. The scanty remains of ancient music afford us no view of that art: and to increase the confusion, the Christian beginnings in music have been often mingled with those remains, and under the name of "Greek" proudly displayed themselves as the result of investigation into antiquities. Von Winterfeld's Joh Gabrieli will contribute much to the clearing up of such doubts.

If we considered attentively the choruses of the Greek tragedies, and combine the expressions relative to music uttered by Plato in the third book of his Republic, we shall soon be convinced that the essential beauty of that music consisted in the rhythm, hence in systematic motion. Indeed the same spirit, which in ancient sculpture announced itself in space, speaks in the rhythm, but not otherwise in motion, therefore in time. The rhythm of antiquity, so far as we can obtain an idea of it by investigating the laws of metre, is of a plastic nature. Hence music was, as it were, rendered visible by the peculiar arts of motion, namely, dancing and mimicry. Music was but the servant of other arts; and though the ancients knew the difference between high and low in sounds, we have nothing to justify us in assuming that they knew anything of a harmonic base, on which what we call melody depends. Rhythm could display itself in tones, but knowledge of the combination of tones was reserved for a later age. The unison of the Eastern nations of the present day now affords an instance of that infancy in music.

It is well known how music displayed itself simultaneously with the rights of Christianity; how music was the art in which Christian worship was first developed. The power of the musical spirit was alone calculated to present to the senses the Christian idea of Deity; while in ancient times this was done by sculpture, when the divinities in the form of men, filled the situations of men. This, in Christian world, could alone be accomplished by an art which had for its end the representation of the Infinite; an art, the elements of which are varying and fluctuating—that is to say, music. Sound dies away like the existence of man. A pictorial composition remains fixed to our gaze, and thus embraces the forms of earth. A musical composition has nothing which it can imitate; its artist can only represent sensual phenomena, when he has first idealised them.

It was natural enough that the musical art should exert an influence over other arts. Poetry shows us this in the origin of rhyme. Harmonic euphony began to gain ground on the rhythmic, and shewed itself not only in rhyme, but in alliteration and assonance. Now did all art strive to elevate man to the Infinite—to God; as the ancients degrading Deity, sought to approximate it to man. Jean-Paul and Frederick Schlegel have long ago shown that the Gothic style of architecture was designed to express that endeavour.

In like manner Christian art produced what is called romantic art, which is by many totally misunderstood. The very essence of the romantic art depends on the endeavour of man to soar above the sphere of his own knowledge; it strives to acquaint us with the unattainable, which no intellect can comprehend.

The opinion will be found correct, that the power of music completes that of language; that the kingdom of the former begins where the latter ends; that without a sweet fancy being itself in the magic of sound, no genuine musical work can exist. If we call Beethoven the master of all masters, the reason is, that he has exhibited, in the plainest view, that striving after the infinite. Every work of art requires a form, but to go so far above it, without annihilating it, was reserved for Beethoven alone. I place him above S. Bach, because the genius of the latter was more immediately subservient to divine worship; because he did not lose himself, like Beethoven, in the magic of sound. I place him above all, because he is independent of words, and lets his inarticulate sounds speak freely for themselves.

Instrumental music, as E. T. A. Hoffmann has justly remarked, is the most romantic of all arts. However, among vocal performers there is more than one who is entitled to stand by Beethoven's side. If he was the mightiest in instrumental music, so was Mozart in another sphere. No other composer has expressed the romantic spirit he has in Don Giovanni.

Among the modern the romantic spirit has appeared in Weber and Spohr: with the former it is almost unbridled; with the latter it is more confined.

Mendelssohn and Lowe are to be reckoned among those of the present day. Yet in all modern art the free unconscious power of creation has become rare. The intellectual education, on the one hand, and the mechanical on the other, plainly exert an injurious influence. That fancy, which makes individuality forget itself, becomes more and more scarce, like that pious childish faith, in which religion first takes root. The age begins to hate the very essence of the romantic; it desires the bodily, the sensual. To satisfy this desire, thousands of musicians are prepared, and ready at all times. With these the very mechanism of music has become living, and the intellect only reckons upon the effect.

A new effect, however, constitutes neither novelty nor originality in a work of art; therefore, that the romantic should be misunderstood was inevitable. We had learned to expect from it outward signs, spirits, and wonders above all things. Thus, Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable must be called a romantic opera, though there is not the least trace of the romantic spirit in any part.

Let us then be less liberal with a name that conveys, above all others, such weighty, such mighty praise. Let us consider that the romantic is the inmost essence of music, that it is the mark which distinguishes all modern art from the ancient; hence, in few words, that in our days every work of art meriting the name must be called romantic, and then that appellation is understood as being the mark of every good work of art in our time.

It will be objected that the term romantic will in fact not at all suit many of our most modern works of art. Alas! such is the case. They have not proceeded from the exaltation of our souls to the infinite; they clave to this earth; they live but an apparent life; they are no productions of the spirit of art, but of intellect, experience, and labour. This is particularly remarked in the greater and more comprehensive works. For small, light pictures, for short, feeling songs, which flash like lightning through the night, the powers of creating and feeling are yet sufficient. But even this losing one's self in a number of trifling designs, without being able to apply one's self to a single great work, is somewhat dangerous. The arts go begging among each other; we seek the matter, being unable to produce it; while Raphael painted the Madonna innumerable times, yet ever new—ever with animation. We are poor in matter, because the enjoyers of art are insatiable. Thus our matter gradually becomes more real, more prosaic.

Music is a product of Christianity; instrumental music a product of the German spirit. The bias of the German character to religion here displayed itself in its noblest form. Let us in a sceptical age, neither in life, nor in art, be robbed of our faith in what is most sacred.

BETTINI, THE TENOR.

(From the New York Journal of Fine Arts.)

An accident, at first sight apparently ludicrous, occurred last week, in what is technically termed the "making up" of an article on the Italian Opera. Two papers, differing materially in spirit, had been prepared by separate writers connected with our critical department, both gentlemen of fine musical appreciation and ability. Both were put in type before it was decided which should appear, and in the arrangement of the matter in columns a portion of the suppressed one was accidentally, by the foreman, placed after the accepted article. By this means the following apparently contradictory language was held concerning Bettini:—

"Signor Bettini is in his prime, his voice a fine tenor, his execution not so good as Salvi's. Yet he is a better actor, and possesses much more perfection than is usually met in the combined qualities of singer and dramatic artist. A natural and dignified carriage, graceful movements, and the absence of a too-common affectation, are traits which mark him. His voice, in its chest-tones, sometimes betrays harshness, but only in the upper register—in general it is remarkable for purity. Yet this artist is unequal, and often his renderings are careless and defective."

"We are sorry we cannot award similar praise to the new tenor, Signor Bettini; nor can we imagine why some of our contemporaries lavish such extravagant encomiums on this gentleman's performances. With a most unwilling voice of dry, hard, unsympathetic quality, he unites an exceedingly defective method, and a style remarkable for nothing but its convulsive attempts at mezza di voce. His acting in the death scene was simply absurd, and the dying strain of the self-murdered Edgar a complete roar. We never witnessed so unfinished a personation of this character."

Now, with due deference to the hypercriticism which strains at gnats, etc., we are inclined to argue the perfect reconcilability of the above juxtaposed opinions. It is not the unsoundness of our critics, which caused them to indite such opposite verdicts; for, as we said, either of them is competent to decide upon the merits of any operatic vocalist on the boards of Castle Garden; but it is simply the fault or misfortune of Signor Bettini, that, by his contradictory styles of acting and singing, on different occasions, he lays himself open to general condemnation, by his particular faults at certain times. One word near the conclusion of the sentence above-quoted is a key to the whole affair. Signor Bettini is "unequal!" That explains both opinions. He is, in fact, lamentably unequal; at one time inspiring us with admiration for some graceful method, or effective point; at another puzzling us with the apparent slovenliness of his entire delivery. Thus, to one critic—and a good judge, too—he presents hard, uneven, limping qualities of tone and performance; to another (listening when Signor Bettini is "i' the vein,") he is warm, enthusiastic, manly, and finished. When "doctors disagree," the patient must look to his own diagnosis. If he discovers himself entirely free from disease—he can afford to laugh at doctors.

Miscellaneous.

HAYDN FORMS AN ACQUAINTANCE WITH CURTEZ, THE CELEBRATED BUFFOON.—Haydn composed, for his amusement, a serenata for three instruments, which he performed on fine summer evenings, with two of his friends, in different parts of Vienna. The theatre of Carinthia was at that time directed by Bernadone Curtez, a celebrated buffoon, who amused the public with his forms. Bernadone drew crowds to his theatre by his originality, and by good opera-buffas. He had, moreover, a handsome wife; and this was an additional reason for our nocturnal adventurers to go and perform their serenade under the harlequin's window. Curtez was so struck with the originality of the music, that he came down into the street, to ask who had composed it. "I did," replied Haydn boldly. "How, you; at your age?"—"One must make a beginning sometime." "Gad, this is droll; come up stairs." Haydn followed the harlequin, was introduced to the handsome wife, and re-descended with the poem of an opera, entitled, "The Devil on Two Sticks." The music, composed in a few days, had the happiest success, and was paid for it with twenty-four sequins. But a nobleman, who probably was not handsome, perceived that he was ridiculed, under the name of the Devil on two Sticks, and caused the piece to be prohibited. Haydn after said, that he had more trouble in finding out a mode of representing the motion of the waves in a tempest of this opera, than he afterwards had, in writing fugues with a double subject. Curtez, who had spirit, and taste, was difficult to please; but there was also another obstacle. Neither of the two authors had ever seen either sea or storm. How can a man describe what he knows nothing about? If this happy art could be discovered, many of our great politicians would talk better about virtue. Curtez, all agitation, paced up and down the room, where the composer was seated at the pianoforte. "Imagine," said he, a mountain rising, and then a valley sinking; and then another mountain, and then another valley; the mountains and the valleys follow one after the other with rapidity; and at every moment alps and abysses succeed each other. This fine description was of no avail. In vain did harlequin add thunder and lightning. "Come, describe for me all these horrors," he repeated incessantly, "but particularly, represent distinctly these mountains and valleys." Haydn drew his fingers rapidly over the key-board, ran through the semitones, tried abundance of sevenths, passed from the lowest notes of the bass to the highest of the treble. Curtez was still dissatisfied. At last, the young man, out of all patience, extended his hands to the two ends of the instrument, and bringing them rapidly together, exclaimed, "The Devil take the tempest!" "That's it, that's it," cried the harlequin, springing upon his neck, and almost stifling him." Aurelian.

HAYDN RECEIVES LESSONS FROM PORPORA.—Haydn did not learn recitative from Porpora, as you have been told; the inferiority of his recitatives to those of the inventor of this kind of music, is a sufficient proof of this; but he learned from him the true Italian style of singing, and the art of accompanying on the pianoforte, which is not so easy a thing as is commonly supposed. He succeeded in obtaining these lessons in the following way. A noble Venetian, named Corner, at that time resided at Vienna, as ambassador from the republic. He had a mistress passionately fond of music, who had harboured old Porpora in the hotel of the embassy. Haydn found means to get introduced into the family, purely on account of his love of music. He was approved, and his excellency took him, with his mistress and Porpora, to the baths of Maneusdarff, which were the fashionable resort at that time. Our hero, who cared for nobody but the old Neapolitan, employed all sorts of devices to get into his good graces and to obtain his harmonic favours. Every day he rose early, beat the old man's coat, cleaned his shoes, and disposed, in the best order, the antique periwig for the old fellow, who was sour beyond all that can be imagined. He obtained, at first, nothing but the courteous salutation of "fool," and "blockhead," when he entered the old man's room in a morning. But the boor, seeing himself served gratuitously, and observing at the same time the rare qualities of his voluntary lackey, suffered himself occasionally to soften, and gave him some good advice. Haydn was favoured with it more especially whenever he had to accompany the fair Wilhelmina, in singing some of the airs of Porpora, which were filled with basses difficult to understand. Joseph learned in this house to sing in the best Italian taste. The ambassador, astonished at the progress of this poor young man, gave him, when he returned to the city, a monthly pension of six sequins, and admitted him to the table of his secretaries. This generosity rendered Haydn independent. He was able to purchase a black suit. Thus attired, he went, at day-break, to take the part of first violin at the church of the Fathers of the Order of Mercy; from whence he repaired to the chapel of Count Hangwitz, where he played the organ: at a later hour he sung the tenor part at St. Stephen's. Lastly, after having been on foot the whole day, he passed a part of the night at the harpsichord. Thus forming himself by the precepts of all the musical men with whom he could scrape an acquaintance, seizing every opportunity of hearing music that was reputed good, and having no fixed master, he began to form his own conceptions of what was fine in music, and prepared himself, without being aware, to form one day, a style entirely his own.—Aurelian.

HAYDN.—"Nature had bestowed upon Haydn a sonorous and delicate voice. In Italy, at this period, such an advantage might have been fatal to the young peasant: perhaps Marchesi might have had a rival worthy of him, but Europe would have lost her symphonist. Frank, who gave his young cousin more cuffs than ginger-bread, soon rendered the young tambourist able not only to play on the violin and other instruments, but also to understand Latin, and to sing at the parish—desk, in a style which spread his fame though the country."—Aurelian.

HAYDN'S INTRODUCTION TO REUTER.—"Chance brought to Frank's house Reuter, Maitre de Chapelle of St. Stephen's, the cathedral church of Vienna. He was in search of children to recruit his choir. The schoolmaster soon proposed his little relative to him; he came: Reuter gave him a canon to sing at sight. The precision, the purity of tone, the spirit with which the child executed it, surprised him; but he was more especially charmed with the purity of his voice. He only remarked that he did not shake, and asked him the reason, with a smile. The child smartly replied, 'How should you expect me to shake, when my cousin does not know how himself!' 'Come here,' says Reuter, 'I will teach you.' He took him between his knees, showed him how he should rapidly bring together two notes, hold his breath, and agitate the palate. The child immediately made a good shake. Reuter, enchanted with the success of his scholar, took a plate of fine cherries, which Frank had caused to be brought for his illustrious brother professor, and emptied them all into the child's pocket. His delight may be readily conceived. Haydn has often mentioned this anecdote to me; and he added, laughing, that whenever he happened to shake, he still thought he saw these beautiful cherries. Reuter returned to Vienna and took the young shaker along with him, then about eight years old."—Aurelian.

HADYN'S EXPULSION FROM ST. STEPHEN'S.—"The ravages of time extended their influence to the little fortune of Hadyn. His voice broke; and, at the age of nineteen, he quitted the class of soprani at St. Stephen's; or, to speak more correctly, and not to fall all at once into the style of panegyric, he was expelled from it. Being a little mischievous, like all lively young people, he one day took it into his head to cut off the skirt of one of his comrade's gowns, a crime which was deemed unpardonable. He had sang at St. Stephen's eleven years, and, on the day of his expulsion, his only fortune consisted in his rising talent, a poor resource when it is unknown. He, nevertheless, had an admirer. Obligated to seek for a lodging, chance threw in his way a peruke-maker named Keller, who had often admired at the Cathedral the beauty of his voice; and who, in consequence, offered him an asylum. Keller received him as a son, sharing with him his humble fare, and charging his wife with the care of his clothing."—Aurelian.

HADYN'S MARRIAGE.—"Hadyn, freed from all worldly cares, and established in the obscure dwelling of the peruke-maker, was able to pursue his studies without interruption, and to make rapid progress. His residence here had, however, a fatal influence on his future life; the Germans are possessed with the mania of marriage. To a gentle, affectionate, and timid people, domestic pleasures are of the first necessity. Keller had two daughters, his wife and he soon began to think of marrying one of them to the young musician, and spoke to him on the subject. Absorbed in his own meditations, and thinking nothing about love, he made no objection to the match. He kept his word in the sequel with that honour which was the basis of his character, and this union was anything rather than happy."—Aurelian.

HADYN LEAVES KELLER, AND MEETS WITH METASTASIO.—"I do not know for what reason Hadyn about this time left the house of his friend Keller, but it is certain that his reputation, though rising under the most brilliant auspices, had not yet raised him above poverty. He went to reside with a M. Martinez, who offered him board and lodging, on condition that he would give lessons on the pianoforte and in singing to his two daughters. It was then that the same house situated near the church of St. Michael, contained in two rooms, one over the other, in the third and fourth stories, the first poet of the age, and the first symphonist of the world. Metastasio, also, lodged with M. Martinez, but as poet to the Emperor Charles VI., he lived in easy circumstances, while poor Hadyn passed the winter days in bed for want of fuel. The society of the Roman poet was, nevertheless, a great advantage to him. A gentle and deep sensibility had given Metastasio a correct taste in all the arts. He was passionately fond of music, and understood it well, and this singularly harmonious soul appreciated the talents of the young German. Metastasio dining every day with Hadyn, gave him some general rules respecting the fine arts, and in the course of his instructions, taught him Italian."—Aurelian.

MESSRS. H. AND R. BLAGROVE'S, sixth and last quartett and solo Concert was given in the Concert Rooms, Mortimer Street, on Friday Evening the 15th instant. Mendelssohn's Quartett, No. 5, in E flat for two violins, viola and violoncello, was delightfully executed by Messrs. H. Blagrove, Clementi, R. Blagrove, and Hausmann. Miss Williams sang Niedermeyer's Melodia. "In van nascondere," in a very effective style, and Linley's pretty ballad, "Thou art near me again," was also charmingly rendered. Mozart's trio for pianoforte, clarinet, and viola, was vigorously played by Messrs. R. Barnett, Boose, and R. Blagrove. The Duo Concertante of Kummer, for violin and violoncello, was given with great spirit and expression by Messrs. H. Blagrove and Hausmann, and received a hearty encore. Mr. R. Blagrove's new Fantasia for Concertina on Airs from Le Prophete, is one of the best we have heard of his compositions, and his manner of executing it was such as to merit the applause and encore it obtained. Mayseider's Trio, No. 2, in A flat, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, deserved every justice at the hands of Messrs. W. Dorrell, H. Blagrove, and Hausmann, all the movements being given in the most pointed and efficient manner. The Concert concluded with Mozart's Quintett in G minor for two violins, two violas, and violoncello, by Messrs. H. Blagrove, Clementi, W. Blagrove, R. Blagrove, and Hausmann, thus bringing to a close a series of Concerts which have given general satisfaction to full audiences, and which reflect much credit on Messrs. Blagrove, as introducing so many novelties, as well as some of the best specimens of the classic masters.

HENRI HERZ.—The celebrated pianist and composer has arrived in London after an absence of many years which have been spent in America and the West Indies.

MADAME ANNA THILLON.—The charming and fascinating ex-rossignol of the Opera Comique has left England for America on a professional tour. There is not the slightest doubt but that the fair songstress will prove an irresistible attraction to the Yankees, despite their recent prostrations at the shrine of the Lind idol. Madame Anna Thillon will not return to this country until about the middle of next season.

MASSOL has left London for Paris to renew his engagement at the Grand Opera.

DIODOR BOUCAULT is engaged on a new and original drama for the Princess's.

WILLIAM BROUGH has completed another farce for the above theatre. We trust, both for his own sake and that of the management, that this new production of his son will be as successful as Apartment to Let, which has just reached its eightieth representation.

ROBERT BROUGH, the other of the brothers, or, par nobile fratrum, has returned from Paris, where he has been for some time residing.

MUSIC IN WASHINGTON.—The city of Washington, a newspaper writer computes, has spent in music, the last season, some 31,000 dollars; of which Jenny Lind's concert absorbed 25,000 dollars, Parodi's 5,000 dollars, and Madam Anna Bishop's 1,000 dollars. The same writer estimates that, during the same time, the expenditure of the Union, for music, were about 2,000,000 dollars.

DONIZETTI.—A meeting of the citizens was lately held in Bergamo, for the purpose of erecting a monument to the memory of the composer of Lucia di Lammermoor.

MADAME UGALDE has made her rentree at the Opera Comique in Paris. Several novelties are in active preparation for her, and she will shortly appear as Maria, in the Fille du Regiment.

THE MANNER IN WHICH HAYDN COMPOSED.—Haydn commenced his work by noting down his principal idea, his theme, and choosing the keys through which he wished to make it pass. His exquisite feeling gave him a perfect knowledge of the greater or less degree of effect, which one chord produces in succeeding another; and he afterwards imagined a little romance, which might furnish him with musical sentiments and colours. Sometimes he supposed that one of his friends, the father of a numerous family, ill provided with the goods of fortune, was embarking for America, in hope of improving his circumstances. The first events of the voyage formed the symphony. It began with the departure. A favourable breeze gently agitated the waves. The ship sailed smoothly out of the port; while, on the shore, the family of the voyager followed him with tearful eyes, and his friends made signals of farewell. The vessel had a prosperous voyage, and reached at length an unknown land. Savage music, dances and barbarous cries, were heard toward the middle of the symphony. The fortunate navigator made advantageous exchanges with the natives of the country; loaded his vessel with rich merchandise, and at length set sail again for Europe with a prosperous wind. Here the first part of the symphony returned. But soon the sea begins to be rough, the sky grows dark, and a dreadful storm confounds together all the chords and accelerates the time. Every thing is in disorder on board the vessel. The cries of the sailors, the roaring of the waves, the whistling of the wind, carry the melody of the chromatic scale, to the highest degree of the pathetic.

Diminished and superfluous chords, modulations, succeeding by semi-tones, describe the terror of the mariners. But, gradually, the sea becomes calm, favourable breezes swell the sails, and they reach the port. The happy father casts anchor in the midst of the congratulations of his frigns, and the joyful cries of his children, and of their mother, whom he at length embraces safe on shore. I cannot recollect to which of the symphonies this little romance served as a clue. I know that he mentioned it to me, as well as to Professor Pichl, but I have totally forgotten it. From little romances of this kind were taken the names by which Haydn sometimes designated his symphonies. Without the knowledge of this circumstance, one is at a loss to understand the meaning of the titles, "The Fair Circassian," "Roxalana," "The Hermit," "The Enamoured Schoolmaster," "The Persian," all which names indicate the little romance which guided the composer. I wish the names of Haydn's symphonies had been retained, instead of numbers. A number has no meaning; a title, such as, "The Shipwreck," "The Wedding," guides, in some degree, the imagination of the auditor, which cannot be awakened too soon."—Anrelian.

FLOWERS.

(From the New York Journal of Fine Arts.)

Your voiceless lips, O flowers! are living preachers;
Each cup a pulpit, and each leaf a book,
Supplying to my fancy numerous teachers
From loneliest nook.

Floral Apostles, that in dewy splendor,
"Weep without woe, and blush without crime,"
Oh! may I deeply learn and ne'er surrender
Your love sublime!

Where I, oh God! in churchless lands remaining,
Far from all voice of teachers and divines,
My soul would find in flowers of thy ordaining,
Priests, sermons, shrines!

ANCIENT ITALIAN AND FRENCH SINGERS.—During the reign of Charlemagne, a difference of opinion existed in France as to the merits of French and Italian music, and the following account of this quarrel is given in a work published at Frankfort in 1514: "The pious Emperor Charles," says the writer, "having returned to celebrate the festival of Easter with our apostolic Lord at Rome, there arose during the feast a quarrel between the French and Italian choristers. The French pretended to sing better and more agreeably than the Italians; while the latter insisted on their own superiority in ecclesiastical music, which they had learned from Pope St. Gregory, and accused the French vocalists of corrupting and disfiguring the true melody. This dispute being submitted to the Emperor, the French, relying on his partiality, presumed to insult the Italians. But the latter, sensible of their superior knowledge, and comparing the learning of St. Gregory with the ignorance of their competitors, treated them with scorn and contempt. This altercation continuing, the Sovereign said to his choristers. "Tell us which is the purest water, that drawn from the fountain-head, or that of the streams which flow at a distance?" The question admitted of but one answer. All declared in favour the water at the fountain-head. "Have recourse then," said Charles, "to the fountain of St. Gregory, whose music you have altered and corrupted."

SUPERSTITIONS.—Most great men have been superstitious. The courier bringing a letter from England, in which the death of his old physician, Polidori, was stated, Lord Byron remarked: "I was convinced something unpleasant hung over me last night. I expected to hear somebody that I knew was dead! So it turns out. Who can help being superstitious? Scott believed, in second sight; Rousseau tried whether he would be damned or not by aiming at a tree with a stone; Goethe trusted to the chance of a knife's striking the water whether he was to succeed in some undertaking. Swift placed the success of his life on the drawing a trout he had hooked out of the water." Byron, on another occasion, observed, "Several extraordinary things have happened on my birthday; so they did to Napoleon; and a more wonderful thing occurred to Marie Antoinette. At my wedding, something whispered to me that I was signing my death warrant. At the last moment I would have retreated if I could have done so. I am a great believer in presentiments. Socrates' demon was no fiction. Monk Lewis had his monitor, and Bonaparte many warnings." Byron had also a belief in unlucky days. He once refused to be introduced to a lady because it was on Friday. On this same ill-starred day he would never pay visits.

MICHAEL KELLY.—Two comedians having laid a wager as to which of them sang best, they agreed to refer it to Kelly, who undertook to be arbitrator on this occasion. A day was accordingly agreed on, and both the parties executed to the best of their abilities before him. As soon as they had finished he proceeded to give judgment in the following manner: "As for you, sir," addressing himself to the first, "you are the worst singer I ever heard in my life." "Ah," said the other, exultantly, "I knew I should win my wager." "Stop, sir," said the arbitrator, "I have a word to say to you before you go, which is this, that as for you, you cannot sing at all."

BURNS.—It is a common mistake to imagine that the "Ayrshire Bard" did not possess any knowledge, however slight, of music. One of his biographers says, "At an early age he was taught Church Music, but in this branch of harmony he made scarcely any progress." A more recent and talented biographer, whose research and veracity may be relied upon, states upon the authority of one of his own family, that he was able to perform on the violin many of the airs to which he wrote his imperishable verses. The Songs of Robert Burns, by the simplicity and power of his genius have done much to promote the happiness of his fellow-men. He unlocks the store of memory, and reminds his countrymen however distant from the scenes of their childhood, of impressions which once were felt in rapture, making them live again over hours of past happiness, and bringing back the cloudless skies of hope! While his Sentimental Songs have elevated in the youthful breast the object of the attachment, his Patriotic Lyrics have awakened in the bosom of maturer age every grand and ennobling feeling.

BRAMH.—Braham's master, Rauzzini, the Italian composer, was said to be gifted with wit as well as musical science. One of his professional bon mots gave birth to this epigram:—

"Says Rauzzini to Braham, 'I'll tell you von ting,
When you've lost all your teeth Mither Bram how to sing.'
'Tell your secret,' says Braham. 'Ah mio diletto,
You must do like your maestro, and sing in Fulso-setto!'"

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

F. W. C.—Will any of our readers oblige an enthusiastic correspondent by telling him whether Cerito, or Cerrito is the correct way of spelling the name of the celebrated dancer.

NOVUS.—Malibran's last performance in London was in the Son-nambula, and an act of the Maid of Artois. She also sang a verse of the National Anthem.

U. V.—Donizelli and Rubini did sing together frequently at Her Majesty's Theatre, but not in the Siege of Corinth. It was Ivanhoff Way played the second tenor part.

SUM.—Miss Annie Bomer is niece to the Miss Bomer.

Advertisements.

CARTE'S PATENT FLUTES.

Just published,

A SKETCH of the successive IMPROVEMENTS made in the FLUTE, with a statement of the Principles upon which Flutes are constructed, and a comparison between the relative merits of the Ordinary Flute, the Flute of Boehm, and Carte's two new Patent Flutes. By RICHARD CARTE.

Publishers: Rudall, Rose, & Co., 38, Southampton-street, Strand; Addison, 210 Regent-street; Keith and Prowse, 48, Cheapside; and Cocks & Co., 6, New Burlington-street. Price 1s., or if sent by post, 1s. 6d.

GREAT DISCOVERY IN HARMONY.

Now ready, price 5s.

THE PRINCIPLES OF NATURAL HARMONY, being a Perfect System founded upon the discovery of the True Semitonic Scale, by J. Harte. London, Published by the Author, 70, Leadenhall-street, To be had of Messrs. Ewer and Co., Newgate-street, and Messrs. Cocks and Co., New Burlington-street.

EASY PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Just published,

COMPOSED BY FERDINAND BEYER,

"A SHOWER OF PEARLS."

12 Recreations, price 1s. each.

No. 1.	Der Schottische	in G.
" 2.	Postillon de Moscou	in C.
" 3.	Montecchi e Capuletti	in G.
" 4.	Through the Forest	in F.
" 5.	Air Tyrolien	in C.
" 6.	Chorus from Norma	in G.
" 7.	Hymne Hollandaise	in C.
" 8.	Le Zapateado	in G.
" 9.	Zauberflöte (Mozart)	in F.
" 10.	Austrian Hymn (Haydn)	in G.
" 11.	Russian Hymn	in G.
" 12.	Carnival de Venise (Krust)	in A.

Weasel and Co., 239, Regent Street. Publishers of all Beyer's works.

THE ORGANIST'S COMPANION,

BY JOHN GOSS, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. A series of voluntaries, for the commencement, middle, and conclusion of divine service; also, a collection of interludes or short symphonies, to be played between the verses of the psalms or hymns, in numbers 2s. 6d. each, or 4 vols., 12 each.

PAROCHIAL PSALMODY.

A COLLECTION of Ancient and Modern tunes; also a variety of favourite responses to the Commandments, with directions for chanting, with an accompaniment for the Organ or Pianoforte, by John Goss, price 6s.

SACRED MELODIES.

SELECTED from eminent composers, and arranged for one or two voices, with an accompaniment for Organ or Pianoforte, by J. Goss, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. Price 6s.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

THE POPULAR SONG OF THE DAY.

"TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWAY," composed by THOMAS CHANTREY. A new edition of which is just issued, may be had at Addison & Hollier's, 210, Regent-street, London. For simplicity, elegance, and originality of melody, it is unrivalled.

Also, by the same author, "Why wilt thou not love?" and "The dream is past."

JOULE'S DIRECTORIUM CHORI ANGLICANUM.

Second Edition, price 1s., in cloth 1s. 6d.

THE most complete Choral Service book that has yet appeared. Dedicated by permission to the Lord Bishop of Manchester. For highly favourable reviews see "Christian Remembrancer," "Theologian," "Parish Choir," &c. &c. London: J. A. Novello.

A few copies of the quarto edition, price 16s., still on hand.

TO ALL THOSE INTERESTED IN THE FORMATION OF A

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

IT is requested that all Members of the Musical Profession, whether Composers, Vocalists, or Instrumentalists, who feel the necessity of reforming the present system, and be desirous of contributing (by their professional exertions) towards the formation of a NATIONAL OPERA, will have the kindness to send their names and addresses (under cover) to the Publisher of the Musical World, at their earliest convenience, for the purpose of selecting therefrom a sufficient number of artists to form a managing committee.

N.B.—No apprehension need exist with regard to any monied responsibility, as all expenses will be defrayed by the advertiser until further steps may be agreed upon.

Office of the Musical World, Aug. 10, 1851.

W. VINCENT WALLACE'S LAST NEW SONGS.

GO! THOU RESTLESS WIND,
THE GIPSY MAID.
SWEET AND LOW WIND OF THE WESTERN SEA.
THERE'S ROOM FOR HOPE.
ORANGE FLOWERS.
OLD FRIENDSHIPS' SMILE.
I MOURN THEE, BUT I LOVE NO MORE.
THE STAR OF LOVE.
COME! SMILE AGAIN.
I NEVER HAVE BEEN FALSE TO THEE.

Cramer, Beale, & Co., 201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—FRIDAY, 29th AUGUST, Handel's MESSIAH. Vocalists—Madame Clara Novello, Madame Macfarren, Mr. Benson, Mr. Manvers, and Mr. H. Phillips. The Orchestra, on the most extensive scale, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets 2s.; Reserved, 6s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's Office, 0, in Exeter Hall, or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross.

CURES FOR THE UNCURED!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—Cure of a Bad Leg of more than sixty years' standing.—Mr. Barker, of No. 5, Graham's Place, Drypool, near Hull, had ulcers on his leg from the age of 18 until upwards of 80, and although for many years he had sought the first advice in the country, nothing was found to cure them. He often suffered excruciating pain for long periods together, which incapacitated him from attending to his business. He had given up all hopes of getting a cure, when at last he was persuaded to try Holloway's Pills and Ointment, which he did, and however wonderful it may appear, the leg was thoroughly healed by their means, and by continuing to use the Pills alone after his leg was well, he has become in health so hale and hearty as now to be more active than most men of fifty. N.B.—The truth of this extraordinary statement can be vouched for by Mr. J. C. Reinhardt, 29, Market Place, Hull. Feb. 20th, 1850.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in the following cases:—

Bad Legs	Coco Bay	Contracted and	Lumbago	Scabby
Bad Breasts	Chiego-feet	Stiff Joints	Piles	Sore-heads
Burns	Chilblains	Elephantiasis	Rheumatism	Tumours
Bunions	Chapped hands	Fistulas	Scalds	Ulcers
Bite of Mosche	Corns (Soft)	Gout	Sore Nipples	Wounds
toes and Sand-	Cancers	Glandular Swell-	Sore-throats	Yaws
Flies		ings	Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar,) London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World, in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1d., 2s. 6d., 4s. 6s., 11s., 22s., and 35s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

LAST NIGHT BUT TWO.

I PURITANI.

GRISI, MARIO, TAMBURINI, RONCONI.

ON TUESDAY NEXT, AUGUST 26th, will be performed (for the third time this season), Bellini's favourite Opera,

I PURITANI,

Elvira,	Madame GRISI.
Henrietta,	Mlle. COTTI.
Valton,	Signor POLONINI.
Georgio,	Signor TAMBURINI.
Arturo,	Signor MARIO.
Bruno,	Signor SOLDI.
	...	And,	...
Riccardo,	Signor RONCONI.

EXTRA NIGHT.

LAST APPEARANCE OF MADAME VIARDOT.

LAST NIGHT OF LE PROPHETE.

On THURSDAY NEXT, AUGUST 26th, will be performed, most positively for the last time this season, Meyerbeer's Grand Opera,

LE PROPHETE,

In which Madame Viardot will positively make her last appearance this season.

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor, Mr. COSTA.

Commence at Eight. Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre, and at the principal Musicallers and Libraries.

All persons having claims on the Royal Italian Opera are requested to send in their accounts immediately, and to apply on Saturday next, August 30th, at one o'clock for payment.

SCHOTT & CO.'S POPULAR PIANOFORTE WORKS.

Aeher, Joseph.	Les Guittes d'eau	3s. 0d.
Bergmeister, F.	Blanche. Polka Mazurka	2s. 0d.
Beyer, Ferdinand.	Krieger's lust March	2s. 0d.
" "	Alpenhorn	2s. 0d.
" "	Rheinehsucht	2s. 0d.
" "	Irene and Agathe	2s. 0d.
" "	Standard Bearer	2s. 0d.
" "	Schubert's Ständchen	2s. 0d.
" "	Les Perles du Nord, No. 1—12, in 12 books, each	2s. 0d.
" "	Fleurs mélodiques de la Russie, No. 1—4, 4 books, each	2s. 0d.
" "	Bluettes du Nord, No. 1—6, 6 books, each	1s. 6d.
" "	Prussian March	1s. 0d.
" "	Polka	1s. 0d.
" "	Asalia Polka	2s. 0d.
" "	Camelia	1s. 0d.
Brisson, Fred.	l'Arabesque	2s. 0d.
" "	Le chant du Rossignol	2s. 0d.
" "	Bonsoir Mr. Pantalón. Impromptu.	3s. 0d.
Goreau, A.	Etude de Salon	2s. 0d.
" "	Caprice Nocturne	2s. 0d.
" "	Reverie	2s. 0d.
Gottschalk, L. M.	Bananas	2s. 0d.
" "	Ossian	2s. 0d.
" "	Mancenillier	3s. 0d.
Hammer, T. G.	Milanello March	1s. 0d.
Kühner, W.	Jovials. Waltz.	2s. 0d.
Mercatino.	Indiana Waltz	2s. 0d.
Stany, Ludwig.	Soldier's Polka	1s. 0d.
" "	Castanets Polka	1s. 0d.
Talery, A.	Felina. Redowa de Salon	1s. 6d.
" "	Aminta. Polka Mazurka	1s. 6d.
" "	Nocturne	1s. 6d.
" "	Les Monténégrins, Fantaisie	2s. 6d.

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's-street.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

LAST NIGHT BUT ONE OF THE SUBSCRIPTION.

LA FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO.

MADAME SONTAG.

ONDINE. MADLLE. CERITO.

THIS EVENING, SATURDAY, AUGUST 23rd, 1851, will be presented,

LA FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO.

Marie,	Madame SONTAG.
Tonio,	Signor GARDONI.
Caporale,	Signor BLANCHI.

And,

Sulpizio Sergente, ... Signor F. LABLACHE

Between the Acts, A GRAND PAS, by Madlle: Amalia Ferraris and M. Charles.
To conclude with the admired Ballet,ONDINE,

Comprising the FETE DE LA MADONNA, GRAND TARANTELE, and the celebrated PAS DE L'OMBRE.

Onidine,	Madlle. CERITO.
Matteo,	M. CHARLES.

LAST NIGHT OF THE SUBSCRIPTION.

On TUESDAY, AUGUST 26th, 1851, will be presented, for the first time these five years, Donizetti's celebrated Opera,

ANNA BOLENA.

Anna Bolena,	Madame BARBIERI NINI.
Jane Seymour,	Madame GIULIANA.
Smerton,	Madlle. IDA BERTRAND.
Percy,	Signor CALZOLARI.
Sir Harvey,	Signor MERCURIALI.
Rochfort,	Signor CASANOVA.

And,

Henry the Eighth, ... Signor LABLACHE.

With various Entertainments in the Ballet Department. Madlle. Cerito, Madlle. Carolina Rosati and Madlle. Amalia Ferraris.

Applications for Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets, to be made at the Box Office of the Theatre. The Opera to commence at Eight o'clock.

PLAY-HOUSE PRICE NIGHTS.FOUR FAREWELL NIGHTS.

WEDNESDAY, THURSDAY, FRIDAY, & SATURDAY,

LAST NIGHTS OF THE SEASON.

On WEDNESDAY, AUGUST the 27th,

LA SONNAMBULA,

Amina ... Madame SONTAG.

And Selections from a Favourite Opera: for Madame BARBIERI NINI. With Entertainments in the Ballet. Madlles. Cerito, Rosati, and Ferraris.

On THURSDAY, AUGUST the 28th,

IL BARBIERE,

Rosina ... Madame SONTAG.

In the Ballet, Madlles. Cerito, Rosati, and Ferraris.

Full particulars will be announced for the LAST TWO NIGHTS, Friday, August 22, and Saturday, August 30.

"ONWARD."

SACRED CANZONET, for a Contralto or Bass voice, by JOSEPH THOMAS COOPER. Cramer, Beale, and Co., 301, Regent-street, and at all the Libraries and Musicallers.

TO ORGANISTS AND THE MUSICAL PROFESSION.

FOR a Critical notice and Description of the Organs in the British and Foreign Departments of the Crystal Palace, together with the Compositions of the Haarlem Weingarten Organs, the monster organs of the continent, see the LEADER of Saturday, August 23. Persons enclosing six postage stamps will receive a copy by post. Office, 10, Wellington-street, Strand.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 2, Strudley Villas, Strudley Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Purkess, Dean Street Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, August 23, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra.) payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 85.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 30, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

A ROYAL OPERA.

The following brief, but significant, account of the new opera, written by His Royal Highness the Duke of Coburg, is extracted from the letter of the correspondent of the Times at Vienna, which appeared on Monday:—

“Placards posted by order of the municipal authorities announced that the Sovereign would be present at the first representation of the new opera, Casilda. According to the Vienna papers, the streets “swam in a sea of light,” but the truth is, that with the exception of the public offices and the Henmarkt barracks, the illumination was infinitely inferior to any which has taken place since I have known Vienna. Transparencies there were none. The Emperor, who did not appear at the Opera, drove through the streets for about half an hour in the course of the evening.

“The public papers do not agree in their opinions as to the merits of the Duke of Coburg’s new opera, Casilda. The private opinion of the musical world is that the opera will soon vanish from our stage. The first and second acts are heavy in the extreme, the third is somewhat better. By way of a hint to English impresarios, I may remark that the only singer who created any great sensation here during the Italian season was the barytone De Bassini, who, with a splendid voice, and an excellent method, is a first-rate actor.”

Mr. Lumley, or Mr. Gye must look after De Bassini, whose great talent, both as actor and singer, we have frequently heard spoken of, as well as read, highly praised in the foreign journals. Barytones are not so plentiful that the directors of our Italian Operas should allow a great celebrity to pass by neglected. Perhaps the managers of both houses are waiting until Signor De Bassini is passé, and then he will be brought to London, and a furor attempted to be established in his favour. It may be remarked that passé singers are no novelty at either establishment.

THE WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR OWN REPORTER.)

TUESDAY, Aug. 26th.

The 128th anniversary of the choirs of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, commenced this morning. Owing to the success of the Gloucester Festival last year, the requisite number of stewards for the present gathering at Worcester was readily forthcoming, and the preliminaries for the musical performances at the Cathedral, and in the College Hall, were arranged, at an unusually early period, under the active and intelligent direction of the Rev. Robert Sarjant, Honorary Secretary.

We entered last year at great length into the history of the origin and progress of these praiseworthy meetings, in which music is made the handmaid of charity, and a refined and civilizing art becomes subservient to the offices of benevolence. A brief summary will, therefore, suffice to place the special object of the festivals, and their immediate and relative influence in a clear point of view.

Early in the last century, the members of the choirs of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, were accustomed to assemble annually in their respective cities in rotation, to perform sacred music in the Cathedral. In 1724, Dr. Byssie, Chancellor of Hereford, and brother of the Bishop, proposed, in an eloquent sermon, that after the performances a collection should be made at the doors, to be devoted to the maintenance and education of the orphan children of the poorer clergy of the three dioceses, or of the members of the choirs. Six stewards, a clergyman, and a layman, belonging to each diocese, were appointed, and a collection was made, after morning service, in Gloucester Cathedral. The first real festival of the three choirs must, therefore, be chronicled as having taken place at Gloucester in 1724. In the two following years Dr. Byssie recommended similar collections at Worcester and at Hereford (his own diocese). At Gloucester the charity was first extended to the relief of widows, thus materially enhancing its utility. For several years the meetings continued slowly progressing, and the small amount of relief afforded, even as late as 1812, may be surmised from the fact, that except in a few very pressing instances, the highest amount accorded to a widow was eighteen guineas, and to an orphan sixteen. In 1768, when the Duke of Beaufort was president of the society, it was agreed, at a general meeting, that the members should assemble the following year at Gloucester, to give two concerts, under the forfeiture of one guinea in case of non-appearance, and that certain preliminary meetings should take place at the instance of the society, absence from any one of which entailed the penalty of 5s. The money accumulating from these not very formidable impositions was devoted to the payment of the band, the stewards being responsible for all deficiencies. The original charge for admission to the concerts was 2s. 6d., which, in 1752, on account of the extra expense incurred by the preparations for Handel’s oratorio of Samson, was raised to 3s. Of the many eminent singers and instrumental performers who appeared at the meetings of the three choirs, and of the various conductors and composers, a full account appeared in our report of the Gloucester Festival last year. Very few particulars relating to the oratorios and concerts, however, are extant previously to 1755, when the festival was held at Worcester, and the use of the College Hall was first granted for the evening concerts and ball by the Dean and Chapter, who fitted it up at their own expense. From this year a regular account of the performances stands on record; and from this year may perhaps be dated the prosperity of the meetings, and their increasing importance to the charity. In 1757, at Gloucester, when Handel's Messiah was first performed in the English provinces, the meeting was prolonged to four days, vice three, inclusive of the full service at the Cathedral on the first day, which has always preceded the festival. The Messiah was not performed in the Cathedral, but at the Boot Hall, now an inn, and was received with rapturous applause. If the assertion of a celebrated musical historian, that this sublime work has "fed the hungry, clothed the naked, and fostered the orphan," was true when Dr. Burney wrote, how much more so now, when more than half a century has elapsed, and its attraction remains unabated. Six years later, the price of tickets was raised from 3s. to 5s. In 1798, at Hereford, owing to the increasing expenses of the festival, it was found impossible to find stewards, and but for the Duke of Norfolk, who assembled all the principal singers and players of the day in his house, at Horn Lacy (among whom were the celebrated Italian vocalist, Banti—Lindley, the patriarch of the violoncello, now living—and Dragonetti, the famous contrabassist, not long deceased), and obtained from them the offer of their gratuitous services, the meeting at this diocese would have dropped, without the likelihood of a revival. Happily, the nobility and gentry of the county would not sanction such a stigma upon their liberality, but at a numerous meeting came to the resolution of continuing the festival at their own risk, the precaution being adopted, at the suggestion of the Duke of Norfolk, of increasing the number of stewards, so as to divide and lighten the burden of responsibility. In 1807, at Hereford, the price of tickets was raised to 7s. 6d. At Gloucester, in 1811, when Madame Catalani, the most celebrated singer of the day, was heard for the first time, there was another advance in the charge for admission, which raised the tickets to 9s. This was probably, with the exception of the Worcester meeting of 1809, when 810*l.* was collected at the doors of the Cathedral, the most successful meeting, as far as the charity was concerned, since the first institution of the festival. The expenses, nevertheless, was so heavy (amounting to no less than 2,335*l.* 8s. 5d.) owing to the large sum paid to Madame Catalani, and the unusual number of performers engaged, that the profits were only 23*l.* 12s. 7d., and, but for the collection, which amounted to 778*l.* 5s. 10½d., the charity would have received small benefit from the meeting.

We need not enter into any account of the progress of the festivals from 1811 to the present period. It is consolatory, however, to find that, while forty years have elapsed, the meetings still go on and the charity is still supported. It would, in our opinion, entail an indelible disgrace on the noble and wealthy inhabitants of the three counties if, from lack of spirit and generosity, they were allowed to be suspended for any period, much less to stop altogether. An institution which kindles the warmth of charity through the medium of a beautiful, an innocent recreation, which encourages love and good fellowship while offering aid and consolation to the needy, should be supported by every possible means. We say nothing of the great benefit accruing to the cathedral cities themselves, by the extra consumption of such articles of commerce as are most immediately the object of general demand on such occasions, since, after all, this is but a minor consideration to the other. Still it should not be overlooked; and we are satisfied that there is not an inhabitant of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester but would deeply regret the discontinuance of the triennial music meetings. Viewed in a purely artistic light, it must be granted that these festivals have remained somewhat stationary. While Birmingham has given Elijah, and Norwich the Fall of Babylon, to the English public, Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester persist in adhering to works already the property of the world, and have never invoked the aid of living genius to further the noble object they profess to have in view. Better late than never. The three choirs will, probably, soon be made aware that to march with the times is indispensable to continued prosperity.

The stewards for the present year are—The Earl of Harrowby, Sir Charles Hastings, M.D.; Mr. W. S. P. Hughes (Mayor of Worcester), the Rev. E. H. Cradock, the Rev. A. Wheeler, the Rev. C. Crewe, Mr. J. Benbow, M.P.; Mr. J. P. Brown-Westhead, M.P.; Mr. George Rushout, M.P.; Mr. Robert Clive, Mr. W. E. Essington, Mr. W. Hancocks. The President is the Bishop of Worcester. The programme of the musical performances offers great attractions. In addition to the full service to-day at the Cathedral, to-morrow, Mendelssohn's Elijah, on Thursday Handel's Samson and Spohr's Last Judgment, and on Friday the Messiah. There will be concerts in the evening at the College-hall this evening, Wednesday, and Thursday. The ball, we presume, will come off, as usual, on the Friday evening at the Town-hall. We have already announced in the Musical World that the principal singers engaged for the festival are Sophie Cruvelli, Madame Castellan, Misses Birch, Dolby, and Williams, Messrs. Sims Reeyes, Lockey, Machin, and Herr Formes—a strong phalanx of talent. The band, led by Mr. Blagrove, and conducted by Mr. Done (organist of the Cathedral), comprises many of the most noted London performers, and the chorus, selected from London, Liverpool, Birmingham, and the vicinity, is on the accustomed scale of efficiency. Mr. Amott (organist of Gloucester Cathedral,) is the organist, and Mr.

Townshend Smith (organist of Hereford Cathedral,) will pre-side at the pianoforte, during the evening concerts.

The prospects of the present meeting are brighter than any one had anticipated. The demand for tickets seems to have been very great, and the friends and promoters of the festival are persuaded that it will turn out one of the most successful on record. May their anticipations prove correct.

The rehearsal of the sacred music took place yesterday morning, in the nave of the Cathedral, in presence of very few strangers, the stewards having judged it fit to keep the preliminaries as strictly private as possible. Perhaps they were right. The Cathedral of Worcester is one of the most venerable of those monuments of ecclesiastical architecture in which this country is so rich. The principal features of the edifice, as it now appears, date as far back as 1380, when the building was finished and perfected as a whole. The realisation of the first plan, made by Bishop Wulstan, but twice destroyed by fire, was accomplished, however, in 1224, by William de Blois, Bishop Sylvester, to whom the great cross aisle, the lady's chapel, the upper aisle, and above all, the choir, one of the most magnificent in England, are attributed. Little of Wulstan's share in the construction can be identified beyond the arch at the north-west end of the vestry, and some rooms over the passage from the cloisters to the deanery; and nothing of Bishop Oswald's Saxon church is supposed to remain but two arches in the western nave, which, however, are accorded to him on questionable authority. The length of the Cathedral from east to west is 394 feet, the breadth of nave and aisles 78. The nave, which is 66 feet long, is admirably adapted for the purposes of music. The effect of the organ, pealing through the aisles and resounding in the choir, is grand and impressive, and enhanced by a chorus and orchestra of more than 300 executants almost reaches the sublime. The truth is that nowhere so well as in a cathedral can the full effect be given to the simple and massive combinations of the oratorio composers. Not only in a point of view purely acoustical are they manifestly superior, but the sacredness of the place lends additional solemnity to the music, by inducing a train of feeling in the mind of the listener, which in a profane edifice is not likely to be engendered.

All the principal singers were present at the rehearsal yesterday, except Madame Castellan and Herr Formes, who not being announced to sing till Wednesday, arrived only to-day. Among the features of the evening concerts are Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, selections from Jessonda and Euryanthe and a new dramatic Cantata, founded upon Schiller's Fridolin, composed by Mr. Frank Mori, from which a great deal is expected. At the first concert to-night Cruvelli will introduce the grand air from Fidelio, one of her most splendid efforts in London. As Cruvelli has never previously appeared in the provinces, the greatest curiosity exists to hear her sing, and she certainly constitutes no small part of the attraction of the Festival. She is already celebrated in the provinces. Festivities of all kinds will prevail during the week. Public breakfasts are promised every morning, that of the mayor of Worcester (Mr. W. S. P. Hughes), who invited no less than a thousand of the notabilities of the city and county having been given this morning, at the Guildhall. The sermon for the charity, was, after full service at the Cathedral, preached this morning by the Rev. E. H. Cradock, canon of the Cathedral. The arrangements of the Midland Counties Railway to facilitate and promote the objects of the Festival are spoken of with satisfaction.

The Mayor's public breakfast went off with great éclat this morning at the Guildhall. In the absence of the Mayoress,

Mrs. Robert Sarjant, wife of the honorary secretary of the festival, received the guests. About 600 out of the 1,000 who were invited actually came. The Guildhall, chiefly used for public balls and meetings, was built in 1723 by Thomas White, a pupil of Sir Christopher Wren, and a native of Worcester. It is a handsome edifice, though somewhat profusely ornamented. The large room, which contains statues of Charles I., Charles II., and Queen Anne, and is about 110 feet long, 25 broad, and 21 high, was fitted up with good taste, expressly for the occasion, and music was performed during breakfast by the Worcester Yeomanry band. About half-past 10 the whole company left to attend morning service at the Cathedral. At the concert-rehearsal last night Mr. Frank Mori's new cantata, entitled Fridolin, was tried, and created a good impression upon all present. Mademoiselle Cruvelli rehearsed some of her pieces with as much spirit and energy as though she was singing in presence of the public—which display of good will appeared to give much satisfaction to the stewards, and the select party of their friends who were present. There can be little doubt of the effect Mr. Lumley's new prima donna is destined to produce on her first appearance before the worthy inhabitants of Worcester and its vicinities. The great enemy to the Festival is the all-absorbing Crystal Palace, which continues to draw so many persons from all parts of the country to London. From Stourbridge, an adjacent district, no less than 450 went up yesterday by rail, via Birmingham. Under the circumstances it is no less consolatory than surprising that the music meeting should promise to turn out so well, and that so large a number as 1,300 persons should be found assembled at the Cathedral on the first day, which is always regarded as the least attractive.

The festival began under somewhat gloomy auspices. The anticipations of fine weather, which were universal yesterday, were to-day altogether dispelled. From an early hour the rain began to come down, and continued, without intermission, the greater part of the day. Nevertheless, a numerous congregation assembled (nearly 1,300) at service in the cathedral, which commenced at the usual hour, 11 o'clock. The "preces" and "responses" of Tallis, and the "Dettingen te Deum" and "Jubilate" of Handel, formed parts of the selection. Formerly the Te Deum of Purcell, and that of Handel, composed for the Peace of Utrecht, used to be performed alternately; but the sublimity of the "Dettingen" has won it the preference for nearly a century. The "Jubilate" of the same composer, has also been mainly instrumental in putting aside that of Purcell, which was once very popular, and must always be highly esteemed, as one of the masterpieces of the greatest musical genius to whom England has given birth. At the same time, with a profound respect for the masterpieces of Handel, we must confess we should not be sorry to hear a new setting of the words "Te Deum" and "Jubilate" by some competent hand—not to supersede Handel, which would be a difficult matter, but to afford the world an opportunity of judging how modern art could give expression to those important passages of the cathedral service. The performance of the two works in question, in which the principal voice parts were taken by Misses Birch, Dolby, and Williams, and Messrs. Lockey and Machin, was as correct and effective as might have been expected from able and practised singers, thoroughly familiar with the music. After the third collect Dr. Elvey's anthem, "In that day," of which a criticism appeared in the Musical World, on the occasion of its performance by the London Sacred Harmonic Society at Exeter-hall, was given, the solo voice parts by the members of the cathedral choir. Dr. Elvey's composition, although neither masterly nor sublime, certainly improves upon acquaintance. The sermon was preceded by the ancient version of the 47th Psalm, "O God, my strength and fortitude," for full chorus, choir, and quartet (Misses Birch and Dolby, Messrs. Lockey and Machin), and followed by Mendelssohn's superb anthem, "When Israel out of Egypt came," one of the noblest examples of modern church music extant. The execution of both works was, on the whole, very satisfactory, although Dr. Elvey's being easier went with more decision. Mr. Done, the conductor, and Mr. Amott, the organist, performed their duties efficiently, and the chorus, almost entirely selected from provincial societies, showed no lack of force or discipline. The band appeared somewhat weaker than has been customary at these meetings, especially in the string department (which was frequently observed in the florid accompaniments of Mendelssohn), but of this we shall be better enabled to judge at the evening concerts. The sermon was delivered with remarkable emphasis and clearness by the Rev. E. H. Cradock. The text was from the Gospel of St. John, chapter 9, verse 4—"The night cometh, when no man can work." After an eloquent and somewhat lengthy preamble, the Rev. gentleman referred particularly to the special object of the musical festival, and the subject could hardly have been treated with more judgment and felicity.

The collection for the charity, after morning service, amounted to £302, a sum which, taking into account that it was the first day of the festival, considerably surpassed expectation. It was just £2 above the amount obtained at the festival of 1848.

Wednesday, August 27.

The rain, which came down almost without intermission during the whole of yesterday, exercised a melancholy influence on the evening concert at the College-hall. It drove many back into the country who had intended to remain, and kept the majority of the inhabitants of the city at home. We cannot remember so thin an attendance at the first concert of any previous meeting of the three choirs. Nevertheless, as a set-off, the audience were attentive and anxious to be pleased, and the programme, which was a very good one, afforded ample grounds for satisfaction. The College-hall is one of the most curious and interesting buildings connected with the cathedral. It is situated on the College-green, at the west end of the south cloister, 120 feet in length and 38 in breadth, lofty and commodious; it is admirably adapted for a concert-room, and is far superior in every respect to the Shire-hall at Gloucester, or the Town-hall at Hereford, since it affords convenience for many more persons, while its arched roof and peculiar form promote just so much reverberation as enhances, without exaggerating, the effect of the music. Erected in 1372, at the same period as the cloister, and originally the common room or refectory of the monks, the College-hall is now appropriated to the King's or College School, founded in the year 1541, which originated from the grant made by Henry VIII. of the ancient manors and revenues of the priory of Worcester, at the dissolution of the religious establishments. The lighting of the hall has been greatly improved since the last festival, and its present aspect, at a full-dress concert, is exceedingly animated and brilliant. The following was the programme of the concert last night:—

PART I.

"The First Walpurgis Night" ...	Mendelssohn.
(Solo parts by Miss Williams, Messrs. Lockey and Machin.)
Aria, Mr. Sims Reeves ("Favorita") ...	Donizetti.
Recitative and aria, Mademoiselle Cruvelli ("Fidelio") ...	Beethoven.
Recitative and aria, Miss Dolby, "Ecce mi Sola" ("Romeo e Giulietta") ...	Guglielmi.
Solo, violin, Mr. Blagrove ...	De Beriot.

PART II.

Overture, "Egmont" ...	Beethoven.
Aria, Miss Birch, "Qui la voce" ("I Puritani")	Bellini.
Aria, Herr Formes, "In diesen heiligen Hallen" ("Zauberflöte") ...	Mozart.
Quartetto, Mademoiselle Cruvelli, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Machin, and Herr Formes ("I Puritani") ...	Bellini.
Song, Miss Williams, "Lovely clouds" ...	Reissiger.
Cavatina, Mademoiselle Cruvelli, "Ernani involami" ("Ernani") ...	Verdi.
Madrigal ...	Marenzio.
Ballad, Miss Dolby, "Ida" ...	G. Linley.
Aria, Herr Formes, "Largo al factotum" ("Il Barbiere") ...	Rossini.
Grand Finale ("Fidelio") ...	Beethoven.

The First Walpurgis Night of Mendelssohn is a good substitute for a grand symphony, and left no cause for the often-urged complaint of the concerts being composed exclusively of light and popular materials. Of this picturesque work, and the ancient legends of the Harz mountains, which Goethe made the basis of his poem, we have so often spoken in the Musical World that it would be superfluous to allude to them further. No effort of Mendelssohn's genius is more instinct with dramatic feeling, and none makes us more deeply regret the loss of his opera of Lorely, of which he only lived to complete the first act. Its execution was highly creditable. Mr. Done did not drag the times of the various movements, as is too frequently the case at these festivals. In the overture the comparative weakness of the stringed instruments was manifest, and in the choruses "Disperse, disperse," and "Come with the torches brightly flashing," there was not always the steadiness and delicacy required; but, taken together, we have heard the Walpurgis Night in London to much less advantage. No one sings the tenor solos in this work better than Mr. Lockey, and no one the quaint air of the old woman "Know ye not a deed so daring?" more ably than Miss Williams. Mr. Machin, who replaced Herr Formes at a short notice, did his utmost for the bass solos, which are trying and difficult; that he failed to give them due effect must be attributed to evident indisposition. The performance was listened to throughout with the strictest attention, and greatly applauded at the end. After such solid and substantial fare, the miscellaneous vocal and instrumental pieces which followed were heard with double zest. The event which excited the greatest curiosity and was the feature of the evening was the first appearance of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli, who was welcomed with enthusiasm, and by her splendid execution of the grand recitative and air from Fidelio, "O tu la cui dolce possanza," proved herself fully entitled to the praises that have been lavished on her performance in the great opera of Beethoven. Nothing that Sophie Cruvelli sings, in our opinion, displays a greater variety of excellence than this; her splendid declamation in the recitative, her expressive and exquisitely touching delivery of the adagio, one of the most beautiful ever written, and her fire and energy in the allegro, are equally entitled to admiration. The audience testified their appreciation of this unexceptionable performance by unbounded applause. The "Ernani involami" of Verdi, belonging to a wholly different school, serves perhaps to more essentially display the compass and power of Sophie Cruvelli's voice, and her facility in the execution of cadenzas and roulades of the most complex and daring character; but, for our own part we must confess we would rather listen to the adagio of Leonora's air than to a hundred such show pieces, for which we find it difficult to get up the smallest degree of sympathy. The Worcester audience, however, were apparently not of our opinion, since they applauded

Verdi's cavatina, with even more fervour than the sublime inspiration of Beethoven, and would fain have had it once again but that Sophie Cruvelli, as is her wont, was discreet enough to decline the honour, and content herself with bowing her acknowledgements. Her success at the Worcester festival was unequivocally established by her performances last night. No greater success has been achieved at Worcester within our memory. Herr Formes, who also appeared for the first time at Worcester, created an impression quite as great as that of last year at the Gloucester Festival. His "In diesen heiligen Hallen" ("Qui sdegno") from Zauberflöte, as usual, a striking and impressive performance, was encored unanimously, and his "Largo al factotum" similarly complimented. The first time Herr Formes complied with the demand of the audience, but the second he was satisfied to reappear in the orchestra, much to the dissatisfaction of the majority, who expressed their anxiety for a repeat in a noisy and turbulent manner. Miss Dolby sang both the Italian air and the English ballad in a very finished and admirable manner; but she could hardly have made a less happy choice of songs. Guglielmi was a very poor composer, and the "Eccomi sola" has no characteristic beyond that of absolute insipidity; on the other hand Mr. Linley, deservedly popular as a ballad writer, has not been fortunate in his "Ida," which is neither more nor less than a piece of squeamish sentimentality. Miss Birch sang Grisi's aria, "Qui la voce," from the Puritani, in brilliant style, and received a well-deserved tribute of applause; a little less profusion in the employment of roulades would nevertheless have robbed her very clever performance of none of its charm. The lovely quartet from the same opera, "A te o cara," was perfectly executed, although by the side of three such voices as those of Sophie Cruvelli, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Formes, the voice of Mr. Machin was scarcely audible. Miss Williams sang Reissiger's ballad irreproachably; Reissiger's ballad, however, is anything but irreproachable; we have rarely listened to a duller strain. The madrigal of Marenzio, a good example of the master, was well executed by the chorus, but the finale of Fidelio was a scramble from first to last, in spite of the praiseworthy efforts of Miss Birch and Herr Formes in the principal soprano and bass parts. One of the most graceful and legitimate efforts of the evening was that by Mr. Sims Reeves, in "Angiol d'amore," from La Favorita. Mr. Reeves had been announced for the great tenor scena from Oberon, but not being enabled to obtain a rehearsal he wisely declined to attempt it. The system of rehearsals at the festivals is very inefficient. The four days' programmes are all crammed into two, morning and evening, on the Monday—the consequence of which is that not more than half the pieces are tried, the remainder being allowed to take their chance. We have only to add that Mr. Blagrove experienced a flattering reception, and performed the hackneyed solo of De Beriot in his usual style, amidst the greatest applause; that the magnificent overture, though taken too slowly, was otherwise well played by the band; and that Mr. Townshend Smith accompanied some of the songs on the piano-forte in an able manner. The concert had the rare merit of not being too long. The result was that every one remained to the last, and nobody was tired of the performance. This should be an example to the manufacturers of festival programmes in general, who are too apt to run into outrageous and unendurable prolixity in making out their schemes—a palpable error, which should be avoided as much as possible, since it is evident that if all their attractions are offered at one concert, the others which follow must suffer materially.

Another change in the weather exercised a most beneficial influence this morning, when Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed in the Cathedral, which was extremely full in every part, the nave, especially, being crowded. This great work appears destined to share with the Messiah the task of "feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and fostering the orphan." Although only five years have elapsed since it was first executed in public (in September, 1846, at the Birmingham festival) it has already, like its mighty predecessor, become an indispensable feature of every great music meeting, and its attraction is counted upon with the same certainty. There can be little doubt now that Elijah is the grandest musical composition of the present age. What the Messiah was to the past century, Elijah is to this—the most lofty and solemn word that music has spoken. It represents the feeling of our time, in its dramatic form and character; and as the Messiah has been termed the great sacred epic, Elijah may, with no less reason, be styled the great sacred drama of music. The performance this morning, under Mr. Done's direction was very efficient. All the performers were on the alert to do their best—which, indeed, is nearly always the case when Elijah is concerned, since there is not a singer or a player in England who does not remember Mendelssohn and venerate his memory, or who can ever feel otherwise than desirous of doing the fullest justice to his immortal chef d'œuvre. The distribution of the solo voice parts was exceedingly strong—perhaps stronger than on any previous occasion. Mademoiselle Cruvelli and Miss Birch were the sopranos; Misses Dolby and Williams the contraltos; Messrs. Sims Reeves and Lockey the tenors; and Herr Formes the bass. Sophie Cruvelli had only one air to sing "Hear ye Israel," the most difficult in the oratorio. It was her first attempt in public in sacred music, and her first essay in the English language. Except by Mademoiselle Jenny Lind we have never heard this fine composition so well delivered.

In the adagio in the minor key, "Hear ye, Israel," Sophie Cruvelli found the true expression—the mixture of pathos and dignity which may be supposed to animate the heavenly messenger, who alternately reproaches and consoles the transgressing people. To the allegro, "I am He that comforteth," where the pathos and the minor key are abandoned, she imparted the emphasis of accent and boldness of style which are the essential characteristics of this sublime admonition. It was altogether an intellectual and a powerful performance, and so well did the music suit the voice of Sophie Cruvelli, that one might almost have believed that Mendelssohn had composed the air expressly for her. The undeviating truth of her intonation was remarkably exemplified in those passages where the higher notes, up to A sharp, were used with the entire strength of her voice, which resounded like a trumpet through the aisles, and the magnificent quality and purity of her tones were more than ever conspicuous. It was the generally expressed opinion that no such singer has been heard in the provinces since the days of Malibran. In her pronunciation of the words Sophie Cruvelli was naturally less perfect, and she must study the English language carefully before she can get rid of such defects as making "Hear" "Her" and "Israel" "Usrael" in the higher notes. Further than this, it would be unfair to criticize her at present. Herr Formes was, perhaps, never more solemn and impressive in the recitative and airs allotted to Elijah, the prophet. Every time we hear the great German basso we are struck with the improved command he is obtaining over his magnificent voice, which, like a wild and stubborn horse, is most difficult to break in, so as to bring it under entire control. Mr. Lockey sang the first tenor air, and Mr. Sims Reeves the last, in their most finished manner, and the other soprano solos were rendered by Miss Birch with complete efficiency. Of Misses Dolby and Williams, in the contralto recitatives, it is unnecessary to say more than that they did justice both to themselves and to the music. The manner in which the choruses, for the most part, were sung was vastly creditable to the choir of provincial singers, who in one or two points might have read a lesson to some of our London choristers. The unaccompanied trio, "Lift thine eyes to the mountains," sung without a blemish by Misses Birch, Dolby, and Williams, was repeated at the usual signal from the Bishop, upon whose will depends all such complimentary tributes to the artists. The organist, however, should have given the chord of D previous to the second time of performance, since, there being no accompaniments, it was impossible to sustain the pitch correctly throughout. The result of this omission was disastrous to the effect. At the end of the trio the singers were found to have strayed so far from the key that the chorus, "He watcheth over Israel," which is but a pendant to it, in the same tone, or rather, indeed, another movement of the same piece, instead of being proceeded with immediately, was arrested, in order that Mr. Blagrove, the leader, might indicate the proper pitch to the choristers with his violin. Such oversights should never be allowed to occur in a meeting of high pretensions. This was the only real drawback to the general excellence of the performance. The fine quartet and chorus, "Holy, holy," in which the solo soprano part was powerfully sustained by Miss Birch, was also repeated at the desire of the Bishop. We doubt, on the whole, indeed, if any oratorio was ever heard at the festivals of the three choirs with more unalloyed satisfaction than Mendelssohn's Elijah to-day.

The collection at the doors amounted to 215*l.*, which, with 802*l.* obtained yesterday, already places 517*l.* at the disposal of the charity. There was upwards of 1,200 persons present; and it must not be forgotten that tickets to-day were 15*s.*; whereas yesterday, at morning service, they were only 5*s.*

Among the notable persons present were remarked:—The Bishop and Mrs. Pepys and party, the Dean and Mrs. Peel, Lord and Lady Henley, Sir O. and Lady Wakeman, Sir P. Winnington, High Sheriff, and lady; Sir J. Pakington and lady, Mr. Pakington and Lady Diana Pakington, Lady Jane Peel, Sir C. Hastings and lady, Hon. R. Clive, M.P., and Lady Harriet Clive, Mr. R. Clive, Mr. W. E. Essington and lady, Mrs. Essington, Mrs. Marriott, Mr. and Mrs. Isaac, the Mayor of Worcester and Miss Hughes, Rev. R. Sarjeant and lady, Rev. Canon Cradock, Earl Somers, Hon. and Rev. J. S. Cocks, Mr. O. Ricardo, M.P.; Mr. F. Rushout, M.P.; Mr. and Mrs. W. Hancock, Mr. Brown Westhead, M.P., and lady; Rev. A. Wheeler, Mr. Berkeley and lady, Mr. E. W. Knight, M.P., and lady, the Hon. W. Coventry and lady, the Hon. and Rev. W. C. Talbot and lady, &c.

The plates for the collection were held by Miss Georgina Lygon, Mrs. W. Hancocks, Lady Harriet Clive, Lady Winnington, Mrs. Wynn Knight, Mrs. Pepys, Mrs. Marriott, Mrs. Watkins, Mrs. Berkeley, Mrs. Sarjeant, Mrs. Ricardo, Mrs. W. E. Essington, Mrs. Isaac, and Mrs. Coventry, supported by the Hon. R. H. Clive, Mr. R. Clive, Mr. Brown Westhead, Sir J. Pakington, Mr. Rushout, Mr. G. Hastings, Mr. Ricardo, the Mayor of Worcester, Mr. Hughes, the Rev. A. Wheeler, Mr. Hancocks, Mr. Essington, and the Rev. Canon Cradock.

Thursday, August 28.

We are now, as the French say, en pleine fête. All Worcester seems turned out of doors. Foregate-street and High-street, which run in one continuous line through the heart of the old city, present the aspect of little Boulevards, so great is the stir and bustle of the equipages, public vehicles of every kind, and promenaders of all denominations, from the showy bearded foreigner to the plain country farmer. By the way, the comparison of a miniature Boulevard is not so wide of the mark when we look at the shops on either side of High-street, which, from the tasteful display of their wares and their clean and handsome exterior, would do credit to the wider and more magnificent streets of the metropolis. Of the porcelain of Worcester we need only say—since it is renowned all over the world—that the eye of every stranger, as he saunters about the town, is inevitably attracted and his steps arrested by the beautiful specimens that constantly come under his notice. Had the weather been more propitious, indeed, we could hardly imagine a more favourable specimen than Worcester, with its venerable cathedral, its grey and winding cloisters, its college green, its river and picturesque bridge, its straight, neat, and orderly streets, its many venerable relics of antiquity, and the general look of comfortable well-being that distinguishes the majority of the inhabitants—to give the foreigner a good idea of an English county town.

The second concert took place last night, at the College-hall, to the accompaniment of a pelting storm of rain, which beat against the windows of the venerable building where erst the monks were wont to refresh body and spirit. In the pauses of the music the effect of this incessant flood of water was singular enough—more singular indeed, than agreeable, since the carved roof of wood, which canopies the hall, seemed scarcely impervious to the incessant libation from above; and we could not but feel apprehensive, sooner or later, of the partial administration of a natural shower bath. No such contretemps arrived, however, to spoil the pleasures of the evening. There were more than twice the number of persons present than at the first concert, and the desolate appearance of a vacuum, which afflicted the eye on the previous evening, no longer made the ladies shiver in their evening costumes.

The concert began with a selection from Spohr's opera of Jessonda, embracing the overture and the various movements of the introduction, the principal voice parts sustained by Misses Birch and Williams, Messrs. Lockey and Machin. The execution of this fine music was creditable to all concerned, and the audience received it with especial favour.

The new cantata of Mr. Frank Mori, entitled Fridolin, was however the chief feature of the evening, and its complete success warranted all that had been predicated in its favour. The ballad of Fridolin, or Der Gang nach dem Eisenhammer, by Schiller, is well known, and has been translated into almost every European language. None can have forgotten how the virtuous Countess, Cunigunda, is attached to Fridolin, her faithful page; how the wicked Robert, envious of the favour of his lady, excites the jealousy of the Count, her husband, against Fridolin; how the Count, to revenge his supposed dishonour, bids Fridolin repair to the forge and ask the workmen—"Have ye fulfilled the task my lord set you?"—having previously given instructions that he who should first make this demand was to be thrown headlong into the furnace; how Fridolin, at the request of the Countess, who apprehends danger, stops at a chapel on the roadside to pray; how the wicked Robert, burning to know the issue of his machinations against the unhappy page, goes himself to the forge, and unthinkingly puts the question—"Have ye fulfilled the task my lord set ye?" and lastly, how the workmen, heedless of his protestations, immediately and without mercy, cast Robert into the burning furnace, where he expiates his sins by an unexpected and terrible death, leaving the intended victims of his envy to mutual explanation and renewed attachment. All this is embodied in Mr. Frank Mori's cantata, and has been reduced to verse, subservient to musical treatment, in a very able and effective manner, by Mr. J. Palgrave Simpson. The form in which Mr. Mori has arranged his music may be traced to Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Nacht, and some of the instrumental effects are not less deducible from that imaginative composition. Nevertheless there is enough of novelty and cleverness in Mr. Mori's Fridolin to entitle it to a more than ordinary share of respect. The overture is the least original portion of the work. It consists of a slow movement in A major, and an allegro agitato, beginning in A minor and ending in the major, the prominent ideas being afterwards employed to much better effect in the cantata. The chief merits of this overture are simplicity of design and clearness of instrumentation.

The opening chorus of vassals, "Now, rosy dawn," is of a pastoral character, not unlike in feeling to some parts of the introduction to Guillaume Tell, in the same key—although the melody is flowing, and by no means plagiarised. A chorus of huntsmen, bold and rhythmical, makes a happy contrast and an appropriate episode. A soprano air, "So good and mild" (sung by Miss Birch), in which Fridolin indulges in the praises of his mistress, is in the florid style, and embodies with considerable grace the artless gaiety of the page. A short chorus which follows, "No pleasure can give," is light, sparkling, and brilliant. A recitative and air for contralto (Miss Dolby),

The cheering sun of that fond eye," in which the Countess alternately bewails her husband's growing coldness and hopes for the revival of his confidence, is thoughtful and happily completed. The andante is eminently vocal and melodious, besides which it has an earnestness of character that well befits the sentiment. The cabaletta, though impassioned and well opposed to the preceding, is less effectively adapted to the voice. A quartet, "That eager look" (Misses Birch and Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Formes), in which Robert spurs on the jealousy of the Count, while Cunigunda and Fridolin are wholly innocent of suspicion, is highly dramatic, and abounds in points of musical interest, especially in the last movement, where there are some striking passages. The unity of the morceau, however, is unhappily destroyed by the want of relationship in the keys of the movements.

We cannot suppose any possible authority for beginning a piece in C minor and ending in D major. Mr. Mori, elsewhere, sets the tonal relationship at defiance, but never with good effect. Our objection to the violation of a long venerated principle, which the greatest masters have invariably respected, is not a pedantic one, but founded on reasons both logical and natural, which, though it would be out of place to discuss here, are not the less worthy of careful investigation. Our chief, almost our only, objection to Mr. Mori's cantata is this entire indifference to the succession of keys in the various pieces as they follow each other, which necessarily destroys congruity, and gives to his work an air of a series of disconnected movements, instead of one continued whole.

An air for the Count, "Torn is the veil" (Mr. Sims Reeves), expresses with great dramatic force the feelings which torment the bosom of the jealous husband; a certain monotony of tone, however, partially derogates from the effect of this song, which, on reconsideration, might, we are convinced, be much improved in plan and development. A duet, "My lord commands" (Misses Birch and Dolby), in which Fridolin takes leave of his mistress before departing for the forge, of a light and popular character, is written with remarkable fluency, and highly effective both in its solo and combinations. The ensemble, with the bell tolling, "the vesper bell," &c., is deliciously tuneful. To be generally admired this duet, we are certain, has only to become generally known. The scene in which Fridolin prays at the chapel, consisting of solos for the page, mingled with choral responses, is admirably effective, but somewhat difficult to be executed in perfect tune, unless very carefully rehearsed. The finale, which involves the catastrophe of Robert's death, is the most striking portion of the cantata, and shows undeniable talent for dramatic composition. The savage energy of the choral passages vividly depicts the resolution of the iron-workers to fulfil the command of their master, the Count, while the frantic despair of Robert is powerfully conveyed in short and broken phrases. We could hardly have desired a more graphic musical embodiment of this impressive situation. After some recapitulatory passages in accompanied recitative, the finale and the cantata come to a termination with a beautiful trio and chorus, "Father of all"—the trio chiefly without accompaniments—in which the Count receives the explanation of the Countess, and a general reconciliation ensues. The theme is taken up by full chorus, and orchestra as a climax, and thus brings the work to a close with dignity and grandeur.

The general style of Mr. Mori's cantata belongs properly to the Italian school, although the indications of a leaning to a higher and more poetical style are not infrequent. As a first work, Fridolin may be praised unconditionally. It shows invention, fluency, taste, and experience in the use of voices and instruments; and the effect it has produced causes us to look forward with real pleasure to any future essay of the young composer, who has already, we are informed, completed an opera for the Italian stage. In the dearth of novelty such a fact is worthy the consideration of those who are interested in these matters.

The performance of Mr. Mori's cantata, which only enjoyed the advantage of one very imperfect rehearsal, was, under the circumstances, remarkably good. He conducted it himself—a decided advantage to all engaged in its performance, his manner of beating being pointed and intelligible. The principal singers—Misses Birch and Dolby, Messrs. Sims Reeves and Formes—exerted themselves strenuously to do justice to the music, and to them may be chiefly attributed its having passed the ordeal so triumphantly, since the orchestra and chorus were by no means efficient. At the end, Mr. Mori was applauded vociferously, and retired from the platform "with his laurels thick upon him."

The remainder of the concert must be shortly dismissed. Sterndale Bennett's romantic and beautiful concert-overture, The Naiades, introduced "by desire," was well played by the band, and much applauded. The first appearance of Madame Castellan, who had only just arrived, was an event, and the charming style in which this accomplished singer, who was warmly welcomed by the audience executed Rossini's aria, "Arpa gentil" (harp obbligato, Mr. Trust), proved that the fatigues of travelling were insufficient to mar the power and beauty of her voice. Sophie Cruvelli, already a universal favourite here, sang "Voi che sapete," and "Casta diva." We were pleased to observe that she refrained from ornamenting the flowing and simple melody of Mozart with any of those obtrusive changes and sfioriture introduced when she played Cherubino, for the first time, at Her Majesty's Theatre, but which she subsequently left out, as we noticed last week, adhering rigidly to the text. The omission of roulades deprived the air of none of its vocal effect but lent a double charm to the genuine and exquisite expression with which she sang it. We need say nothing of Cruvelli's "Casta diva," except that, on the whole, we have never heard her sing it with more fire and brilliancy; the cabaletta, more especially, was a masterly display of vocal power and facility.

Madame Castellan sang Rode's air varié in a highly effective manner; but this, like the two airs of Cruvelli, was marred by the slovenly and imperfect style in which the orchestral accompaniments were played. On more than one occasion the singers were almost brought to a standstill. The reason was obvious—they had not been rehearsed at all. Herr Formes sang the "Revenge" song from Der Freischütz with immense energy, and was loudly encored. He declined to repeat it, however, thereby setting an example which other popular singers might advantageously follow. The madrigal on this occasion was Benet's "All creatures now are merry minded," a gem in its way, and remarkably well sung. Among the features of the evening was the andante from the long duet in La Donna del Lago, by Madame Castellan and Miss Dolby; Gluck's "Che farò," sang by Miss Williams, and deservedly applauded; Mr. Costa's beautiful terzetto, "Vanne a colei che adoro," by Miss Williams, Messrs. Sims Reeves and Lockey, an extremely good performance; and a graceful new ballad (MS.), called "The Emigrant's Farewell," by the Rev. Robert Sarjant, which Miss Dolby sang to perfection. The concert terminated with the March from Mendelssohn's Athalie, which kept almost everybody in the room till the end. Nevertheless, the programme was a great deal too long. Owing to the rain, which fell in torrents, a tedious period elapsed before the visitors could get into their carriages. The arrangements, by the way, are very deficient in this particular, and discomfort and inconvenience are inevitable.

This morning, another favourable change in the weather which has coquetted during the week in an extraordinary manner, was propitious to the charity, and insured a larger attendance at the cathedral than even that of the last festival on the second day. The performance embraced a great portion of Handel's Samson, a miscellaneous selection, and the whole of Spohr's Last Judgment—an unreasonably long programme. Of Samson we are not compelled to say more than that it was for the most part well executed, although not so well as the Elijah yesterday. To Mr. Sims Reeves was allotted the music of Samson, and we never heard him sing the air, "Why does the God of Israel sleep?" more effectively. Herr Formes, who sustained the part of Harapha, produced a marked impression in the animated air, "Honour and arms," which is perfectly suited to his strong and sonorous voice. Another impressive performance was Micah's air, "Return, O God of Hosts," by Miss Dolby, who is always at her ease in this music. Mr. Machin was in much better voice to-day, and gave the recitatives of Manoah in a very able manner. The difficult air, "Let the bright seraphim," with trumpet obligato (Mr. Harper), was allotted to Mdle. Cruvelli, who in the elaborate divisions with which Handel has overloaded this celebrated piece, found herself much more trammelled with the words than in "Hear ye, Israel," which, moreover, is better suited to her style. She, nevertheless, acquitted herself admirably as far as vocal execution was concerned; and the clearness and resonance of her upper tones were strikingly conspicuous. Her reading of the air was vigorous and bold—precisely, indeed, what is required. She must master the English text, however, before she essays it again. A command of the language once obtained, we have little doubt that Mdle. Cruvelli will become one of the best singers of Handel and Mendelssohn. In the two airs she has already essayed she has proved her reverence for established forms by not attempting to interpolate a single ornament or variation, and this cannot be said of many foreign singers of renown.

The choruses in Samson, not inferior in some respects to those of Israel and the Messiah, were in many instances well and steadily executed. The most striking were "Fix'd in his everlasting seat," "Let their celestial concerts," and "Awake the harp." The choruses of the Philistines, and that of the Israelites, "Weep, Israel," however, were deficient in clearness and precision. The Dead March was given too slow; but the effect of the drum (played by Mr. Chipp) reverberating through the aisles, and in the choir, was wonderfully solemn and impressive. Some new additional accompaniments to the score of Handel were used on this occasion, which are by far the best written, the most discreet, and the least obtrusive we have heard. Their author was not mentioned in the programme.

In the miscellaneous selection, Miss Birch sang "Holy, holy" in a very solemn style, the audience standing. This devotional song was introduced on the present occasion by the stewards in order to redeem themselves from the reproach directed against them at the festival of 1848, in consequence of Alboni having sung it in Italian. By the way, this should have been a warning to the directors not to put down foreign vocalists for English songs without being acquainted with their amount of proficiency in the English language. Cruvelli might have acted in the same manner as Alboni, without affording any reasonable ground of complaint. Madame Castellan's "With verdure clad," a chaste and efficient performance, made the most favourable impression on all present. Of Spohr's oratorio, The Last Judgment, which terminated this very lengthy selection at a late hour, we have only now time to say that the solo parts were intrusted to Misses Birch and Williams; Messrs. Lockey, Machin, and Herr Formes, and that the general performance, under Mr. Done's direction, was praiseworthy, if not perfect.

It is a fact worth noting—since it has acted materially against the interests of the meeting—that none of the great Catholic families of the counties of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, (who were wont, not only in some cases to officiate as stewards, but to promote the prospects of the triennial festivals of the three cities in a substantial manner), have come forward on the present occasion. The inference that the charity being in behalf of the widows and orphans of clergymen of the Church of England is the cause of the withdrawal of patronage in certain quarters, appears harsh at a first glance; but recent events and controversies allow of no other to be drawn.

ALBERT SMITH AND MONT BLANC.

Our trusty friend and witty collaborateur, Albert Smith, the soaring and go-a-head philosopher, the travel-stained and sea-sprinkled seeker after the wonderful, has taken his, as yet, highest flight in literature, and has absolutely scaled the summit of Mont Blanc, has kissed the grey head of the king of the Alps, and escaped without a limb being hurt, without a scratch. But hear the account, dated Chamounix, August 14th.—"This quiet Alpine valley has for the last week been in a most unusual state of activity and excitement. About seven days ago the people learned that three students from the University of Oxford, and an English author, were getting themselves into condition for attempting the ascent of Mont Blanc. Guides and villagers were at once on the qui vive, and the adventurous party were regarded with much interest wherever they went. On Tuesday morning, at seven o'clock, all the preparations being complete, the party set out from the Hotel de Londres. It included Mr. Floyd, said to be a son of the general of that name, and cousin of Sir Robert Peel; Mr. Phillips; a third Oxford man; and Mr. Albert Smith; with sixteen guides, sixteen porters, and a number of aspirants for the post of guide, who attended the voyagers and their paid party for the purpose of learning the route to the summit of the mountain. After their departure telescopes were fixed from the windows of the inn, and in other places, to watch the progress of the toilsome ascent, and before six o'clock it was evident the voyagers had crossed the great glacier, and had arrived at their resting place for the night—on the Grands Mulets. Yesterday morning, as soon as day-light afforded a clear view, the adventurers were again visible by the aid of a good glass, and by twelve o'clock were seen making the final ascent. They rested on the summit for about twenty minutes, and then commenced their descent, arriving here last night about seven o'clock. The excitement during the previous twenty-four hours had been very great in Chamounix. Anxious wives and parents having husbands and sons amongst the party up in the snows, and the interest being in no means diminished by the fact, that Sir Robert Peel (who had arrived here after the departure of his relative for the ascent) invited nearly all the men remaining in the village, about sixty in number, to an entertainment provided at an auberge, were they were supplied with wine and other popular liquors, in which to drink "the health of the Englishmen who were sleeping on Mont Blanc." This ceremony was performed very zealously, and repeated in the most willing manner again and again till long after midnight. When in the evening the party from Mont Blanc approached the village, nearly all the inhabitants assembled to meet them. Guns were fired in quick succession; the harps and fiddles of the valley were in requisition, and a sort of half-comical half-triumphant scene ensued. The travellers and guides looked rather jaded and sun-scorched, and had very bloodshot eyes and rather dilapidated costumes, but, in other respects, seemed to be in tolerable condition.

This successful ascent by four Englishmen turns the scale of numbers in favour of the English; the French tourists having been hitherto accustomed to point with satisfaction to the fact that more of their countrymen than of ours had succeeded in reaching the top of the King of the Alps. The present forms the 25th ascent—the first dating in 1787. The cost as well as the labour and danger of these daring excursions is very great. The talk of the village declares that the ascent will cost the party of four travellers fully £150. Albert Smith gives the following account in a letter to the Times:—"I was accompanied by three other gentlemen, from Christ Church, and 20 guides. We left Chamounix at seven o'clock in the morning, on Tuesday, and got to our bivouac on the glaciers at the Grands Mulets at four o'clock. Here we made a fire and dined, and at midnight started again with lanterns, as the moon was not up, along the Glacier de Tacconay, reaching the Grand Plateau (where the avalanche swept away Dr. Hamel's party in 1820) about four o'clock in the morning. After a great deal of trouble amongst the crevices, and having at times to cut each footstep in the ice with hatchets, we scaled the Mur de la Côté, and got to the summit of Mont Blanc at half past nine o'clock on Wednesday morning, where we remained half an hour in the enjoyment of a perfectly cloudless view. In descending we got back to the Grands Mulets by one o'clock. The most dangerous part of the journey now commenced, as the extreme heat of the day had thawed much of the snow on the Glacier du Bussons, which threatened at every step to give way beneath us. We were, however, all tied together with cords; but for this one of our party would have been lost. We ultimately arrived in safety at Chamounix at half-past six o'clock in the evening, where the whole village turned out to meet us, and a little fete was prepared by M. Tairraz, of the Hotel de Londres, in honour of our safe return. Guns were fired and wine distributed, and at night the bridge was illuminated with pine branches. I believe we formed the largest party ever assembled together on the summit: but the increased number of guides was necessary from the treacherous state of the snow, after the bad weather that has prevailed here lately."

Our facetious and multiple-sided contributor—who, by the way, has contributed nothing to the MUSICAL WORLD for an incalculable space of time—so much the worse for the Musical World in particular, and the World in general—has elevated himself higher than ever in public account. He has intrepidly and without vinegar surmounted the most insurmountable of the Alps. Let him be styled the literary Hannibal. Let him be crowned with an avalanche, and be sceptred with a mountain peak. Hereafter, deriving his nomenclature from as-cent, and not from de-scent, instead of Albert Smith, let him be dubbed

ALP-ERT SMITH.

MUSICAL FETE AT KIRKSTALL ABBEY.

(From the Leeds Intelligencer.)

The fine old monastic building of Kirkstall,
"Where Desolation day by day Holds dire communion with Decay—" though dismantled and in ruins, is still one of the most attractive and interesting spots in the whole valley of the Aire; and it is often the scene of much rational amusement and healthful recreation, upon which even the monkish men of old would not, we think, pass a word of censure. Indeed, historical records of Kirkstall Abbey—an edifice which "Lies a little low,

Because the monks preferred a hill behind
To shelter their devotion from the wind,"—

prove that the Cistercian brethren were not at all loath to a good carousal now and then, and that of their hospitality the sons and daughters of Leeds were wont to partake. One of the most pleasing of summer festivals—one which may be denominated a soiree musicale—took place within the precincts of the Abbey on Monday evening last; and though the ideas suggested by such a fete in such a spot could not be of the most unimixed character, nor be untinged with that seriousness which a contemplation of the ruins of any religious temple is sure to produce in a well-regulated mind, it is not too much to say that many of the former occupants of the building, ere Bluff King Harry brought monks, friars, and nuns of all orders to a reckoning, would have expressed pleasure, under the altered circumstances of the times, at the festive proceedings of which we are about to give a passing notice. The Philharmonic Society in connexion with the Mechanics' Institution, consists of a great number of the vocal and instrumental performers, amateur and professional, of the town of Leeds, and was on Monday night, as on former occasions, conducted in the performances by Mr. Spark, the accomplished organist of St. George's church; and Mr. Bowling, organist of East Parade Independent chapel, was the leader. Both these gentlemen, and the performers generally, deserve commendation for the way in which they acquitted themselves in their different parts. The first part consisted of sacred music, opening with Weber's "Mass in G," which was given with care and solemn effect, but much of its force and that of all the subsequent pieces were dissipated as it were "on the desert air;" for the performers and the auditory stood within the roofless nave—the former just without the west side of the chancel—and the sweet sounds of both instruments and vocalists had to contend with slight currents of air from the open side of the transept and the wide space in which formerly stood the east window. Yet some of the music fell with peculiar richness upon the ear—soft, subdued, fitful, and though, owing to the circumstances we have named, there was a want of unity and strength, the general effect was one of extremely gentle pleasure. It was, like the song of the nightingale,

"Most musical, most melancholy."

A Sanctus, by Bertinausky, without instrumental accompaniments, and Palestrina's anthem, "We have heard," were given with much taste. The chief vocalists were Miss Brown, Miss Milner, Mrs. Gill, Miss Cooke, and Messrs. Cawthra, Mellor, Cooke, Cavill, Milner, and Rider, all of whom were in good voice, and fully maintained their professional reputation. Between the first and second parts, refreshments, in the shape of a plentiful supply of beef and ham sandwiches and nut-brown ale, provided by Mr. Stanwix, of the Victoria Dining Rooms, Briggate, were served in the Chapter House, the architectural beauties of which were made apparent to the visitors by a number of naphtha lamps suspended from different parts of the spacious apartment. After the viands had been duly discussed, the spirits of the numerous party seemed much enlivened, and a selection of secular music—madrigals, glees, choruses, &c.—was performed as the second part of the musical entertainment, ending with the National Anthem, which concluded a little before ten o'clock at night. The nave, during the performance of the second part, was well lighted with naphtha lamps—one of the most useful modern discoveries in the art of producing artificial illumination. By the skilful exertions of Mr. Huggon, the teacher of the chemical class at the Mechanics' Institution, the nave, chancel, and transept of the Abbey were for a short period lighted with a variety of coloured fires, which gave a novel and pleasing appearance to the objects that came within their influence. The rich crimson and green lights, varying in every degree of vividness and intenseness, and passing from object to object, living and inanimate, gave an air of almost supernatural beauty to the assembled company of well-dressed ladies and gentlemen, the majestic columns and windows of the ruin, the waving alder tree in the nave, and all the other objects around. A special train on the Leeds and Thirsk railway conveyed nearly the whole of the delighted company to Leeds between ten and eleven o'clock. The fete in every respect passed off well, and thanks are due to Mr. Traice, the indefatigable secretary, Mr. John Bingley, the honorary secretary, and other members of the Mechanics' Institution, as well as to the members of the Philharmonic Society, for the excellency of the arrangements, and the successful way in which they were carried out. Thanks are also due to George Hayward, Esq., of Headingley, for having kindly given permission for the Festival to be held at the Abbey.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The spirited direction of the affairs of this Society not only commands but deserves signal success, and right glad are we to hear that the profits of this season already approach near upon two thousand pounds. Udaunted by the Worcester Festival which took from them not only their principal singers but many of their band, the Society set to work in an indomitable spirit and collected at the performance of the Messiah last night a band equal in every respect to that we have been usually accustomed to at the Society's Concerts. Madame Novello sang the music allotted to the soprano in the most chaste and expressive manner, and taking advice from the numerous kind friends by whom she is surrounded indulged less in that excessive fioriture which, although displaying the richness of her voice and her facility of vocalization, is hardly allowable in the music of the Messiah. Both Miss Dolby and Miss Williams being at Worcester, the circumstance afforded the Society an excellent opportunity of calling to their assistance Madame Macfarren for the contralto, and we are persuaded that, judging from the beautifully devotional style of this lady's singing, the Society will be glad to engage her services on many future occasions. We never, on any former opportunity, rose so impressed with the truly solemn air, "He was despised," as last night, the reading imparted to it by Madame Macfarren bringing tears to the eyes of many of the audience. Her recitatives were magnificent, and in the concerted music, her intonation was perfect. The tenor part of the oratorio was divided between Messrs. Benson and Manvers, and the evident pains taken by both gentlemen reconciled us to the absence of the tenor artistes usually engaged. Much as we admire Herr Formes, the reappearance of Mr. Phillips last night gave us cause to remark the extreme smoothness and delicacy of his rendering of the bass part of the Messiah, and confirmed us still stronger in the opinion we have long entertained, that for Handel's music we know no more conscientious singer than Mr. Phillips. His reverence for the text, and his expressive manner of rendering it, never fail to produce unmixed satisfaction amongst his audience. The choruses went magnificently, and, although Mr. Costa had amongst his forces some not accustomed to his baton, his unfailing nerve and rigid discipline were never less called into strong operation, the whole performance going off with remarkable precision, and with apparently less than the usual amount of exertion on his part. The Hall was crowded to suffocation. The Elijah is announced for next Friday, with Madame Novello, Misses Dolby and Williams, Mr. Sims Reeves and Herr Formes.

FIDELIO.

(Continued from our last.)

